The real question is whether there are enough in this period of political running for cover to vote their convictions and stop once and for all a reckless assault on the Constitution.

Investments vs. Hamburgers

Reagan's Chief 'Supply-Sider' Miscalculates Speed of Money

By Gus Tyler

WHAT MAKES money run?

Yes, money does run. In economics, the speed is called "velocity." It's a measure of how fast the buck passes from hand to hand.

The subject came up in a very sophisticated debate between Murray Weidenbaum, the chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, and George Perry, an economist at the Brookings Institution, on the subject of "supply-side" economics.

PERRY SAID the Administration was caught in a contradiction. How could it increase investment to swell "supply" while, at the same time, backing the Federal Reserve Board in its strategy to limit the money supply?

Weidenbaum answered with one word: velocity. That meant that while there would be fewer dollars, each dollar would race around at greater speed.

Perry raised two objections: first, if the buck were to run fast enough to expand the economy as Weidenbaum projected in spite of restricted money supply, the buck would have to break all world records, moving about four times faster than ever in history; second, if money started moving that fast, it would again be "inflationary" and would induce the Federal Reserve to restrict the money supply even further.

Weidenbaum did not seem to have an effective answer in this debate that appeared at length in the New York Times back on April 19.

BEHIND HIS SILENCE lurks the real agenda of the Administration: the redistribution of national income from the lower tiers to the top tier of the nation.

There is only one way to get more money for "investment" while curtailing the money supply. The way is to transfer income to the top, to the relatively small portion of the population that lives primarily, sometimes exclusively, on its investments.

Here's how it can be done. McDonald Corp., the fast food outfit, has—according to a recent report—350,000 employees. Assume about half of these are the kids you meet face to face when you buy a hamburger. If this Administration puts through a youth subminimum wage, most of the youngsters will get 85 cents less per hour. This means that McDonald's will profit by about $150,000 an hour.

THIS MULTI-MILLION dollar transfer payment from the kids to the corporation is but one slight example of the overall policy that goes under the deceptive name of "supply-side" economics. Taking away school lunches, child nutrition or legal aid while giving sizable tax reductions to the most affluent are other examples.

Putting fairness aside, will this enrichment of the rich increase the supply? Most unlikely. McDonald's might have the money to turn out more hamburgers, but if all that money is up there in the hands of the "investing" class, who will buy the hamburgers?

Social Justice Linked To Freedom's Cause

The defense of freedom in the world must go hand in hand with the continuing struggle for social and economic justice at home.

Democracy is not likely to win either the ideological or the power struggle if this country, its strongest champion, appears to the world as the advocate of an economic philosophy that embraces injustice and urges a return to 19th Century concepts of laissez-faire and the survival of the richest.

We do not subscribe to the notion that a promise of economic security is equal in value or an alternative to human freedom and human rights. Nevertheless, high unemployment, inflation, idle resources, and declining social services do poor service to the case for democracy and undermine the economic base for the material defense of democracy's interests. . . .

A just society does not fall into place of its own accord. It is the product of sacrifice and struggle. No one knows that lesson better than the labor movement and its allies. It is they who have done the sacrificing and the struggling to construct, piece by piece, the elements of a more compassionate and fair society.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at a Social Democrats U.S.A., dinner honoring Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason, June 2, 1981.

The Thatcher Experiment

Reagan-Style Economic Policy Tilts Britain into Deeper Skid

The following article is excerpted from the current issue of the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine. The author is Bill Callaghan, who heads the economic department of the British Trades Union Congress.

MUCH OF THE U.S. economic plan unveiled by President Reagan in early 1981 has a familiar ring to British ears because Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has pursued much the same course in England in the last two years. In those two years, output has slumped, unemployment has doubled and inflation is still above what it was when Mrs. Thatcher took office and set out to correct an inflation rate of less than 10 percent.

Unemployment has not spared any segment of the United Kingdom. In every region, including the previously prosperous Southeast and West Midlands, registered unemployment far outstrips registered vacancies. No matter how mobile British workers and their families are, they will find it difficult to get a job in any region they move to.

The irony of the policies pursued by the United Kingdom over the past two years is that they have actually made inflation higher rather than lower.

The simple fact is that the United Kingdom Government has deflated the economy. The Government was pinning all its hopes on the new incentives it thought it was creating by the cuts in income tax. Like President Reagan, Mrs. Thatcher seems to believe in the "Laffer" curve. Unfortunately for both of them, no evidence has been proved to show this curve exists.

BIG BUSINESS in Britain was clamoring before the 1979 election for cuts in income tax rates. They were duly rewarded when the first budget introduced by the Conservative Government slashed income tax rates, particularly for those on high incomes.

For most ordinary people the income tax cuts were more than offset by a near doubling of the UK sales tax (value added tax) and by the cuts in public expenditure. But the people lucky enough to earn 50,000 pounds (or $110,000) a year, top managers and executives, were given a 50 percent increase in their take-home pay. But these tax cuts did not make them work harder or put new life into the economy because of the added incentives. And the overall economic environment is so harmful and interest rates so high that there is little room for private initiative or enterprise.

A CENTRAL ELEMENT of Mrs. Thatcher's policy has been to pursue tight money and high interest rates. The monetarist argument is full of flaws. First, it is quite clear that there is no strong causal link between increases in the money supply and increases in the rate of inflation. All the monetarists can say is that there is an impact of changes in the money supply on inflation after a

Unfortunately no one can agree how long that time lag is: some say 18 months; some say two years; and some say five years. This is hardly the basis for a well-worked out policy of economic management.

Secondly, there is no proven connection between changes in the budget balance and changes in the money supply. In Britain, debate has centered on the public sector deficit known as the public sector borrowing requirement (PSBR). Despite the lack of any proven connection between the PSBR and the money supply, the main attention given by this Government has been to reducing the PSBR. But it has failed, and it has failed miserably.

THE UK GOVERNMENT has made clear its determination not to change from its course, but the reality is that in certain areas the Government has been forced to modify and sometimes change its plans.

Recently it has been forced to provide extra financing for the coal and steel industries, as part of a belated recognition that these two core sectors cannot be left to the whims of market forces. Forcing short-term financial viability on these industries can in fact mean long-run decline.

These belated signs of repentance are welcome, but they do not add up to a change of strategy. As it nears the end of its second year in office, the Thatcher Government has been forced to recognize some elements of political and economic reality—but a much more significant shift in policy will be necessary if the economy is going to be put on the road to recovery.

ALL AMERICANS should study the British economic experiment. It is rather uncomfortable being inside the test tube, but outside observers should recognize the experiment has not been a success. Of course, some will always blame the failure on government not applying the monetarist discipline tightly enough.

Indeed, U.S. Professor Milton Friedman, one of Mrs. Thatcher's economic gurus, has already criticized the Bank of England for not applying the monetary screws even tighter. The cost to the British economy of the present policies has been enormous. The cost of an even tighter fiscal and monetary policy is beyond belief. Unemployment and bankruptcies would have been higher still. It's possible that government, in adopting such a draconian policy, might cure the disease of inflation, but in doing so kill the patient, the British economy.

Both the UK and U.S. economies have tremendous potential, which if properly harnessed can bring benefits to British and American workers, as well as workers in the less developed countries of the Third World. But if President Reagan is going to adopt Mrs. Thatcher's economic policies, then American workers are in for a rough ride.

In Strike Skirmishes

Union Rights Periled in Drive To Tag Extortion Law on Pickets

THE CAMPAIGN to subject workers striking for better wages or conditions to the penalties of the federal extortion law is an attempt to deny union members their lawful rights, not to improve the level of law enforcement, AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Howard Marlowe declared.

Acts of violence, "whether they be on the picket line or at a ballgame," should be prosecuted by state and local authorities, Marlowe said. He added that the obvious aim of the campaign mounted by the National Right to Work Committee and other anti-union groups is "to intimidate workers from striking for their legitimate rights." He pointed out that the measure sponsored by Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) would reverse the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that actual or relative picket line disturbances are not extortion under the terms of the Hobbs Act.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Marlowe rejected the contention of those pushing the measure that it would also make "violence on the part of employers" a federal crime.

"EXTORTION MEANS that you want to take something material that somebody else has," he noted, and since a struck employer isn't seeking to take something material from the strikers, "there is no way he can extort from an employee," and would therefore be exempt from the Hobbs Act.

"In effect, if an employer or his agent went out to the picket line and threw a punch, he would be subject to state and local prosecution, whereas an employee who hit back would be subject to federal prosecution" and far greater penalties, Marlowe stressed.

Reporters questioning Marlowe were Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News and Dale McFeatters, of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The program is produced by the AFL-CIO as a public service and is broadcast weekly on the Mutual radio network.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

FOR THOSE WHO live in urban areas, the Reagan Administration proposals to slash social spending and to fold targeted aid programs into block grants to the states at reduced levels is bad news.

These are some of the things the cutbacks would mean: An acceleration of municipal bankruptcies; higher taxes and fees; reduced services ranging from public education to mass transit; more layoffs of city employees, including teachers; less subsidized housing construction, and higher rents for public housing tenants.

Although nearly all municipalities would be adversely affected hardest hit would be the large cities in the East and Midwest. The financial base of the cities has been eroded by recent high levels of unemployment and the exodus in past years of businesses, jobs and middle-income people to the suburbs and outlying areas. And within these cities, low-income and elderly people will be the ones to suffer most.

THESE GRIM REALITIES are described in four recent studies and surveys—by the Joint Economic Committee of Congress, the House Democratic Study Group, the U.S. Conference of Mayors and the American Federation of Teachers.

The JEC study, which surveyed 275 cities around the nation, stated that even without the Reagan budget cuts, the situation of most municipalities is "bleak."

"Because of the magnitude of the proposed federal cuts and the abruptness with which they are likely to be implemented," said the JEC report, "many economic development initiatives will be reversed, the population of many cities will be forced to forgo certain services and to pay more for others, and an increasing number of cities will find themselves on the brink of fiscal collapse."

Among the 36 large cities surveyed, 70 percent were in deficit in fiscal 1980, and all but four anticipated deficits in the current fiscal year.

Wage increases of municipal workers—sometimes used as a scapegoat for cities' fiscal problems—almost always lagged behind inflation in recent years, the JEC survey acknowledged.

As a long-range solution for the urban crisis, "the results of this study strongly support the need for reindustrialization policies," said the JEC survey.

THE REPORT by the House Democratic Study Group is stark in its conclusions. The Reagan cuts, taking $20 billion from urban programs in fiscal 1982, "will bring efforts to revitalize cities to a standstill," it states.

"The loss of thousands of jobs and reduced services for the poor and disadvantaged will compound existing urban problems and increase dissatisfaction and unrest in the nation's cities," predicts the DSG report.

The Reagan program, touted as a plan for "economic recovery," reads more like a prescription for disaster, the DSG said.

The Conference of Mayors surveyed 100 cities of various sizes and found that the block grant consolidation would have "an adverse affect on 87 percent of the cities." The survey said city officials were concerned about cuts in services and "about anticipated problems caused by state administration of funds."

The Teachers union, in its 1981 survey of the 30 largest cities, looked at the key indices of financial health and found seven cities under "very high stress": Washington, D.C., New York City, Boston, Atlanta, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Cleveland. Under "high stress" were: Detroit, St. Louis, San Francisco, Chicago and Nashville.

Instead of moving backwards, Congress—which now is in the process of acting on the Administration's program—should provide the resources needed to revitalize the cities instead of permitting them to slide further into decay and despair.

INTIMIDATION OF strikers, not improved law enforcement, is the aim of anti-union groups that are trying to classify picket line disturbances as extortion under the Hobbs Act, AFL-CIO Associate Director Howard Marlowe, center, declared. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Jerome Cahill, left, of the New York Daily News and Dale McFeatters of Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Race Car No. 31 Carries IAM Colors

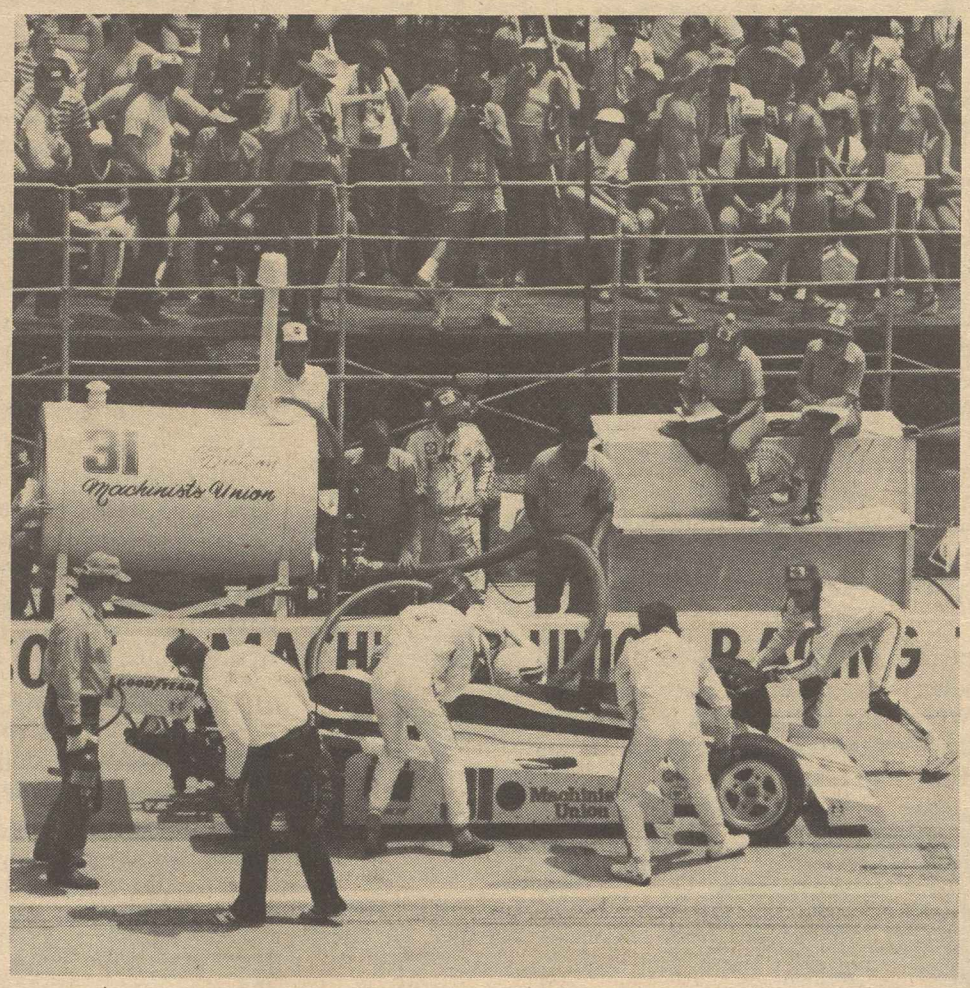
Race car No. 31 is carrying the Machinists' union emblem in this year's championship class circuit.

The red, white and blue machine is the centerpiece of the IAM's racing team which has a respectable showing in the Indianapolis 500 and the Gould Rex Mays 150-mile race—two major events in USAC (U.S. Auto Club) and CART (Championship Auto Racing Team) competition.

THE IAM TEAM hit the big time this year with its new Penske-Cosworth car after running an experimental season in 1980 with another machine that was refitted with a new engine and now serves as the backup car for No. 31.

With driver Lay Dickson behind the wheel, the union's P-C-7 finished 18th in the Indy Memorial Day classic and improved its standing by finishing 10th at the Wisconsin State Fair Speedway on June 8 in the Gould Rex Mays. For the year, the IAM team ranks 17th among the 105 teams on the big car circuit.

Dickson, the only three-time USAC sprint car champion, will again be driving No. 31 in the next major CART race—the Atlanta Twin 125 on June 28.



Dickson had to drop out of the Indy 500 after completing 165 laps when the car's turbocharger blew. Even so, the IAM racing team was awarded $30,600 in prize money for its finish in a field of 33 entries and collected $6,000 in the Wisconsin race.

Number 31 is powered with a Cosworth/Ford engine that develops about 700 horsepower at 10,200 revolutions per minute. The car was clocked at speeds of more than 230 miles an hour at Indianapolis.

KEEPING THE machine in top running order are chief mechanic Howard Millican, assistant Chuck Swearengin and journeyman machinist Anita Millican, the chief mechanic's wife. She is the only woman machinist on the major race car circuit.

Chief mechanic Millican built the first gas-power turbine car used at Indianapolis in 1969, and the following year constructed the first rear-engine Offenhauser that raced in the Indy.

The racing team is expected to log 20,000 miles this year hauling its race cars—the P-C-7 No. 31 and the No. 30 backup car—to USAC and CART events. The cars and support equipment are transported in a tractor-trailer rig bearing a giant Machinists union racing team logo. The rig was purchased with the help of many IAM automotive local unions and district councils, the union reported.

MACHINISTS PIT CREW at the Indianapolis 500 scrambles to get the union's Penske-Cosworth race car refueled and back into the running. The IAM's No. 31 racer came in 18th in the Memorial Day classic and collected $30,600 in prize money.

Regulation on Toxic Labels Held Essential

Workers have a "right-to-know" about the health hazards they encounter at work, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers declared at House hearings.

Legislative Director Nolan W. Hancock and other OCAW witnesses voiced the union's disagreement with the decision of the Reagan Administration to withdraw a proposal by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration dealing with labeling of hazardous substances.

THE RULEMAKING procedure had just begun, Hancock stressed, and the chemical industry would have had ample time to make its case. In fact, he noted, withdrawal of the proposal also cancelled scheduled hearings at which interested parties were to have commented.

The only possible reason for the Administration's "hurried" action, Hancock suggested, is its "eagerness to please the chemical industry."

Nolan and OCAW Occupational Health Specialist Sylvia Krekel testified that without the added force of federal regulation, the union must constantly battle to obtain from employers the specific information needed to evaluate hazards and avoid overexposure.

The industry concept of adequate warning labels, the union witnesses testified, is along the lines of posting a "do not inhale" warning on a drum of chemicals or using a letter and number code to identify a product instead of a label carrying the chemical name.

THE "COST-BENEFIT" analyses that the Reagan Administration has said it will use to judge the need for regulations ignores the social costs of occupational disease, the OCAW said. While employers may save some money through lack of regulation, "the workers bear the costs, the deaths and disease," the union observed.

Earlier, the AFL-CIO charged that the Labor Dept. had withdrawn the OSHA proposal in response to political pressure from the chemical industry "and orders by the Office of Management & Budget." The House hearings were conducted by an Education & Labor subcommittee headed by Rep. Joseph M. Gaydos (D-Pa.).

The Reagan Administration has moved against a number of other OSHA protections initiated by the Carter Administration, including walkaround compensation, cotton dust and lead exposure standards and a hearing conservation program.

Fund Cuts Seen Threatening Role of Public Broadcasting

If public broadcasting is to perform its role, adequate public funding must be made available to keep it insulated as much as possible from outside political influences, the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees told Congress.

Bills substantially reducing the already inadequate funding for public broadcasting are now before lawmakers and threaten to exacerbate the problem, Dept. Director Jack Golodner warned in testimony before a House Energy & Commerce Committee.

"PUBLIC BROADCASTING was called into being to provide a communications medium governed by different concerns in the belief that different voices would find a place there," he said. "This is a vital role in a democracy.

"By and large, we find that public broadcasting officials are very much aware of the unique role they must play and they share our concern that it be done well—without deviation. But money is a problem.

"Supporting the democratic dialogue in a time of infinitely complex communication modes does not come cheaply. Though feeding our souls in a democracy is not quite as expensive as saving our skins, it does require some financial sacrifice."

The House bills call for a steady reduction in funds for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting between 1984 and 1986. One bill, introduced by Rep. James Collins (R-Tex.), the ranking minority member of the House Telecommunications subcommittee, would authorize the appropriation of only $100 million each for fiscal years 1984 and 1985 and $90 million for 1986. The bill also would cut back funds already appropriated to the CPB for fiscal years 1982 and 1983.

A BILL introduced by Rep. Tim Wirth (D-Colo.) would authorize CPB appropriations of $160 million in 1984, $145 million in 1985, and $130 million in 1986, and allow public broadcasters to use their facilities for other revenue producing purposes.

The Collins bill, the more stringent measure, also would reduce the membership on CPB's board of directors from 15 to 7, a move opposed by the AFL-CIO.

Jobless Rate Up Sharply in May To 7.6 Percent

month totaled 125,000, and primarily reflected the industry's continuing deterioration, BLS said. After posting increases throughout the last half of 1980, construction employment has decreased steadily since last January.

Job growth continued in the services industry, however, as employment rose by 90,000 over the month. Retail trade employment increased by 75,000, recovering most of the job loss posted between March and April. Elsewhere in the service sector, there were slight gains in finance, insurance and real estate while government employment edged down.

In an analysis of the composition of the nation's unemployed workers, Commissioner Norwood said that 43 percent of the 8.2 million jobless last month were men, 35 percent women, and the remaining 22 percent teenagers.

Half of the unemployed in May had lost their last job, she noted. Of these, about one-third were on layoff status, expecting recall at some future date, and the other two-thirds had been permanently separated from their former employer. Voluntary departure from the last job accounted for 12 percent of the unemployed.

Chain Store Workers Affiliate with UFCW

Scranton, Pa.—The Giant Markets Employees Association, which has represented workers at a chain of 15 stores in the Scranton-Wilkes-Barre area for 35 years, formally voted to affiliate with the Food & Commercial Workers. Giant employs 725.

Frank Colella, president of the association, said the vote to affiliate was overwhelming, and that possible sale of the stores may have persuaded the Giant workers that they could no longer stand alone but needed representation from an experienced AFL-CIO union.

Insurance Union to Step Up Drive for Clerical Workers

Miami Beach—Delegates to the Insurance Workers 12th biennial convention drafted plans for expanding the union's membership by organizing clerical workers in companies under IWIU contract.

More than 90 percent of the IWIU's present membership is made up of insurance agents, and the resolution calling for the campaign to bring in other white-collar workers in the insurance industry was unanimously adopted by the 325 delegates as vital to "consolidate the union's gains and strength."

THE CONVENTION also called on the union's leadership to continue to pursue a merger in "all possible haste" with a larger union while enabling the IWIU to retain its identity.

During the past two years, IWIU officials have conducted merger discussions with the Office & Professional Employees and the Ladies' Garment Workers.

In his opening remarks to the convention, IWIU President Joseph Pollack told delegates that economic conditions, changes in insurance merchandising systems and anti-union campaigns by certain companies have affected the union's membership.

Pollack reported that during the two years since the last convention, IWIU won 46 and lost 52 representation elections.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the delegates that the labor movement's programs face a stiff challenge from the Reagan Administration and the Republican-dominated Senate.

"The Reaganites are delivering the worst attacks on the rights of working people, on consumers and on the standard of living of the average American in 50 years," Donahue said.

One of the biggest tasks that labor faces, he stressed, is to mount a strong defense of social programs that have become a prime target of the Administration and its political allies.

The convention approved a two-step increase in monthly dues, which will rise from the current $9.50 to $10 next Aug. 1 and to $11 on Aug. 1, 1982. The entire 50-cent increase of the first step and 25 cents of the second step will go to local unions. The international will increase its per capita share of the dues by 75 cents as in the second step. The union's per capita payment is currently $7.25.

Delegates re-elected Pollack to a new two-year term. Also re-elected by acclamation were Sec.-Treas. Nicholas M. Rangione and Vice Presidents Lawrence Pellegrini, Andre B. Henault and Patrick McGrogan. Twenty-one incumbents and three new members were elected to the union's executive board.

Per Capita Tied to Wages

Clothing-Textile Union Charts Organizing Plan

Detroit—Delegates to the Clothing & Textile Workers convention backed up a resolution assigning "priority" to organizing activities with a constitutional amendment to shore up the union's finances.

After a spirited floor discussion in which a cross-section of the 3,000 ACTWU delegates participated, the convention approved a proposal to link future per capita dues increases to union-negotiated wage increases. Starting next October, the per capita will go up each year by the same percentage that wages went up in ACTWU contracts.

EXECUTIVE VICE President Scott Hoyman spoke to the delegates of the heavy penalty that all textile workers pay for the large segment of the industry that is still unorganized.

He cited advanced new technology that has "given a big boost to the profits of the industry"—and the failure of employers to share the fruits of that productivity increase with their workers. Hoyman said a survey of 23,000 textile workers in North Carolina this year found that workers in unorganized companies are paid no more for running new weaving machines than they previously made.

All textile workers are affected by such practices, he stressed. "The only way textile workers can achieve good wage standards is to help unorganized workers to organize."

Successful organizing is "not cheap" and in the face of employer hostility is seldom quick, Hoyman said, but experience has demonstrated that it "is possible."

DRAMATIC EVIDENCE was in the presence at the convention of delegates from 10 J. P. Stevens locals that now have union contracts.

At the opening of the convention, ACTWU President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman had sharply challenged Reagan Administration retreats from social justice, and a series of resolutions reinforced the criticism.

The delegates, representing 450,000 members in the United States and Canada, condemned the Reagan Administration's reliance on so-called "cost-benefit analysis" for regulations to protect workers and denounced its "flagrant attack on safety and health standards and workers' rights."

THE CONVENTION urged passage of legislation to require advanced notice to workers and their communities of plant closings.

Among other resolutions adopted were a strong affirmation of the equality of women in the workplace and in all phases of union and national life, reiterated concern over imports from low-wage areas, and an expression of thanks for the organizing efforts of the AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept. and the Canadian Labor Congress.

National Urban League President Vernon Jordan proposed a series of "alternatives" to President Reagan's proposals to cut food stamps, Medicaid and other programs for the poor. IUD President Howard D. Samuel, COPE Director Al Barkan and Americans for Democratic Action President Patsy Mink were among other convention speakers.

37 Groups Assail Plan to Scuttle Minority Goals

cluded the UAW, Mine Workers, NAACP, League of Women Voters, National Urban League, Coalition of Labor Union Women and Hispanic groups.

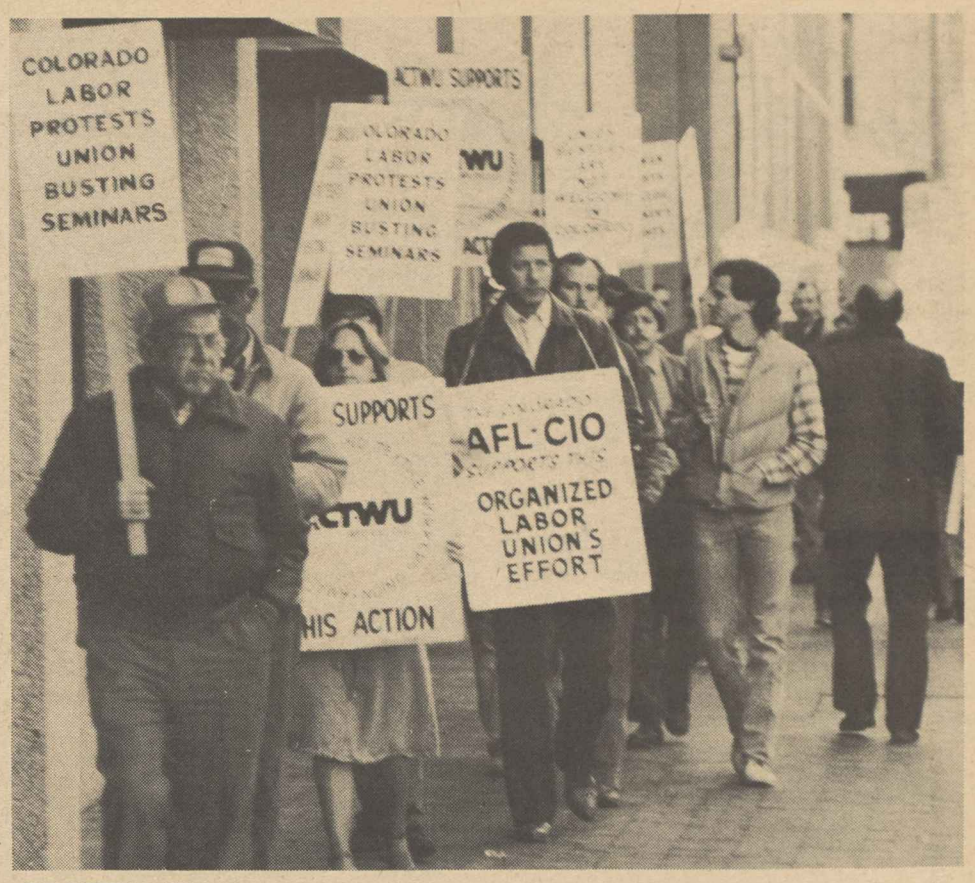
The organizations questioned the Labor Dept.'s claim that changes in the compliance regulations are necessary because it cannot enforce the rules with its present resources.

THE AFL-CIO and the other organizations "will assist in every way possible during the budget process" to secure the resources for a strong enforcement program, Kirkland said.

Texts of the proposed changes, which also include weakening of the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law and the Service Contract Act, have not been published. Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan and other department officials have outlined the changes in briefings.

Modifications in the rules suggested by the Carter Administration before it left office included some tightening of the regulations involving affirmative action programs and an expansion of the role unions could play in the exercise of programs under the Office of Federal Contract Compliance.

The Carter regulations were scheduled to go into effect Jan. 29, but were frozen by the Reagan Administration.



IN RELATED ACTION, attorneys for the AFL-CIO, the Auto Workers, Steelworkers, State, County & Municipal Employees, Laborers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers wrote Donovan earlier objecting to the freeze that reverted unions to the status of "observers" in OFCCP actions and investigations.

"The department should encourage, not thwart, union efforts to further equal employment opportunity through approaches consistent with trade union principles," the attorneys stressed.

AMONG THE CHANGES in affirmative action policy being studied by the Labor Dept. are the exemption of more small contractors from compliance, and a policy of permitting employers to indicate they have made "reasonable good faith efforts" to meet goals rather than document specific compliance.

Other points that were to be dealt with in the new regulations include:

- The appropriateness of back pay as a remedy for violations.
- Whether to set numerical goals for minority and female participation in construction.
- Whether non-federal work done by covered contractors should be exempted.
- Whether contractors must develop affirmative action plans for their non-construction employees.

PROTEST SIGNS carried by Colorado union members greeted participants in the Denver seminar by management consultant Charles Hughes on "Making Unions Unnecessary." Similar informational picketing took place at other cities where union-busting seminars were held.

Pickets Greet Participants In Union-Busting Seminars

Union members and picket signs urging "union-busters go home" met management consultant Charles Hughes at almost every turn on his recent swing through the West to conduct his seminars on "Making Unions Unnecessary."

State and local central labor bodies organized demonstrations and informational picket lines in Denver, Dallas and Edina, Minn., in April and May to spotlight the union-busting content of the seminars for management executives staked by Hughes's company, Executive Enterprises, Inc.

MORE THAN 300 union members took part in two days of picketing in Denver at the downtown hotel where Hughes's session was held. The demonstrations, which received wide press coverage, were a joint project of the Colorado AFL-CIO's organizing committee and the AFL-CIO's regional office in Denver.

It was the second time since February that the management consultant's presence in Denver was met by union members carrying signs declaring "Union-busters Are Not Welcome in Colorado."

Lunchtime demonstrations protesting the seminar were swelled by union members working on a number of nearby construction sites, AFL-CIO Representative Steve Beiringer said.

IN DALLAS, where Hughes's company is based, over 500 union members turned out for demonstrations organized by the Dallas AFL-CIO and Tarrant County Central Labor Council.

A local television talk show, filmed the same day, pitted Hughes in a debate with Texas AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard. The show was flooded with calls from union members questioning Hughes on the anti-union topics covered in his seminars and accompanying series of books.

Dallas AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Willie Chapman told reporters at a news conference that the union demonstrations were not directed against Hughes alone but at the entire union-busting consultant industry. He termed the consultant firms "parasitic organizations feeding off employer fear of the employee's capacity for good judgment."

CHAPMAN POINTED out that managers paid $550 each to attend the Executive Enterprises' seminar. The demonstrations were meant "to raise public awareness that eliminating unions is big business in America," he said.

Some 200 trade unionists met Hughes and employers arriving at his seminar in Edina, Minn., near Minneapolis, with banners urging, "Union Busters Go Home."

State AFL-CIO President David K. Roe said the demonstration was organized to shed light on the tactics, legal and illegal, advocated by Hughes and other management consultants to "delay and frustrate the legal rights of employees to choose by majority vote without coercion to join or not join a union."

QUOTING FROM topics listed in advertising for Executive Enterprises' seminars and from chapter headings in Hughes's books, Roe asserted that the consultants' techniques for thwarting union organization by creating a "happy" workforce are in fact a thinly disguised "new form of industrial paternalism."

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, which keeps tabs on the activities of union-busting firms, has called Hughes and Executive Enterprises "pioneers" in the lucrative seminar field.

One three-day seminar, attended by 60 employers and employer representatives, brought in $27,000, Charles McDonald, assistant director of the organizing department, said. Hughes schedules about 20 seminars a year, McDonald said, and the company also sells an array of books and literature giving advice on techniques for union avoidance and employee control.

New Textbook Developed For Labor Study Courses

The first in a series of college textbooks on labor studies subjects for use in a degree program at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies has been published by the Bureau of National Affairs, Inc., in Washington.

The book, Survey of Labor Relations by Dr. Lee Balliet, will be used in college courses dealing with the labor movement and by union officers, shop stewards, and union members who seek a clear understanding of the history and operations of American trade unions.

BALLIET'S WORK was commissioned by the Studies Center's Tripartite Program for Apprenticeship & Associate Degree in Labor Studies. The program offers union members an opportunity to earn college credits for apprenticeship training while working toward a two-year associate of arts degree in labor studies.

Balliet, of Morgantown, W. Va., is a consultant and teacher of economics and industrial relations. He has served as assistant professor at the University of Wisconsin School for Workers, at West Virginia University Institute for Labor Studies, and as associate director for Labor Education & Research at the University of Kentucky.

His book covers union development and behavior, the historical and legal foundations of labor-management relations in the United States, the structure and functions of unions, and the personalities and politics that helped shape the movement.

Collective bargaining and contract administration are treated historically with a description and discussion of major problems. The textbook also deals with discrimination against women and minorities, the consequences of technological change, conglomerate and multinational expansion, the workings of unions in other countries, and the prospect for U.S. trade unions.

PARTICIPATING IN the center's Tripartite Program, which is financed by a Labor Dept. grant, are Bunker Hill Community College, Charlestown, Mass.; College of the Mainland, Texas City, Tex.; Des Moines Area Community College, Des Moines, Ia., and Rhode Island Junior College, in Warwick.

More information on the program may be obtained from the Apprenticeship & Associate Degree Program, George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903.

Reagan Attacks Assailed

Social Security Promise Termed 'Earned Right'

New York—American workers have an "earned right" to the social security system as the foundation to their retirement security, AFL-CIO Vice President Sol C. Chaikin testified at hearings here.

The Administration's threats to cut social security protections violate a "moral compact between the government and its citizens" under which workers contribute to the system expecting to receive benefits from it when they are unable to work, Chaikin said. He testified as chairman of the AFL-CIO Social Security Committee before a subcommittee of the House Select Committee on Aging.

Chaikin, who is also president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, warned that the Reagan Administration's proposals to cut social security by nearly $82 billion by 1987 are so "horrendous" they may shock the American people into negotiating for what still amount to "major cuts."

CONGRESS SHOULD NOT look to benefit cuts to meet the problems of the social security system, he urged. It must protect both the system's financial integrity and its commitments, Chaikin said.

The AFL-CIO proposal, Chaikin said, is to use general revenues to partially finance all the system's programs.

A first step, he suggested, could be to finance up to 50 percent of Medicare from general revenues, a move acceptable to many who otherwise oppose such actions since Medicare benefits are not related to wages or contributions paid.

In addition, Chaikin testified, the AFL-CIO supports programs to avert the system's short-term financing problems including:

- Interfund borrowing when there is a temporary surplus in one social security trust fund and a shortage in another.
- Government contributions to the trust funds to make up for declines in income during periods of high unemployment and economic downturns.
- Change in the social security law to ensure that benefits would be paid from general revenues if payroll taxes are insufficient, a provision that was part of the law from 1944 to 1950.

Chaikin called the Administration's proposed cuts in social security "wrecking on a massive scale."

He pointed out that the suggested cut in benefits to workers taking early retirement ignores the fact that more than 70 percent of all workers who retire before 65 do so because of poor health, layoffs, or discontinuation of jobs. Further, he said, 80 percent of those who apply for disability benefits and are denied eligibility never find regular jobs again.

THE AFL-CIO OPPOSES all compromises that would raise the age of retirement, increase the amount of actuarial reduction or otherwise tamper with the early retirement provisions of the law, Chaikin said.

Such proposals would also have a "profound impact on collectively bargained pension plans and would devastate the value of their early retirement provisions," he warned.

Eisenberg Named to Equity Executive Post

New York—Alan D. Eisenberg, a Washington attorney who specializes in labor law, has been named to succeed Willard Swire as executive secretary of Actors' Equity next Oct. 1.

Eisenberg, 46, has been representing a number of local unions in the Washington area since 1972. He is a senior partner with the firm of Spelman, Eisenberg, Paul & Wagner. Before going into private practice, Eisenberg had been on the staff of the National Labor Relations Board.

Swire, formerly assistant executive secretary of Equity, has been serving as executive secretary on an interim basis since last October.

Senate Food Stamp Changes Hit Low-Income Households

Its projected savings come from such steps as changing the rules to bring eligibility standards closer to the poverty level, reducing the amount of deductions from earnings allowed for medical or dependent-care expenses, lengthening the disqualification of persons who voluntarily quit a job from 60 to 90 days, and postponing cost-of-living adjustments. The bill also would allow states to require recipients to work off the value of their stamps.

The Senate bill does not, however, include the Administration proposal to reduce a needy family's food stamp allotment by the value of the free school lunches a child might receive.

IN BOTH the Senate and House, committees were struggling with varying degrees of pain to cut programs within their jurisdiction sufficiently to meet the targets imposed in the budget that Congress adopted.

In the House, especially, there will be a strong effort to push up the budget ceilings to lessen the severity of some of the cuts that otherwise would be required.

Thus, the House Education & Labor Committee complied with the directive to slash $12.1 billion from its programs, but Chairman Carl D. Perkins (D-Ky.) said he will seek to restore part of the funds when the Budget Committee brings its "reconciliation bill" to the House floor. That's the bill that will encompass all of the program cuts made by the legislative committees.

PERKINS SAID the committee had acted reluctantly, "with a gun pointed at our heads" to wipe out nearly one-third of the funds that otherwise would be spent next year "for the nation's poor, handicapped, elderly and students."

On the Senate side, a coalition of Democrats and the more moderate Republicans on the Labor & Human Resources Committee sought to assure that such programs as federal funding of aid to disadvantaged elementary and secondary students and community health centers will be maintained and not left to the uncertainties of the block grant approach the Administration has favored.

Other committees were seeking in various ways to save the nation's passenger and freight railroad system from complete dismemberment, to assure funding of needed housing programs and to protect cost-of-living adjustments for retired federal and postal workers. Congress was having some second thoughts about the budget.

AT WINDUP of the coast-to-coast series of AFL-CIO regional conferences, a television news team interviews AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in New Orleans. The goal of the conferences was an interchange of views at all levels of the labor movement.

Retirement, Disability Cuts Not in Election's Mandate

By Rex Hardesty

New Orleans—The AFL-CIO series of seven 1981 regional conferences closed here with President Lane Kirkland declaring that when President Reagan proposes deep cuts in social security, he "is not fulfilling a mandate. He is breaking a promise."

Kirkland quoted Reagan's promise in the nationally televised debate of October 1980 that no one on social security would have "the rug pulled from under them."

Retired and disabled Americans who voted for Reagan obviously did not know that "they voted to cut their social security benefits by 23 percent," Kirkland said.

THE NEW ORLEANS conference was for the seven states of Louisiana, Mississippi, Texas, Missouri, Oklahoma, Kansas and Arkansas. It followed the same format as the other six conferences, which were held between March 5 and April 4 in Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Denver and Atlanta.

In each region the conference delegation comprised principal leadership from the state AFL-CIOs, central bodies and regional officers or representatives sent by international unions in response to a January 1981 invitation from Kirkland.

KIRKLAND STRESSED in New Orleans, as elsewhere, that he, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, and the 10 federation department directors conducting workshops "came to listen," and said, "We are not assembled to adopt new goals and policies—to do the work of constitutional conventions or the Executive Council."

Instead, Kirkland said, "we are here to discuss ways to more effectively carry out federation policy and achieve our goals.

"It is our job to enhance the well-being of our members through any educational, political, legislative or community activities that can advance the cause of workers."

He promised the participants that "the points that you have made will be brought to the attention of the appropriate bodies and committees of the Executive Council that are examining these issues and problems."

In his detailed "summing up" of the conferences, Donahue traced conference topics as disparate as higher local union affiliation with state and central bodies and a request for the federation to provide more material on the resurgence of the Ku Klux Klan and other far-right groups.

DONAHUE NOTED that the issues—from six one-hour workshops the first day and two more sessions the final morning—closely parallel the issues which are discussed "in any trade union forum, most notably the Executive Council."

"I don't think there's anything new about an effort to revitalize this movement," Donahue said. "In my local union in the early 1950s, we struggled with an extensive shop steward training because we knew that even a 16-year-old institution had to be continually revitalized."

Donahue noted, however, that the American labor movement's greatest strength, "our democratic nature," can lead to frustration because "it creates a very untidy system. It is not neat. It is hard to execute programs in democratic institutions."

Kirkland also noted that "we, as trade unionists, do aspire to far higher goals and more selfless purposes than any other element of human society. The challenge is great. It will be with us for a long time, but our common burden will be made all the lighter to the extent that we all shoulder it together. Our calling will then continue to be the most rewarding in spirit and certainly the happiest trade within the gift of the people that we serve."

Seafarers Back Shift Of Maritime Agency

The Seafarers support the Reagan Administration's plan to transfer the Maritime Administration from the Commerce Dept. to the Transportation Dept., SIU President Frank Drozak announced.

Drozak, who is also president of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., said he was assured by Transportation Dept. Sec. Drew Lewis that the agency will receive "proper representation in the Transportation Dept. and to the White House."

The transfer, which must be approved by Congress, will put all federal transportation agencies under one department.

Unanimous Vote By UAW Board Backs Affiliation

The UAW will also continue to work with the AFL-CIO "to save important governmental programs that are being callously slashed in Washington."

Fraser said UAW units at the state and local level will make their own decisions on affiliation with AFL-CIO central bodies. The UAW has set up a committee to study the question of affiliation with the Industrial Union Dept., Fraser added.

THE UAW and its late president, Walter P. Reuther, had a major role in the formation of the AFL-CIO in 1955. It left the federation in 1968 but in recent years has worked closely with the AFL-CIO on legislation and other union goals.

At the recent AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in Baltimore, Kirkland said at a news conference that the UAW's reaffiliation would be greeted "with rejoicing on the part of the affiliates and members of the AFL-CIO" and would "enhance the solidarity of the trade union movement in these difficult times."

Solidarity Day Set Sept. 19 to Rally Labor, Allies

The AFL-CIO will sponsor a Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington on Sept. 19 to protest the Reagan Administration's attack on vital social programs and to spotlight "demands for jobs and justice."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called on affiliates for "a maximum effort" and invited the participation of labor's allies in the Budget Coalition.

"A DEMONSTRATION of grass-roots, rank-and-file support" for social justice goals "will be the most effective response to the Administration's claim that it speaks for the working people of America," Kirkland said in letters to affiliates and central bodies.

In the labor federation's centennial year, he added, Solidarity Day will reaffirm "the historic commitment of the labor movement to social and economic progress."

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, June 20, 1981 No. 25

The concept of the demonstration was approved by the AFL-CIO Executive Council at its May meeting, and a committee was set up to work out the details. It includes Vice Presidents Charles H. Pillard, Lloyd McBride, Murray H. Finley, Albert Shanker and William H. Wynn.

Kirkland designated John Perkins, associate director of COPE, as the AFL-CIO's coordinator for Solidarity Day. He asked each affiliate and participating organization to appoint a Solidarity Day coordinator to work with Perkins for the biggest possible turnout for the Saturday demonstration.

The Budget Coalition organizations invited to participate include leading civil rights organizations, senior citizen groups and dozens of public interest organizations concerned over the severity of the Administration cutbacks.

A SUCCESSFUL demonstration, Kirkland wrote the coalition groups, can "refocus the nation's attention on our goals of social and economic justice for all."

Details of the Solidarity Day program are being worked out and will be announced later. Kirkland said at a news conference after the Executive Council meeting that the goal is to bring to Washington a broad cross-section of the trade union movement and allied groups.

Court Bars Cost Tests by OSHA

POSTAL SERVICE contract talks covering nearly 600,000 workers were formally initiated with the exchange of initial proposals by the parties. Representatives of the two biggest unions, the Postal Workers and the Letter Carriers, left, are shown at the opening meeting with USPS management officials. Current contracts expire July 20.

Labor Hails Decision on Cotton Dust

By John R. Oravec

The Supreme Court rejected all attempts to apply restrictive cost tests to job safety and health protections as it upheld the federal standard on worker exposure to cotton dust.

The 5-3 decision, hailed as a major victory by the AFL-CIO, was a direct rebuff to the Reagan Administration's hard-nosed strategy of dismantling OSHA regulations.

CITING THE intent of Congress in enacting the 1970 job safety law, the court held that feasibility should be the only limitation for providing safe and healthful workplaces.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, commenting on the court's cotton dust decision, said it not only upholds the safety law as Congress had intended, but also "vindicates the approach to enforcing OSHA taken by the labor movement and by the last Administration, and repudiates the efforts of the Reagan Administration to block a Supreme Court decision and to water down the act."

The high court's majority decision, written by Justice William J. Brennan, declared that "Congress itself defined the basic relationship between costs and benefits by placing the 'benefit' of worker health above all other considerations, save those making attainment of this 'benefit' unachievable."

BRENNAN WARNED that "any standard that strikes a different balance than that struck by Congress would be inconsistent with the command set forth" in the section of the law that covers the development of OSHA standards.

In another decision critical to worker

Labor Dept. Hit On Move to Sap Pay Protection

Labor Dept. proposals to narrow the protections of the Service Contract Act will unleash wage-slashing competition and undercut fair employers, the AFL-CIO charged.

The federation's ad hoc Service Contract Committee, meeting at AFL-CIO headquarters, issued the warning amid reports from the Labor Dept. that it will seek changes in the rules to curtail jurisdiction and enforcement of the 1965 law. The Service Contract Act requires employers who provide services to federal agencies to pay locally prevailing wages determined by the Secretary of Labor. It affects more workers than any other prevailing wage law.

TAKING PART in the meeting to discuss strategies for fighting the proposed changes were representatives of the Boilermakers, Carpenters, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Government Employees, Laborers, Machinists, Marine Engineers, Painters, Postal Workers, Seafarers, Service Employees and Theatrical Stage Employees as well as the AFL-CIO. The work their members perform for government ranges from cleaning and maintaining buildings to clerical work and technical support for the space program.

New rules to improve the administration and enforcement of the Service Contract Act were issued by the Carter Administration, but these regulations were pulled back for "further study" by the Reagan Administration. Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan said the regulations would be re-evaluated and subjected to cost-benefit analysis.

Initial Proposals Exchanged

Postal Unions Kick Off Bargaining for 600,000

The Postal Service and the two biggest unions representing about 500,000 of the agency's nearly 600,000 workers kicked off negotiations for a new contract by exchanging initial contract proposals.

In a joint statement, President Moe Biller of the Postal Workers and President Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers said they knew of "no reason why, if both parties work hard, we cannot hammer out a sound, acceptable contract" before the current three-year agreement expires on July 20.

"THE MAJOR ISSUE in these contract talks can be easily predicted," Biller and Sombrotto said, "for they represent the aspirations of working men and women everywhere: improvements in our wages and fringe benefits, improved safety conditions in postal facilities, and the impact of automation on job security.

"In sum, we expect to reap the rewards we have earned as both the most productive workers in the American economy last year and as the world's most productive postal workers."

The unions pointed out that productivity in the USPS last year rose 5.5 percent over the previous year.

EARLIER IN THE day, USPS negotiators opened talks with a third postal union, the unaffiliated National Rural Letter Carriers' Association, and set June 19 as the first meeting date with the Mail Handlers Division of the Laborers. The two unions represent about 100,000 postal employees.

The postal talks are the biggest set of labor negotiations on this year's bargaining agenda. The four unions and postal management planned to open talks on Apr. 22, but the USPS delayed the initial session until the National Labor Relations Board settled a question of union representation. The matter was resolved June 11 when the NLRB rejected Postmaster Gen. William Bolger's bid aimed at having the bargaining done by a single union.

BOLGER, WHO did not attend the opening bargaining session, said in a statement that the USPS was determined to "bargain hard and long" to reach an agreement by July 20.

"We make no pretense that these negotiations will be easy," he said. "They will not be."

Unanimous Council Vote Clears UAW Reaffiliation

The AFL-CIO Executive Council has unanimously approved the reaffiliation of the UAW, effective July 1.

As of that date, UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said in a letter to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, the union will be affiliating "our entire membership in the United States," which over the past year has averaged 1.12 million. Another 120,000 UAW members are affiliated with the Canadian Labor Congress.

Kirkland expressed his "personal appreciation" to Fraser and the UAW board for their leadership in ending a 13-year breach and securing reaffiliation.

"I am confident that both the AFL-CIO and the UAW will be strengthened and thus able to do a better job of representing the interests of America's working men and women," Kirkland wrote.

The certificate of affiliation will carry the UAW's full name, the International Union, United Automobile, Aerospace & Agricultural Implement Workers of America.

Labor Panel Presses OECD on Jobs

The Trade Union Advisory Committee to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development issued a strong attack on the restrictive economic policies of the major industrial countries and called instead for vigorous efforts to create jobs.

The continuing reliance of major western nations on restrictive, monetarist policies "implies an acceptance of a further rise of unemployment," TUAC warned in a report to the OECD governing council and to the participants of the upcoming Economic Summit meeting in Ottawa.

"RESTRICTIVE POLICIES are undermining employment and investment, creating new sources of inflation instead of tackling the basic underlying problems," the TUAC statement charged.

"The very high nominal interest rates, used as a policy instrument, stimulate capital movements away from socially useful and productive investments into speculative financial activities. They force countries which have been more successful in containing inflation either to import inflation through a devaluation of their currency or adopt restrictive, monetarist policies, and thereby choke off economic activity."

Copies of the statement, drawn up in Paris at a meeting of high-level trade unionists from the free world have been forwarded to Reagan Administration officials as recommended by TUAC. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas Donahue participated in the Paris deliberations.

Rising unemployment was the central concern of the trade union leaders, who were sharply critical of past OECD steps to reverse the trend.

For some years now, the TUAC statement observed, the OECD's ministerial council—the nominal governing body of the 23-nation organization—has held that its policies would reduce unemployment and inflation, promote stable economic growth and balanced trade, and solve the problems of energy.

Approaching the next annual meeting of the council and the Ottawa summit, scheduled in July, the OECD governments are apparently giving up all hope for any real recovery, the trade unionists pointed out.

"IN FACT, the word 'recovery' has been increasingly used to describe a state where unemployment remains stable but at higher levels than before, where inflation is some 10 percent, and economic growth is around 1 to 2 percent. The promised recovery has become a mirage in the eyes of policy planners and makers, too."

Mass unemployment such as that in OECD-member countries, where the number of jobless is approaching 30 million, threatens to tear apart the fabric of western society, the TUAC statement warned. Half of the unemployed are young people, it noted.

Practitioners of monetarist policies expect a recovery through productivity increases in technologically advanced sectors, the statement observed. However, it pointed out, as the recession coincides with demographic and social trends that result in large increases in the number of young people and women looking for jobs, the most likely result is even higher unemployment among these hard-hit groups.

"AT THE SAME time, with the increase of long duration unemployment, more attention has to be paid to the problems of older workers," the TUAC statement added.

Instead of restrictive policies, TUAC called for steps to promote full employment, price stability, investment and adequate growth while coping with energy needs and technological change. Specifically, it recommended:

- Active employment and labor market policies, including direct job creation, which release resources now increasingly tied up in unemployment benefits.
- A targeted investment policy aimed both at improving public services to meet unfulfilled needs and stimulating private investments in economically and socially useful sectors.
- A policy aimed at the shortening of working time without reduction of income. The form in which the reduction takes place should be determined through negotiations which, in turn, are influenced by national circumstances.
- A policy to fight inflation through an attack on its main underlying factors—high interest rates, overdependence on imported oil, market controlling forces, obsolescence of productive capacity, defective income distribution, and unemployment itself.
- A global approach to the prices and supplies of all forms of energy, also in the context of collective negotiations between oil-producing and oil-consuming countries.
- An internationally coordinated reduction of interest rates and reforms in the international monetary system to facilitate the recycling of balance-of-payment surpluses of some oil-producing countries.

"ANTI-INFLATION policies that are consistent with employment growth are a priority for trade unions," the TUAC statement observed. "Trade unions are prepared to enter into dialogue with governments on the full range of economic issues, including price rises, active employment policies and problems of income distribution, with a view to bringing about a greater degree of convergence in expectations about economic performance."

The statement also noted that current restrictive policies carry the often, unpronounced motivation of breaking allegedly "excessive" union power. But, it warned, "weakening trade unions also means increasing social unrest and closing the door to one way out of the crisis—that is, negotiated solutions among all parties concerned. This should not be the time for confrontation but for cooperation, to bring about jointly agreed policies."

HAIL AND FAREWELL to officers of the Firemen & Oilers are offered by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at the union's convention in Bal Harbour, Fla. Delegates elected by acclamation Sec.-Treas. George J. Francisco, right, as the union's president to succeed retiring John J. McNamara, left, who had been president since 1975. McNamara was named president emeritus.

House Budget Cuts Refute Reagan Gripe at Congress

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan complained at a televised news conference of congressional delay in enacting the huge spending and program cuts demanded by the Administration, but he was flogging a dead horse.

Even as the President spoke, House Democrats had backed down on most of the budget issues in dispute, and the Republican-controlled Senate Budget Committee put the finishing touches on spending cuts even deeper than the $35 billion target that Congress set last month.

WITHIN A WEEK, both the House and Senate are scheduled to act on budget reconciliation bills, comprising hundreds of pages of legislative changes made by congressional committees to bring programs in their jurisdiction within the new spending limits.

The Senate version hews closely to the blueprint drawn by Office of Management & Budget Director David A. Stockman, the architect of the Reagan budget.

The House version strays more from the OMB dictate and in some cases preserves programs the Administration wants to eliminate. But the spending totals are well within the ceilings set in the budget resolution and additions in some areas have been counterbalanced by deeper cuts elsewhere.

A short-lived rebellion was launched in the House by the staunchly liberal Education & Labor Committee, which sought to devise a strategy that would get the House to lift the spending ceiling a few notches. But the committee backed off when it became evident that a conservative coalition so dominated the House that the effort to lessen the hardships of the budget cuts was likely to boomerang.

THE HOUSE Budget Committee bill does differ from the Administration blueprint in one major area.

The White House has sought to scrap a large array of federal programs and substitute instead "block grants" to the states to use as they wish, virtually free of federal oversight. Total funding for these programs would be cut by 25 percent on the excuse that there would be less red tape and administrative costs.

The Senate balked at a number of the consolidations, especially in education programs. And House committees flatly rejected the concept.

The clearly expressed concern of the committees that have jurisdiction over these programs was that the shift to block grants would just be the first step toward ending all federal funding.

IRONICALLY, the exaggeration of President Reagan's press conference assertions and his dismissal of criticism of the Administration by Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., as "sheer demagoguery" has at least temporarily ruptured the conservative coalition that has dominated the House.

Key members of the Conservative Democratic Forum have voiced resentment at the President's attacks on budget decisions they helped shape and passed the word, as one member put it, "that we were tired of being manipulated by the White House."

Reagan sought to repair some of the political wounds with a conciliatory telephone call to O'Neill. But for the moment at least, House Democrats were closing ranks.

STILL TO BE decided were the parliamentary rules under which the budget reconciliation bill will be considered by the House—and whether any amendments or substitute proposals will be allowed.

There will be no restriction on Senate amendments to its reconciliation bill. But the political tilt of the Senate is so conservative that any changes would most likely make the spending cuts even more stringent.

Supreme Court Rebuffs Watt In Upholding Strip Mine Law

A unanimous Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a strip mining law that the AFL-CIO had strongly supported and that the present Secretary of the Interior had tried to overturn.

The 1977 law requires operators of surface coal mines to restore the land they tear up to environmentally acceptable standards. It prohibits strip mining of land that can't be restored, and it imposes a tonnage tax on coal to pay for reclamation of abandoned mines.

THE HIGH COURT'S decision was an important victory for the government, upholding federal regulatory authority against a states' rights challenge. But Interior Sec. James G. Watt, whose department enforces the law, wasn't doing any celebrating.

Watt was head of the conservative Mountain States Legal Foundation when briefs in the strip mining case were submitted to the Supreme Court last November. Lower courts in Virginia and Indiana had held portions of the law unconstitutional, and President Carter's Secretary of the Interior, Cecil D. Andrus, had directed an appeal to the Supreme Court.

Watt, who had not yet been chosen for the Reagan Cabinet, submitted a brief on behalf of the coal mine operators contending that the strip mining law "usurped government functions" and represented a "trend toward centralized decision-making that threatens to destroy the federal structure of government in America."

Justice Thurgood Marshall, writing for the Supreme Court, said it would be a "radical departure from long-established precedent" if the Supreme Court voided the law.

BEFORE THE Supreme Court decision, Watt had sharply criticized the Interior Dept. administration of the law in a speech to a coal industry trade association and had ordered immediate abolition of two regional offices of the Federal Office of Surface Mining in a speedup of a previously announced reorganization plan.

Passage of the strip mining law was declared a priority goal of the AFL-CIO in the 1977 session of Congress. Similar legislation had twice been vetoed by former President Gerald Ford. The bill that finally became law passed the House by a 325-68 margin and the Senate on an 85-8 vote.

Postal Bargaining Opens for 600,000

Biller has said that the unions want a "clearer statement of an employee's right to refuse work under unsafe conditions" and wider protection against layoffs due to USPS's stepped-up use of automated equipment. He said the initial proposals did not cover wage and fringe benefits, and a separate economic package will be submitted later in the bargaining.

The union negotiating team consisted of some 60 headquarters and district officials of the unions. Besides letter carriers, the bargaining covers workers in specific crafts represented by the APWU—clerks, motor vehicle operators, special delivery messengers, and maintenance personnel.

Cotton Dust Standard Upheld

Court Bars Cost Tests On Safety, Health Rules

safety, the court ruled 8 to 1 that federal mine inspectors do not have to obtain a search warrant before inspecting stone quarries.

Donahue noted that a six-year struggle has been waged for an effective cotton dust regulation by the Clothing & Textile Workers, the AFL-CIO and the Industrial Union Dept.

"WE HAVE fought mill-owners, the Council of Economic Advisers, the Council on Wage & Price Stability and, since March, the Labor Dept. itself," he observed.

"We are heartened by the outcome of our efforts, not for ourselves, but for the affected workers. For thousands of victims already suffering the debilitating effects of brown lung, today's decision is probably too late. But for the half-million active textile workers, it comes not a minute too soon."

ACTWU President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman reinforced Donahue's comments, noting that the decision is a welcome development for all workers who encounter serious health hazards on the job.

"WE CALL UPON the Secretary of Labor to vigorously enforce this standard and to immediately cease his recent efforts to weaken OSHA standards," they said.

The cotton dust standard was developed by the Carter Administration in 1978 in an effort to eliminate the "brown lung" hazard that textile workers face. But it was challenged by employer groups on the ground that the installation of required engineering controls would be too costly.

In an unusual maneuver, the Reagan Administration asked the high court two months after oral arguments were presented in the case to delay its pending ruling until OSHA conducted a cost-benefit study of the standard. The court pointedly refused to do so.

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donavan and OSHA Director Thorne G. Auchter have also maneuvered to stall several other safety and health standards developed by the Carter Administration through implementation of an order by President Reagan to apply cost-benefit analysis to federal regulation.

BRENNAN'S DECISION incorporates a number of points contained in the AFL-CIO's brief and oral arguments delivered by Atty. George H. Cohen on the cotton dust case.

In reviewing reports and debates on the safety bill when it was before the House and Senate, Brennan noted that "perhaps most telling is the absence of any indication whatsoever that Congress intended OSHA to conduct its own cost-benefit analysis before promulgating a toxic material or harmful physical agent standard."

WHILE UPHOLDING the essence of the cotton dust standard, the court vacated a section of the regulation dealing with wage and job guarantees for workers transferred to less hazardous jobs for medical reasons.

The standard requires employers to transfer workers who cannot use respirators to lessen their exposure to excessive levels of cotton dust. But the court said that OSHA had not proved the need for the wage guarantees and remanded that section back to the federal appelate court. which had earlier affirmed the full standard, for further hearings.

However, the need for respirators should end by Mar. 27, 1984, the deadline for employers to have engineering controls fully operational.

ACCORDING TO an industry survey cited by ACTWU Safety Director Eric Frumin, about 75 percent of the nation's spinning and weaving mills already have engineering controls in place to meet reduced exposure limits.

The standard limits worker exposure over an eight-hour workday to 200 micrograms of respirable cotton dust per cubic meter of air in yarn manufacturing, 500 micrograms in textile production and 750 micrograms in slashing and weaving.

Dissenting opinions in the cotton dust case were issued by Justices Potter Stewart and William H. Rehnquist, who was joined by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger.

ON THE MINE SAFETY inspection access decision, the court held that the Fourth Amendment is not violated when inspectors from the Mine Safety & Health Administration enter a stone quarry without a court warrant.

The majority decision by Justice Thurgood Marshall concludes that the inspection program under the 1977 mine safety law "in terms of certainty and regularity of its application, provides a constitutionally adequate substitute for a warrant."

In its finding, the court distinguished the MSHA inspection program from the OSHA provision for more "random" warrantless inspections which the Supreme Court overturned in 1979.

The mine inspection case involved a Wisconsin quarry owner who refused to allow a federal inspector to conduct a follow-up inspection to determine if violations had been corrected.

Donahue said the two decisions reinforce the federal government's "responsibility to protect the lives, health and safety of workers."

Federal Bases Ruled Immune To State 'Right-to-Work' Law

Atlanta—A state "right-to-work" law banning union shop agreements is invalid in a federal "enclave" within that state, the U.S. 5th Circuit Court of Appeals ruled.

Its decision upheld the validity of the union shop-agency shop contract between RCA International Service Corp. and a local of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which represents RCA employees at various Air Force and aerospace installations in Florida.

IT REJECTED the argument by the National Right to Work Legal Defense Foundation, on behalf of eight employees in the bargaining unit, that Florida's law prohibiting a union shop was binding on the federal properties. The "right-to-work" argument was that there was no conflict between federal and state law since Section 14(b) of the Taft-Hartley Act specifically allows states to prohibit a union shop.

The appellate court panel, by a 2-1 margin, also rejected a federal district court's finding, which both sides had appealed.

The district court held that applicability of the "right-to-work" law depended on when the property had been ceded to the federal government. Under this reasoning, it ruled that the union shop agreement could be enforced at the Patrick Air Force Base, because that property had been ceded to the federal government in 1940, before the state "right-to-work" law was passed. But the district judge held that a union shop or agency shop couldn't be enforced at Cape Canaveral Air Force Station because the state ban had been in effect before the property was transferred to the federal government.

The dissenting appellate judge agreed with that reasoning. But the majority decision, by Circuit Court Robert S. Vance, held that federal and state labor policy was in conflict because union shop agreements are specifically allowed under the National Labor Relations Act. Therefore, the federal position would govern.
munications Workers.

A similar conclusion had been reached in an earlier case decided in the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals, which the Supreme Court declined to review and thus left final. But that case did not involve the issue of whether a state "right-to-work" law had been in effect at the time of the creation of the federal enclave.

Air Controllers Rap FAA Policy, Call Strike Vote

Negotiators for the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Association unanimously rejected a new contract proposal by their employer, the Federal Aviation Administration, and set a strike vote for June 21.

Unless a reasonable, ratifiable offer is made to PATCO bargainers by that date, the union said it would determine member support for a walkout, which it is planning for June 22 at 7 a.m. Members authorized a strike vote in February just before bargaining began.

PATCO President Robert Poli, who heads the nine-member union negotiating team, criticized the FAA for failing to bargain on the issues. The union's main concerns are wages, working hours, and retirement benefits, which are up to Congress to approve. But Poli says the FAA "won't even bargain on issues (such as working conditions) which it can bargain on."

PATCO's old contract expired on Mar. 15. Formal talks broke off Apr. 28, and the two sides have met informally a number of times since then, frequently with the presence of a federal mediator.

PATCO, an affiliate of the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, represents over 14,000 of the nation's 17,000 air traffic controllers.

Brown Returns to Seat on ILO Council

Geneva—A sweeping victory of the free workers at the International Labor Organization's assembly here returned AFL-CIO International Rep. Irving Brown to the seat he resigned on the agency's Governing Body when the United States temporarily withdrew from the ILO in 1978.

Brown, the U.S. worker delegate to the ILO, was on the ticket sponsored jointly by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the Organization of African Trade Union Unity.

IN ACCORDANCE with the ILO's "tripartite" structure that gives labor and employers independent voices alongside their governments in the 145-nation organization, the workers met in caucus to elect their 14 representatives for a three-year term on the Governing Body, the ILO's executive council.

The free workers captured the 13 seats they sought. Among those re-elected in the victory were Gerd Muhr of West Germany's Confederation of Trade Unions; Shirley Carr, executive vice president of the Canadian Labor Congress; Glynn Lloyd of Britain's Trades Union Congress; Sanchez Madariaga of the Mexican Federation of Labor, and Moussa Sow of Mauritania, vice president of the African Trade Union Unity Orgazination.

Another significant development was the re-election of Gideon Ben-Israel of Histadrut among the 14 worker representatives on the Governing Body. While backed by the ICFTU, the Israeli labor spokesman was not officially endorsed by the African group.

HIS RE-ELECTION in the absence of this endorsement was a clear indication that many African worker delegates voted for him for their own trade union reasons despite the pressure exerted by the Arab bloc to retain African support for its anti-Israel policy.

This policy has been marked in the ILO session's general debate by calls from the Arab governments for the designation of a "Day of Solidarity" for the Palestinians' "relentless struggle against racism and discrimination," as Kuwait's labor minister, Hamad al-Rujaib, put it. The proposal has gathered little support.

Addressing the 1,800 trade unionists, employers and government officials attending the assembly, President Luis Herrera Campins of Venezuela listed the right to organize and bargain collectively as an "essential and irreplaceable condition" for justice in human relations. He announced that his government is making a $770,000 special contribution to the ILO's vocational training program in the Caribbean and Central American regions.

MEANWHILE, the session got down to the ILO's basic task by preparing in committee new international standards, which can have the force of treaties, on the protection of workers' health and safety on the job. Similar work is under way on measures to insure that workers, whether men or women, are not denied job opportunities or advancement simply because they have family responsibilities.

A committee is also drafting a recommendation that the assembly will make to governments on the steps they should take in consultation with unions and employer organizations to make collective bargaining a reality.

United Way's Beirne Award Cites Rhode Island Leader

San Francisco—Edwin C. Brown, secretary-treasurer of the Rhode Island AFL-CIO, is the 1981 recipient of United Way's Joseph A. Beirne Community Service Award.

Brown, a member of the Machinists, has been involved in United Way programs for the past 25 years in Rhode Island and New England.

The award is presented annually in memory of the late president of the Communications Workers.

The Broken Promise

THE SOCIAL security program was born in the midst of an economic crisis and it has survived many challenges through the years. But there has been no time when there has been so direct and dangerous a challenge to the program as now. The Reagan Administration's proposals would have a devastating impact on the economic security of the American people and their confidence in the program.

Workers have paid their share in the expectation of an earned right to social security benefits. The government must not break its compact with American workers.

The President advanced these proposals under the guise of dealing with social security's financial difficulties. But the cuts far exceed what is necessary to deal with these problems.

Workers electing or forced into early retirement at age 62 now receive 80 percent of their full benefit paid at age 65. The President's proposal would reduce this to 55 percent at age 62. Other proposed changes would actually reduce the amount to well below 50 percent of the full benefits.

Roughly 70 percent of workers who retire early do so for two reasons—ill health and inability to find a job. If the President's proposal is adopted, in 1982, no retiree age 62, single or couple, would receive a benefit as high as the official poverty threshold.

THE PRESIDENT made no attempt to provide liberalized disability benefits to compensate for the crushing impact of the early reductions on the majority of workers who retire early because of ill health. On the contrary, he proposes to make eligibility much more restrictive and to cut the overall program by one-third.

The Administration proposes to reduce future benefits by a technical change in the computation formula and eliminate benefits to federal, state and local retirees who qualify for social security from other employment.

All of this from a President who during his campaign said "the benefits of those now receiving, or looking forward to receiving, social security must be protected."

A DANGER exists that the Administration's proposals are so extreme that it may increase the willingness of some Americans to accept cuts they would not have otherwise tolerated. This appears to be the Administration's new fall-back strategy since they have now indicated a willingness to "compromise." They may be willing to do so, but the AFL-CIO is not.

We will not be intimidated by politically motivated exaggerations. As with any problem, there is more than one solution. The Administration's is the worst.

The AFL-CIO believes that interfund borrowing, partial general revenue financing and income tax credits for social security taxes paid are much fairer alternatives. With the adoption of these alternatives, Congress will have met the problem head on and will have met its obligation to protect the system's and, indeed, the government's integrity by honoring the commitments made to American workers.

'Mushiness Index' of Pollsters Reflects Uncertainties of Life

By Gus Tyler

IN THIS AGE of uncertainty, it was inevitable that someone at some moment would further shake our certainty by telling us that all those opinion polls, with their seemingly firm facts, are not quite as firm as we were led to believe. And now the "research" firm of Yankelovitch, Skelly & White has officially said so.

On March 20, notes a press release from YS&W, a "mushiness index" was "unveiled at a conference." From now on, promises the company, no poll will be completed without its measurement of mush.

THE PUSH TO MUSH appears to have been prompted by the embarrassment of pollsters in the last go-around before the 1980 elections. The modern oracles erred in predicting a close election that was not close. Now YS&W attributes this to "a last minute switch to President Reagan—a switch that some critics feel public opinion surveys did not properly signal."

The "mushiness index" will help to avoid any future appearance of infallability. By foretelling the outcome and then by recording just how soft the statistics really are, the seers will be taking out insurance against failure. If the forecast comes out otherwise, then the pollster can point to the mush mash to claim honor anyhow.

It is a tribute to the polling industry and especially to YS&W that they have been able to turn lemons into lemonade. The industry did goof. But instead of saying, "I'm sorry," it now says, "now we are greater than ever."

YS&W is ready to share its discovery of mush with others. "Our firm is making a commitment," they say, "to use the index whenever we survey attitudes on public policy issues, and we are delighted to share it with anyone who cares to use it."

THE DISCOVERY that things are not quite as predictable as we would like them to be comes rather belatedly to the polling business. More than half a century ago, the Principle of Uncertainty was enunciated in a discipline where certainty was always assumed; namely, in the field of physics, an exact science.

It was Werner Heisenberg who concluded that those sub-atomic particles called electrons behaved in ways we could not foretell, despite those "immutable" laws of nature. At the core of the universe, in the innards of the atom, there was a mushiness.

In our daily lives, of course, we are constantly reminded of the principle of uncertainty. The other day, I was told at the railroad station that there would be delays of up to 20 minutes on my line; when the train arrived, half the doors did not open; in the overcrowded car, the air-conditioning did not work; two people fainted; the escalator to carry us to the street floor was inoperative.

WHEN I GOT to my appointed place an hour late, the elevator door would not open at my floor; I pushed buttons and rang bells and began to move, only to get stuck in between floors. When I finally climbed out and made it, I was told that someone had tried to assassinate the President but that Reagan had not been hit; Haig was wounded in the head. And so it went.

Maybe Heisenberg, YS&W, and my dizzying day are all on the same wave length, just subparticles within a civilizational atom that is turning mushy.

Attack on Government Blow to All Workers

Six months ago, the Reagan Administration came out of its corner swinging. It promised to deliver the punch that would solve this country's undeniably tough economic problems.

So far, all we have seen is a series of blows to the rights of working Americans.

Government spending is the root of all evil according to the gospel preached by the new Administration.

The Reagan Administration is listening only to itself if it seriously believes that the American people gave it carte blanche to dismantle the government of the United States and the services it provides.

Surely, the intense public outrage over the social security cuts should give them a hint.

—Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, at Public Employee Dept. convention, Washington, D.C., June 12, 1981.

Analysis of Issues, Goals

New Approach Sought to Solve Lag in Civil Rights Progress

By Bayard Rustin

IT IS WIDELY recognized that the struggle to improve the social and economic life of black Americans and poor people in the United States has reached an impasse. While we are fully aware of the impending problems and hardships we face, too little thought has been given to three important questions:

- What economic changes have occurred in the 1970s and 1980s which require changes in the strategies and tactics used so successfully in the '60s?
- Why do we appear to have lost the support of those allies who stood so firmly alongside us in the 1960s?
- Why do so many of the major objectives and programs we in the civil rights movement earlier espoused appear to have lost support even within much of the black community: integrated schools and housing, busing, etc.?

TO INTELLIGENTLY answer these questions we must ask others:

- To what degree has race declined as the dominant factor in the continuing inequality of the races, and in what areas is this development most apparent?
- Which problems have not traditionally received significant attention by black leaders, but require their attention today?
- Can we develop a strategy to deal with the decline in black political participation? This question involves both the role of blacks in the electoral process (political party participation, registration levels, voter participation rates) and the relationship of blacks to such grass-roots forces as community groups, business, the trade union movement, and the like.
- Can new approaches to affirmative action be devised which can win the support of a consensus of those groups which once comprised the civil rights coalition? Here it would be essential to look carefully at whether a course of action based on economic and class criteria or on ethnic, religious, racial, and sexual criteria should be pursued.
- An examination of the process by which blacks can achieve further economic and social progress.
- An assessment of the differences between the social and economic programs of the traditional civil rights organizations and those of the black political leadership, with a view toward creating a common program for the future.
- The attitudes and relations of American blacks toward refugees and undocumented aliens who are perceived to be in competition with blacks for jobs and social services, and how these attitudes and relations affect the process of coalition building.
- The role of heightened racial identity as a motivating force toward progress and, simultaneously, the role of race consciousness as an impediment towards the development of effective strategy and tactics.
- How can the educational process be modified to meet the changing needs of the job market?
- Can new careers be created to meet the needs of the poor? Can the very nature of work be redefined?

THERE IS A NEED to bring together the most creative minds in America to explore these questions. Such a group must try to develop a new social policy for the 1980s, founded upon the results of their philosophical, sociological, and intellectual exploration.

This group, or institute, would need to examine both domestic and foreign policy issues which affect minorities, women, and the poor. For instance, it is imperative to recognize that blacks may lose a vast number of American jobs, not because of discrimination, but because of the shift of labor intensive industry abroad—a fact largely ignored by the black community. There is a clear and urgent need to respond to this and similar developments.

A broad range of very important issues require from us a serious analysis and the formulation of new objectives. If we in the civil rights community do not make such an effort, we will continue to hold on to those policies, programs and strategies of the past which demonstrably are failing.

Donovan Proposal Assailed

Move to Lift Ban on Homework Would Revive Sweatshop Era

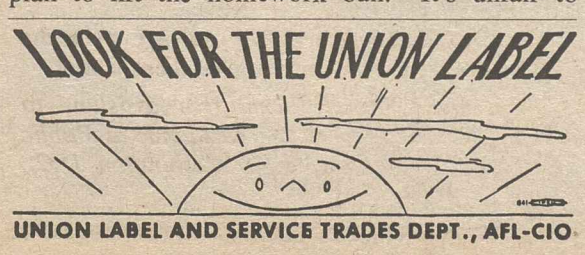
LIFTING THE 40-year-old ban on industrial homework would cancel out the Labor Dept.'s drive against the growing number of sweatshop apparel plants, Vice President Evelyn Dubrow of the Ladies' Garment Workers warned on Labor News Conference.

Worse yet, Dubrow declared, ending the restrictions laid down by Congress in 1949 would clear the way for unscrupulous employers to shift their operations to tenements, barrios and ghettos of urban and rural America, where the already high incidence of wage, hour, safety and health violations would be even harder to detect. She rejected the notion suggested by some advocates of the industrial homework scheme that the work would be performed in "pleasant suburban surroundings" and that mothers could take care of their children while they earn a little money.

Immigrants and undocumented workers would be the most likely to become "victims of unconscionable employers who want to make more money on them than fair employers would," Dubrow asserted.

Dubrow said that employers and consumer groups have joined with the labor movement in opposition to Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan's plan to lift the homework ban. "It's unfair to employers who have to pay taxes, who have to pay for the upkeep of machinery, who have to pay for the lights, who have to keep their workplaces in good, healthful and safe condition," she stressed.

Dubrow pointed out that the homework restrictions were adopted to help eliminate the very kind of "kitchen sweatshops" and child labor that would return if the Administration's plan is approved.



"THERE IS NO way of guaranteeing that all of the family isn't working on industrial homework," she said. "They can work 24 hours a day, because there's just no way of policing the situation," she pointed out.

Dubrow said that many employers are just as concerned as organized labor about the Administration's attempt to lift the restrictions on homework.

"They find that if they have to compete with employers who are encouraging homework, they can't possibly meet the wage scale they have to pay. They can't meet their expenses because they are the victims of unfair competition."

The ILGWU leader noted that "there's a difference between industrial homework and what is known as a "cottage industry," which is done because a region has a particular kind of industry that more or less deals with their folklife. That's an entirely different situation."

Dubrow, who is legislative director of the ILGWU, was questioned by Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Drew Von Bergen, United Press International.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE FIRST things Dwight Eisenhower did when he became president in 1953 was to appoint a blue-ribbon commission to find out why the federal government was growing, ostensibly at the expense of the states.

The panel reported back that federal programs were being created because of the inability or unwillingness of the individual states to meet people's needs.

Today, the durable advocates of "states' rights" finally have one of their own in the White House.

The Republican Party's view of history, as laid out in its 1980 platform, is that the Democratic Party brought about "Big Government" and did it "under the guise of providing for the common good."

TO TURN THINGS around, President Reagan has proposed a "new federalism" which would convert scores of specific programs into "block grants" and turn them over to the states—whether they want them or not, whether they are able to administer them or not.

At the same time, federal funding for these consolidated health, education, community development and social service programs would be cut 25 percent initially, or at least 35 percent if inflation is figured in.

A coalition of 63 national organizations—including civic action, civil rights, consumer, senior citizen, religious and labor groups—recently held a briefing on Capitol Hill to explain what block grants would mean to their various constituencies.

The categorical grant programs, it was recalled, weren't set up at the whim of Washington bureaucrats, as critics imply. They evolved after years of study and debate out of real needs which were not being addressed by the states.

Some examples are the Title I program to help educationally deprived children, aid to handicapped students, legal services for the needy, low-income energy assistance, community and mental health services, and clinics for migrants and black lung victims.

Under the block grant proposal, federal money would be handed over to the states to use as they please under broad, undefined areas of eduucation, health and the like.

There are no standards nor requirements for adequate record-keeping and reporting, and thus no way for Congress or anyone else to evaluate how programs are working.

There is no requirement that these federal funds not be used to substitute for state funds that would otherwise be used for the same purpose.

As a coalition member observed, the Reagan block grant approach would turn the competition for public funds over "to a brutal political struggle where the most vulnerable and least powerful groups are almost certain losers."

As he sees it, "the handicapped will be pitted against the aged, foster care parents against child care advocates, and black lung victims against mental health patients."

THE BLOCK GRANTS, if enacted, would "set the stage for even deeper cuts and less accountability in the future," it was predicted. It was noted that Reagan said in March that "block grants are only the intermediate steps" in his so-called "new federalism."

Congressional committees in both houses recently have taken a skeptical look at the Reagan block grant package and have rejected many parts of it.

However, further battles on the issue loom in committees and on the floor of the House and Senate. More citizen education and vigilance is needed to get the message to Congress that the federal government must not abandon to the states its responsibilities to the needy and the powerless.

A GREEN LIGHT for sweatshop apparel plants is seen in Labor Sec. Donovan's push to scrap the 40-year-old ban on industrial homework, Ladies' Garment Workers Vice President Evelyn Dubrow, center, warned on Labor News Conference. She was questioned by Drew Von Bergen of United Press International and Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced interview is aired weekly on the Mutual radio network.

He also holds the George Meany Award for 36 years of service to scouting.

Labor Board Hearing Set in Baseball Case

New York—The National Labor Relations Board moved ahead with plans for a hearing on unfair practice charges against major league baseball club owners as negotiations in the week-old baseball players' strike resumed with no discernible progress.

An NLRB administrative law judge was to have opened hearings on the complaint against the owners on June 15, but Daniel Silverman, New York regional director of the NLRB, delayed the hearing a week to give the parties time to negotiate.

THE COMPLAINT, based on charges by the Major League Players Association, was filed against the owners by NLRB Gen. Counsel William Lubbers. It accuses management of failing to bargain in good faith by refusing to give the union the financial data it says it needs to assess the owners' claim that financial hardship requires a change in player free-agency rules.

Compensation to teams that lose premium players to free agency is the sole issue in the strike that got under way June 12 following the denial of an injunction against the owners. The injunction, requested by the NLRB, would have blocked management from implementing its controversial free-agent compensation plan.

Under an agreement that the two sides reached in averting a regular-season walkout last year, the owners had the right to put their compensation plan into effect by Feb. 20 and the players had the right to strike in response by June 1. That strike deadline was extended while the NLRB attempted to obtain the injunction against the owners that would have set aside the compensation issue until next year.

NEGOTIATORS for both parties met June 16 but the compensation issue was not directly discussed. Federal Mediator Kenneth E. Moffett said that, instead, "we explored the past history of how we got into the situation we're in right now."

Moffett described the talks as "amicable but without progress toward the end of a strike."

The strike affects 650 major league players on the 26 teams in the two major leagues.

2 Unions Reach Settlements with Associated Press

New York—The Newspaper Guild and the Telegraph Workers reached tentative agreements with the Associated Press on new contracts that provide substantial wage and benefit improvements.

The agreements, which are subject to ratification by members of both unions through mail referendums, cover 1,200 Wire Service Guild members and 450 members of UTW's Division 14. The Guild's old contract with the AP expired last December and the UTW's pact ran out on June 1.

The Guild agreement provides for wage improvements for both editorial and non-editorial employees averaging about 18 percent over the term of the contract which expires Dec. 31, 1982. A cost-of-living clause was dropped.

The UTW reported that wage and benefit improvements for top-scale employees will average about $100 a week over the next two years.

Both unions won improvements in company-paid health insurance, dental plans and pensions.

IUD Legislative Conference Focuses on Program Cuts

The annual legislative conference of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. focused on the Reagan Administration's budget and tax cuts, its attacks on safety and health protections, and a new round of anti-labor legislation.

The conference was addressed by three liberal members of Congress and culminated in an afternoon of lobbying on Capitol Hill by the 350 conference delegates.

IN VISITING congressional offices, delegates urged senators and representatives to work for adequate funding for safety and health as well as job training, education and public health programs benefiting workers and the poor.

The legislators were urged to support the Guarini-Brodhead bill, which targets tax relief to the individuals and industries that need it most. It includes the AFL-CIO's proposal for an income tax credit on social security payroll deductions.

Also, delegates lobbied against anti-labor bills, including legislation to deny food stamps to strikers and their families, to amend the 1946 Hobbs Act so that any incident of violence on a picket line would be made a federal crime, and to repeal the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage act.

Addressing the conference were Representatives David R. Obey (D-Wis.), and George Miller (D-Calif.), and Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio).

OBEY, a member of the House Budget Committee, predicted that the Reagan budget and tax proposals, if enacted, would produce four years of large deficits, more inflation, higher interest rates and lower productivity.

The Reagan across-the-board tax cut, which benefits "high-income taxpayers at the expense of middle-income and poor" people, is based on "the old trickle-down theory," said Obey. "It didn't work under Herbert Hoover and it won't work under Ronald Reagan."

He said Administration budget cuts were economically shortsighted in such areas as job training, scientific research and health care.

"WE SPEND less on job training than any other industrial society, but Reagan is cutting the guts out of this," he said.

Obey urged the delegates "to go home and explain what the cuts mean in your shops and communities. The only way to turn this town around is to start raising hell back home where it counts."

Miller, a member of the House Education & Labor Committee, charged that "the Dept. of Labor has launched the most systematic attack on the rights of working people since the 1920s" in its assault on occupational health and safety regulations.

THE MESSAGE is, he said, "that after 30 years on the job, you get a watch and you also get cancer."

He said the department's actions reflect "an agenda of anti-labor extremists who are in favor of labor unions in Poland but seem intent on destroying the labor movement in this country."

Metzenbaum predicted that after budget and tax issues are disposed of, the Administration and conservatives in Congress will begin "to move in full force against the labor movement." (PAI)

Yaeger Elected President Of Arizona State AFL-CIO

Flagstaff, Ariz.—Delegates to the Arizona State AFL-CIO's annual convention here elected William Yaeger of Phoenix as president and returned Sec.-Treas. Darwin Aycock for his eighth term.

Pete McGee of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters was elected first vice president, the post formerly held by Yaeger. The 250 delegates to the three-day meeting also elected Fermin Martinez of the Laborers and Norman Rudd of the Operating Engineers as second and third vice presidents.

YAEGER, WHO is with the Machinists, succeeds Fred J. Brown who was named president emeritus.

Resolutions adopted by the convention assailed the Reagan Administration's proposals to undermine federal laws that protect workers, including weakening the protections of prevailing wage laws and the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

Another measure expressed firm opposition to the Administration's plan to cut social security benefits, and the delegates renewed the state federation's long-standing demand for a state program to aid medically indigent citizens. Arizona is the only state without a Medicaid plan.

A special resolution of appreciation for service "to the labor movement and to the nation" was voted for AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan.

THE DELEGATES also expressed support for the Polish workers and their union, Solidarity, and they commemorated the 25th anniversary of the merger of the AFL and the CIO in the state, including recognition of all delegates present who had also attended the state federation's first merged convention.

Speakers included Sen. Dennis DeConcini (D-Ariz.) and Gov. Bruce Babbitt, AFL-CIO Regional Director James Baker, Area COPE Director LaMar Gulbransen, AFL-CIO Rep. Grace Carroll, and COPE Western Region VIP Director Jane Adams.

Reagan Appoints EEOC Chairman, Wage-Hour Chief

President Reagan appointed a chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and a wage-hour administrator. But other high-level posts of special interest to the trade union movement remained unfilled six months after the Administration took office.

The new EEOC chairman is William M. Bell, 55, who has operated a Detroit personnel consulting firm that specialized in placement of minorities.

Bell had served as a consultant to the EEOC chairman during the Ford Administration and will succeed Eleanor Holmes Norton. Another EEOC vacancy remains to be filled.

William M. Otter, 58-year-old Kentucky attorney who has represented management in collective bargaining, has been picked to head the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division.

He is a former director of the Kentucky Dept. of Labor and was a consultant to the Occupational Safety & Health Administration in 1971-76.

Both Bell and Otter must be confirmed by the Senate.

The President has still not appointed an under secretary of labor, the department's second-ranking position. Also vacant are the posts of assistant secretary for policy, evaluation and research and the director of the Women's Bureau.

Public Sector Unions Hit Attacks on Government

By Susan Dunlop

Delegates to the fifth biennial convention of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. approved restructuring of the department, a per capita tax increase and a series of resolutions condemning attempts to slash the budgets for public services and make public workers scapegoats for the nation's economic ills.

PED President Kenneth Blaylock told the 130 delegates to the Washington meeting that the convention's job was to strengthen the department's ability to deal with the "seriousness of the attacks on government and the people who work for government."

BLAYLOCK, WHO is president of the American Federation of Government Employees, urged the delegates to improve communications with the public and among their members to counter attempts to pit public employees "against the public instead of showing ourselves as the friends of the public we really are."

Public workers must build coalitions with "natural allies" in the labor movement and among its supporters, Blaylock said.

The delegates approved changes in the department's constitution to provide for an elected president, secretary-treasurer, two executive vice presidents and nine vice presidents as well as an appointed executive director. Previously, the PED leadership structure had consisted of the two top elected officers and a 34-member executive board with an appointed executive director.

Blaylock was elected to his first full term as president, and Teachers President Albert Shanker was elected secretary-treasurer. Blaylock had been serving out the term of William H. McClennan who retired from office in February.

JOHN SWEENEY, president of the Service Employees, and Vincent Sombrotto, president of the Letter Carriers, were elected executive vice presidents of the department.

Elected as vice presidents were Ande Abbott, Boilermakers; William Boarman, Typographical Union; John A. Gannon, Fire Fighters; J. C. Turner, Operating Engineers; Rodney Bower, Professional & Technical Engineers; Sol Fishko, Printing & Graphic Communications Union; Angelo Fosco, Laborers; Moe Biller, Postal Workers; and Dan V. Maroney, Jr., Amalgamated Transit Union.

The 13 officers will serve as the department's executive committee which will meet four times a year. The full executive board will continue to consist of representatives from the department's 34 affiliates and will meet once a year. John Leyden is the department's executive director.

The delegates approved a per capita tax increase on a sliding scale which Blaylock said "will give PED the opportunity to respond to the threats to government and its workers."

AFFILIATED UNIONS will pay 4 cents per member per month on the first 100,000 members and 2.25 cents on membership over 100,000, an average of 3.2 cents. The previous per capita, unchanged for six years, was 2 cents per month.

In an address to the delegates, Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, scored the Reagan Administration's budget-cutting proposals as a "short-changing of American workers" that will "translate directly" into closed doors on public services and lost jobs in both the public and private sector.

Public workers have the support of the AFL-CIO, Young pledged, in the fight to maintain a fair budget and to stave off "union-busting tactics" such as those employed against the Postal Workers and Air Traffic Controllers to delay negotiations for decent contracts.

THE AFL-CIO and public workers' unions must seek to "prove to Congress that the labor movement and its allies do not give up their principles and to prove to scoffers and enemies of labor that we do speak for the interests and beliefs of the rank and file," Young stressed.

Among the 43 resolutions adopted by the delegates were measures condemning the Administration's plans to slash 83 federal programs and destroy more than a million jobs. The delegates called for passage of the AFL-CIO's tax cut proposal as a more equitable alternative to the Administration's plan.

Other resolutions called for extension of federal safety and health protections to the public sector, full collective bargaining rights for public workers at all levels, compliance with the law establishing pay for federal workers at levels comparable to the private sector.

The convention expressed firm opposition to mandatory social security coverage of federal workers, to the tuition tax credit proposal, to relaxation of the postal Private Express Statutes and to the contracting-out of federal jobs.

THE CONVENTION honored one of the former hostages held by Iran, William Royer, a member of AFGE Local 1812, now based in Washington with the U.S. International Communication Agency.

Other speakers at the meeting included Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes (D-Md.), Sen. Ted Stevens (R-Alaska), and Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.).

FAIR TREATMENT for public workers has been left off the Reagan Administration's agenda, Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.) told delegates to the convention of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. in Washington. The convention called for preservation of public service programs and jobs in the federal budget and an equitable tax cut plan.

Coast Guard Fee Proposal Branded Unfair Tax Burden

The imposition of user fees for U.S. Coast Guard services would put an unfair tax burden on the maritime industry, Seafarers President Frank Drozak told Congress.

Drozak opposed the Reagan Administration's proposals to charge for services in testimony before the Coast Guard subcommittee of the House Merchant Marine & Fisheries Committee. The panel is holding hearings on the Administration's request for statutory authority to charge most vessels entering U.S. waters for a broad range of port and maritime services. Pleasure and fishing boats would also have to pay an annual flat fee.

THE ADMINISTRATION plan is a tax, Drozak charged, because it is "a method of raising revenues for the discharge of governmental functions." This plan would "essentially delegate the legislative power to tax to the Executive Branch" by giving the Secretary of Transportation "substantially unrestricted power" to decide who would be charged for which services and how much, Drozak warned.

As outlined, the Administration plan calls for charges for certain inspection, licensing and certification services, but the proposal to Congress was not accompanied by a specific schedule of such services, Drozak pointed out.

By delegating such broad revenue-raising authority to the Executive Branch, Drozak stressed, "an uncertain and added burden" would be placed on the U.S. merchant fleet "due to the absence of a fixed fee schedule and the probability of future expansion" of the range of charges.

"The Administration's proposals," Drozak said, "are based on the premise that some Coast Guard services are of benefit only to particular segments of the population and that fairness dictates these services be subject to 'user fee'."

HE SUGGESTED, however, that because the Coast Guard is a "multi-mission" agency performing many functions in the public interest, it is difficult to determine who are the "sole beneficiaries" of any of its services.

Drozak told the committee that "a safely maintained and operated vessel, manned by a qualified and trained crew, accrues benefits to the public" well beyond the inspection, documentation, crew licensing and certification services provided by the Coast Guard to the owners.

Congress Urged To Enact Limits On Interest Rates

Recent laws and regulations have removed restraints on interest rate charges on loans to such an extent that businesses, consumers, and the economy as a whole stand to suffer serious injury, the AFL-CIO warned Congress.

Henry Schechter, director of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, urged that appropriate statutory limits on interest charges be enacted immediately.

Interest on commercial and farm loans now may not exceed the higher of either the maximum rate permitted by state law or a rate 5 percentage points above the Federal Reserve discount rate, plus whatever surcharge there might be.

"Since surcharges are paid only by the relatively few banks who make excessive use of the discount window, it is a phantom cost for most banks," Schechter told the Senate Banking Committee.

He urged Congress to delete the surcharge from the formula setting maximum interest rates, and called for reduction of the 5-point spread above the discount rate since banks can and do make loans with a much smaller spread above their current new money costs.

Schechter also urged a statutory limit on how much the interest rate may be raised on adjustable rate mortgages. Recently issued regulations of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Home Loan Bank Board place no limit on the rate.

F. E. Dubois Named Head Of Mine Safety Agency

President Reagan has nominated F. E. Dubois III as an assistant secretary of labor to head the Mine Safety & Health Administration.

Dubois, a former manager of a mine exploration company, has been in charge of Nevada's mine enforcement and compliance activities since 1975.

PROGRESS REPORT of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute is discussed at the annual meeting of the AAFLI board of trustees. The report was presented by AAFLI Executive Director Morris Paladino, seated to the left of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. AAFLI was created by the federation in 1968. It sponsors programs in a number of Asian countries designed to promote the development of free trade unionism.

Service Contract Act

Labor Hits New Move To Undermine Wages

Donovan and at a press briefing by Labor Dept. Solicitor T. Timothy Ryan. Cutbacks in Davis-Bacon Act wage protections and weakened affirmative action obligations for federal contractors were outlined at the same time. The Labor Dept. is expected to issue its formal proposals by the end of June.

Among the changes being considered is one that would limit the prevailing wage protections to contracts that are "principally for services." This loose definition could strip protection from about half the workers now covered under the law's application to contracts that contain substantial portions of service work.

As an example, the committee said that a contractor who sells the government office machines and provides repair and maintenance service would become exempt from wage requirement for service workers since the principal purpose of the contract would be deemed sales rather than service.

THE ADMINISTRATION is also questioning whether to exempt whole classes of service contracts and industries including automated data processing and other "high technology" services, overhaul and modification, services associated with timber sales and removal, and research and development.

The committee charged that the proposals for these exemptions are a result of heavy industry pressure. It pointed out that a 1974 amendment to the Service Contract Act sharply limits the Secretary's authority to grant any exemptions from coverage.

Another proposed change, "two-stage bidding," has been strongly and successfully opposed by the AFL-CIO in the past, the committee noted.

The practice would permit the Labor Dept. to base wage determinations for some service contracts on scales from the lowest-paid areas of the country, undercutting the ability of contractors in areas with higher standards to compete.

AFL-CIO ECONOMIST John Zalusky, a member of the committee, described the tactic as a way to shift jobs from higher-wage states to areas where wages are traditionally low and union organization is sparse.

The committee also warned that the Labor Dept. would permit "reconfiguration" of contracts so as to undermine the successorship provisions of the law.

These now require that, when a government contract is relet, the wages and benefits negotiated with the previous contractor must be considered the prevailing standards. The Administration's proposals could allow minor rewriting of the contract terms so that it could be labelled "new work."

The Labor Dept.'s proposals "raise the spectre of union contracts being overturned by the government contracting process," Zalusky said.

THREAT TO FAIR WAGES is posed by Labor Dept. proposals to weaken the protections of the Service Contract Act requiring payment of prevailing wages for services performed for the government. Strategies to preserve strong compliance rules and enforcement of the law are discussed by the AFL-CIO's ad hoc Service Contract Committee.

Eula Bingham Finds Reagan Hazard to Workers' Health

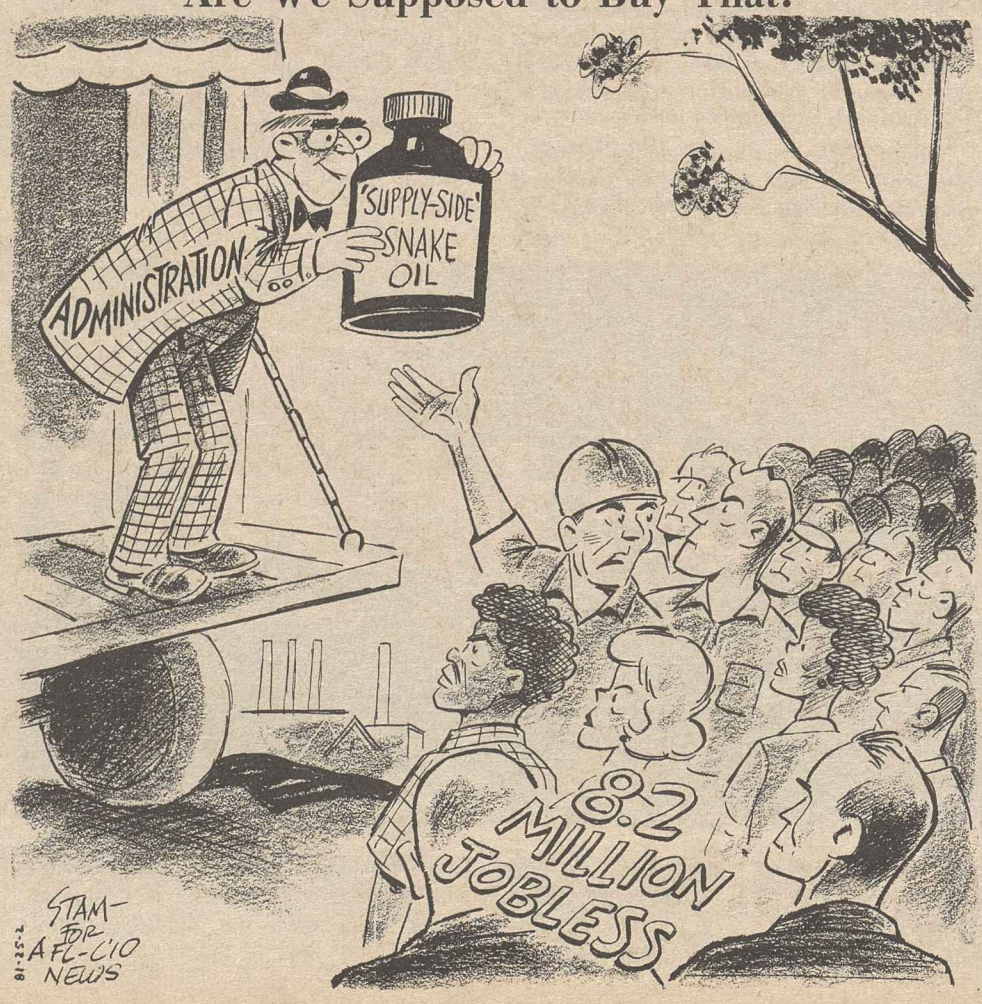
The Reagan Administration is hazardous to the health and safety of America's workers, Eula Bingham charged at a labor issues seminar held at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Bingham, who headed the Occupational Safety & Health Administration during the Carter Administration, told union members who had battled to enact job safety legislation that the Reagan appointees "are destroying your law."

SHE SAID withdrawal and rescinding of OSHA regulations "are bound to kill workers."

Responding to a question on cost-benefit tests for OSHA standards, Bingham challenged the assumption that a dollar value can be put on a worker's life or health. How does the "cash value" of a 21-year-old white male compare with that of a 62-year-old black woman, she asked.

If the federal government retreats from enforcement of the law, Bingham suggested, states and cities will have to move in to fill the gap, as some have already done on the labelling of toxic chemicals.



EVEN AFFECTED industries are now asking the Dept. of Labor "to have a second look" at its decision to withdraw a hazard-labeling standard, she told the Labor Studies Center audience. It may be, she said, that they realize that "it's not too cost-effective to have a different standard in every state and city across this land."

Bingham expressed concern that the new Administration's attitude toward job safety and health regulations is leading to an exodus of qualified professionals from OSHA who will be difficult to replace.

Bingham said, however, that she has been encouraged by the growing expertise of the trade union movement on occupational health and safety matters, and the increasing protection being written into union contracts.

Unions now have their own industrial hygienists, safety specialists and physician consultants, she noted, and that is making workplaces less hazardous.

'Are We Supposed to Buy That?'

Donovan Asked to Withdraw Industrial Homework Plan

All seven Democrats on the House Subcommittee on Labor Standards called on the Reagan Administration to withdraw its proposal to scrap federal sanctions against industrial homework in the apparel industry.

The subcommittee members warned in a letter to Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan that revocation of the 40-year-old ban on industrial homework would encourage wage-hour violations and inhibit the Labor Dept.'s ability to enforce the law.

NONE OF THE five Republican members of the panel signed the letter.

The letter urged Donovan to defer further consideration of administrative action until legislation on his proposed amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act is developed.

"In that matter, we will be in a better position to prepare a coordinated legislative response to the serious problem of sweatshops with the cooperation of industry labor and others who share our mutual desires for strict enforcement of the law," the letter said.

IT POINTED OUT that both labor and industry representatives who testified at subcommittee hearings last month opposed lifting the ban, and that only Labor Dept. representatives favored the change.

Even so, "it is the opinion of federal and state enforcement personnel that abolition of the ban on industrial homework will exacerbate the horrible working standards of tens of thousands of garment workers," the panel's letter noted.

"No case was presented to the subcommittee which indicated that revocation would improve enforcement capability," the panel stressed. "Nor were your representatives at the hearing able to identify a single individual or organization which had either requested or supported the concept of eliminating the homework restriction."

CITING THE response of both labor and industry, as well as the Labor Dept.'s inability to specify any urgent basis to rush through the rule change, the panel said there is adequate reason to suspend further consideration of the proposal.

"With this controversial and divisive action deferred, we feel we will be in an improved situation to develop a mutually acceptable bill and a general enforcement strategy to support your department's effort to attack the scourge of sweatshops," the subcommittee members told Donovan.

The June 1 letter was signed by Representatives George Miller (Calif.), subcommittee chairman; Phillip Burton (Calif.), William Patchford (Conn.), Austin J. Murphy (Pa.), Pat Williams (Mont.), Dale E. Kildee (Mich.) and Carl Perkins (Ky.), chairman of the House Labor Committee.

The Labor Dept. recently extended to July 4 the comment period on the proposal to revoke the ban on homework.

Staffing, Funds Urged For Immigration Agency

The AFL-CIO has called for full restoration of 1,355 positions and $21.6 million for the Immigration & Naturalization Service that would be cut under Reagan budget proposals.

In a letter to Rep. Romano L. Mazzoli (D-Ky.), chairman of the House Judiciary subcommittee on immigration, Legislative Director Ray Denison observed that the elimination of positions and overtime of INS workers would only serve the cosmetic image of achieving savings in government.

"As we have in the past, the AFL-CIO urges that the funding and staffing of the INS be increased to the point where this government agency may perform its important mission of providing a system of orderly immigration to the United States, while protecting the American workforce from unfair competition of illegal foreign labor," Denison said.

Vol. XXVI | Saturday, June 27, 1981 | 3 | No. 26

Real Earnings Continue Skid As CPI Rises

Inflation, as measured by the government's consumer price index, increased six-tenths of 1 percent in May, lowering workers' purchasing power by yet another notch.

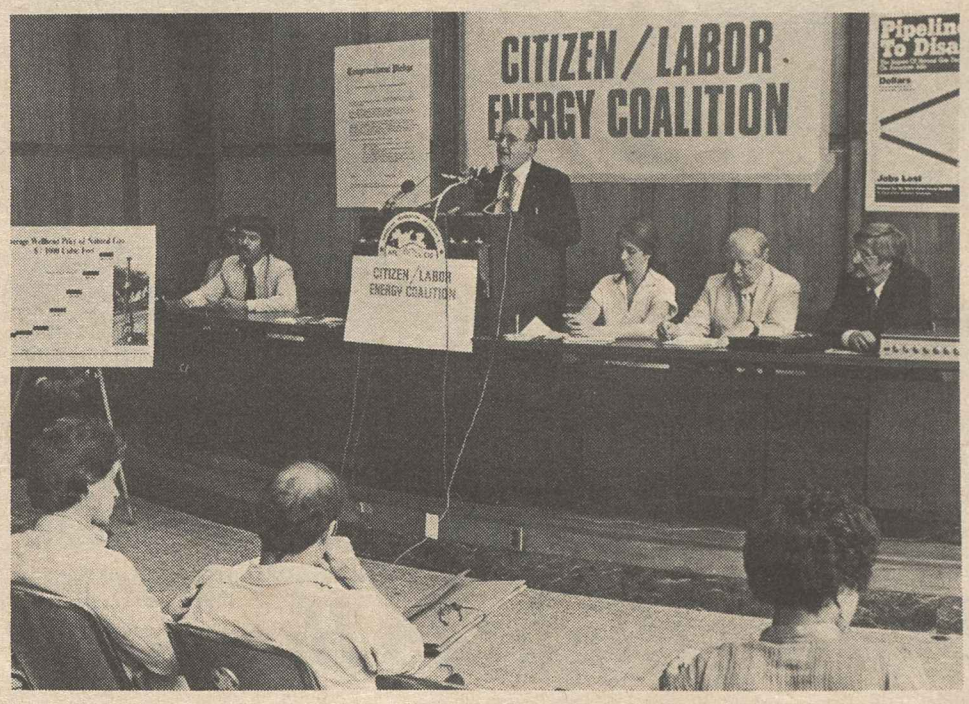
The May CPI rise exceeded the increase of four-tenths of 1 percent recorded by the Bureau of Labor Statistics for April, and was the same as in March. On a year-to-year basis, the index still hovered at a near double-digit level, 9.8 percent.

THE EFFECT of the May price surge, which BLS attributed mainly to the soaring cost of home mortgages, was to force another decline in real spendable earnings over the month. Real spendable pay, or wages minus taxes adjusted for the impact of inflation, fell four-tenths of 1 percent in May and was down 2 percent from 12 months earlier.

BLS said that while the average earnings of all workers in the private, nonfarm sector last month were $253.10 a week in current dollars, a worker earning the average who had a non-working spouse and two children brought home "real" weekly pay of only $94.30 expressed in 1967 dollars, a 34-cent drop from the previous month.

The housing component of the CPI rose 1.3 percent in May, and accounted for over four-fifths of the entire monthly increase, BLS said. Home financing costs rose 3 percent, reflecting a 2.1-percent increase in mortgage interest rates and a 1 percent increase in house prices. Prices of fuels and utility charges were up eight-tenths of 1 percent, despite a decrease in fuel oil prices as charges for gas and electricity rose 1.5 percent.

FOOD PRICES dropped two-tenths of 1 percent, with grocery store prices falling five-tenths of 1 percent. Beef prices rose for the first time this year, however, increasing seven-tenths of 1 percent over the month. Prices for many fruits and other fresh produce declined sharply.



There are signs that food prices will not behave as well when the June price increases are reported. Sugar prices have begun to climb, and the Agriculture Dept. reports pork is likely to be in shorter supply later this year.

As in the past, the four basic budget items that affect most American families—food, housing, transportation, and medical care—have accounted for practically all of the nation's inflation over the past 12 months. Transportation charges are up 11.6 percent since May 1980, housing 10.1 percent, medical care 9.8 percent, and food 8.7 percent.

Transportation charges were up three-tenths of 1 percent, chiefly because of increases in new car prices and automobile financing charges. New car prices jumped 2.6 percent in May, while used car prices rose only two-tenths of 1 percent.

Health care costs were up seven-tenths of 1 percent, largely due to a sharp rise of 1.3 percent in medical care commodities. The cost of entertainment overall went up one-half a percent.

Labor Hits 'Giveaways' To Business in Tax Bill

CAMPAIGN TO BLOCK decontrol of natural gas prices is announced at a news conference in the AFL-CIO building by Machinists President William W. Winpisinger in his role as president of the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition of some 200 organizations. A study warned of serious job losses from the sharp rise in utility bills and industrial costs that decontrol would bring.

Kirkland Cites Heavier Load For Workers

Corporate tax cuts tentatively approved by the House Ways & Means Committee would force America's workers to carry a bigger share of the nation's tax burden, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland protested.

Kirkland urged the committee to reconsider its decisions, which would cost the Treasury more than $180 billion in lost revenues over the next five years. New tax breaks for business, he said, should be linked to the goal of shoring up the nation's industrial base.

THE DEMOCRATIC majority on the Ways & Means Committee has been vying with the Reagan Administration to come up with the most generous package of tax reductions for business, with middle-income wage and salary earners the obvious losers in the competition. The "bipartisan giveaways" will come close to wiping out the corporation income tax entirely, Kirkland warned.

One committee action would drop the maximum corporation income tax rate from 46 percent to 34 percent over five years, which would lower the "effective" corporate rate from 29 percent to only 14 percent.

Combined with other committee-endorsed business tax cuts, Kirkland noted, the corporate share of the cost of government would fall to a mere 7 percent. That's a 70-percent drop from the 1970 ratio, he pointed out.

THE WAYS & MEANS Committee went a big step further than the Reagan Administration in liberalizing the depreciation tax writeoffs businesses can take on

3.4 Million Jobs at Stake

Natural Gas Decontrol Labor, Coalition Battle

The AFL-CIO has joined with the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition in a nationwide campaign to block decontrol of natural gas prices and avert a chain reaction of inflation and job losses.

Decontrol would double heating bills of households using natural gas, shift $260 billion from consumer spending to the profits of the oil and gas companies over the next four years, and wipe out some 3 million jobs, according to a study commissioned by the coalition.

MACHINISTS President William W. Winpisinger, who heads the 200-organization Energy Coalition, told a news conference that it will seek written pledges by members of Congress to oppose any attempt to repeal natural gas controls or speed up the existing timetable for gradual decontrol of "new" natural gas wells.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said the federation will urge members of Congress to make such a pledge and will work with the coalition and allied senior citizen, farm and consumer groups "in a nationwide grass roots education and lobbying campaign to stop natural gas decontrol."

Decontrol would hurt every American household, undercut the competitive position of American industry, and inflict new hardships on moderate-income families dependent on natural gas. "There is no argument, save greed, for decontrol," Denison told the news conference.

WILLIAM HUTTON, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens and secretary-treasurer of the Energy Coalition, said NCSC's 4,000 local clubs will work with other coalition participants to get the message to members of Congress that "no one in your district will benefit from decontrol."

Last January, soon after taking office, President Reagan decontrolled oil and gasoline prices with an Executive Order. But lifting of controls on natural gas would require legislation and touch off a major battle in Congress.

Energy Sec. James B. Edwards has made clear the Administration is opposed to continued controls, and it is in anticipation of the congressional battle that the coalition has launched its campaign.

Senate GOP Blocks Move To Preserve Pension Floor

The Senate obediently went along with the Reagan Administration's insistence on wiping out the minimum social security benefit of $122 a month. But for a change, nearly all Democrats and a small handful of moderate Republicans stood up in opposition.

The 53-45 vote defeated an attempt by Sen. Donald Riegle (D-Mich.) to restore the minimum retirement benefit by amending the budget reconciliation bill—a package of nearly $40 billion in "savings" that are achieved by rewriting laws and cutting back programs.

RIEGLE SOUGHT to eliminate a $925-million budget cut that would be achieved by ending the existing guarantee that no one eligible for social security benefits would receive less than $122 a month.

If the House goes along with the Senate action, some 3 million persons would have their social security checks cut. A House Ways & Means Committee staff found that at least 86 percent of those whose income would be reduced are women, mostly elderly, including 500,000 over the age of 80. "Many of these elderly women have been living for years in or near poverty on their social security benefit, plus whatever savings or other small income they might have," the study found.

Forty-one Democrats and four Republicans voted to restore funds for the minimum benefit. But they were outvoted by a lineup of 48 Republicans and five Democrats.

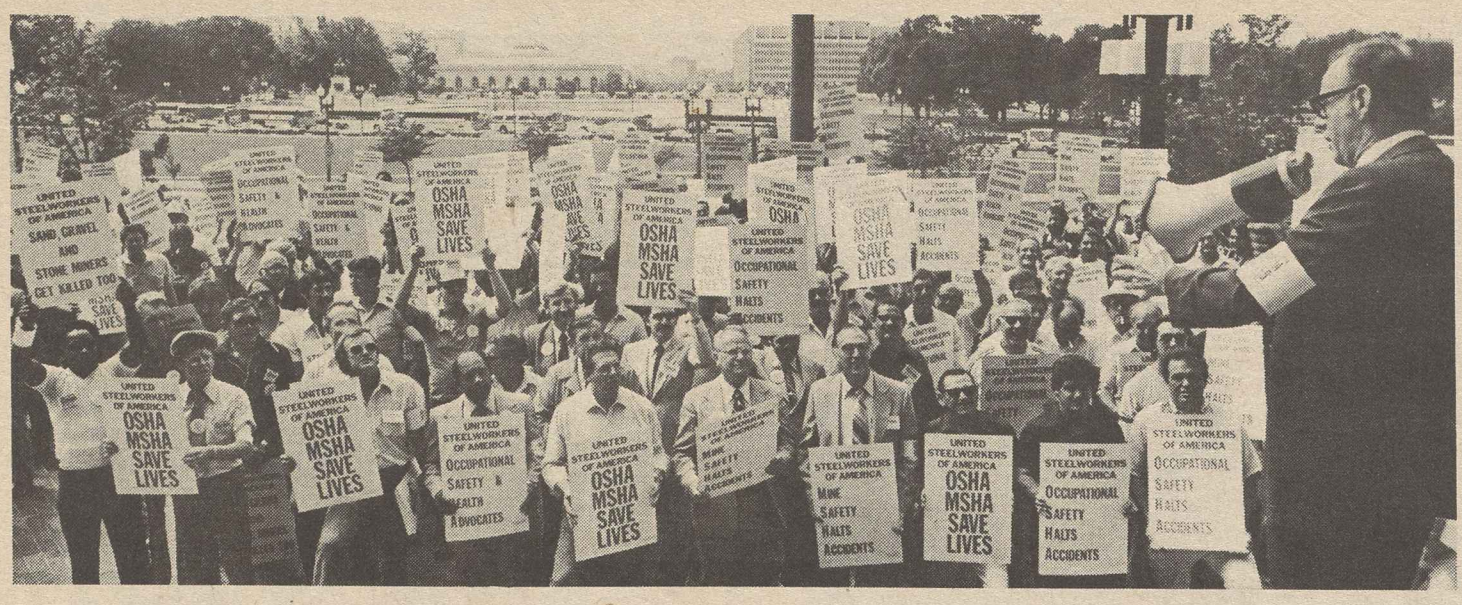
Maritime Unions Win Bargaining Gains for 45,000

Three maritime unions have negotiated new three-year agreements with U.S.-flag ship owners for more than 45,000 crew members on deep sea vessels.



The settlements provide basic annual wage increases of 7.5 percent as well as three cost-of-living adjustments and marked improvements in pension benefits.

THE CONTRACTS, retroactive to June 16, cover 20,000 members of the National Maritime Union, 14,000 Seafarers and 11,000 active members and retirees of the Marine Engineers.

Members of both the SIU and NMU overwhelmingly ratified the agreements, the unions reported. MEBA said a ratification vote is pending.

The Masters, Mates & Pilots continued bargaining with the ship owners after extending old agreements for 30 days beyond the June 15 expiration date.

STEELWORKERS' legislative conference delegates moved from the Labor Dept. to the Capitol to convey what USWA President Lloyd McBride termed a "sense of outrage" at the Reagan Administration's policies. Above, USWA Legislative Director John J. Sheehan uses a bullhorn to speak to delegates demonstrating at the Labor Dept. in support of OSHA, the Occupational Safety & Health Act, and MSHA, the law that covers mine safety and health. At right, McBride welcomes House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., who told the delegates that the Administration's economic program is "for the selfish, for the greedy and for the affluent." McBride said Congress must hear from constituents "the kind of anger" aroused by the attempt to slash social security.

Employment Goals Pushed Under CETA

The AFL-CIO reminded Congress of its full employment obligations and cautioned against "unrealistic" reliance on the private sector to provide jobs and training in a slow-growing economy.

Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten, testifying at Senate hearings on employment and training issues, urged a continued mix of programs under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (CETA) and other laws.

CETA HAS helped the disadvantaged develop basic skills needed to find and keep jobs, McGlotten noted. It has helped workers raise on-the-job skill levels, prepared minority youth for apprenticeship through labor-supported outreach programs, and provided public service jobs to take up the slack of recession unemployment, he pointed out.

"Full employment is essential to economic recovery and economic growth," McGlotten insisted.

It should be the goal of overall economic policy and of "direct, specific, targeted employment and training programs," he said. "Targeted jobs programs tailored to the specific needs of unemployed workers and to specific social needs are two to four times more effective in creating jobs than are generalized tax cuts," McGlotten testified.

HE STRESSED, however, that "employment and training programs should not be used to subsidize low-wage, substandard employers, to subsidize high labor turnover or jobs which do not require training, or to aid runaway industries."

The AFL-CIO strongly supports the concept of a "counter-cyclical jobs program" which would fund public service jobs when the unemployment rate is high, McGlotten said. And it supports funding of nationally-developed programs, such as the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, as well as community programs operated by local governments or other non-profit "prime sponsors."

High Court Denies Right to Bargain Over Partial Business Shutdowns

The Supreme Court ruled that a company doesn't have to bargain with a union representing its workers before closing down a part of its business—provided that the shutdown is solely for economic or business reasons and not to "chill" unionism.

Its 7-2 decision rejected the position taken by the National Labor Relations Board in a case involving a company that provided maintenance services for a number of nursing homes. The NLRB position was that a partial shutdown clearly affected conditions of employment and therefore is a mandatory subject for collective bargaining until a genuine impasse is reached.

A BRIEF supporting the NLRB, filed jointly by the AFL-CIO and the UAW, had cited examples of union-management negotiations over a seemingly unavoidable economic shutdown that resulted in cooperative labor-management actions which reduced costs and preserved jobs.

The Supreme Court majority suggested that management would have an incentive to bargain voluntarily with the union where labor costs were a factor in a shutdown decision. But it insisted that the decision should rest with management alone since there might be situations where any delay in closing down would be costly or otherwise burdensome.

The court did reiterate that management remained obligated to bargain with a union over the effects of a shutdown. And it noted that federal labor law "prohibits partial closings motivated by anti-union animus." The NLRB "may inquire into the motivations behind a partial closing," the court said, and "an employer may not simply shut down part of its business and mask its desire to weaken and circumvent the union by labeling its decision 'purely economic.' "

A DISSENTING opinion by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., joined by Thurgood Marshall, said mandatory bargaining might not be required in all cases of partial closings, but the NLRB was in a better position to judge the situation than the courts. The dissenters complained that the court majority had taken into account "only the interests of management" and had failed to consider "the legitimate interests of the workers and their union."

The Supreme Court also differed from the AFL-CIO position in a case testing the constitutionality of a Minnesota state fair regulation prohibiting sale or distribution of any "printed or written material" at the fairgrounds except at booths rented from state fair authorities.

The restriction had been challenged by the Krishna Society as an infringement of religious freedom, but an AFL-CIO brief focused on the free speech aspect, citing parallels with laws used to restrict distribution of union leaflets that had been held unconstitutional in earlier Supreme Court decisions.

THE AFL-CIO contended that the vast fairground with its network of roads and walkways was akin to a city. But the court, in an opinion by Justice Byron R. White, held that "there are significant differences between a street and the fairgrounds."

While the court was unanimous in allowing limitations on literature sales and fund solicitations, four justices would have allowed distribution of free copies of literature by persons moving about in the fairgrounds crowds.

Still another Supreme Court decision handed down on June 22 upheld the position taken by the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters as to federal jurisdiction over a suit by a local union against its parent organization based on the international union constitution.

THE CASE arose when the international union used its authority under the union constitution to compel a merger of a group of local unions after the locals involved had failed to reach a voluntary agreement. A New Jersey local sued in state court to block the merger.

The international union then acted to transfer the case to a federal district court, which upheld its position on several legal grounds. On appeal, the 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals nullified the district court's action and said the case should have been left for the state courts since the dispute would not have a "significant impact on labor-management relations or industrial peace."

In a 6-3 decision written by Justice Brennan, the Supreme Court rejected the appellate court interpretation and upheld the federal district court's jurisdiction over the case.

IN ANOTHER AREA of interest to labor, the Supreme Court agreed to decide whether employees of the Long Island Railroad, a commuter line, are covered by the no-strike provisions of New York State's Taylor Law or by the federal Railway Labor Act.

The state took over the railroad in 1966 and sought to block a 1979 strike by the United Transportation Union by invoking the Taylor Act.

A federal district court held that the union members had the right to strike under the Railway Labor Act since the railroad was a necessary link with other carriers in the movement of interstate freight.

THE 2ND CIRCUIT U.S. Court of Appeals ruled that the state law overrides the Railway Labor Act on the theory that the state interest in assuring passenger service for a large body of commuters is paramount. Arguments in the case will be heard in the fall.

By refusing to review another appellate decision, the Supreme Court gave the green light to a future court test of the "comparable worth" argument in a sex discrimination case involving the pay of men and women workers.

The Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers (IUE) had charged that Westinghouse violated the Civil Rights Act by paying women employees at its Trenton, N.J., plant less than men for jobs that under the company's own job evaluation required at least equal knowledge, training, skill and responsibility.

A federal district court dismissed the suit as outside the scope of the law. But the 3rd Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals sent the case back to be heard on its merits. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission had supported the IUE position before the appellate court. The Supreme Court denial of review makes the appellate ruling final.

Cleveland Unions Undertake Study On Plant Closings

Cleveland—The Cleveland AFL-CIO has launched a survey among its local unions in an attempt to learn why factories are leaving the city or closing.

A questionnaire prepared by the central body has been sent to the locals querying them about closings, planned closings, proposed layoffs, shorter work weeks and the physical condition of factories.

Questions also deal with whether management has been keeping up with technological change.

IF THERE have been closings or runaway shops, the central body survey tries to determine if the reason given by the owners was one of 26. These include foreign competition, flight to "developing" countries, lack of city support, flight to Sunbelt, high taxes, lack of capital, wages and high energy cost.

The Cleveland AFL-CIO got involved when Mayor George V. Voinovich said he believed that labor officials and staff, who service the union members, might know more about the problem then anyone else in the city.

Central Body President Martin J. Hughes of the Communications Workers expressed the hope that the survey results will help labor deal more effectively with mounting economic problems afflicting older cities in the East and Midwest like Cleveland.

Executive Sec. Sebastian Lupica noted that there have been many plant closings in the city and we have suffered in membership loss and we must find new ways to deal with it, correct information is the starting point."

U.S. Workers Support ILO Attack on Apartheid, Government Abstains

Geneva—The AFL-CIO broke with the government members of the U.S. delegation by voting for a declaration by the International Labor Organization denouncing the "degrading, criminal and inhuman racial policies" of the South African government.

The declaration was adopted by the ILO's annual assembly without a dissenting vote, but the U.S. government was among the seven delegates abstaining. It expressed technical reservations on some of the action proposed in the fight against apartheid.

Speaking for the U.S. worker delegation, Patrick O'Farrell, executive director of the African-American Labor Center, assured the assembly that the U.S. worker vote in favor of the declaration, rather than the government's abstention, had expressed the "true feeling of the majority of the people of our country."

IN THE EARLIER discussion, O'Farrell had recalled that the AFL-CIO had its own policy, independent of the government's, in support of the black and other South African trade unions struggling against discrimination.

"We reject at this juncture the calls for armed struggle and for war as the only means of ending apartheid," he said. But if more drastic measures than those now contemplated should become necessary "we would be prepared to consider such measures at that time," O'Farrell said.

The AFL-CIO delegation also broke with the government by voting in favor of an ILO budget for the two years 1982-83 of $230 million, a 5.1 percent increase over the preceding two years.

Gerd Muhr, West German chairman of the worker delegates, expressed the satisfaction of the group at the importance given in the budget to the ILO's work in favor of labor standards and human rights.

WHILE RECOGNIZING the ILO's effort to economize, the U.S. government delegates abstained in the vote approving the budget to underscore the Reagan Administration's clampdown on expenditures.

The 34 votes against the budget were all cast by the Soviet bloc to protest what it claimed to be a failure to take into account its program proposals.

However, Poland's Solidarity trade union delegation showed its independence by casting the only Eastern European vote in favor of the budget.

In a major address to the assembly, AFL-CIO International Rep. Irving Brown warned that the job and social standards established by the ILO must not be sidetracked in the effort to speed tht development of the world's poorer countries.

"Economic growth is not the whole story of development," Brown stressed in his address to the 1,800 worker, government and employer delegates and their advisers. "Economic development," he continued, "must provide for the satisfaction of the economic and social needs of man."

Brown, as the U.S. worker delegate to the ILO, heads an AFL-CIO team that was reinforced in the course of the three-week session by the arrival of Federation President Lane Kirkland and UAW President Douglas A. Fraser.

Noting that the need to assist Third World development is now a major preoccupation of all international organizations, Brown called on the ILO to insure that its standards for bettering the life of workers are applied in all "international actions and programs."

"The promotion of standards is the major job of the ILO," he said.

BROWN RECALLED the AFL-CIO's "constant concern for the disabled" in connection with the UN decision to focus world attention this year on the problems of the handicapped.

ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard underscored in his report to the conference the AFL-CIO's "well-defined policy" in favor of the disabled.

Brown stressed that this policy for "bringing disabled workers into the world of productive employment is also part of the struggle against discrimination in employment."

He noted that a London newspaper recently reported that a founder of a movement in the Soviet Union in defense of the handicapped had been threatened with internment in a mental hospital as a dissident.

"It is this kind of treatment that must be exposed and eliminated," Brown said as he expressed satisfaction that the 1983 ILO session will examine ways to insure that the handicapped hold their rightful place in society.

AS IT NEARED the final week of the session, the assembly also adopted, despite some government and employer hesitation, an international standard by which governments are called upon to "encourage and promote the development of collective bargaining."

Robert Wholey of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute was the member of the AFL-CIO delegation who helped draft the convention that makes action mandatory for governments that ratify it.

The convention stipulates that trade unions and employer groups should first be consulted and their agreement sought before any measures are taken.

IN GENEVA, at the International Labor Organization's assembly, Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland bolstered the U.S. worker delegation during discussion and debate on standards and issues affecting workers throughout the world.

Key Interest Rate Edges Up, New Housing Starts Plummet

Two major New York banks raised their prime lending rates to 20 percent, making that the prevailing rate among the nation's largest banks despite an easing in the money supply.

The actions by Chemical Bank and Citibank reversed declines posted by the two banks a week earlier. Chemical had lowered its prime, or base, rate on corporate loans to 19 percent on June 15. The following day, Citibank cut its prime rate to 19.5 percent. A similar move to the 20 percent level was made June 19 by Bankers Trust & Marine Midland, which with Citibank had lowered its prime to 19.5 percent.

MEANWHILE, the Federal Reserve Board reported a modest increase in the nation's money supply after three weeks of decline, which normally would signal lower interest rates. But the federal funds rate, which banks charge one another for loans, has remained high, and analysts say that interest rates will not decline until it eases substantially.

The prime lending rate generally tends to influence other short-term lending rates, including consumer rates such as those charged for home mortgages.

Higher interest rates have been largely responsible for the growing sluggishness in the economy, which both Administration and private analysts expect to show little growth during the current and third quarters of the year.

HOUSING STARTS plummeted 14 percent last month to the lowest level since the depths of the housing depression one year ago, the Commerce Dept. reported. The falloff was due in large part to high mortgage rates averaging 16 percent across the country.

New home construction in May declined to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.15 million units, the lowest level since the 938,000 starts a year earlier. The May decrease was the first and the largest since February, when starts plunged 26.8 percent.

The issuance of building permits, a sign of future housing construction, fell a slight three-tenths of 1 percent to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 1.82 million units. The level was 37 percent above the very low rate of 864,000 permits in May 1980.

OTHER GOVERNMENT reports revealed equally poor performance in other sectors of the economy. Output of the nation's factories, mines, and utilities increased a modest three-tenths of 1 percent in May, the Federal Reserve Board reported. The board said the increase was concentrated in the production of motor vehicles and parts.

Autos were assembled at an annual rate of 7.3 million units last month, up from a 6.8-million unit rate in April. But this reflected a buildup of inventories in anticipation of plant closings in the summer. Another factor was the introduction of the new General Motors "J" cars.

Factory output increased four-tenths of 1 percent following similar rises in April and March. But output of construction supplies continued downward for the second month dropping seven-tenths of 1 percent. Output of business and defense equipment continued to expand, and materials output increased three-tenths of 1 percent.

SEPARATELY, the Fed reported that the nation's factories operated at 80.1 percent of capacity in May, up a slight one-tenth of 1 percent from April.

In another government report, the Commerce Dept. said that Americans' personal income increased a slight six-tenths of 1 percent in May, barely enough to cover the current rate of inflation. It was the same percentage increase as in April.

Reagan Fills NLRB Posts, Designates New Chairman

President Reagan has named a management consultant and the chief counsel of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee to fill the two vacancies on the National Labor Relations Board.

Reagan announced he will nominate John R. Van de Water to serve the remainder of the term expiring on Aug. 27, 1981, from which John A. Penello resigned on Jan. 14, and for the ensuing five-year term expiring in 1986. The president said he would also designate Van de Water to replace John H. Fanning, a Democrat, as chairman of the NLRB. Fanning, whose term expires in December 1982, would continue as a member of the board.

TO FILL THE second vacancy, held until last Jan. 26 by John C. Truesdale under an interim appointment, Reagan named Robert P. Hunter, 41, who currently is chief counsel and chief of staff for the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee.

The AFL-CIO is checking with those familiar with Van de Water's work in order to analyze his record on labor-management issues. Similarly, while the federation is familiar with Hunter's record on Capitol Hill, his writings on labor-management issues are being studied.

Before the Republicans took control of the Senate this year, Hunter had served as counsel to minority members of the committee, including the present chairman, Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah). He previously had been an attorney with NLRB regional offices in Buffalo and Cincinnati.

Van de Water, 64, has headed his own management consulting firm, Van de Water Associates, since 1949. He also is executive vice president of Promanent International Inc., which specializes in audio-visual materials for management development programs.

HE HAS served as a management representative for both the Ford Motor Co. and North American Aviation, Inc., and has served on the Labor Relations Committee of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Van de Water also has been on the management and industrial relations faculties of both UCLA and the University of Southern California.

Both nominations require Senate confirmation.

The remaining members of the board are Howard Jenkins, Jr., and Don A. Zimmerman.

Comeaux Appointed To Region IV Post

Robert L. Comeaux, an international representative with the Food & Commercial Workers, has been appointed assistant director of AFL-CIO Region IV effective July 6.

Comeaux had been coordinator of the UFCW's national boycott against Winn-Dixie, which led to an agreement with the southern supermarket chain a year ago. He also has served on the staffs of the UFCW Texas district council and UFCW Local 455 in Houston since 1972.

Region IV, based in Arlington, Tex., covers the states of Colorado, Louisiana, New Mexico and Texas. Nicholas Kurko is director.

The Natural Gas Grab

THE AFL-CIO opposes the decontrol of natural gas prices.

Decontrol of natural gas will hurt all American workers and their families by stealing from their paychecks through inflation, and by robbing millions of Americans of their jobs. The massive increase in prices for natural gas will cost an estimated 3.4 million Americans their jobs by 1985 as the result of price acceleration of products and services to a point where they can no longer be afforded.

The increased production costs in such key industries as chemicals, food processing, textile and clothing manufacture, steel and other primary metals, fabricated metal products, and transportation equipment will undercut the competitive position of American industries and cost more American workers their jobs.

DECONTROL WILL inflict severe hardships on low-income and middle-income families who heat their homes with natural gas. The poor and senior citizens are already paying as much as 35 to 50 percent of their incomes for energy and cannot afford gas bills double or triple what they now pay.

There is no argument, save greed, for decontrol.

Decontrol will not increase incentives to explore for new natural gas supplies. Instead, decontrol will allow the oil companies to take windfall profits on natural gas discovered years ago. At the same time, decontrol will destroy the special price incentives for new and hard-to-find gas which were put in place by the Natural Gas Policy Act.

The natural gas decontrol issue is of critical importance to the AFL-CIO's 13 million members, and to consumers across the nation. The corrosive effects of natural gas decontrol on inflation, unemployment and falling standards of living are enormous and have a heavy impact on the stability of America's collective bargaining process.

THESE ADVERSE effects far outweigh any monetary advantage that might come from individual and business tax cuts now being proposed in the Congress. While we think these tax cuts need to be redirected and are an unconscionable run on the U.S. Treasury, it would be doubly cruel and cynical for the Administration to allow the oil companies to take away from American workers and businesses more than has been promised in the proposed tax cuts.

The AFL-CIO will work with the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition, senior citizens, farmers, and consumer groups in a nationwide grass roots education and lobbying campaign to stop natural gas decontrol.

We urge members of Congress to pledge their opposition to accelerated or total decontrol of natural gas prices.

Hidden Giveaways

'Tax Expenditures' a Program Of Relief for the Truly Wealthy

By Gus Tyler

TAX EXPENDITURES. Everytime I use that expression in one of these columns I get letters—even phone calls—from readers asking, "what are tax expenditures?" Occasionally, I am even charged with a misprint. How can you have a "tax," which is money you take in, called an "expenditure," which is money you pay out?

The answer is that a "tax expenditure" is money you pay out when you collect the tax: that's why it's called a "tax expenditure." Tricky, eh? Yes, it is.

SOMEDAY somebody ought to popularize another name for these self-contradictory items in our national budget and tax system. I would call them the "hidden giveaways."

They are "giveaways" from Uncle Sam to special interest groups in America. Certain individuals and certain institutions, the largest being the biggest corporations, are "given" tax breaks. Taxes that they would normally pay, they do not pay, because somebody wrote an obscure item into the tax code or because some bureaucrat or court made some interpretation of some item in the law that makes it legal to pay less or pay nothing, if you are one of these favored parties.

This kind of "giveaway" is hidden, unlike other "giveaways" that are out in the open. If Uncle Same gives food stamps to a poor family, that "expenditure" is on the record. But when Uncle Sam gives away $300 billion in tax expenditures in any one year—as he will this year—that does not appear on the books as an expense. It is "hidden."

YES, THE SUM is roughly $300 billion. If "tax expenditures" were included in our budget —as food stamps, school lunches, defense expenditures, or scholarship loans are—then "tax expenditures" would be the single biggest item in the budget. It is also the most rapidly growing.

But we hear no caterwauling, complaining, and crying about this "expenditure," alongside of which outlays for the poor are petty peanuts.

Here we are in the midst of an emotional debate on the budget. Everybody is at everybody else's throat to have or to hold a piece of the pie. Yet, nobody talks about that biggest single chunk of the pie—tax expenditures—because it is hidden.

Soon we will be deep in the debate over taxes. How do we raise enough money to pay our bills? Meanwhile, Uncle Sam will be losing $300 billion in income this year through "tax expenditures" that will be larger this year than ever.

I'M NOT SAYING that Uncle Sam should not excuse some people or some companies from paying some taxes—if that is in the national interest. But why not do it in the open? Let's tax and then let us—by public action recorded on the books—give back some of that tax money to persons or corporations if we want to.

Then, at least, we would know who is really "on relief." We will discover, at long last, that the biggest receivers of relief are not the poorest, but the rest of us, especially the richest.

Labor Welcomes Challenge to Role

These are trying times for us today in many respects. But what we in the American labor movement face and have faced for years is not a passing period of acute crisis. Rather we face a permanent challenge to our basic role in American life.

We are, by the nature of our duties, continually subject to attack from many quarters. Our warts are magnified and distorted, and all of our weaknesses are continually probed and exploited when found. We are exposed to more searching and critical scrutiny and are held to a higher standard of ethics and performance than any other element of our society.

We do not complain of that, nor do we, in fact, wish it were any other way. It's what we all signed on for. We welcome that challenge.

The fact is that we, as trade unionists, do aspire to far higher goals and more selfless purposes than any other element of human society. The challenge is great. It will be with us for a long time, but our common burden will be made all the lighter to the extent that we all shoulder it together.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at federation's regional conference in New Orleans, June 6, 1981.

Supreme Court Decision

OSHA Puts Preeminent Value On Safe, Healthful Workplace

The following is excerpted from the Supreme Court decision upholding the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's cotton dust standard. The majority decision, written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr., held that OSHA is not required to conduct cost-benefit studies in developing safety and health standards.

CONGRESS ENACTED the Occupational Safety & Health Act of 1970 "to assure so far as possible every working man and woman in the nation safe and healthful working conditions." The act authorizes the Secretary of Labor to establish, after notice and opportunity to comment, mandatory nationwide standards governing health and safety in the workplace.

In 1978, the Secretary, acting through the Occupational Safety & Health Administration (OSHA), promulgated a standard limiting occupational exposure to cotton dust, an airborne particle byproduct of the preparation and manufacture of cotton products, exposure to which induces a "constellation of respiratory effects" known as "byssinosis."

Byssinosis, known in its more severe manifestations as "brown lung" disease, is a serious and potentially disabling respiratory disease primarily caused by the inhalation of cotton dust.

ESTIMATES INDICATE that at least 35,000 employed and retired cotton mill workers, or one in 12 such workers, suffers from the most disabling form of byssinosis. The Senate report accompanying the act cited estimates that 100,000 active and retired workers suffer from some grade of the disease. One study found that over 25 percent of a sample of active cotton preparation and yarn manufacturing workers suffer at least some form of the disease at a dust exposure level common prior to adoption of the current standard.

Petitioners representing the interests of the cotton industry, challenged the validity of the "Cotton Dust Standard" in the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. They contend that the act requires OSHA to demonstrate that its standard reflects a reasonable relationship between the costs and benefits associated with the standard.

Respondents, the Secretary of Labor and two (sic) labor organizations [the AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept. and the Clothing & Textile Workers] counter that Congress balanced the costs and benefits in the act itself, and that the act should therefore be construed not to require OSHA to do so.

THEY INTERPRET the act as mandating that OSHA enact the most protective standard possible to eliminate a significant risk of material health impairment, subject to the constraints of economic and technological feasibility. The Court of Appeals held that the act did not require OSHA to compare costs and benefits.

To resolve this debate, we must turn to the language, structure, and legislative history of the act. The starting point of our analysis is the language of the statute itself. Section 6(b)(5) of the act provides:

"The Secretary, in promulgating standards dealing with toxic materials or harmful physical agents under this subsection, shall set the standard which most adequately assures, to the extent feasible, on the basis of the best available evidence, that no employee will suffer material impairment of health or functional capacity even if such employee has regular exposure to the hazard dealt with by such standard for the period of his working life."

Although their interpretations differ, all parties agree that the phrase "to the extent feasible" contains the critical language for purposes of this case.

THE PLAIN MEANING of the word "feasible" supports respondents' interpretation of the statute. According to Webster's Dictionary "feasible" means "capable of being done. . . ."

Thus, the act directs the Secretary to issue the standard that "most adequately assures . . . that no employee will suffer material impairment of health," limited only by the extent to which this is "capable of being done."

In effect then, as the Court of Appeals held, Congress itself defined the basic relationship between costs and benefits, by placing the "benefit" of workers health above all other considerations save those making attainment of this "benefit" unachievable.

ANY STANDARD based on a balancing of costs and benefits by the Secretary that strikes a different balance than that struck by Congress would be inconsistent with the command set forth in the act. Thus, cost-benefit analysis by OSHA is not required by the statute because feasibility analysis is.

The legislative history of the act, while concededly not crystal clear, provides general support for respondents interpretation. The congressional reports and debates certainly confirm that Congress meant "feasible" and nothing else in using that term. Congress was concerned that the act might be thought to require achievement of absolute safety, an impossible standard, and therefore insisted that health and safety goals be capable of economic and technological accomplishment.

PERHAPS MOST TELLING is the absence of any indication whatsoever that Congress intended OSHA to conduct its own cost-benefit analysis before promulgating a toxic material or harmful physical agent standard. The legislative history demonstrates conclusively that Congress was fully aware that the act would impose real and substantial costs of compliance on industry, and believed that such costs were part of the cost of doing business.

When Congress passed the act in 1970, it chose to place preeminent value on assuring employees a safe and healthful working environment, limited only by the feasibility of achieving such an environment. We must measure the validity of the Secretary's actions against the requirements of that act.

Smaller Share for Business

Tax Cut Proposals Would Add To Heavy Burden on Workers

THE SHARP BUSINESS tax cuts shaped by the House Ways & Means Committee would shift more than one-third of the total corporate tax share to the already heavy burden carried by workers, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald charged in a network radio interview.

Pointing out that under current law, corporations pay only 11 percent of the total tax bill, Oswald said that "the Democrats have outdone the Republicans" by allowing even faster depreciation and business expense writeoffs than the Administration had proposed. He said that as a result, the corporate share of total taxes would be slashed to less than 7 percent.

"Somebody else has to pay those taxes—they're not going to disappear—and that somebody else is going to be the workers of America," he asserted on Labor News Conference, broadcast weekly by the Mutual radio network.

OSWALD SAID the business tax cuts proposed by the Ways & Means Committee would largely benefit the biggest and wealthiest corporations, but would do little or nothing to help the new and struggling companies that most need relief. He said the specifically targeted business tax reductions urged by the AFL-CIO would provide the kind of help that the hardest-hit industries and areas of the country need.

That kind of plan, he pointed out, "would not provide windfalls to large corporations . . . would not shift the tax burden onto individual taxpayers," but would help lagging industries rebuilt their strength and compete effectively.

Washington Window

FREE AND EQUAL public education was one of the basic demands of working people 150 years ago. Today, the public school system remains one of labor's—and democracy's—greatest achievements.

As almost every parent and neighborhood knows, the public school again is being forced to adapt under the pressures of declining enrollment, tight budgets and population shifts.

As if public education systems did not have enough problems to deal with, the revival of the tuition tax credit proposals in Congress poses a direct and very dangerous threat to the aspirations of millions of people. For the tuition tax credit would finance private schools to the disadvantage of public schools, shift aid from working class families to the rich and create a caste-like system of education.

The public schools have survived through the upheavals of the Depression, World War II, the civil rights revolution, the baby boom and slump, and population shifts.

THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS may not survive the tuition tax credit, which would provide up to $500 a year for each child in a private college, vocational, elementary or secondary school. The eventual cost would be $4.7 billion a year and the money probably would be shifted from public schools in need to high-income families.

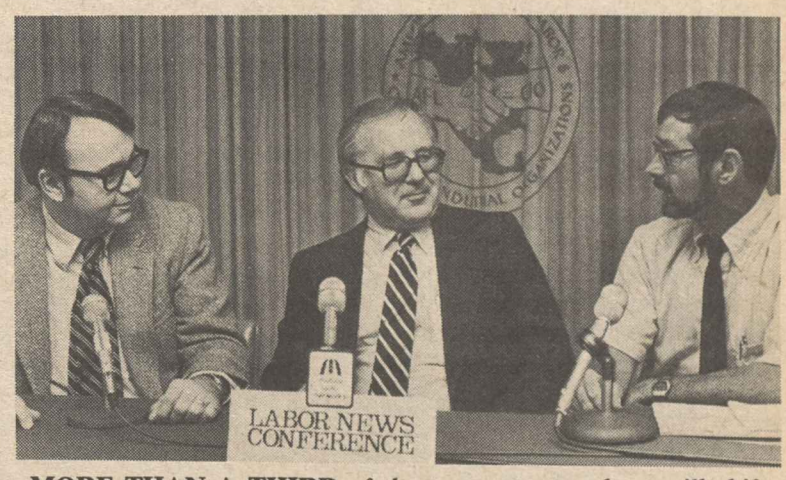
Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kan.) of the Senate Finance Committee stated the "thorny issues" fairly when hearings opened in early June on the tax credit and whether it might become part of the second tax bill later this year.

Because about 85 percent of the private elementary and secondary schools are religiously affiliated, there is the argument that tuition payments violate the First Amendment ban on establishment of religion. Others argue that tax credits would drain brighter students from public to private schools.

Others, Dole said, argue that in a time of fiscal restraint, it is hardly the time to cut federal aid to public education while granting a tax subsidy to parents of private schoolchildren.

ON THE OTHER side, Dole added, proponents argue that education is best served by the diversity of educational philosophies and institutions found in healthy private and parochial schools.

Grace Baisinger, a past president of the National PTA, testified as chairperson of the labor-backed National Coalition for Public Education. She said tax credits would be "bad economic policy, bad education policy and bad public policy."



Nancy Neuman of the League of Women Voters cited findings by sociologist James Coleman that families with incomes above $38,000 a year are more than four times as likely to send their kids to private schools than families with incomes under $7,000. Tax credits would lead toward an "educational caste system," she asserted.

Neuman also observed that "segregation academies" would be aided by such tax credits and quality integrated education would be undermined.

WHEN A LABOR panel made up of the AFL-CIO, the American Federation of Teachers and the National Education Association testified, tuition tax credit sponsor Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.) lost his temper.

It was a performance unworthy of a senator from a liberal state. Moynihan browbeat the witnesses and, in a statement carried on national TV, charged that the witnesses "dragged slime into this hearing room." In fact, the labor testimony was similar or identical to that of others opposing the bill.

Moynihan's intemperate remarks recalled the old rule of trial lawyers. If the facts are on your side, argue the facts; if the law is on your side, argue the law; if you have neither the facts nor the law on your side, yell like hell.

MORE THAN A THIRD of the corporate tax share will shift to the already heavy burden carried by workers if sharp business tax cuts shaped by the House Ways & Means Committee are adopted, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald, center, charged. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Frank Swoboda, left, of the Washington Post and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly on the Mutual radio network.

Union Contracts Prove Value to Workers, Nation

The union contract produced by collective bargaining represents a solid investment for both workers and the nation, union economists Markley Roberts and William Bittle point out in the American Federationist.

Unionized workers not only earn more than non-union workers in similar occupations and industries but also are more productive than their non-union counterparts, they note.

The article in the AFL-CIO monthly magazine cites abundant evidence that unionization raises productivity to such a point that unionized employers can better afford to give higher pay and more fringe benefits to their workers.

"TAKEN TOGETHER, higher earnings and higher productivity provide a sound basis for a growing, expanding U.S. economy with widely dispersed and rising mass consumer buying power and high-volume, cost-cutting mass production of the goods and services America's people need and want for a rising standard of living," the authors observe. Roberts is an economist for the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research and Bittle for the Machinists.

No single study or statistical series gives the full story on relative wages of similarly situated workers on the basis of whether they are covered by a collective bargaining agreement, they note. Yet, the available information adds up to an overwhelming case for the wage advantage of unionized workers.

The most recent Bureau of Labor Statistics report on "earnings and other characteristics of organized workers," based on a May 1977 survey, found that unionized blue-collar workers had usual weekly earnings averaging $266, or $72 higher than non-union, blue-collar workers' earnings.

Unionized service workers had usual weekly earnings averaging $212 a week, compared to the $135 a week earnings of non-union service workers.

ON AN INDUSTRY basis, the overall union advantage was 19 percent—$262 average weekly earnings for unionized workers compared to $221 for non-union workers. The biggest union differential was 49 percent for workers in the construction industry.

More evidence is cited in unpublished BLS data from the May 1978 Current Population Survey which add industry, occupation and geographic details to the general union/non-union pay picture. Earnings by occupation of workers paid on an hourly basis showed a big differential in favor of union workers over non-union workers.

Unionized blue-collar workers made 58 percent more than non-union blue-collar workers, the data show. Unionized white-collar workers made 51 percent more than their non-union counterparts and unionized service workers held a 62-percent differential.

ON A REGIONAL basis, earnings of unionized hourly paid workers exceeded non-union earnings in every U.S. region, with the highest differential, 81 percent, in the Rocky Mountain states, and the lowest, 46 percent, in the New England states. For the nation as a whole, as in the industry and occupation breakdown, the union advantage in pay was 66 percent.

Union workers also do better than non-union workers with respect to fringe benefits, Roberts and Bittle observe. Unpublished BLS data collected for a 1980 report on "employee compensation in the private, non-farm economy" show that the $2.75 value of total benefits on an hourly basis for unionized workers exceeded the $1.13 value of total benefits for non-union workers by 143 percent. On an annual basis, the fringe benefit advantage for union workers was $3,300.

UNIONS MAKE an important contribution to the efficient utilization of human capital, too, the authors point out, adding that more and more studies are now showing that union workers are much more productive than their non-union counterparts.

One significant study, "Trade Unions in the Production Process" by Charles Brown of the University of Maryland and James Medoff of Harvard University, in the 1978 Journal of Political Economy, found unionized establishments about 22 percent more productive than non-union establishments — and union productivity advantage could even be as high as 30 percent.

Brown and Medoff give several reasons why unionized firms are more productive, with labor turnover among the principal factors.

"Unionized workers have lower turnover rates than do otherwise comparable workers in the non-union portion of the industry," they observe.

"HIGH TURNOVER can reduce productivity of a workforce through both a reduction of investment and a loss of firm specific training, interference with the functioning of a work group and the costs (e.g., personnel) of securing the requisite amount of labor."

The authors also say that the seniority system put in place by the union can raise productivity: ". . . Seniority can greatly weaken the feeling of rivalry among workers. This can increase the amount of informal training and assistance that workers are willing to provide others."

In light of the accumulating evidence that unionized workers produce more as well as earn more than non-union workers, Roberts and Bittle sum up, employers and American society in general should take a much more positive approach to unionism and collective bargaining.

The outcome was described by National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman as "vicious and cruel treatment of older people by the Administration and by all those in the Senate who supported the Administration proposal."

Another Democratic-sponsored attempt at fund restoration was beaten by an almost identical 52-46 vote, even though the amount of money involved is much smaller. It came on a motion to add $80 million to avoid cuts in federal funds for foster care and adoptive services. The Senate reconciliation bill would lump funding in with other programs as "block grants" to states and cut the total amount 25 percent.

The block grant issue is one of the most important the House was to deal with as it took up a Democratic-crafted version of the reconciliation bill.

CUTS IN THE House bill were almost as horrendous as the Senate version in terms of labor's concerns, but the differences were significant enough that the AFL-CIO legislative staff was actively lobbying against changes sought by the Administration.

The further spending cuts Republicans were trying to add to the reconciliation bill through a substitute bill would affect student loans, child nutrition, social security, family welfare, housing, food stamps and federal employee retirement.

In a letter to House members, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison termed the GOP proposals "unmerited and unnecessary" to stay within the budget ceilings.

HE URGED especially rejection of a Republican attempt to wipe out a number of separate programs and lump them with reduced funding into block grants for the states to spend as they wish.

"Passage of block grants is the beginning of a very short road to the total elimination of federal funding for these essential and comprehensive education, health, energy, social service and community development programs."

The House and Senate were both scheduled to complete action on budget reconciliation before recessing until after the Fourth of July weekend. Differences between the two measures must then be resolved in a House-Senate conference.

MOST ATTENTION in the House focused on the political battle being waged by the White House to repeat President Reagan's victory on the original budget resolution, when a large body of conservative Democrats broke with the party leadership.

House Republicans, supported by 31 conservative Democrats, won a first-round victory on the budget reconciliation bill. On a 217-210 procedural vote, they won the right to package their amendments into a single substitute bill that would be easier to pass than a series of amendments. The vote was a political victory for President Reagan but the narrow margin showed a slippage in the conservative coalition strength.

Labor Film, Art Programs Slated For Smithsonian

A labor film festival and a major art exhibit sponsored by two AFL-CIO unions and the Smithsonian Institution will be feature attractions in Washington, D.C., during July and August.

The film festival, developed by the Service Employees, will run July 18 to Aug. 17. It will include the public premiere of the AFL-CIO's film, "A Time of Challenge," produced as part of the federation's celebration of the centennial of organized labor in America.

THE SMITHSONIAN also will host from July 16 to Aug. 21 "Images of Labor," an exhibit of 32 original works of art commissioned as part of the Bread & Roses cultural project of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union's District 1199.

SEIU's festival will include among its 24 offerings classic labor films and four new productions by the Steelworkers, Machinists, Auto Workers and District 1199. Films will be shown free at the Smithsonian's Museum of American History.

The same museum will house the art exhibit which includes paintings and sculpture by major American artists, each based on a quotation about the lives of working people. The Washington show is the first leg of a two-year national tour of the exhibit conducted under the auspices of the Smithsonian.

A schedule of the titles and screening dates of the films is available from Lyn Goldfarb, SEIU, 2020 K St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

Social Security COLA Due in July Checks

The social security checks for some 36 million beneficiaries will be 11.2 percent higher in July, when a 12-month cost-of-living adjustment is put into effect.

The average monthly payment of $337 will rise to $374, reflecting the rise in the consumer price index from the first quarter of 1980 to the same period in 1981. Persons receiving railroad retirement benefits will get comparable increases.

The percentage raise will also go to some 4 million low-income recipients receiving Supplemental Security Income (SSI) payments, which are made out of general treasury revenues and not the social security trust funds. The maximum SSI payment for an individual will go to $264.70.

All increases will show up on checks that normally are delivered on July 3.

AFL-CIO Calls for Bar to Commodity 'Tax Straddles'

Congress should take the profit out of a billion-dollar tax avoidance scheme instead of "slashing programs in the name of budget balancing," the AFL-CIO said.

The federation strongly endorsed a bill being considered by two Senate Finance subcommittees that would close the "tax straddle" loophole used by wealthy investors and corporations to generate artificial losses for tax purposes from commodity transactions that have very little economic risk.

Such straddles usually involve contracts for future purchases and sales of commodities. By holding buy and sell contracts of equal amounts for different delivery dates, speculators can take advantage of market movements to show paper losses while deferring taxes on actual gains.

ENDING THIS tax avoidance scheme, the AFL-CIO noted, would bring in an additional $1.3 billion in revenues in 1982.

At a time when tax policy should be used to promote economic growth and generate employment opportunities, "Congress can ill afford to ignore a tax shelter gimmick that serves to drive up the price of commodities, adds to the deficit and serves absolutely no economic purpose," the federation declared.

Oil Workers Put Job Security High On Contract List

Denver—Guarantees against layoffs and plant closings are high on the list of priorities outlined by the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers for coming negotiations with the oil industry.

The collective bargaining goals drafted by the union's 12-member National Bargaining Policy Committee also call for a two-year contract providing substantial wage improvements and employer contributions to a supplemental pension plan.

CURRENT OCAW agreements with the industry covering about 55,000 oil and petrochemical workers will expire next Jan. 7.

OCAW President Robert F. Goss, who chairs the committee, reported that the eight specific proposals will be presented to the companies in November after they are ratified by the union's oil industry bargaining units.

The committee's concerns for job security were prompted by impending shutdowns of plants and refineries that employ OCAW members. Current agreements provide for a six-month notice by the employer prior to plant shutdown.

IN ADDITION to the guarantees against layoffs, the key goals are for:

- A two-year agreement expiring Jan. 7, 1984.
- No regression in existing terms and conditions covering pensions, job health and safety clauses and pay differentials.
- A substantial wage increase in each of the two years. The basic national rate for OCAW members is currently $11.60 an hour.
- A $24-per-week contribution for each OCAW-represented worker to the OCAW Union-Industry Pension Plan as a supplement to existing company pension plans.
- "Premium-free" health care coverage for all OCAW-represented workers, retirees, spouses and dependents. Companies have increased health plan contributions by $36.50 in the past two years, which has resulted in full employer payments at some companies. Current coverage for retirees varies widely in OCAW's 400 contracts with the oil industry.
- Increasing vacations to seven weeks after 25 years of service from the current six weeks after 30 years.
- An additional paid holiday, to be determined by the bargaining unit, for a total of 11.

At AFL-CIO Conference

Role of Unions Pressed In Safety Enforcement

Unions must step up their involvement in the government's decision-making process on employer-contested job safety and health violations to assure that workers' interests are protected.

That message was stressed at a two-day AFL-CIO conference exploring the role and activities of the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission. A major purpose of the meeting was to set forth practical ways for unions to better represent their members in the process.

THE THREE-MEMBER commission was established by the 1970 job safety law to review contested citations imposed on employers by OSHA.

Participants were greeted on the opening day of the conference by the landmark legal victory in the Supreme Court's decision upholding the OSHA cotton dust standard. The justices blocked attempts by the Reagan Administration to require cost-benefit studies in the development of occupational safety and health standards.

The 80 conference participants, representing AFL-CIO constitutional departments, affiliates and state federations, were told that the OSHRC adjudication process is taking on added importance as the volume of the commission's caseload grows.

THE NUMBER of the employer-contested OSHA citations has nearly doubled over the past seven years—increasing from 3,901 in 1973 to 7,386 in 1980.

During that period, the nature of the appeals process has changed in ways that fundamentally affect the rights of workers under the federal job safety law, AFL-CIO Vice President William H. McClennan observed in announcing the conference.

"Eighty-nine percent of contested OSHA citations are being settled 'out of court' by negotiated agreements between employers and Labor Dept. lawyers—often with no notice to and participation by union representatives," McClennan noted. He also cited recent OSHRC and appellate court decisions that are causing unions problems in the adjudication procedures.

"THESE DEVELOPMENTS make it more and more important for unions to become involved, to exercise their rights before the Review Commission and to protect the interests of the members they represent," he stressed.

"This means that union staffs should become more skilled and more knowledgeable in the exercise of their rights in this area of OSHA enforcement."

OSHRC Commissioner Bertram R. Cottine told the participants that while the nation has made progress in job safety and health over the years, much remains to be done in "the national effort to protect human life and preserve human dignity."

COTTINE SAID that OSHRC has steadfastly upheld the right of worker representatives to participate in negotiations for the settlement of contested citations.

"Obviously, the right to be heard does not compel a favorable result," he observed. "But it does guarantee an opportunity to actively participate in government decisions that vitally affect one's health and safety."

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.) warned the conference that the Reagan Administration's government deregulation drive includes an all-out attempt to undermine the safety and health protections of American workers.

HE SAID that the attacks on OSHA are an attempt to subsidize industry at the expense of workers, with workers and their families paying the price when they become victims of job injuries and disease.

Miller called on unions to use all possible means—court actions, protests, oversight hearings, political campaigns—to make up for the lack of action by many Democrats in Congress to counter the Reagan Administration's tactics.

President Reagan has nominated Robert A. Rowland to a six-year term on the commission for the seat that has been vacant since Frank Barnako's term expired Apr. 28. Rowland, a former Texas assistant attorney general, was vice chairman of the Reagan election committee in Texas.

trol, done by Employment Research Associates of Lansing, Mich., warned that the windfall profits from natural gas decontrol would quickly translate into a further increase in the already huge political power of the oil and gas companies.

In the 1980 elections, "large sums were given to those whom the industry wanted to re-elect and to the opponents of members whom the industry wanted to defeat," the study found.

UNDER EXISTING law, the price of natural gas discovered after April 1977 is allowed to rise with inflation plus an additional percentage that is supposed to bring it to the level of decontrolled oil prices by 1985. Gas found before April 1977 would remain controlled unless the law were changed.

Oil prices have gone up so rapidly that immediate decontrol of new gas would have a staggering effect on the economy. The estimate of a $260-billion price rise over four years and the loss of some 3.4 million jobs are based on an assumption of an accelerated schedule of decontrol.

An AFL-CIO Executive Council statement last February urged Congress to reject any speedup in the decontrol of natural gas prices that would in effect allow the OPEC cartel to dictate the price that Americans pay for natural gas produced in this country as well as the price of oil.

A NUMBER OF unions taking an active part in the coalition effort issued statements backing the campaign against decontrol. The UAW warned that "the auto industry could lose tens of thousands of jobs" because of loss of consumer buying power, while higher costs for the ingredients of automobiles would make it harder to compete with foreign auto makers.

President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers said the higher consumer costs would have their most severe job impact on the retail trade and food industries where the union's members work.

The State, County & Municipal Employees, Service Employees, Communications Workers were among the large-membership groups expressing concern at the Energy Coalition's news conference. And the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers made clear its commitment to the campaign to stop decontrol. OCAW members and their families are consumers as well as workers in the oil and gas industry and would be hurt by decontrol, the union said.

Performer Unions Plan Protest on Arts Funding Cut

New York—Delegates to the Actors & Artistes' 10th biennial convention announced plans for a "Save the Arts" rally here July 18 to protest President Reagan's proposed cuts in funding for the National Endowment for the Arts and the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The union and its constituent member organizations will coordinate the rally, which will take place at the Lincoln Center plaza. Similar demonstrations will be held in major cities across the country.

The Actors & Artistes—a federation of nine AFL-CIO performer unions—has appealed to Congress to save arts and humanities programs that would be severely crippled by the Administration's budget cuts.

In other action, the union re-elected Frederick O'Neal to his sixth straight two-year term as president. Also re-elected were Treasurer Harold M. Hoffman and Vice Presidents Chester Migden, DeLloyd Tibbs, H. O'Neill Shanks, Alan J. Nelson, and Executive Sec. Sanford I. Wolff. Willard Swire was elected to replace Donald Grody, who is now with the Federation of Professional Athletes.

The 4-As, as the union is commonly called, embraces Actors' Equity, the Television & Radio Artists, Musical Artists, Variety Artists, Hebrew Actors, Italian Actors, Screen Actors, Screen Extras, and Puerto Rican Artists & Technicians.

Idaho AFL-CIO Elects Jim Kerns For Full Term

Burley, Ida.—Jim Kerns, secretary-treasurer of the Idaho AFL-CIO for the past 12 years and its interim president since April, was elected to a full two-year term as president at the state labor federation's 23rd annual convention.

The 183 convention delegates also elected D. V. Maynard as secretary-treasurer and four new executive board members—Louis Foruria of the Carpenters, Jon Walters of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Verlow Hadden of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and Tom Harn of the United Transportation Union.

KERNS, A MEMBER of the Food & Commercial Workers, became interim president after Robert C. Kinghorn resigned to become a regional director for the Operating Engineers.

In setting priorities for the coming session of the state legislature which opens next January, the convention called for legislation to provide collective bargaining rights for all public employees in Idaho. Only fire fighters and teachers are currently covered by bargaining provisions, Kerns noted.

Delegates also stressed the need to protect worker safeguards from new attacks. In the last session of the legislature, attempts were made to repeal Idaho's prevailing wage and to enact a "right-to-work" bill. Both measures were defeated.

Gov. John V. Evans said in an address to delegates that even if the RTW bill been adopted, he would have vetoed it. The Senate rejected the measure 20-15 after it cleared the House, 49-to-21.

PLANS FOR A statewide media campaign to promote organized labor were unveiled at the convention. The effort includes a series of television commercials beginning on Labor Day to be followed by radio ads and press releases. The state federation is also launching a quarterly publication to expand its communications with union members.

OSHA Found Effective in Chemical Industry

New York—Recorded illness and injury rates in the chemical industry declined 23 percent over an eight-year period following the adoption of OSHA regulations at a cost to companies of only $140 a year per worker, according to a study released by the Council on Economic Priorities.

The study, Occupational Safety & Health in the Chemical Industry by Randall Higgins and Ruth Ruttenberg, estimates that nearly 90,000 injuries and illnesses were averted because of the improvements from 1972 through 1979.

EVEN SO, the public interest group which evaluates the social responsibility performance of U.S. corporations, noted that the chemical industry has a rate of violations per OSHA inspection nearly three times the national average. The study points out that the severity of violations by chemical firms exceeds all other industries except mining.

The 147-page study also rates the safety and health performance of the eight major chemical firms based on an extensive examination of OSHA inspection records.

Other key findings:

- The general schedule of OSHA inspections, singled out for criticism by the Reagan Administration and some members of Congress, has evidently played a positive role in reducing health and safety hazards in the chemical industry.
- Health inspections, a small fraction of OSHA's operations during the agency's early years, now constitute nearly one-third of all federal inspections in the chemical industry.
- Health problems were numerous and significant during the eight-year study, as only 17.6 percent of safety violations were classified serious, compared with 51 percent of the health violations.
- Worker complaints prompted nearly 41 percent of the OSHA inspections of the eight companies, compared with 27.3 percent for the entire industry.
- Worker-initiated inspections brought twice the average number of serious violations per inspection as general inspections.

The study points out that although OSHA has been charged by some sectors as an agency that over-regulates business with unimportant regulations. no factual basis exists for the charges. The authors note that OSHA discarded 900 standards in 1977 that it considered unrelated to safety and health protections for workers.

For Docks, Shipyards

Unions Defend Benefits Under Job Injury Law

The AFL-CIO and unions representing workers directly affected urged a Senate subcommittee to reject employer-sought cutbacks in the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act.

The 1972 law, which governs workers' compensation for injuries in shipyards as well as on the docks, also covers private employment in the District of Columbia. AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Jay Power described it as a model law that should be emulated in other workers' compensation programs. Its benefits, which employers and insurance companies have attacked as too generous, "should be extended to all workers," he urged.

POWER AND OTHER union witnesses reminded the Senate subcommittee that the 1972 law was a compromise that included important concessions to employers that relieved them of liability under third-party suits.

"Now they seek to back out of their part of the agreement," Power protested.

Bills introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Don Nickles (R-Okla.) and in the House by Rep. John Erlenborn (R-Ill.) seek to reform the law by limiting benefit increases, ending free choice of physicians and restricting eligibility.

INDUSTRY AND insurance company witnesses urged its adoption, union representatives testified against the measure, and the Labor Dept.—which had originally been scheduled to present the Administration's position—cancelled its appearance because its planned testimony had not yet been cleared by the Office of Management & Budget.

Patrick Sullivan, legislative director of the Longshoremen, said insurance costs are high because of unsafe working conditions and because of pressure by shipping company operators to cut corners to reduce loading time so as to keep their vessels at sea as long as possible.

He told the panel that the ILA supports steps to halt fraud in accident claims, but he charged that employers "begin with the unwarranted presumption that claims are fraudulent unless proven otherwise."

ONE WAY to cut down on claims, Sullivan suggested, is to have clear labeling of toxic substances being transported and laws to protect longshoremen who might be endangered by leaks or spills.

Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan, whose union represents some 17,000 shipbuilding and ship repair workers covered by the law, protested that the proposed cutbacks of jurisdiction would return the industry to conditions that existed before the 1972 law. Under the previous law, an injury over water was covered but state workers' compensation laws would apply if a worker on the same job were hurt on land.

If workers are building a ship, he said, "it should make no difference as to whether they are building it on land or over the water. The hazards are the same . . . and the compensation system should be the same."

Testifying along with Power were Frances Zwenig for the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Ande Abbott for the Boilermakers.

ABBOTT SUGGESTED that overcharging by the insurance industry may be responsible for some of the cost rises that employers attribute to passage of the 1972 law.

Zwenig reminded the subcommittee that workers' compensation laws are intended for the protection of injured employees and complained that all the charges being proposed by the Nichols bill "seem designed to promote only the interest of employers and insurance carriers."

AFL-CIO WITNESSES at Senate hearings urge rejection of a bill that would cut back benefits and coverage of the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act. From left, Arleen Gilliam, workers' compensation specialist in the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security; Legislative Rep. Jay Power, who presented the testimony, and Associate Social Security Director Larry Smedley.

Air Controllers Avert Strike, Vote on Contract Settlement

The Air Traffic Controllers canceled their plans for a nationwide strike after the union's negotiators reached a tentative agreement with the Federal Aviation Administration that would mean an average pay raise this year of $4,000 for the 17,000 controllers who coordinate landings and takeoffs at large and small airports across the country.

The pay boost, which must be approved by Congress as well as PATCO members, includes a 6.6 percent increase —about $2,300—under the terms of the settlement, plus the Administration's planned 4.8 percent wage increase for all federal workers this October.

THE UNION said mail ballots will be sent to members beginning June 29, and are expected to be counted at PATCO headquarters in Washington around the middle of July.

PATCO President Robert Poli, who described the agreement as "a fair contract," said he would recommend that members ratify its terms. If ratified, implementing legislation will be introduced in the House and Senate.

Announcement of the settlement came at the end of a marathon negotiating session that extended five hours past the strike deadline of midnight, June 21, that had been set by the union a month earlier. The last contract with the FAA, the controllers' employer, expired on Mar. 15.

BESIDES WAGE increases, the package gives PATCO members the right to participate in formulation of procedures to handle air traffic safely and efficiently and to make recommendations on new equipment.

Other highlights of the 42-month settlement:

- Relaxation of the previous limitation on premium pay to permit time-and-a-half after 36 hours. The controllers would still be required to work 40 hours a week, however. The effect would be to give controllers 42 hours' pay for 40 hours of work.
- An increase in the night pay differential to 15 percent from the present 10 percent.
- Up to 14 weeks of severance pay for experienced controllers who must quit for medical reasons.

POLI SAID the biggest change in the new agreement is that, through contract language, the government recognizes the air traffic controllers as unique federal employees with special needs.

PATCO is affiliated with the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association and represents about 14,000 of the nation's 17,000 air traffic controllers.

Kirkland Blasts Tax Plan On 'Giveaways' to Business

the cost of new equipment and machinery. After a phase-in period, the committee bill would allow the entire cost to be written off in a single year.

"Equally disturbing," Kirkland said, "is the bipartisan support for other costly and long-resisted attempts to raid the U.S. Treasury, including the virtual elimination of estate and gift taxes, added breaks for oil royalty owners, slashes in the top tax rate on unearned income, and a variety of inequitable devices touted as savings incentives."

The AFL-CIO's concern is that much of the tax savings to business would be used for speculative purposes, to buy other companies, invest overseas or finance shutdowns and relocations that destroy jobs, Kirkland said.

EVEN A SOMEWHAT more equitable individual income tax cut than the Administration has proposed would leave middle-income and moderate-income households with a bigger share of the tax burden, Kirkland noted.

He urged the Ways & Means Committee to consider anew the concept of a social security tax credit coupled with targeted assistance to economically distressed industries and other tax decisions to encourage economic growth, job gains and productivity improvements. Two committee members, Frank J. Guarini (D-N.J.) and William M. Brodhead (D-Mich.), have introduced bills encompassing the AFL-CIO's proposals.

By contrast, Kirkland said, either the Reagan Administration's corporate tax cut proposals or the version tentatively agreed to by the Ways & Means Committee "would destroy whatever fairness now exists in the tax structure . . . relegating to the scrap heap the principle of a progressive tax system based on ability to pay."

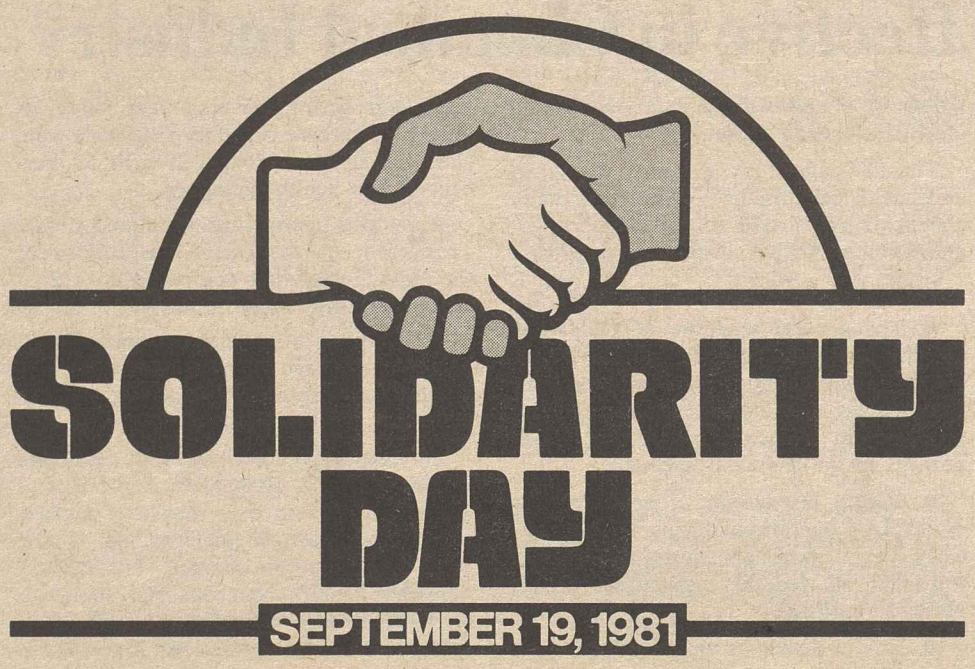
Meanwhile, the Longshoremen negotiated a contract supplement for ILA members at Atlantic and Gulf Coast marine terminals that establishes a $10 million incentive plan to help stimulate container handling work.

The NMU agreements with the Maritime Services Committee and the Tanker Services Committee provide for COL adjustments every six months starting in December 1982. The SIU contracts with the same employer groups as well as the American Maritime Association and independent ship owners have similar cost-of-living adjustments.

Both unions put special emphasis on improving medical and dental insurance plans because of threatened cutbacks in the U.S. Public Health Service hospitals resulting from the Reagan Administration's budget slashes.



PENSION BENEFITS were increased $25 per month for regular retirees and seamen on disability retirement, the NMU reported.

The SIU contracts provide for a paid holiday on Aug. 20, the birthday of the late Seafarers' president, Paul Hall, while dropping the Lincoln's birthday holiday.

The new ILA supplemental agreement with port operators was attached to the union's master agreement that runs through Sept. 30, 1983.

THE SUPPLEMENT is designed to increase the availability of work for ILA members. It provides for the establishment of an emergency hearing panel to determine whether employers have committed violations by diverting their cargo handling operations away from the docks.

The issue developed after a federal court issued an injunction on behalf of the National Labor Relations Board suspending the use of contract rules protecting union work on container cargoes.

NAACP to Join Labor's Solidarity Day Protest

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, July 4, 1981 No. 27

Denver—The NAACP voted enthusiastic endorsement of the AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day demonstration and called on more than 2,200 local branches to take part in the Sept. 19 rally in Washington "for jobs, justice and equity."

Nearly 5,000 delegates to the 72nd annual convention of the nation's oldest civil rights organization applauded and adopted a Solidarity Day "emergency resolution" that was brought to the floor at the opening session of the convention.

OTHER SPECIAL resolutions adopted at the same session with the support of the NAACP board sharply criticized Reagan Administration budget cuts and pressed for renewal of the Voting Rights Act, A few hours later, delegates sat politely but slightly through a speech by President Reagan.

The Solidarity Day resolution and a message from AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed the long and close alliance between the trade union and civil rights movements.

In endorsing Solidarity Day, the NAACP cited the attempts by the Reagan Administration to "diminish or destroy" programs to help "the aged, the poor and the disadvantaged."

The resolution, adopted by voice vote without dissent, welcomed the initiative taken by the AFL-CIO and the federation's invitation to the NAACP and other concerned organizations "to participate in this timely demonstration."

UAW President Douglas A. Fraser, one of the speakers at a labor luncheon held during the convention, said his union is going all out to make Solidarity Day a success.

"LET'S MAKE this the greatest demonstration since people of all walks of life and all colors marched in Washington in support of civil rights in 1963," Fraser urged.

Right Wing Targets 8-Hour Day

STALLING TACTICS by Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger in contract talks covering 600,000 postal workers brought out thousands of members of the Letter Carriers, Postal Workers and Mail Handlers division of the Laborers for a nationwide protest June 25. Bill to Scuttle Rule Backed By Donovan

The Reagan Administration is supporting a Senate bill to repeal the eight-hour day standard for employees of federal contractors and has signaled approval of other legislative and administrative changes sought by employer and right-wing groups but strongly opposed by unions.

Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan formally endorsed a bill to end the present requirement or the Walsh-Healey Act and the Contract Work Hours & Safety Standards Act that overtime rates of time-and-one-half must be paid after eight hours in a day to workers employed on federal contracts, whether for procurement of goods, for services or on construction contracts. The bill, by Sen. William L. Armstrong (R-Colo.), would allow straight-time pay for 10 hours a day for persons employed on a work-week of four 10-hour days.

DONOVAN wrote Senate Labor Committee Chairman Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah) that the Administration supports the bill because the present overtime pay requirement is a "disincentive" to the use of "unconventional worktime arrangements" that could increase both job satisfaction and productivity.

In testimony before the Senate committee last March, the AFL-CIO noted that less than 1 percent of workers are on a 10-hour day, 40-hour week schedule and that a high proportion of union contracts require at least time-and-one-half overtime rates after eight hours, with an increasing number specifying premium pay after a seven-hour day. The Armstrong bill "is moving in the wrong direction," the federation said.

In the works, Donovan indicated, is formal Administration support for a subminimum youth wage, a perennial demand of employer groups.

EARLIER THIS year, Donovan said he wanted to wait on the report of the Minimum Wage Study Commission, a blue-

Reagan's Budget Cuts Sweep Through House

By David L. Perlman

The House adopted a $38 billion package of budget cuts and program changes sought by the Reagan Administration, approving almost sight unseen a substitute budget reconciliation bill hundreds of pages long and pockmarked with scores of last-minute changes.

On the showdown, a key 217-210 vote, 29 conservative Democrats broke with their party's leadership to support Reagan. On the other side of the aisle, the White House kept all Republicans in line, including GOP "moderates" who in the past have crossed party lines to support progressive programs.

THE CUTS made by the conservative coalition were in most cases deeper than was required to comply with the stringent spending ceilings Congress had set in a budget resolution adopted last May. That resolution had directed 15 legislative committees to reshape programs in their jurisdiction to achieve the "savings" needed to meet the budget targets.

By adopting the Republican substitute, the House scrapped the actions taken by its committees. At the bidding of the White House, it imposed deeper cuts in student loans, child nutrition, social security benefits, welfare, subsidized housing, food stamps and federal employee retirement benefits, among others.

PERHAPS EVEN more far-reaching were portions of the Republican substitute bill that eliminated separate funding of a number of education and health programs. They would be replaced, with less total funding, by general purpose "block grants" to the states.

In a letter to House members before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Director

Rollcall Vote on Page 6

Ray Denison warned that the Administration sees the switch to block grants as "the beginning of a very short road to the total elimination of federal funding for these essential and comprehensive education, health, energy, social service and community development programs."

Job Loss Seen As Curbs Expire On Shoe Imports

President Reagan's decision to end import restrictions on certain kinds of footwear from Taiwan and South Korea will cause further job losses for American shoe workers already suffering from over 15-percent unemployment, union and industry leaders warned.

Reagan's action is "insensitive to the needs of these workers for jobs," said Murray Finley, president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, and Jacob Sheinkman, the union's secretary-treasurer.

WILLIAM H. WYNN, president of the Food & Commercial Workers, said the President's decision "flies in the face of the International Trade Commission's finding that the domestic shoe industry was still being injured by imports" from the two

OSHA Standard On Lead Clears High Court Test

By John R. Oravec

The Supreme Court rejected challenges by the lead industry and the Reagan Administration to an OSHA standard that sharply reduces the hazard of lead poisoning for more than 800,000 workers.

Coming on the heels of a decision 12 days earlier upholding the federal cotton dust regulation, the high court's action reinforced its ruling against Administration attempts to impose cost-benefit tests by OSHA in developing safeguards on worker exposure to toxic substances.

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, whose union represents a large segment of the lead industry's workers, called on employers to move quickly to install en-

General Board Meeting Aug. 6 To Mobilize for Solidarity Day

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has called an Aug. 6 meeting of the federation's General Board, comprising the president or principal officer of each of the 102 affiliated unions, to discuss plans for the Sept. 19 "Solidarity Day" protest demonstration in Washington.

The meeting will be held at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Chicago following sessions of the AFL-CIO Executive Council, Aug. 3-5.

"The American labor movement must provide national leadership in the present struggle to protect and advance our country's social and economic progress," Kirkland said in a letter to General Board members. The meeting will examine "how best to mobilize our efforts in behalf of union members and those who share our concerns for a more just society," he added.

Schedule for July Listed By Labor Studies Center

A workshop on newswriting and editing, an institute on organizing techniques, and a seminar on workers' compensation highlight activities at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, Silver Spring, Md., during July.

In addition, nearly 100 trade unionists working for college degrees of Bachelor of Arts in Labor studies will spend the week of July 26-31 in residence, attending classes and preparing for their next six months of home study.

Four AFL-CIO affiliates will run their own staff training programs on campus during the month. The schedule:

Organizing Techniques, July 6-10—An institute on the essentials of successful organizing campaigns. Labor Board procedure will be reviewed.

Workers' Compensation, July 22-24—A seminar for principal officers of state central bodies to explore in detail problems in state workers' compensation programs and legislative developments at the state and federal levels. This seminar is co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Newswriting & Editing for Union Publications, July 26-31—An opportunity for union editors to sharpen their skills in news and headline writing, makeup, and editing for readability and credibility. This workshop is co-sponsored by the International Labor Press Association.

Unions using the campus for their own leadership training are the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, July 5-10; School Administrators, July 12-17; Flight Attendants, July 12-17; Molders, July 19-24.

The American Institute for Free Labor Development is conducting classes for 40 Spanish-speaking women trade unionists from Latin American countries who are on campus all month.

More information on these or other labor studies programs may be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Avenue, Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

Kirkland Warns NIOSH Shift Could Weaken Agency's Role

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned that the role of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health may be seriously weakened by shifting the institute's headquarters from the Washington area to Atlanta. He urged Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker to reconsider the move.

In a letter to Schweiker, Kirkland expressed concern that such a shift could impair the effectiveness of NIOSH's research and investigation program, which ultimately would damage the effort to improve job safety and health conditions.

HHS ANNOUNCED the planned shift of NIOSH headquarters with the naming of Dr. J. Donald Millar as the new director of operations. Millar had been director of the federal environmental health center at the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control.

Kirkland said the transfer "could make it difficult for NIOSH to preserve its identity as an institute for the protection of workers' health and safety by subordinating its mission to that of the Centers for Disease Control."

He noted also that the move would be costly, resulting in a drain on the institute's financial resources and a loss of highly qualified staff members who can't make the move. About 107 key NIOSH positions will be transferred to Atlanta and another 50 to Cincinnati.

"In addition, the physical separation will endanger the close working relationship NIOSH must have with OSHA and EPA, as well as with union health and safety experts," Kirkland pointed out.

While expressing disappointment that affected groups and individuals were not consulted on the shift, Kirkland said labor's primary concern is for the future ability of NIOSH to carry out its role in protecting the health and safety of American workers.

Steelworkers, UAW Urge Renewal of Voting Rights Act

The Voting Rights Act has been dramatically successful and should be continued, Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride and Auto Workers Vice President Marc Stepp testified at House hearings.

Because of a history of Senate filibusters and delaying tactics on civil rights legislation, a House Judiciary subcommittee headed by Rep. Don Edwards (D-Calif.) is taking up an extension bill more than a year before the Aug. 6, 1982, deadline.

"VOTING DISCRIMINATION in this country has not ended," McBride warned. "Instead it takes more subtle and more sophisticated forms" such as gerrymandering districts to nullify the impact of minority votes.

"When minority voting rights are abridged, all Americans suffer," McBride stressed.

Stepp termed it "essential" to continue the national ban on literacy tests and the requirement for Justice Dept. approval of changes in political districts in parts of the nation where fewer than 50 percent of blacks or language minorities had been registered to vote.

He cited the "great strides" taken since 1965, when the Voting Rights Act was first passed, and urged that "we cannot take even one little step backward."

McBRIDE SAID continuation of the requirement for pre-clearance of changes in voting districts in communities where this has been a problem is especially important to assure that the redrawing of congressional districts required by the 1980 census doesn't result in "racial gerrymandering."

Rep. Peter W. Rodino, Jr. (D-N.J.), chairman of the full Judiciary Committee, is the sponsor of the labor-backed bill to extend the law's key provisions an additional 10 years and to clarify a section dealing with standards for judging local and state voting laws.

At the start of hearings in May, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and the heads of the nation's leading civil rights organizations endorsed the Rodino measure.

The Reagan Administration has not yet taken a position on extension of the Voting Rights Act and the President sidestepped the issue in his address to the NAACP convention on June 29.

ILO Bids Soviet Union Take 'Concrete' Action To Assure Union Rights

Geneva—The International Labor Organization has called on the Soviet Union to take "concrete measures" to live up to its commitments to guarantee workers the right to form independent unions of their choice.

The call was made in a report adopted by the ILO's general assembly in the final stage of a session that brought together nearly 1,900 trade unionists, employers and government representatives and their advisers from most of the ILO's 145 member states.

IN URGING action in the "near future" by the Soviet Union, the report said Moscow should bring its labor legislation into line with the ILO convention, a formal treaty establishing international standards for guaranteeing workers freedom to organize and bargain without government interference.

An assembly watchdog committee that regularly reviews how governments abide by the pledges under the ILO standards found a "divergence" between the rights guaranteed under the convention and what Soviet workers are permitted by the communist regime.

Soviet delegate Alexander Malikov went before the assembly to "emphatically object" to the committee's finding against Moscow, which had touched a raw nerve. Malikov attacked the ILO machinery for verifying compliance with the standards, charging that the ILO was assuming the role of a "supernational body with the functions of a tribunal."

BUT EDWARD J. Hickey, Jr., the legal expert on the U.S. worker delegation, praised the ILO efforts to have governments toe the line they had drawn.

Hickey reminded the assembly that Lech Walesa, head of Poland's independent Solidarity trade union federation, had expressed "grateful acknowledgment" earlier in the session for the role played by ILO in advising the Polish government on how to give full effort to the ILO convention on the right of workers to organize freely.

This achievement, through direct contacts by ILO officials with Warsaw, is a "milestone—arising as it does in a communist country—and its significance in terms of advancing free and independent trade unionism and human dignity is obvious," Hickey observed.

MEANWHILE, the assembly's president, Senegal's Labor Minister Alioune Diagne, rejected an Arab bid to make political capital of the Israeli air strike on Iraq's nuclear facilities at Tamuz.

Refusing to allow the assembly to be sidetracked by a political issue outside the ILO's scope, Diagne ruled "irreceivable" an Arab demand that the assembly condemn Israel and expel the Jewish state from the ILO.

With Eugenia Kemble of the Teachers and Mike Boggs, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of International Affairs, speaking out for U.S. workers, pro-Moscow propaganda slogans were neatly eliminated in committee from a Soviet draft resolution on disarmament.

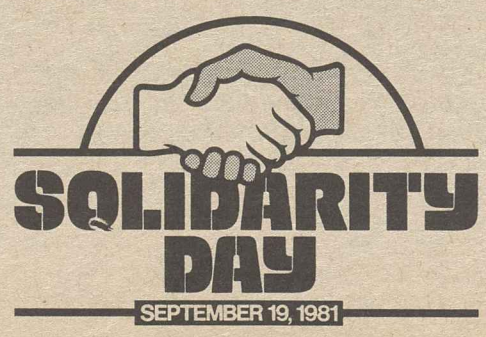
IN THE COMMITTEE version adopted by the assembly, the resolution simply called on the ILO to make whatever contribution it can "within its field of competence" to United Nations studies on the possible economic and social consequences of disarmament.

A resolution adopted by the assembly on the proposal of U.S. Worker Delegate Irving Brown and other free workers made the "ratification and full application" of ILO standards a major goal of the "international development strategy" for bettering life in the Third World.

Another free worker resolution approved by the assembly calls on ILO member states to multiply their efforts to prepare, adopt and apply comprehensive training programs for workers.

A CONVENTION for insuring that neither men nor women encounter job discrimination because of family obligations was approved by the assembly for submission to governments for ratification.

Joyce Miller, vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, and Jose Estrada of the American Institute for Free Labor Development took part in committee discussions on this convention.



Ratifying governments will be obligated to assure as much as possible that workers with family responsibilities can "exercise their right to free choice of employment."

Leon Lynch, vice president of the Steelworkers, and Charles Gray of the Asian-American Free Labor Institute were the AFL-CIO team members who helped draft a convention to protect workers against job-related accidents and health hazards.

ALSO APPROVED for submission to governments, the proposed treaty spells out the measures to be taken in consultation with unions and employers to "formulate, implement and periodically review a coherent national policy" on occupational health and safety.

J. F. Otero, vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, and Jesse A. Friedman of AIFLD represented U.S. workers in an assembly committee that prepared for final drafting at next year's session new standards for social security protection for migrant workers.

Similar preparatory work on standards to protect workers against unfair dismissals was done in a committee that includes Robert F. Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept., and Lester N. Trachtman of the African-American Labor Center.

Economic Signs Underscore Lag In Recovery Rate

The government's index of leading economic indicators, a barometer of future economic trends, plunged 1.8 percent in May, the largest monthly decline since it fell 2.5 percent a year earlier.

The drop in the index, the third since January, confirmed the view of many economists that the economy's recent pattern of growth had come to a halt. Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said the decline in the index, together with other information available, "suggests that the economic recovery that began last summer temporarily has stalled."

ANALYSTS WHO believe that business activity has buckled under the pressure of high interest rates since the beginning of the year were not too surprised by the latest Commerce Dept. report. They see continued weak economic growth through at least the third quarter of the year.

Nine of the 10 available indicators in the May index contributed to the decline for the month. The biggest negative influence was at the very beginning of the supply pipeline, an apparent drop in demand for crude materials like scrap iron and paper.

Other factors feeding into the downturn were the layoff rate, new orders, the pace of deliveries, contracts and orders for plant and equipment, building permits, stock prices, liquid assets, and the money supply adjusted for inflation. The only indicator that gave off positive signals was the average workweek.

LABOR'S SUPPORT for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment was reaffirmed by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue in Washington, a focal point of the June 30 nationwide ERA rally. Donahue was joined in addressing the 3,000 ERA supporters across from the White House by Florine Koole of the Communications Workers and Joycelyn Thompson of the Machinists. Alan Alda, right, a member of the Screen Actors, keynoted the Washington rally.

Hotel, Restaurant Delegates Adopt New Dues Structure

Chicago—Delegates to the 39th convention of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees approved constitutional changes to streamline the union's operations and bolster its national legislative and organizing goals.

The 350 delegates to the week-long meeting approved a five-step per capita and dues increase, and voted to change the union's name, effective in late July, to the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees International Union (HERE). The former name was Hotel & Restaurant Employees and Bartenders' International Union.

THE CURRENT $2.32 monthly per capita paid by local unions will increase on Oct. 1, 1981, by $1.06 for U.S. locals and $1.01 for Canadian affiliates, plus an additional 50 cents each Oct. 1 through 1985.

The delegates also voted to increase the current minimum membership dues of $5.50 a month by $2.06 for U.S. and $2.01 for Canadian locals on Oct. 1, 1981, and by an additional $1 each October through 1985. Locals otherwise may set their own dues structures.

The difference between the U.S. and Canadian rates reflects the 5 cents in the U.S. rate allocated to legislative activities. The additional penny in both cases will be earmarked as a contribution to St. Jude's Children's Hospital.

This will bring the union's contribution to the hospital, instituted at the 1976 convention, to 3 cents per member per month.

Edward T. Hanley was re-elected without opposition as the union's president and John Gibson as secretary-treasurer, both to their second full five-year terms.

The convention amended the union's constitution to create the office of general vice president and elected John C. Kenneally to the post. Kenneally had been assistant to the president.

The position of director of organization was also made an elective office. Herman Leavitt, a vice president at large, was chosen to fill the position.

THREE NEW district vice presidents were elected to fill vacancies left by retirements. They are Vito Pitta, District 2, New York; Rhonda Allgaier, District 8, Seattle; and Robert J. Gamberg, District 9, Monterey, Calif. Allgaier, along with Hanley, is also a vice president of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept.

Vincent Sirabella of Los Angeles and Jack Stafford of Las Vegas were elected vice presidents at large, expanding the number of district and at-large vice presidents to 19. All other incumbent vice presidents were re-elected.

In his opening remarks to the delegates, Hanley called on the union's members to gear up for the "challenges of organizing."

"WE HAVE NOT yet conquered privation and hunger. Black and minority workers are still repressed. This must and will be changed," Hanley declared.

He pledged that the union would step up organizing to bring the "benefits of the union to more people" and to "counteract the actions of union-busters."

He urged the delegates to work to "thwart new attacks on labor by its antagonists," and he scored the news media for "unfair treatment" of labor.

AMONG THOSE addressing the convention were House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill (D-Mass.), Rep. Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.), Rep. Guy Vander Jagt (R-Mich.), Rev. Jesse Jackson, president of Operation PUSH, and Richard M. Daly, state's attorney for Cook County, Ill.

Labor speakers included AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan; Earl D. McDavid, secretary-treasurer of the AFL-CIO Union Label Dept.; Robert F. Harbrant, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept.; and Chicago AFL-CIO President William A. Lee.

Flint Glass Union Spurs Action on Job Health Risks

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to the 93rd convention of the Flint Glass Workers adopted a strong resolution calling for improved protections for workers from health and safety hazards in the industry.

The delegates to the 12-day convention directed the union, which represents over 32,000 workers in the manufacture of glass products, to support efforts to eliminate such dangerous substances as asbestos from their workplaces.

The convention deplored attempts by the Reagan Administration to gut the protections of the Occupational Safety & Health Act, minimum wage safeguards, wage and hour standards, social security benefits, unemployment compensation and other programs that benefit workers.

AFGW PRESIDENT George Parker urged the membership of the 103-year-old union to support efforts to preserve these programs from budget-cutting assaults.

Parker was re-elected by acclamation to his 11th two-year term, and Ivan T. Uncapher was re-elected to his fifth term as secretary-treasurer. Also re-elected were Vice Presidents Robert W. Newell, Eugene Bowling and Ben Johnson. Lawrence Bankowski was re-elected as assistant secretary.

President Jacob Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens told the delegates that the Reagan Administration's proposed cuts in the federal budget would amount to "disaster" for older Americans, and he urged them to press their representatives in Congress to fight the cuts.

Other speakers included Howard Chester, chairman of the Stone, Clay & Glass Coordinating Committee, and Dr. Edward Holstein, an asbestos expert on the staff of New York's Mt. Sinai Hospital.

Britain's Jobless Rate Doubles in Two Years

London — Britain's unemployment rate zoomed to 11.1 percent in June, its highest level since the 1930s and double the rate since Conservative Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's election two years ago.

The government's Dept. of Employment said that 2,558,405 Britons were out of work last month, and that a figure of 3 million was possible by the end of the year.

Joblessness has risen steadily as Mrs. Thatcher's economic policies of monetarism, including spending cuts and attempts to balance the budget, have been implemented. The June jobless rate compares with 10.6 percent in May and 6.9 percent a year earlier.

David Basnett, chairman of the British Trades Union Congress economic committee, said that "the last two years have been a brutal and costly lesson in how not to run the economy. . . . The only hope for the unemployed now is a complete reversal of economic priorities, so that creating new jobs is once again at the top of the agenda."

NAACP to Join Solidarity Day Demonstration

Director Benjamin L. Hooks expressed confidence and determination that hard-won progress will not be reversed.

He cited the "fundamental changes" that the labor and civil rights alliance helped bring about.

"WE HAVE swept away the age-old legal codes and legislative sanctions that perpetuated racial discrimination in our schools, in housing, in public accommodations and in the world of work," Kirkland said.

Equality is closer to becoming "a fact of daily life, as well as of law," he noted. And labor remains committed "to affirmative action programs necessary to open doors previously shut to minorities and women."

But Kirkland voiced concern at signs of retreat. "Violations of civil rights laws that would have been unthinkable even a year ago have already begun to surface in states where our opponents eagerly anticipate the demise of the Voting Rights Act," he warned.

And there is suffering ahead, he said, "as the Administration seeks to close one door after another in the face of those who need jobs, food, housing and the educational, medical and social services their government will no longer supply."

The AFL-CIO is devoting its energies and resources to preserve a just society, Kirkland affirmed.

"We are heartened," he said, "to know that the NAACP is at our side."

Donahue Pledges Labor Push for ERA Ratification

The AFL-CIO strongly reaffirmed its support for the Equal Rights Amendment and will continue working for its ratification, federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told a crowd of 3,000 ERA supporters at a June 30 rally in Washington.

The lunch-time gathering, dubbed a Countdown Rally, was one of 180 demonstrations sponsored nationwide by the National Organization for Women to dramatize the final 12 months in the ratification process. Thirty-five of the required 38 states have approved adding the amendment to the Constitution.

THE AFL-CIO supports ERA "for one simple reason—because it is right," Donahue said. The amendment "recognizes the fundamental dignity and individual rights of every human being. We believe in it, we have fought for it, and we will continue to fight for the cause of individual human dignity above all other causes," he said.

He pledged that the federation and its state and local councils will be active in urging legislation in states that have not ratified the amendment to do so before the June 30, 1982, deadline.

Donahue pointed out the opposition to the ERA is being led by the same people who are seeking to take away laws and programs that benefit and protect workers, the elderly and the needy.

"ERA—AND ALL the social justice issues—are opposed, even hated, by a loud, noisy minority that so distorts the issues with the 'Big Lie' technique that it has thwarted the will of the majority of the citizens of this country," Donahue said.

He urged those attending the rally "to raise the real voice of the majority of Americans so that it is heard in every state legislature, in Congress and in the White House," and he called on ERA supporters to join the AFL-CIO's "Solidarity Day" demonstration Sept. 19 in Washington.

"That day, we will reaffirm the labor movement's historic commitment to social and economic justice, and that includes, above all, a commitment to equality," Donahue told the gathering.

OTHER LABOR speakers at the rally included Florine Koole, assistant to the executive vice president of the Communications Workers, and Joycelyn Thompson, assistant director of the Machinists' Human Rights Dept.

The roster of more than 25 speakers included NOW President Eleanor Smeal and actor Alan Alda.

John Svahn New Chief Of Social Security Agency

Baltimore—The new head of the Social Security Administration, the largest unit of the Dept. of Health & Human Services, is John A. Svahn, who was a state welfare official in California when President Reagan was governor.

The social security commissioner will administer a program that provides some $144 billion a year in benefits.

The Budget Surrender

CONGRESS HAS come full circle in the budget-setting process, and it has only itself to blame.

It has allowed the White House to seize the machinery it set up in 1974 in rebellion against presidential domination of the budget process.

The Congressional Budget Act that was passed then by near-unanimous votes of the House and Senate established procedures to set overall budget targets that in later revisions would be broken down into program functions and made binding. While the mechanism was overly complex and often overly restrictive, the intent was good. There was in the early years substantial bipartisan cooperation in trying to make it work.

IN THE SAME LAW, Congress established its own nonpartisan budget office to provide the economic research needed for decision-making and to estimate the cost impact of program changes.

But this year, first the Senate and then the House surrendered the decision-making role to the Reagan Administration. The budget reconciliation bills passed by the Senate and the House bear the mark of the Reagan White House, with only a few thin surface changes made by congressional committees.

And the reconciliation process, intended as the final step in setting binding budget ceilings at the start of the fiscal year in October, has been converted by this Administration into a legislative shortcut to repeal and amend laws without separate consideration by Congress.

TRADE ADJUSTMENT assistance and the minimum social security benefit are among the many programs that are likely to disappear with hardly a passing mention in the Congressional Record. Look for their demise somewhere in a bill hundreds of pages long that only a few congressional staffers have read in its entirety.

The scene on the House floor a few days ago was described by the chairman of the House Budget Committee as "a shameless charade of the legislative process gone mad."

A majority of the House, once so jealous of its role as a part of the Legislative rather than the Executive Branch of the government, surrendered all independent judgment. Who knew what those scrawled changes in a photo copy of the bill were intended to mean? Was it true, as some warned, that science research funds for government agencies were abolished? And if so, was it by intention or carelessness? Just what last minute changes had been made by the White House to corral a needed vote?

THE HOUSE ACTION was proclaimed by the newspaper headlines as a big political victory for President Reagan.

But the real loser was not the House Democratic leadership or the committee chairmen who had labored to meet unrealistic budget ceilings. The real loser, for now, is the Congress of the United States.

In the long run, the loser will be the American people.

Facts Refute Claims

Statisticians Challenge Reagan On Exaggeration of Tax Bite

By Gus Tyler

JUST HOW BIG a bite do taxes take out of the average income? "Today," advises President Reagan, "we have to work four months to pay that bill." In contrast, he noted, "prior to World War II, taxes were such that on the average we only had to work a little over one month each year to pay our federal, state and local tax bill."

That statement stirred a couple of statisticians into action. In a series of pieces they have been running in the New York Statistician, official publication of the New York Chapter of the American Statistical Association, on the "Misuse of Statistics," H. F. Spirer and A. J. Jaffe of the University of Connecticut and Columbia University, respectively, have been doggedly tracking down the inaccuracy of figures in common usage. So when they saw the Reagan statement about how we spend one-third of our earning time to pay taxes, as contrasted with only one-twelfth before World War I, these two watchdogs began to howl.

WHAT THESE ACADEMICS found in the latest issue of Statistical Abstracts of the United States is that "direct taxes have gone from 14 percent of income to 22 percent," a 53 percent increase from the period before World War II to the present.

"The average working time to pay direct taxes has increased from 1.7 months to 2.6 months, also an increase of 53 percent." Although nobody is happy with this increase, the two statisticians remind us that the increase is less than one-seventh of the President's figure.

Another way to calculate taxes is to go beyond "direct" taxes to all kinds of taxes collected at all levels of the government. Here the increase from the pre-war days to the present is 16 percent." The record, based on documents published by the government, shows that there is "no official data support (for) the President's dramatic assertion of a 400 percent increase."

THE SCHOLARLY PIECE then addresses another Reagan comment: "The percentage of your earnings the federal government took in taxes in 1960 has almost doubled." Actually, "the increase in average percentage of income paid in individual income taxes has gone from 10.9 percent to 12.2 percent, a growth of about 11 percent."

So what the President declared to be a 200 percent increase is only a small fraction of that amount.

In short, the President was in error—according to official publications. Wrong about the percentage of earnings going for direct taxes; wrong about the percentage going for all kinds of taxes; wrong about the increase in the last 20 years.

Now we can be fairly sure that the President was not aware that he was exaggerating wildly. He undoubtedly was reciting "fact" given to him by someone on staff.

BUT THE IMPACT on policy is the same as if Reagan had done his own research. What he said is taken for the truth and is heard by millions.

What the New York Statistician says is read by few—very few—a handful of academicians who subscribe to this two-page publication.

Is it any wonder that so much of public policy is promulgated in ignorance?

'Equality of Rights... Shall Not Be Denied'

Some day the United States Constitution will include the sentence: "Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of sex."

The AFL-CIO strongly endorses ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment because it is right . . . because it recognizes the fundamental dignity and individual rights of every human being.

In those state legislatures where the struggle will be focused in these next 12 months, we will testify, we will lobby.

And we will march. You will find the men and women of organized labor in the vanguard of every march for ERA across the country.

We want to see ERA ratified. And we want to put the enemies of equality on notice that this is a fight that we will never abandon.

Together, we will prevail.

—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue in a speech at the ERA Countdown Rally, Washington, D.C., June 30, 1981.

Election Message Distorted

Reagan Administration Bases Program on 'Invented Mandate'

The following is excerpted from an article in the Washington Post, June 28, 1981. The author is senior study director of the 1980 American National Election Study at the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research.

By Arthur H. Miller

THIS MAY GO DOWN in political annals as the Year of the Invented Mandate.

Treasury Sec. Donald Regan, defending the Administration's three-year tax cut plan, proclaims that the president "was elected on this basis." Vice President George Bush declares that congressional opponents of the president's spending and tax cut proposals would "in effect thwart the mandate of the people."

Budget chief David Stockman adds his assertions that cuts in social programs are dictated by the elections, and Nevada Sen. Paul Laxalt defends anti-abortion, pro-capital punishment and other conservative social causes by contending: "That's what the election was all about. It is part of the Reagan mandate."

ALL THIS MAY or may not be good politics but it certainly is nonsense, and awfully repetitious nonsense at that. If Administration officials are going to keep it up, there is little choice but to repeat back, emphatically: That is not what the election was about. The accumulating evidence makes it quite clear that the November returns provided none of these claimed mandates, just as they did not represent the broader "historic political realignment" that more than a few observers have suggested.

The more limited and tentative messages of the election are particularly evident in the emerging findings of our 1980 American National Election Study at the University of Michigan's Institute for Social Research (ISR). These, I think, bear some scrutiny if we are to avoid, on this and other scores, the kind of inflated rhetoric which is not merely contrary to the majority's wishes but which may ultimately lead us back to deep disillusionment with our political system.

Consider, for example, Sec. Regan's imagined tax mandate. The reality, our study shows, is that less than half the Republicans and independents and only a third of the Democrats who voted for President Reagan favored his three-year tax cut proposal. The president clearly was not "elected on this basis," and later evidence gives no reason to believe his tax plan has inspired more confidence since November.

A NATIONWIDE POLL taken in mid-April by the Los Angeles Times found that less than half of all registered voters interviewed thought a Reagan-style, across-the-board tax cut would get the economy moving again. Similarly, the separate May ISR Survey of Consumer Attitudes showed that only 41 percent of respondents thought they would be better off if President Reagan's plan to reduce federal taxes and spending were enacted.

The same holds for the Administration's across-the-board cuts in social programs. The election provided no "mandate" for this drive, no matter what David Stockman pretends. On the contrary, our study confirms other findings showing that voters in 1980 continued to express their long-standing support for these programs.

NOR HAS ANY significant shift in preferences for social programs been detectable since the election. In April the CBS/New York Times Poll even reported that those identifying themselves as conservatives opposed spending reductions for such programs as the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act (government jobs for the unemployed) or loans to college students, both currently on the Reagan chopping block.

One could scarcely find better evidence of popular opposition to domestic spending reductions, in fact, than the fears of Reagan supporters about voting on individual program cuts in the House budget battle last week.

Least of all can one find evidence of Sen. Laxalt's mythical "mandate" on a social issue like abortion. If it needs saying again, in November, as for a decade, the country was firmly committed to a woman's right to have an abortion.

WHAT DID THE election say? It may leave political theologians on all sides unsatisfied, but the 1980 vote essentially was an expression of growing American worry about inflation and our slipping economic growth, as well as about U.S. military strength and prestige abroad—not a clear endorsement of specific means for solving these universally recognized concerns.

In other words, despite the striking Reagan sweep of the electoral college, the 1980 election was not ideological in terms of issues. Our study shows that ideology in fact played a less important role in 1980 than it did in 1976 to 1972.

A majority of both Carter and Reagan voters, for example, favored increased military spending. But they did not view this suddenly acquired preference—a response to events in Iran and Afghanistan—as a tradeoff for reduced outlays in long-supported domestic social programs. Rather, our study makes clear, military increases were supported in addition to domestic programs.

The support for reduced spending that voters did express in the 1980 election, our study shows, was more a response to the belief that waste and incompetence can be cut in all areas, defense as well as domestic, than an ideological rejection of all Great Society programs.

It should be abundantly clear from all this that Reagan did not have a mandate for most of his policies at election time and has not yet succeeded in establishing a popular consensus. The Administration's repeated claims to "mandates" can thus be seen as part of its attempt to in fact create such a consensus today, either by inventing popular wishes or using selective evidence to support its case.

By Press Associates, Inc.

HEADY WITH SUCCESS in pushing its budget and tax program through Congress thus far, the Reagan Administration is expected soon to press for congressional approval of a scheme which a recent study says "would mean the most rapid and massive transfer of money from one sector of the economy to another in American history."

As with the Administration's budget and tax proposals, what one critic called "the missing piece" of the Reagan economic package—the decontrol of natural gas—would benefit the wealthy at the expense of working people and the poor.

In the case of gas decontrol, those who would reap the benefits are those who are least in need—the 20 largest oil conglomerates who own more than 60 percent of the nation's natural gas reserves.

While further bloating the wealth and power of the oil giants, decontrol would result in massive job loss, higher inflation, and extreme hardship for lower income and elderly persons who use natural gas for heating and cooking and who already pay from 35 to 50 percent of their income for energy.

FOR THE 60 PERCENT of American households which depend on gas, prices would at least double—to an average of over $1,000 a year.

These expected consequences are explained in a study prepared by an independent research firm and released in late June by the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition. The 200-organization coalition is launching an educational and lobbying campaign to fight gas decontrol.

Under current law, natural gas prices will increase each year until 1985, when they will be deregulated and allowed to rise to the equivalent OPEC oil price. The President has the authority to continue controls two years beyond 1985.

During his campaign for President, Reagan advocated gas decontrol. Budget Director David Stockman and Interior Sec. James Watt are pushing for immediate decontrol, an even more extreme alternative to the existing law than accelerated decontrol. Accelerated decontrol would boost gas prices at a much faster rate than the current schedule allows.

UNDER ACCELERATED decontrol, the coalition study warns, 3.4 million jobs would be lost over the next four years in every major sector of the economy: retail and wholesale trade, agriculture, transportation, services, and manufacturing. This is because homeowners and tenants will pay an additional $86 billion for gas and will have that much less to spend on consumer purchases.

Of the 157 industries studied, only three would have a net gain of jobs: oil and gas well drilling, oil and gas exploration, and oil field construction machinery—all of them highly capital intensive rather than job-creating.

Also, business would have less capital available for job-creating investment and revitalization of the economy. Many smaller businesses would be forced to shut down, accelerating the already high rate of bankruptcies.

Decontrol will help only the oil and gas companies which already are awash with record profits far in excess of investment needs. These companies have so much extra cash that they have been busy gobbling up other companies and increasing their already immense economic power.

Their economic power also means political influence, and these energy giants long have been adept at electing their friends to Congress. During the 1980 elections, oil and gas industry PACs spent over $6 million.

The American people must make it clear to Congress that they will not tolerate a huge ripoff which will hurt all consumers and which serves no purpose except to increase further an already dangerous concentration of economic and political power.

Reagan Plan Protested

Proposed Social Security Cuts Heighten Concerns of Workers

UNION MEMBERS are increasingly upset over the Administration's wide-ranging budget slashes, AFL-CIO Vice President John DeConcini declared in a network radio interview.

The proposal for drastic reduction of social security benefits has "struck a very discordant note" among workers, as they realize that the Administration's plan would sweep away much of the retirement protection they have paid for and counted on throughout their working lives, DeConcini said.

DeConcini, president of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, said the proposed social security cuts will be a major focus of that union's protests in the AFL-CIO Solidarity Day demonstration Sept. 19 in Washington.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, DeConcini said the union's new emphasis on worker education is helping local union officers, shop stewards and rank-and-file members gain a much better understanding of how the issues fought out in Congress and state legislatures have a direct impact on the quality of their lives and communities. He said the education effort has been a key element in the stepped-up political awareness and activity among the union's membership.

WHILE TECHNOLOGICAL advances have affected many of the jobs in the baking, candy and tobacco industries, DeConcini said, negotiated provisions in the collective bargaining agreements have given the union effective input into manning and other aspects of the automated processes that has helped ease the impact on individual workers.

He said newly established "open and frank discussions" between the American Bakers Association and the union have also produced "very useful exchanges" on both union and industry problems, and that the union intends to continue such communications.

DISCONTENT IS GROWING among workers as they see big chunks of the gains that they and their unions fought for swept away by the Administration's budget slashers, President John DeConcini, center, of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers said. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Alan Adams, left, of Employment Relations Report and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Key House Vote to Worsen Budget Cuts

The House passed a labor-opposed budget reconciliation bill drawn up by the White House as a substitute for less drastic cutbacks that would have met congressional budget goals. This 217-210 vote on June 25, which defeated the Democratic leadership on a key procedural issue, did the damage.

On labor's scoreboard, right votes (R) were cast by 209 Democrats and, inadvertently, by one Republican. [Republican John T. Myers (R-Ind.) explained that he had meant to cast his vote for the Reagan position.] Voting wrong (W) were 29 Democrats and 188 Republicans.

Appellate Decision Final

Supreme Court Clears Lead Hazard Standard

gineering controls and to implement work practice provisions "now that the standard has been approved in its entirety."

McBride also called on the Labor Dept. to "stop fooling around" and start enforcing the regulations.

LABOR WELCOMED the court's actions as back-to-back victories that mandate OSHA and the Administration to fully enforce the congressional intent of the 1970 federal job safety law.

"The Supreme Court has once again properly placed the health of workers ahead of the profits of employers," said George H. R. Taylor, the federation's job safety director.

"Of particular importance to the 800,000 workers exposed to lead on the job is that the standard contains a key provision providing medical removal of a worker from excessive exposure to lead to another job within the workplace with less exposure —without loss of pay or other rights," Taylor pointed out.

THE JUSTICES rejected the industry-Administration challenges without comment in denying review of a federal appeals court decision upholding the Carter Administration's lead standard.

The lead industry attempted to block implementation of the standard the day it was issued in 1978. The Reagan Administration leaped to industry's side in April, asking the Supreme Court to vacate the appellate court ruling.

Two days after the Supreme Court action, Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter, ordered a 21-day delay of a lower "trigger level" for medical removal of workers in the primary and secondary lead smelting industries.

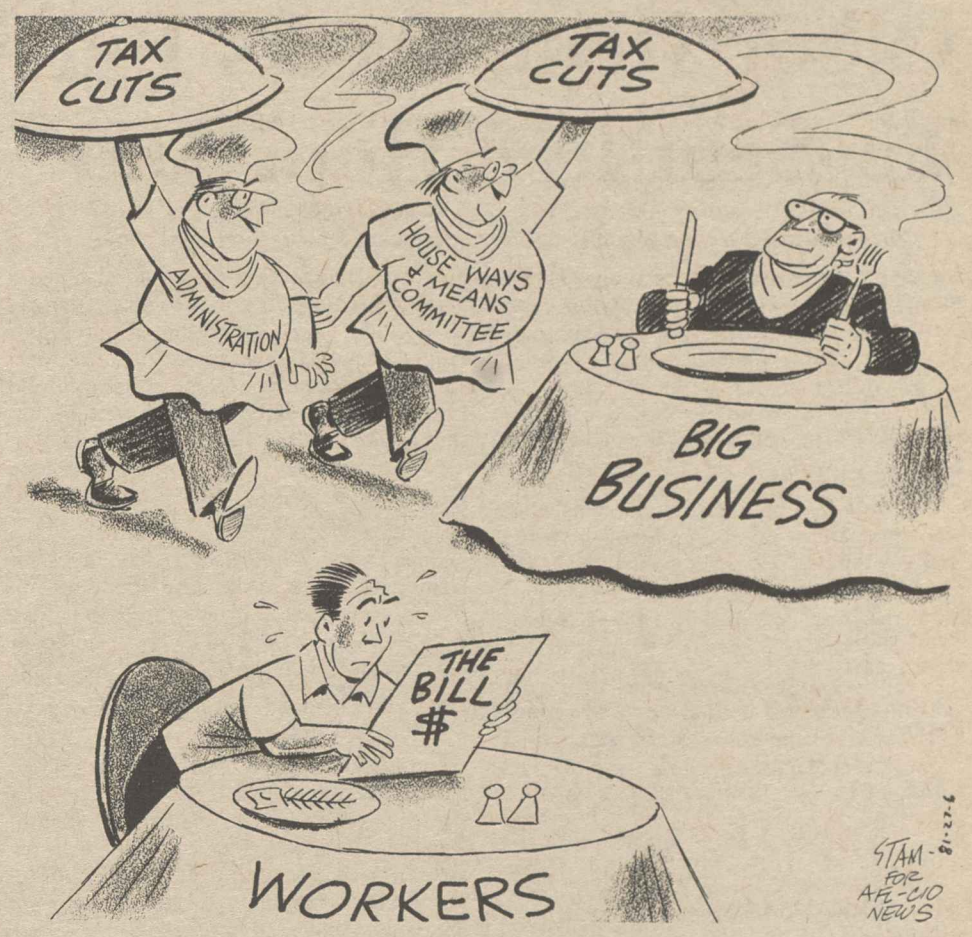
The medical removal protection provision requires a worker be transferred to a less hazardous job when the lead content in his blood reaches a critical level.

ON THREE earlier occasions, Auchter had delayed lowering the trigger levels for all industries other than primary and secondary smelters.

Lead poisoning, resulting from high levels of exposure to the metal, can result in anemia, kidney failure, nervous system disorders, brain damage and death.

In upholding the standard last August, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia pointed out that OSHA had presented "voluminous evidence" of the harmful effect of lead.

THE STANDARD, which went into effect in February 1979, set up a 10-year timetable for industry to reduce exposing levels in steps from 200 micrograms of lead per cubic meter of air to 50 micrograms during an eight-hour shift.



In the early stages, exposure reductions could be achieved through the use of respirators by workers. In later stages, engineering controls, hygiene facilities and work practices must be used to achieve exposure limits.

In another area vital to worker on-the-job safeguards, the AFL-CIO charged in a federal appeals court action that the Administration illegally postponed implementation of an OSHA hearing conservation program.

THE PROGRAM was developed shortly before the Carter Administration left office and was to have taken effect on Apr. 15. But Auchter first pushed back the effective date to June 1 and has since postponed the start of the program to Aug. 1.

Under the program, employers would be required to reduce noise levels in workplaces from the current 90-decibel limit to 85 decibels through the use of hearing protectors, audiometric testing, training and monitoring.

'Just the Way You Like Them!'

Reagan Budget Cut Package Approved Intact by House

the Democrats who broke with their party and a number of Republicans who were wavering on the issue. The architect of the substitute bill, Office of Management & Budget Director David A. Stockman, then would make "adjustments" to the bill if necessary to assure a vote. But Stockman told reporters that the changes were only marginal. "Considerations and adjustments" are always factors in a close vote, he said.

WHATEVER THE cause, the scene on the House floor when the Republican substitute was brought up was one of confusion. A thick photo copy of what purported to be the GOP substitute appeared to write into law the phone number of a congressional budget aide. Hand-written inserts were indecipherable. No one was sure whether a law giving blind vendors the right to operate candy stands in government buildings was being repealed. Estimates of "savings" to be achieved by the reconciliation bill varied by as much as $2.6 billion.

The House began a 10-day Fourth of July vacation period the next day, leaving committee staffs to plow through hundreds of pages of small type in the Congressional Record to find out what the House had wrought.

It appeared that the House-passed version would impose a means test for student loans, as well as a 4-percent "origination fee." The House-passed bill would eliminate the social security minimum benefit of $122 for all persons now on the rolls, while the original Democratic bill would have applied only to future recipients.

FEWER CHILDREN would be eligible for school lunches and for aid-to-dependent-children welfare payments because of tightened eligibility. Both federal civilian and military retirees would lose one of their two cost-of-living adjustments each year. The 1982 pay raise for government employees, set at 5.8 percent in the original House bill, would be cut to 4.8 percent under the GOP substitute.

Despite the philosophic affinities between the House and Senate versions, differences in details are so great that a House-Senate conference will be a lengthy process.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.) said Democrats will try to use the conference procedure to mitigate some of the damage done by the Republican budget reconciliation substitute. He said House committees may also hold unique "after-the-fact" hearings to focus attention on the severe cuts imposed by the hastily adopted substitute.

OF THE DEMOCRATS who gave the Republicans their margin of victory, O'Neill suggested that "in decency, some of those fellows should resign from the Democratic caucus."

But Rep. Delbert L. Latta (R-Ohio), the chief GOP spokesman during the budget debate, warned that the Democratic leadership in the House is in for more setbacks unless the party "takes a turn to the right."

Tucson Student Awarded AFL-CIO History Prize

A paper on the Haymarket Square Riots of 1886 earned high school student Clay Gary of Tucson, Ariz., a special prize from the AFL-CIO at National History Day ceremonies at the University of Maryland.

The award, including a $200 cash prize, was presented by James Auerbach of the federation's Dept. of Education. Auerbach serves on the board of directors of the National History Day competition, which brought more than 800 finalists to the Washington, D.C., area for the three-day event. Gary, an 11th grader, was among some 50,000 participants from 30 states.

Eugene A. Kelly Dies, Retired News Staffer

Cleveland—Eugene A. Kelly, a former assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News, died June 27 at Lake County Memorial Hospital where he was being treated for pneumonia. Kelly, who was 80, retired from the AFL-CIO staff in 1971.

He was a founding member of the Newspaper Guild's Local 1, which he served as president and in other executive positions for 15 years. He also was a member of the Cleveland Federation of Teachers.

In a message to his family, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said Kelly will be remembered as a talented newspaperman and an unswerving trade unionist.

"His talents enhanced the AFL-CIO's publications, and each of us who had the pleasure of working with Gene remembers him as a friend," Kirkland said.

Kelly worked as a reporter on all the major Cleveland dailies—the Plain Dealer, the Press, as well as the old News and the Times—during a 37-year span. He joined the AFL-CIO News staff in 1960.

Survivors include his wife, Marguerite, and a son, the Rev. Justin J. Kelly, S.J.

Senate Vote on Eliminating Social Security Minimum

One of the "savings" adopted by the Senate as part of its budget reconciliation bill eliminates the minimum social security retirement benefit, which assures that persons who have worked long enough to qualify for social security payments will get at least $122 a month.

The Senate on June 23 rejected, 53-45, a labor-supported amendment by Sen. Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.) to retain the minimum benefit for those now receiving it.

Repeal Bill Endorsed

Labor Dept. Backs Bid To Scuttle 8-Hour Day

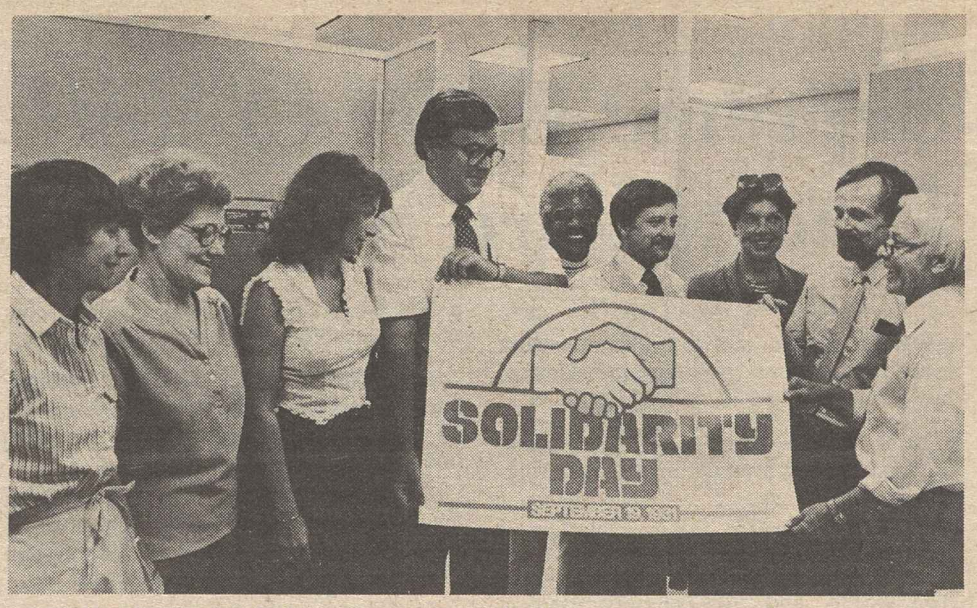
ribbon group established by Congress, before taking a stand on the issue. The commission's report, submitted in late May, concluded that a lower youth wage would violate the principle of equal pay for equal work. And it warned that any decrease in teen-age unemployment would be offset by a rise in adult joblessness.

But at a recent breakfast meeting with reporters, Donovan was quoted as saying that he hoped to send a youth wage differential bill to Congress this fall as "part of a package" of Administration legislative proposals.

At his meeting with reporters, Donovan said the Administration is opposed to outright repeal of the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires contractors on federally-financed construction to pay prevailing wages.

Donovan said he is "hopeful" that the objectives of those who want to repeal the 50-year-old law can be achieved "administratively" through rewriting the regulations.



THE LABOR DEPT. has extended to July 15 its timetable for regulatory changes, and there have been press reports that the Office of Management & Budget feels that the original Labor Dept. proposals do not go far enough. An OMB spokesman was quoted in the Wall Street Journal as voicing disappointment "that the prospective savings aren't greater."

The Administration has not yet taken a formal position on congressional attempts to exclude various government programs from Davis-Bacon requirements. The most immediate threat is an amendment written into a pending military construction authorization bill by the Senate Armed Service Committee that would eliminate Davis-Bacon jurisdiction on military construction contracts.

The Labor Dept. also postponed its rewriting of rules prohibiting job discrimination in federal contracts after the Business Roundtable and other large employer groups indicated dissatisfaction with the initial draft.

DURING THE early months of the congressional session, when the key budget battles were being fought, the Administration's policy was to discourage Republican right-wingers from pushing controversial legislation that did not bear directly on the President's economic program and might "distract" Congress.

Whether or not the policy has been relaxed, Sen. Roger W. Jepsen (R-Iowa) introduced with a flourish a bill being pressed by the National Right to Work Committee to make the union shop illegal under both the National Labor Relations Act and the National Railway Labor Act. A companion measure has been introduced in the House by Rep. Mickey Edwards (R-Okla.).

Jobless Rate Dips to 7.3% Despite Employment Decline

Despite an 840,000 drop in the total number of employed persons, the nation's jobless rate last month dipped to 7.3 percent, from 7.6 percent the month before. The Bureau of Labor Statistics cautioned, however, that "we should not draw definitive conclusions about the economy from these data" because of technical swings in the figures.

"It may be that earlier-than-usual school closings increased the supply of job seekers in May, leaving fewer to enter the labor market in June," BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood said in a statement. "This may have exaggerated the seasonally adjusted changes in the unemployment rates for May and June."

UNEMPLOYMENT traditionally rises in June as large numbers of young people enter the workforce and either find jobs or continue to search for work. This June, BLS's seasonally adjusted figures showed the largest shrinkage in the civilian labor force on record, 1.2 million.

Workers between the ages of 16 and 24, who make up only one-fifth of the labor force, accounted for four-fifths of the seasonally adjusted drop in the labor force, BLS said, another indication of the skewing of the June data.

The huge drop in total employment over the month, 840,000, was more than during the sharp recessions of last year and the mid-1970s. BLS analyst Jack Bregger said that obvious discrepancies in the June figures probably would be ironed out later in the year when the data are revised in the bureau's annual seasonal adjustment correction process.

Last month's jobless rate was a return to the rate that had prevailed in February, March, and April.

THE SHARPEST DROP occurred among 20-to-24-year-old men. Their jobless rate fell from 12.9 to 12.1 percent over the month. The unemployment rate for white workers declined four-tenths of 1 percent to 6.4 percent, and the rate for black and other minority workers edged up from 13.6 to 14.2 percent. The jobless rate for workers of Hispanic origin remained at 10.2 percent.

Workers unemployed 15 weeks or more increased 183,000 to 1,205,000 during June, while the number unemployed between five and 15 weeks fell 221,000 to 2,360,000.

BLS said the number of "discouraged" workers—those who want to work but say they have given up looking for a job—declined by about 100,000 from April through June, but was still above levels before last year's recession.

New Job Losses Forecast As Shoe Import Curbs End

Asian countries. The ITC had recommended the continuation of import relief, as had the AFL-CIO.

ACTWU and UFCW together represent about half the domestic shoe industry's quarter-million workers.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in a letter to Reagan urging extension of the import relief program for three years, noted that the purpose of the quotas was to allow the industry sufficient time to adjust to new conditions of competition.

"The shoe industry is on the road to recovery, largely as a result of efforts it has undertaken during the import relief period," Kirkland observed. "Premature termination of import relief will seriously impede, if not destroy, the industry's recovery process."

REAGAN'S ACTION meant that the four-year-old import restrictions on shipments to the United States of non-rubber shoes from Taiwan and South Korea ended at midnight June 30. The domestic shoe industry, along with the unions, had sought an extension, contending that an end to the quotas would hurt U.S. manufacturers and result in job losses.

A labor-management coalition, consisting of the American Footwear Industries Association, ACTWU and UFCW, decried the President's decision.

Arnold Hiatt, chairman of the American Footwear Industries Association, said the original purpose of the import relief program was to provide U.S. shoe makers with a "breathing space" while the industry undertook fundamental steps of revitalization.

During the last four years, the domestic footwear industry has substantially increased spending for capital facilities, research and development, export promotion, marketing and in other areas to increase productivity and competitiveness, he said.

The White House said it based its decision against continuing import restrictions on the Administration's commitment to free trade and in the belief that an end to the quotas would reduce inflation.

IN THEIR statement, Finley and Sheinkman noted that imports accounted for 53 percent of the U.S. market in the first quarter of 1981, or 6 percentage points higher than when import relief was first granted in 1977.

"The loss of only 1 percent in market share by the domestic industry to imports translates into nearly $60 million in revenue which otherwise would be pumped into the U.S. economy," they observed. "The consequence to taxpayers will be to add substantially greater amounts to be paid out in unemployment insurance and welfare payments to unemployed shoe workers," they warned.

Allen Zack Leaves Information Post

Allen Y. Zack, 36, has resigned as assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Information, effective July 3, to become a senior associate of the Kamber Group, a Washington public relations firm that represents a number of unions.

Zack was previously assistant director of public relations from 1975 until that department merged with the Dept. of Publications in January 1980. He first joined the federation staff in 1970.

Zack served as secretary-treasurer of the International Labor Press Association from 1975 until this past January, and has led ILPA's efforts to achieve equitable postage rates for labor publications. He also coordinated the communications campaign in the successful 1978 effort to defeat a so-called right-to-work initiative in Missouri.

Postal Employees Protest Contract Stall

Thousands of union postal employees demonstrated from coast to coast June 25 to gain public support for their contract talks with the U.S. Postal Service and to show their displeasure with Postmaster General William F. Bolger's stalling tactics.

At post offices and postal facilities, members of the Letter Carriers, the Postal Workers, and the Mail Handlers division of the Laborers engaged in informational picketing during what was billed as Postal Solidarity Day.

"MORE POSTMASTER and less general," read placards held by demonstrators in Grand Rapids, Mich. "Bolger negotiate, not agitate," and "people deliver mail, not postmasters," others read.

Bolger incurred the ire of workers for having delayed talks for two months while trying to get the National Labor Relations Board to name one of the four postal unions currently engaged in bargaining with the USPS as the sole representative of the nearly 600,000 employees involved in the talks. He lost the battle, clearing the way for the opening of negotiations last week.

APWU PRESIDENT Moe Biller took an optimistic posture in speaking to several hundred workers who marched in 98-degree heat in the nation's capital.

"There is no reason why we cannot reach a contract by July 20," said Biller. The APWU and the NALC together represent about 500,000 postal employees. The unions' current three-year agreements expire on July 20.

Biller said the informational picketing was designed to bring Bolger to the collective bargaining table and to inform the American public about "his shameful conduct of labor relations."

IN A STATEMENT to APWU members, Biller said the turnout was "beyond belief." New York Metro, APWU's largest local, reported the largest demonstration in its history, he said.

Bolger's "high-handed arrogance" will not succeed, Biller predicted. "We will stand united against his tactics. We will ask the American people to join with us in demanding that he live up to his responsibility and negotiate with our unions," he said.

Also involved in the negotiations with the Postal Service is the unaffiliated National Rural Letter Carriers' Association. The main issues in the talks are wages and fringe benefits, safety, and the impact of automation on job security.

Senate Panel Toes Reagan Tax Cut Line

White House strategists are looking to the conservative coalition that rammed through the massive budget cuts to provide the votes for tax reductions tilted heavily to corporations and wealthy investors.

It won an easy victory in the Senate Finance Committee, which kept close to the Administration script in fashioning a bill that would drop the corporate share of the tax burden to a minuscule 7 percent of total tax revenue and reward individuals in the highest income tax brackets with a disproportionate share of the tax reductions.

DEMOCRATS ON the committee made some desultory attempts to lessen the inequities, but only Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) voted against the bill.

Under the Constitution, revenue bills must originate in the House. But the Senate committee left open the possibility of circumventing that mandate by attaching its bill to an unrelated House-passed debt limit measure.

The House Ways & Means Committee, meanwhile, has tentatively approved a different package of business tax cuts which the AFL-CIO protested are at least as bad as those the Administration sought. But the committee's Democratic majority is still struggling to come up with individual tax reductions that Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) promised would be "fairer" than the Administration plan.

THE SENATE committee bill follows the Administration formula of a 5 percent individual tax cut effective next Oct. 1, an additional 10 percent cut on July 1, 1982, and a final 10 percent reduction on July 1, 1983.

It also would reduce the maximum tax rate on unearned investment income, lower further the capital gains tax, allow a higher deduction for two-income couples, and provide an assortment of additional credits and deductions for groups such as holders of oil and gas royalties and persons putting money into retirement accounts.

Over the next five years, according to an AFL-CIO analysis, the federal government will lose $169.3 billion in business tax breaks "which amount to repealing the corporate income tax and benefit primarily the largest and most prosperous corporations . . . providing windfall tax breaks to firms for doing what they would do anyway."

ON THE individual income tax cuts, the AFL-CIO figures show that for the year 1982, the 59 million taxpayers with incomes of $30,000 or less would receive an average cut of $213. The total would amount to $12.6 billion.

Nearly as much in total reductions—$12.4 billion—would go to the 4.4 million taxpayers with incomes over $50,000. Their average savings would be $2,844.

The White House is pressing for action by the House as well as the Senate before

'Scare Tactics' Charged To Social Security Foes

Labor Cites Ready Cure For Deficit

The AFL-CIO challenged the scare tactics being used by the Reagan Administration to justify its proposed cutbacks in social security protections and called on Congress to allay fears by guaranteeing payment of all earned benefits.

"We do not accept the unfounded allegations that the system is bankrupt now or will be in the future," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman testified before a Senate Finance subcommittee.

CHAIRMAN William Armstrong (R-Colo.) had opened the hearing with a warning that "social security is going broke." His source was a gloomy report by the three social security trustees—all members of the Reagan Cabinet—that the system will run out of money if unemployment and inflation stay high.

Seidman retorted that the immediate funding problems can be overcome without cutting back benefits, and the solution recommended by the AFL-CIO—using general revenues to fund 50 percent of Medicare hospitalization insurance—"would finance the various social security programs well into the next century."

Seidman accused the Administration of exaggerating the system's temporary funding imbalance in order to twist the social security program "to serve its political, philosophical and budget objectives." The proposals the Administration has made "go far beyond legitimate concern about the program's financing," he testified.

DEMOCRATS ON the subcommittee suggested that the Administration wants to cut down social security benefits far deeper than would be needed to keep the program solvent so that the surplus funds could be used to reduce the federal budget deficit. Social security payroll taxes show up on the revenue side of the budget; benefit payments are shown as expenditures.

Kirkland Warning:

Administration Steering Toward Social Disaster

Boston—The Reagan Administration is steering the nation toward "social disaster" and it's up to the labor movement to sound the alarm, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the Communications Workers convention here.

Kirkland called for building coalitions with labor's allies in every congressional district, as well as nationally.

LABOR STILL has some friends in Congress, "timid though they may be," he said. But a showing of back-home support can "put a little iron in their backbones."

As for labor's foes, they should be "returned as soon as possible to private life" and replaced on Capitol Hill with those "who share our values."

America's workers are bleeding from the Reagan Administration's budget slashes, Kirkland said, and unions can't afford to sit on the sidelines until the political climate improves.

The Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington on Sept. 19 will "show those who have written off the labor movement that we have lost none of our driving force," he predicted.

KIRKLAND STRESSED the importance of making sure America's workers understand the issues in "human terms" and are not fooled "by right-wing economic fakers."

It is America's workers who are endangered by the crippling of OSHA and the dismantling of safety and health regulations, Kirkland reminded the delegates.

It is workers "whose children's schools will deteriorate" and whose neighborhoods will lose police and fire protection "because of the strangulation of federal aid to the states and cities and the destruction of federal job programs."

RETIRED AND disabled workers "are the targets of the efforts to put the social security system on the budgetary chopping block," he pointed out.

The Reagan Administration is seeking to dismantle "the social programs that hold together the relatively humane society that the labor movement has helped to build in the last half century," Kirkland warned.

Solidarity Day to Put Focus On Impact of Reagan's Cuts

Organized labor's Solidarity Day protest set for Sept. 19 in Washington will draw into focus the frustration of millions of Americans over the Reagan Administration's plans to turn back the clock on 50 years of social and economic progress, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue declared in a network radio interview.

Between now and September, Donahue predicted, more and more Americans will become aware of the harmful results of the Reagan Budget cuts and the generally bad effect of the President's proposed tax cuts on the economy.

THE PLANNED demonstration in Washington ought to have a telling effect on the Administration and a more important effect on the people's representatives in Congress, Donahue said on Labor News Conference. The protest should "make them understand a little better than they do just where the people are," he added.

Donahue said the nation's judgment of the Reagan Administration ultimately will come down to how well it handles the economy. Right now, he observed, the outlook is bleak.

"Take a look at what they're saying," he said. "They're saying that all of the budget cutting, all of the restrictions on the economy—the tight-money policy, the 20 percent interest rates, and so forth—all of that is going to produce two million extra jobs by 1986."

Food, Fuel Costs Pace June Rise in Wholesale Prices

The government's producer price index for finished goods, a measure of change in wholesale prices, moved up six-tenths of 1 percent on a seasonally adjusted basis in June, or at an annual rate of about 7 percent.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics attributed most of the monthly rise to higher costs of food at the dealer level, a new swing up for home heating oil, and sharp increases in the cost of natural gas.

THE JUNE RISE was the largest since April when wholesale prices rose eight-tenths of 1 percent. Through the first six months of this year, the wholesale index has risen at a 9.5 percent annual rate. The

CWA Keynoters Assail Callous Reagan Policies

Boston—Speaker after speaker at the 43rd annual convention of the Communications Workers denounced the programs and policies of the Reagan Administration as showing callous disregard for working people.

CWA President Glenn E. Watts, in his opening address, assailed the Administration's economic policies as "by and large, the economics of big business applied to government. The aim is to run a government of the corporation, by the corporation and for the corporation."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill all excoriated the Administration in the White House and the conservative mood in Congress.

"Under the guise of trying to balance the budget, the Administration is advancing a new government ideology—an approach to government which has little room for human concerns," Watts told the more than 2,500 delegates and alternates.

Watts said he sees the humanistic approaches of government being eroded in favor of policies that are like welfare for the wealthy.

"I CAN imagine nothing worse than turning our backs on decades of work on behalf of social causes," he said. "Yet that is what the political ideology of the extreme right would have us do."

Kirkland, who shared a press conference appearance with Watts, called on delegates "to resist with all of our strength and resolution the effort that is now under way to bring back the days when our nation was a two-class society with great wealth and privilege on one side supported by all the largess and solicitude of government, and insecurity, privation and neglect on the other."

Kennedy slapped the Administration for trying to "repeal the achievements of a generation. The nation did not vote in 1980 for extremist schemes of longer hours and lower wages or for right-wing assaults on the health and safety of workers on the job." He rejected the notion that government spending is the major cause of the nation's economic problems.

"WE ARE TOLD, and it is surely correct, that we cannot solve our problems simply by throwing money at them. But that is only a half-truth that is too often misused to excuse indifference and neglect. The rest of the truth is that this nation cannot solve its problems by throwing tax cuts and budget cuts and social security cuts at them," Kennedy said.

Looking ahead, he predicted that "in due time this anti-union, anti-worker, anti-labor attitude will pass. . . . The vast majority of our people will soon come to understand that the prevailing philosophy of this day is alien to our history and contrary to our hopes. And when they do, you and I will be there—faithful to our principles, true to the cause of all the working men and women of America, and ready for leadership once again."

O'NEILL CALLED Reagan "as hard as nails when it comes to programs like food stamps and school lunches that help poor people . . . a real tightwad when it comes to programs like social security that help working families . . . a real Ebenezer Scrooge when it comes to programs like student loans that offer opportunity to our young people."

"But when it comes to giving tax breaks to the wealthy of this country, the President has a heart of gold," O'Neill observed.

He pledged that Democrats are not about to give up: "We will not abandon our responsibilities to the wage earner, the aged and the disadvantaged."

Watts, opening the convention, called for elections by each of the union's 12 districts for representatives to serve on "CWA's Committee on The Future," which was established by the executive board last May.

RANK-AND-FILE delegates elected to the panel will sit with appointed members of the union's executive board to review CWA's structure against the background of a "technological explosion that is sweeping today's work place," Watts said.

"Rapidly changing technology will transform the way workers approach their jobs in the future, and this new wave of technology promises to transform the whole of society as well," Watts said.

"What we want from this committee is an all inclusive look into the future. . . . What the future holds for society, for government, for commerce, for science, for industry, for workers, for families, for unions."

WITH WATTS as chairman, CWA Executive Vice President James B. Booe will serve as co-chairman. Among other appointed members are Sec.-Treas. Louis B. Knecht and Vice Presidents Morton Bahr of New York, Martin J. Hughes of Cleveland and Walter Maulis of Denver.

The committee is expected to report back to delegates at CWA's 1982 convention.

A convention resolution making the AFL-CIO's centennial year hailed the federation's continuing "vigor, vibrancy and verve."

In other resolutions, delegates called on Congress to extend for 10 years the Voting Rights Act originally adopted in 1965, expressed strong support for the full labor movement in Poland and memorialized the young people murdered in Atlanta.

Kirkland Warns Reagan Setting Disaster Course

He said labor must resist "with all our strength and resolution the effort that is under way to bring back the days when our nation was a two-class society—with great wealth and privilege on one side, supported by all the largess and solitude of government, and insecurity, privation and neglect on the other."

KIRKLAND challenged the Administration's philosophy of "getting government off our backs" and spoke of his own recollection of growing up in the depression-era South where "the only social security system was the county poorhouse" and to be black "meant constant humiliation, segregated schools or no school at all, no hope for a decent job and no hope for a decent future for your child."

And "in cotton mills and steel mills, clubs and guns were the tools of labor relations, backed up by the police and the National Guard."

It wasn't until "government got on our backs" that conditions improved, he stressed.

That brought paved roads and rural electrification, he recalled.

"A federal insurance system saved the banks. A federal public health service wiped out the endemic diseases that afflicted generations of Americans."

KIRKLAND SPOKE of the hope brought by social security and the Civilian Conservation Corps, which "provided jobs for the young and planted the trees that the pulp and paper industries are living on today."

Business groups that want the government "off their backs" also want continued government subsidies for themselves, he noted. And "I don't have to tell you that big business is not rushing to lift government regulations off the backs of workers. The corporations are perfectly content with every law that restrains the activity of unions."

Business foes of regulation, Kirkland said, remain "fervent supporters of compulsory open-shop laws, mandatory injunctions, and all the laws that give property precedence over human beings."

As the trade union movement sees it, he told the CWA delegates, "in a just society, it is the business of government to look after the interests of the poor and the weak. The rich and the powerful can and do look after themselves."

ROY WILKINS Award of the NAACP Labor Committee honored COPE Director Alexander Barkan and was accepted on his behalf by Associate Director John Perkins. Fannie Neal, southern area director of COPE's Volunteers in Politics program, makes the presentation at a convention luncheon in Denver.

Grain Millers Convention Votes Step-up in Per Capita

Palm Springs, Calif.—Delegates to the Grain Millers biennial convention here approved a series of per capita payment increases while raising the monthly dues minimum from $7 to $8.50.

The monthly per capita payment will rise to $5.25 effective Aug. 1 with automatic increases of 30 cents each in subsequent years. The union's per capita rate has been at $4 since 1975.

In his keynote address, President Frank T. Hoese hailed recent action by the Federal Trade Commission that gives unions the automatic right to intervene in antitrust cases that have a direct effect on members' jobs.

The FTC ruling grew out of a lengthy battle by the Grain Millers and other affiliates of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. on a divestiture case against four major cereal makers that threatened more than 2,500 union jobs.

Resolutions adopted at the three-day convention called on Congress to reject any attempts by the Reagan Administration to slash social security benefits and to help improve the stability of the program through the infussion of general tax revenues.

Delegates also called for a federal ban on the use of strikebreakers, emergency legislation for extending supplemental unemployment benefits and protections for the U.S. sugar industry against unfair foreign competition.

The convention re-elected Thomas Frain to a new term on the union's board of trustees. Hoese, Sec.-Treas. Joseph T. Smisek and other top officers are in the middle of four-year terms.

Labor, Civil Rights Goals Linked as Reagan Targets

Denver—The historic ties between the trade union and civil rights movements have never been stronger or more needed, Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser and Ladies' Garment Workers Vice President Evelyn Dubrow told participants in the NAACP convention here.

Dubrow, who is also the ILGWU's legislative director, linked attempts in Congress to scuttle the Voting Rights Act with the Reagan Administration's drive to wipe out other hard-won programs through the budget process.

CIVIL RIGHTS and workers' rights are inseparable, she stressed. Attacks on the minimum wage, on social security protections, child nutrition and job programs are the trademark of the Reagan Administration, Dubrow charged.

Fraser, who is a member of the NAACP board, assailed the Democrats who "capitulated" to Reagan on the budget votes and likened the deals made by the Administration to get their votes to a "tobacco auction."

He spoke of the interdependence of the nation's economy, where layoffs in the auto industry spread unemployment to dozens of supplier industries that eventually ripples throughout the nation.

Fraser and Dubrow hailed the decision of the NAACP convention to endorse the AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day demonstration and to call on NAACP local and state branches to take part in the Sept. 19 protest rally in Washington.

AT THE SAME program, the NAACP labor committee presented its Roy Wilkins Award to COPE Director Alexander Barkan. It was accepted on his behalf by COPE Associate Director John Perkins, who is the coordinator of the Solidarity Day program.

Other awards to AFL-CIO affiliates included a plaque to the State, County & Municipal Employees, accepted by AFSCME Sec.-Treas. William Lucy, and special awards to Thomas Turner, president of the Metropolitan Detroit AFL-CIO, and Robert Sutt, a Steelworker from Johnstown, Pa., for his work in strengthening relations between the labor movement and the NAACP.

Foods ready for sale at the grocery store, which had showed almost no change since last November, were up a half-percent in June. Meat was the major category leading the increases, with beef and veal up 2.4 percent for the month and pork up even more, 2.8 percent.

Natural gas continued its quickening pace of price increases of the past few months. In June, natural gas became 4.4 percent more expensive, a rate that if maintained would mean a doubling in price in less than two years.

Fuel oil, which rose 1.2 percent at the dealer level in May, went up by four-tenths of 1 percent in June. Gasoline prices, however, dropped again, this time by 1.2 percent, because of its current ready availability worldwide.

PRICES OF finished consumer goods other than foods and energy—items such as motor vehicles, luggage and jewelry—rose by the same amount as the overall index, six-tenths of 1 percent. Wholesale prices for over-the-counter drugs were down slightly after rapid increases in April and May.

Heavy machinery did not increase as fast in June as in the previous two months. Capital equipment prices moved up seven-tenths of 1 percent in June, after going up nine-tenths of 1 percent in April and May. Heavy motor truck prices rose 2.6 percent over the month following a 2.1 percent increase in May.

'Put on Walking Shoes'

Labor's 'Solidarity' Rally Enlists Teacher Support

Denver—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue called on all union members to "put on your walking shoes" on Solidarity Day, Sept. 19, to protest the Reagan Administration's assault on vital social programs and to "join in asserting our demands for jobs and justice."

In the keynote address to the opening session of the American Federation of Teachers' 65th annual convention, Donahue linked the history of the first 100 years of the American labor movement to the present difficulties faced by working people, declaring:

"ONE HUNDRED years later, solidarity is still our message and still our greatest strength . . . as we reaffirm the historic commitment of this labor movement to social and economic progress."

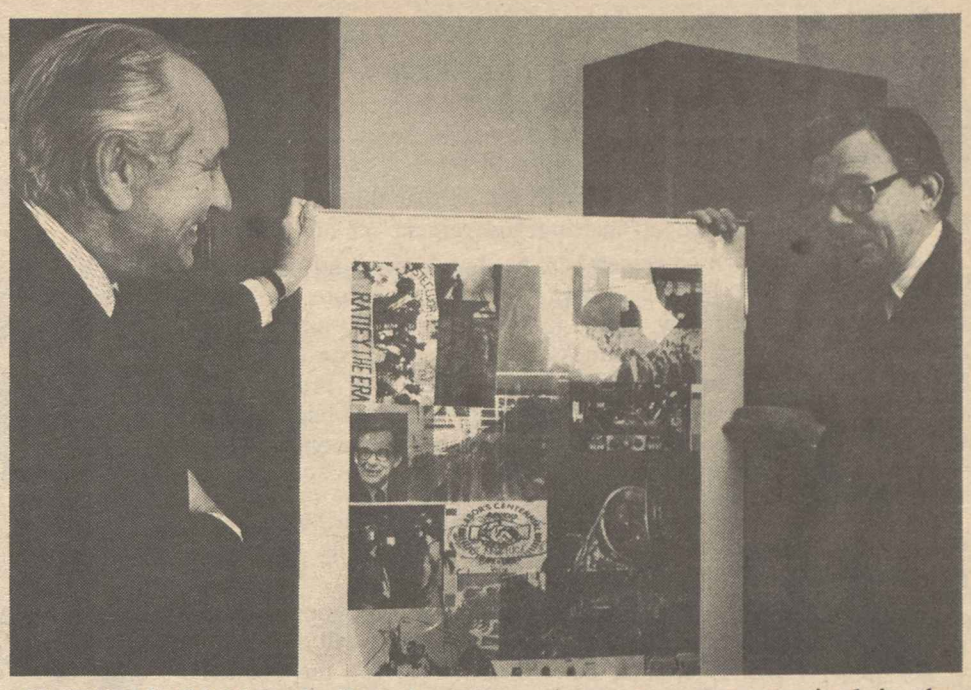
AFT President Albert Shanker, in his state of the union address to the nearly 2,500 delegates, followed up on Donahue's call for solidarity, charging that in his budget-cutting, President Reagan is "practicing the role of Robin Hood in reverse —he is taking from the poor and giving to the rich."

Shanker warned the delegates representing 580,000 AFT members that the union faces severe threats from both the Reagan budget cuts affecting education, health care and public employees, as well as the Administration's call for tuition tax credits, under which parents would receive a $500 income tax credit for sending a child to private school.

TO MEET these twin assaults, Shanker called on the delegates to fight "as though it were life or death" by getting every AFT members to contribute $10 to COPE, by organizing the "free-loaders," and by increasing political activity.

Shanker warned that the combination of the Reagan cuts in federal funds for education and social programs and the Administration's push for tuition tax credits means "an entire wipe-out of the federal presence in education and in health, an entire reduction and decimation of the public sector in this country, and the possible destruction of public education in America."

In a press conference following his speech, Donahue expressed the AFL-CIO's opposition to the tuition tax credit proposal, declaring, "Our tax dollars should support public institutions." He said such tax credits would "vastly weaken public schools."



DURING HIS address to the delegates, Donahue emphasized that the AFL-CIO would "continue to extend every assistance in our power to our brothers and sisters in Poland as long as they need and desire our help," a declaration that the delegates greeted with resounding applause.

He said the federation "will do the same in Chile, in El Salvador, in South Africa and in other countries where working people have asked for trade union support."

Donahue pointed out that the AFL-CIO is seeking "to bolster those free trade unions as democratic institutions for the expression and achievement of workers' rights."

THE AFT delegates were to consider a wide range of resolutions on education policy, health care, public employment and international affairs as well as the Reagan Administration's economic program.

The officers reported a growth of nearly 30,000 members in the past year, despite layoffs and attrition, as a consequence of the combination of bargaining units switching from the National Education Association to the AFT, the chartering of more than 100 new locals, and the union's expansion of its membership in the health care field to 35 locals in 18 states.

HISTORIC GOALS of all trade union movements are summarized in the original lithograph by American artist Robert Rauschenberg commemorating the 100th anniversary of the AFL-CIO. One of 300 signed prints is presented by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to Francis Blanchard, director general of the International Labor Organization, during Kirkland's visit as part of the U.S. delegation to the ILO's annual assembly in Geneva.

Randolph Institute Leaders Concerned at Drift to Right

Los Angeles—Blacks and workers must put before the American people "a wide-ranging, socially equitable program" as an alternative to the regressive policies of the Reagan Administration, Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, declared at the institute's 12th national conference.

Hill sharply criticized the rightward drift of the Senate and the Executive Branch and charged that the Reagan Administration has launched "the most formidable challenge to the interests of blacks and other workers since the Republican administrations of the 1920s." Hill's keynote address sounded the theme of the annual conference, which brought together more than 750 black trade unionists and community leaders.

CALIFORNIA GOV. Jerry Brown, who addressed the opening session of the conference, spoke of the problem of world hunger and emphasized that millions of blacks are starving to death in Africa. He called for foreign policy initiatives to help stem the problem of starvation.

Los Angeles Mayor Tom Bradley praised APRI's work in the area, including its "very important contributions to voter registration and voter participation."

Other speakers included AFL-CIO Vice President Frederick O'Neal, Civil Rights Director William Pollard, COPE Director Al Barkan, Sec.-Treas. John Henning of the Calif. AFL-CIO, and Sec.-Treas. William Robertson of the Los Angeles County AFL-CIO.

The high point of APRI's conference was the presentation of the A. Philip Randolph Freedom Award to Rep. Augustus F. Hawkins (D-Calif.), who was cited for his contributions to the concepts of full employment, social justice and interracial cooperation.

APRI Chairman Bayard Rustin praised Hawkins as "one of our country's outstanding legislators." He said that like Randolph, Hawkins "knows that the trade union movement is a principal force for social justice" and that "freedom for black workers is only possible in an atmosphere of political, social and economic security."

Donald Slaiman, deputy director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, presented greetings to the conference and award dinner from Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas Donahue. Slaiman urged institute leaders to play a leading role in building black community support for the federation's Sept. 19 "Solidarity Day" demonstration.

DELEGATES TOOK part in an extensive workshop program focusing on such topics as occupational safety and health, union organizing drives, and grass-roots legislative lobbying.

The Randolph Institute is made up of more than 18,000 black trade unionists, active in 36 states and the District of Columbia. It conducts voter participation programs, supports labor's organizing drives, and mobilizes support within the black community for labor's agenda, among other activities.

Pennsylvania Unions Seek Restoration of Jobless Aid

Philadelphia—The repeal of "ripper" legislation that Pennsylvania enacted last year sharply cutting back jobless benefits and an all-out drive to reject a new measure that would gut workers' compensation head the State AFL-CIO legislative agenda.

The 1,600 delegates to the federation's convention here called on the current legislature to restore the more than $200 million in annual benefits jobless workers are losing under the so-called ripper law.

THE CONVENTION also urged legislators to reject an eight-bill package that would disqualify thousands of workers needing occupational injury and illness compensation. The measures would also halt automatic annual adjustments in benefits linked to increases in the state's average wage.

Another key legislative objective is passage of a House bill that would require firms employing at least 50 workers to give a one-year notice before plant shutdowns to ease the economic impact on workers and their communities.

While the convention was in session, the Republican-dominated state senate passed a labor-opposed bill lifting the interest rate ceiling on consumer credit, which currently ranges from 15 to 24 percent. Delegates urged the House to defeat the measure, warning that Pennsylvania consumers would have to pay at least $30 million a year more in credit charges if it were adopted.

DELEGATES GAVE a cool reception to Gov. Richard L. Thornburgh (R) as he attempted to defend his support of the jobless benefit ripper law and other anti-worker measures.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the delegates that reports from its enemies that the labor movement is dead are grossly exaggerated. He stressed that organized labor is alive and well and that it is committed to the fight against attempts by the Reagan Administration to wipe out 50 years of social progress.

Other speakers included Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.), who pledged to resist all efforts to repeal the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law; Sen. Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), National COPE Director Al Barkan, AFL-CIO Regional Director Walter Waddy and Paul Ornburn of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

'Speak Out' on Cutbacks, McBride Urges

New York — Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride urged organized labor and its allies to "speak out" against the budget-cutting mood in Congress and denounced the pro-business, anti-worker bias evident in the Reagan Administration.

McBride's comments were made as the League for Industrial Democracy presented him with its 76th anniversary award in recognition of his commitment "to democracy in his union, his country and around the world."

McBRIDE TOLD the 400 trade union and political leaders at the luncheon that there is an element in the Administration that believes "if only we could unleash the power of business concerns to be free to do as they please, this country would be great and powerful again."

That philosophy led to the exploitation and intimidation of workers in the past, McBride pointed out, and he stressed that the labor movement will fight any such efforts to turn back the clock. Unions will use the collective bargaining process to defend workers' rights to "a sense of dignity which creates conditions better than they ever have been before," he declared.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue called McBride "a union leader who believes very deeply that a union belongs to its members and not to others who feel they understand the interests of workers better than the workers themselves."

THE LID awards luncheon was part of a two-day conference that featured a debate between Ladies' Garment Workers' Assistant President Gus Tyler and "supply-side" economist Eugene Birnbaum on the Reagan Administration's economic policies.

U.S. policy toward El Salvador was debated by Penn Kemble, founder of the Coalition for a Democratic Majority and author-historian Ron Radosh.

A message of greetings to the conference was delivered by Piotr Naimski, a founding member of the dissident Polish Committee for Self-Defense, KOR.

Naimski described the work of Solidarity, the independent trade union movement in Poland, and urged American workers to continue their support for Polish workers.

"What we need most," Naimski said, "is moral assistance. We need to feel that the outside world supports our activities." Naimski also outlined practical needs such as printing equipment. Solidarity faces "media and communications problems" in circulating information to its members, he pointed out.

LID Chairman Tom Kahn, an assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, announced that the league will begin publication in the fall of a quarterly magazine dealing with the status of workers' rights in Eastern bloc countries.

THE PUBLICATION will focus on working conditions and the status of independent workers' movements in those countries, Kahn said.

He told the conference the league has made available a study defending the establishment of the minimum wage and is preparing a report on the activities of union-busting management consultants.

'Rationale for Plutocracy'

WE HAVE TO remind our elected lawmakers as forcefully as we can of the fact that the budgetary knife cuts more than pieces of paper with numbers on them—it wounds the flesh and drains the blood of living human beings.

Those who are swinging the blade tell us that they do so with the high-minded purpose of "getting government off our backs."

Anyone old enough to remember, firsthand, the kind of world that Americans lived in before there was a CWA, before the business jungle was tamed by public-interest legislation, and before government resources were harnessed to secure justice and promote the quality of human life, can only reject any prospect of returning to those good old days, before government began—not to get on the people's back—but to stand by the people's side, with a helping hand for the poor and weak.

IN A JUST society, it is the business of government to look out for the interests of the poor and the weak. The rich and powerful can and do look out for themselves.

We reject the idea, now labeled "supply-side" economics, that government should look after the rich and the rich will take care of the poor. There is nothing new in this idea. It's the ancient rationale for plutocracy.

It is possible for our country to avoid the social disaster we see taking shape behind the Reagan economic program. We believe it is our duty to warn our fellow citizens of the danger they face.

THERE ARE some welcome indications that the American people and at least some of their elected lawmakers are beginning to grasp the full dimensions of the human cost behind the dollar cuts of the Reagan Administration.

One was the 96-to-0 vote with which the Senate replied to the President's initial proposal to gut the social security program. Of course, that battle isn't over. We can expect more schemes and more attacks on that basic instrument which working people rely on for security in old age.

Another indication is the growing number and extraordinary range of the national voluntary organizations that have responded to the AFL-CIO's call for a broad coalition to restore human values to the budget.

OUR COALITION includes well over 200 organizations that cover the whole spectrum of human concerns—with the conspicuous exception of business and finance. Many have never engaged in any sort of legislation action on a national scale. All of them have found that their interests, too, need to be defended and that they cannot do it alone.

In our first century, we have acquired a considerable body of experience. We have seen a great many administrations and congresses come and go. We have seen leaders come on the scene as conquering heroes, shinning with charisma, only to slip away a few years later without applause, and sometimes with scorn.

Many times over these 100 years we have faced far worse odds than we face today. We have never lost heart, never lost sight of our goals, never turned our back on our true friends.

Sweet Talk on Sugar Supports Swings Votes to Reagan Budget

By Gus Tyler

THE QUESTION BEFORE the House was this: should they vote on the budget as one big package or should they vote on it as six separate packages?

The difference is one faced by every shopper when buying bananas, for instance. Should you make six separate purchases of one banana each or should you buy half a dozen at once? As a rule, if you make the big buy, you save something, a few pennies.

So what were the members of the House of Representatives who voted for the Republican plan to act on the big package "saving?" They were saving themselves from their constituencies, from the people who elected them.

IF THE REPRESENTATIVES had voted on six separate questions, their constituents would know exactly where the congressmen stood and just how "representative" they were. The legislator would be on record "for" or "against" items affecting such sensitive areas as social security, food stamps, guaranteed student loans, child nutrition, Medicaid, and cost of living increases for federal retirees. Understandably, many congressmen preferred not to be on record.

To "save" their standing with the folks back home, while at the same time voting all these cuts, the congressmen preferred to vote for the total budget in one big chunk. In that way, they could always say to a constituent that they did not really like this or that feature of the budget but that they had no alternative since they were voting on the package as a whole.

"Sorry," reads the letter to the retiree back home, "that there was that cutback on your pension. There were several things I didn't like in that package. But we couldn't pick and choose; we had to vote it 'up' or 'down'. And, unfortunately, some things slipped through that were not to our liking."

BY AVOIDING SIX separate roll calls on six sensitive issues, the representatives could be as unrepresentative as they pleased while concealing that fact from the people in the precincts.

It was this charade to which President Reagan referred when he said: "Today's vote is a profile in political courage."

Apparently, some of that "courage" was also up for sale, at the rather expensive price of four cents on a pound of raw sugar. Rep. W. J. Tauzin (D-La.), one of 29 defectors from his party who voted for the "package," says that, in exchange for supporting the GOP proposal, the President promised to jack up sugar cane prices by 25 percent.

WHEN REAGAN'S Budget Director, David Stockman, was confronted with this "deal," he simply denied that any deal was made. There were only a few "adjustments and considerations."

Apparently, Tauzin was not the only southern Democrat who was importuned with "adjustments and considerations." Stockman granted that the President made numerous calls and that in each case he was properly briefed on just what it was the congressman would like in exchange for his vote. Explained Stockman: "Obviously you don't call people cold. He ought to know where the latest heartburn item is."

So the President knows the "heartburn." He promises to ease the pain. In gratitude, the congressman then votes for the GOP package which he can do with impunity since the "package" will allow him to hide his views from his constituency.

A Question of Honor On Social Security

The AFL-CIO recognizes the need for strengthening the financing of social security. This can and should be done without reducing benefits for beneficiaries or for those now contributing to the program who must depend on it in the future.

Workers have paid contributions during their working lives confident of receiving specified benefits. It would be a breach of faith to deprive them of these benefits.

Congress is honor bound to meet program commitments. There are effective ways to fully balance the program without slashing benefits, and we urge you to support them.

Lech Walesa at ILO

A Message of Justice, Freedom From Polish Workers' Leader

The following is from an address by Lech Walesa, chairman of the independent Polish trade union, Solidarity, to the 67th International Labor Conference in Geneva last month.

I HAVE COME to this conference as a delegate of Polish workers, accompanied by my colleagues from the Solidarity trade union and colleagues from the two other trade union federations in Poland, the branch unions and the autonomous unions.

This is clear proof of the pluralism of the Polish trade union movement. However, I have taken the floor here, first of all, as a representative of the largest Polish trade union organization, the independent self-managed trade union Solidarity.

This organization was born late in August 1980 as a result of the memorable events in the shipyards of Gdansk, Gdynia and Szczecin and in the coal mines of Silesia.

IN JUST a few months, we have brought together in our ranks millions of workers in every sphere of the national economy and Solidarity has become the largest social organization in the history of my country.

Its members have different levels of education, different occupations and vocations, different philosophical and religious opinions, but they are joined by one common aspiration, that of ensuring for the Polish workers, blue-collar and white-collar alike, a life in civic freedom, freedom of thought and speech, human dignity and national sovereignty.

The independence of our union, which has brought about a new social situation in my country, sometimes gives rise to various fears.

I should like, from this international forum, to tell everybody, all the peoples and all the countries in the world, that the Poles are capable of settling their own internal affairs among themselves and by themselves. It is in the common interest that no external intervention should prevent the process of consolidation of the Polish society which began on 31 August 1980.

OUR UNION was born out of protest. Using the traditional methods of workers' struggle—demonstrations and strikes—it contributed in a definitive way of initiating a thoroughgoing transformation of the social and political life of the country.

There is no area which has remained unaffected by this process of renewal. And even though we are aware that this is only the beginning of these changes, no one in Poland has any doubt that there is no way to return to the old methods of ruling the country and governing its economy.

The whole world knows what a difficult economic situation my country is in as a result of the political errors and the irresponsible economic and social policies pursued by the leaders of my country in past years.

We are conscious of the fact that to find a way out of the present difficulties will require sacrifices and self-denial on the part of every Pole, even though he bears no responsibility whatever for our economic collapse. We have recommended every section of Solidarity not to make any wage demands and not to go on strike without the agreement of the leadership of Solidarity. But we shall continue our struggle so that no one in Poland remains jobless and so that the vital interests of the most deprived segments of the population in town and country are well protected.

MAY I EMPHASIZE that Polish workers belonging to the independent, self-managed trade union Solidarity greatly appreciate the possibility of cooperating with the ILO and are ready to participate actively in the formulation and development of international labor laws and other ways of bringing about social progress.

It is a matter of personal privilege and honor to me to be able to participate in the present session of the ILO Conference and to be able to meet and cooperate with so many trade unionists from all the countries of the world.

Polish trade unionists have cooperated with the ILO wholeheartedly throughout the 62 years of its existence. When in August 1980 we decided to create independent self-managed trade unions, we used in full the provisions of the ILO Conventions Nos. 87 and 98 on freedom of association with trade union rights to strengthen Solidarity. I hope that in the future, too, our cooperation with the ILO will be a lasting element in the mutual relations of Polish trade unionists with trade unions from all over the world and with international organizations working for social progress and social justice.

I SHOULD LIKE to express our solidarity with working people throughout the world, with the struggle waged by trade union organizations in defense of the social interests of the working people, in defense of dignity of work, for protection of human rights wherever they are infringed.

A man of our times cannot have a clear conscience so long as there are areas in the world where poverty and famine prevail, so long as heartrending contrast in material and social well-being exists between different countries or classes of people, so long as man's natural pursuit of freedom, a decent life and happiness are countered by violence, oppression and exploitation.

May I express the hope that—irrespective of and dividing line between states, blocs or systems—the principles of social justice, democratic freedom and independence of the trade union movement, which are the guidelines of Solidarity, may be the common property and underlying force of the entire trade union movement.

Discontent on Reagan Policies Seen Focus of Labor's Protest

"I hope we can wait. That's a long time for eight million to remain unemployed—a long time to wait for those two million extra jobs to be added to the economy. . . .

"IT SEEMS TO ME that a more effective program would be to try to find ways to keep the people employed in the meantime, not to create a budget which will, in and of itself, account for an extra million people unemployed."

Donahue acknowledged that the President is personally popular, but he stressed that "there is a great gap" between that assessment and "what the people's real attitudes are towards the individual actions of the Reagan Administration."

He said that congressional votes in which longtime supporters of the labor movement—both Democrats and Republicans—have switched to support Administration programs opposed by the labor movement reflect a hurried view. "They are reading the tea leaves differently," he suggested. While "they're running with the pack" now, those elected representatives will respond differently "when the people's real attitudes are toward the individual horrors that are being visited upon them," he said.

DONAHUE REJECTED the contention of Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan that "workers have more to gain than to lose by going along with this program." Donovan, he pointed out, is "the same Labor Secretary who said the Supreme Court shouldn't apply the best health standards to workers in the textile industry . . . the same Labor Secretary who proposed a renewal of industrial homework—the worst kind of exploitation of the past."

"Sec. Donovan needs to take another look at all of these issues," he asserted, and "another look at the economic effects of the Reagan program."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHEN BISMARCK RULED imperial Germany a century ago, he reportedly remarked that people shouldn't see either sausages or laws being made. The point was well illustrated in a session of the House of Representatives on June 26.

Following a rancorous five-hour "debate" which often bordered on pandemonium, the House approved the broadest package of budget legislation in memory—a one and one-half inch thick compilation of fine print which had been handed to House members shortly before the session began.

The legislators, by their own admission, did not have time to read or study the 1,000-page compendium, which had been thrown together at the last minute, with some sections hastily crossed out and others penciled in the margins.

YET WITH SOME cajoling from President Reagan, who proved to be as skillful with the telephone as with television, the House passed by a 217 to 211 vote the so-called "Gramm-Latta" substitute to the budget legislation its own committees had devised.

The Administration's astonishing victory was made possibly by the defection to GOP ranks of 29 House Democrats, most of them southern conservatives. All but two Republican members were held in line.

The Gramm-Latta legislation is similar to that approved by the Senate. Both versions whittle down or repeal many of the social programs enacted since the 1930s and seriously strain the "safety net" for the needy which Reagan had pledged to maintain.

As Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) told his colleagues during the debate in reference to the Gramm-Latta substitute: "The three branches of government will have become two. The White House will not only propose legislation, but also dispose of it. . . . Major changes in the law are being stampeded through Congress without any deliberative process."

Rep. Mary Rose Oakar (D-Ohio) pleaded that "opposition to the Republican substitute is not merely a sour grapes phenomenon. The Gramm-Latta bill will abrogate the authority and function of the House authorizing committees. I do not exaggerate when I charge that adoption of these amendments constitutes a blatant threat to our entire checks and balances system."

Rep. Thomas M. Foglietta (D-Pa.) declared, "I cannot, and I will not, go along with this mockery of the legislative process." The "budget process," he said, "is being used as an excuse to implement major policy reversals. The President's block grant proposal is the most prominent example."

THE VOTE FOR Gramm-Latta only compounded the rout of the Legislative branch by the Reagan-led Executive Branch which began when the House voted in May for a "bipartisan" budget resolution sponsored by Texas Democrat Phil Gramm and Ohio Republican Delbert Latta. The 63 conservative Democrats who joined a solid GOP provided a comfortable margin of victory.

That resolution, the original Gramm-Latta measure, mandated House authorizing committees to make $36.6 billion in social program cuts. Congress thus complied with the Administration's desire to turn the budget process on its head by forcing congressional committees to shape programs and rewrite legislation to conform to previously determined spending ceilings.

Rep. Richard Bolling (D-Mo.), chairman of the House Rules Committee, warned that "If the Administration's insistence that it have its own way—and at once—through the reconciliation process continues, it will be a gross distortion of the intent of those who wrote the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, as well as the intent of the 1974 budget act."

Bolling continued: "If Congress is to be reduced to automatons permitted only to ratify a presidential legislative agenda that has been premasticated by an all-powerful executive, the American people, with some justice, may very well ask: 'Why should we support this expensive anachronism?' "

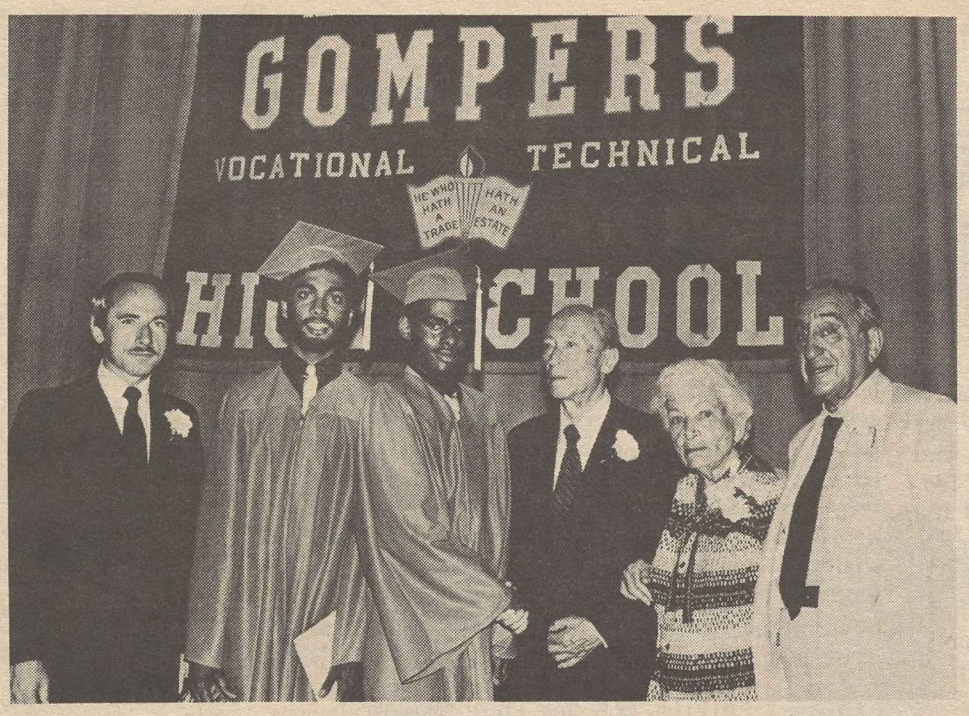
SOLIDARITY DAY demonstrators will help repudiate the Reagan Administration's claims of a mandate to reverse 50 years of social progress, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Lance Gay, left, of the Washington Star and Philip Shabecoff of the New York Times. The program is aired weekly on the Mutual radio network.

State-County Strikers Seek Pay Equality

The State, County & Municipal Employees pledged the union's full resources to San Jose, Calif., city workers striking to win for women the same pay as men doing comparable work.

"AFSCME and its local union membership in San Jose are asking for no more than a good-faith effort on the part of the city," said Union President Jerry Wurf in a telegram to the officers of AFSCME Local 101 in San Jose.

"San Jose's wage rates are illegal and in violation of the Civil Rights Act," he charged.



SOME 1,500 librarians, mechanics, janitors, and clerical and other workers struck July 5 when their old contract with the city expired. Earlier, on June 8, with the aid of AFSCME's legal department, Local 101 filed a formal complaint with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission that the city has engaged in sexual discrimination in paying its predominantly female job classes less than predominantly male job classes.

The union is seeking a $3.2 million commitment over four years to correct the inequities. The city, which has a population of 650,000, has offered $1.3 million. On the other hand, the city government has already adopted a pay equity program for management officials based on an independent evaluation of the city's pay structure.

The study, conducted by the consulting firm of Hay Associates, found that pay for jobs that are predominantly staffed by females ranges from 2 to 10 percent less than the overall average for the city. The city initiated the half-million dollar survey at AFSCME's request.

CITY OFFICIALS rejected the union's wage proposal on the ground the Hay study was not intended to measure precisely the relative value of jobs, and have refused to upgrade jobs that are within 10 percent of the average salary "trend line." The union's proposal would bring predominantly female positions up to the trend line.

"The men and women of AFSCME know that your fight is our fight," Wurf said in his telegram to the local. He pledged support "with all of the resources available because the issues are important to working women everywhere."

SCHOLARSHIP AWARDS are presented to graduates Angel Pacheo and Kamlesh Patel at Samuel Gompers High School commencement exercises in Bronx, N.Y. in memory of the first AFL president. The awards were made on behalf of the Reunion of Old Timers by Charles Zimmerman, a retired vice president of the Ladies' Garment Workers, Mrs. Zimmerman, and Morris Novik, right, a media consultant to the AFL-CIO. Principal Victor Herbert is at left. The old timers group was founded 40 years ago by New York area socialists and trade unionists.

Hospital Workers Win Pact In 4-Month Kentucky Strike

Prestonburg, Ky.—A four-month strike by service and maintenance workers at the regional hospital here has ended with substantial contract gains despite a campaign of threats and violence mounted against the workers.

The 280 members of District 1199's unit at the Highlands Regional Medical Center, a 137-bed non-profit facility, struck Mar. 25 after solidly rejecting a take-it-or-leave-it offer from the hospital management. District 1199 is the hospital and health care division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union.

THE NEW three-year pact, ratified 144-41 on July 7, provides for a 30 percent across-the-board wage increase in steps of 11, 10 and 9 percent. Most of the union's members had been receiving the minimum wage or slightly more.

Many workers will also get an average of 7 percent in raises to correct pay inequities in some jobs and establish seniority differentials.

Gains were also made in vacations, sick leave, and holiday pay and health care coverage.

At the start of the strike, the hospital hired a Cincinnati firm, Nuckols & Associates, to provide security guards. The nearly 50 uniformed guards were permitted to carry guns and billy clubs and to use surveillance cameras, high intensity lighting and armored cars. A local judge enjoined the union from having more than five pickets on the line at any time.

UNION MEMBERS reported being beaten on the picket line by the guards, and several pickets were injured when they were struck by cars crashing through the line.

The windows of the union headquarters and of many strikers' cars were shot out.

Pickets said they were followed home by guards after leaving the line, and a number reported receiving telephoned threats of death or violence if they did not return to work. But not a single member of the unit returned to work during the strike.

District 1199 organized a strike support fund for the Prestonburg members, which was amplified by a statewide campaign led by the Kentucky AFL-CIO. Additional support and funds came from the Mine Workers. Many of the strikers, 230 of whom were women, were the only support of their families or are married to Mine Workers' members who were also on strike during much of the same period.

ROBERT MUHLENKAMP, District 1199 director of organizing said the victory will be studied by hospitals and workers throughout the area.

The medical center, Muhlenkamp pointed out, "thought that because most of the strikers were women service workers earning the minimum wage they were powerless and vulnerable, and that a campaign of violence would scare them into submission.

"The hospital guessed wrong, and the workers stuck together in a magnificent display of courage and commitment."

Musicians' Delegates Vote To Retain Dues Structure

Salt Lake City—Delegates to the Musician's 84th convention rejected an executive board proposal of a one-time, $5-per-member assessment to bolster the union's financial position, but left intact the per capita dues structure adopted at last year's convention.

The 900 delegates to the four-day meeting also re-elected the federation's officers, streamlined language in the union's constitution, voted to increase the salaries of officers and executive board members, and heard a number of speakers.

A RESOLUTION calling for a return to annual conventions was voted down in a voice vote. At its 1980 convention, the AFM delegates had voted to hold conventions biennially rather than yearly.

The decision to retain the work dues structure under which members pay one-half of 1 percent of scale wages to the national union and one-half of 1 percent to their local was by a large majority of delegates. Several resolutions had been proposed to modify the plan.

Re-elected to new two-year terms were President Victor W. Fuentealba, Vice President David Winstein, Vice President from Canada J. Alan Wood, and Sec.-Treas. J. Martin Emerson. Incumbents to the remaining five positions on the nine-member executive board were also re-elected.

THE OFFICER salary increases, the first since 1975, raise the salary of the president from $55,000 to $64,000 a year while that of the vice president from Canada and the secretary-treasurer go from $45,000 to $52,000 a year. The three positions are full-time. Also, the salaries of the remaining, part-time executive-board members were raised from $12,000 to $14,000 a year.

Speakers included the wife of Gov. Scott Matheson, Norma, filling in for her husband who had been detained in Washington during a meeting with President Reagan; President Eddie P. Mayne of the Utah State AFL-CIO; Maurice Abravanel, music director of the Utah Symphony, and Edwin Schmidt, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Reproduction, Mailings & Subscriptions.

Union Urges Controllers To Reject Pact

Chicago—The Air Traffic Controllers' executive board has unanimously recommended that the union's members "overwhelmingly reject" the tentative contract settlement their negotiators reached June 22 with the Federal Aviation Administration.

The board adopted its position at a two-day meeting here attended by some 400 local union representatives as well. A resolution approved by the nine-member panel said that last month's agreement "does not address the fundamental issues important to the air traffic control profession."

VOTING ON the tentative contract is expected to begin next week, and the results known by July 28. If the pact is rejected, the union's next stop would be to ask the government to resume bargaining.

The resolution did not address specific contract issues, but PATCO leaders said they have received many letters, telegrams, and phone calls from members complaining that the Administration's offer of an 11.4 percent wage increase this year is inadequate. The controllers also had sought a shorter work week without reduction in pay as a means of lessening job-related stress. Instead, the agency offered time-and-a-half pay for four hours of a regular 40-hour week.

Under the new contract proposal, all PATCO members would not benefit equally since much of the package consists of increases in premium pay for night and weekend work as well as money for controllers who are medically disqualified.

THE BOARD'S three-paragraph resolution recommending rejection of the contract supported PATCO President Robert Poli's acceptance of the agreement "given the circumstances with which he was confronted in the early morning of June 22."

With a strike deadline set for approximately 7 a.m. on that date, negotiations between the union and the Reagan Administration, represented by Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis, continued through the night while union officials polled controllers across the country to determine whether there was sufficient support for a strike.

An affiliate of the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, PATCO represents about 14,000 of the nation's air traffic controllers.

Congress Girds For Tax Battle

Congress breaks for a scheduled August recess.

The House Democratic leadership had assumed that a tax cut less skewed to the very rich would be politically more acceptable than the Administration plan. But the President demonstrated in the budget votes his ability to swing a bloc of conservative Democrats to his side.

Ironically, the business groups that were solidly aligned with the President on the budget cuts are seen as the wild cards in the tax battle.

Some trade associations find the business tax reductions in the House committee bill more lucrative for their industries than the Administration version.

COPE-Backed Democrat Elected in Mississippi

Jackson, Miss.—COPE-endorsed Democrat Wayne Dowdy, who spoke out for extension of the Voting Rights Act, was elected to the House from a Mississippi congressional district last represented by a Republican.

Dowdy, 37-year-old mayor of McComb, edged out Republican Liles B. Williams in a runoff.

The seat had been held by the GOP since 1972 and has been vacant since April when Republican John Hinson resigned from Congress after his arrest on a morals offense charge.

Williams had led seven other candidates in the first round of voting. He campaigned as a supporter of President Reagan, whose endorsement was mailed to district voters, and used a television advertisement featuring Vice President Bush.

Dowdy had the near-solid support of the district's 45 percent black population, and Williams attributed his loss to the unexpectedly high voter turnouts.

Ready Cure for Deficit

Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker was also questioned sharply about the economic assumptions it used to project a massive future deficit in the social security funds. For that purpose, Sen. Bill Bradley (D-N.J.) noted, the Administration assumes a continuation of very high unemployment and very high inflation. But for other economic projections, it foresees both rates dropping.

In Detroit, Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser said the Reagan Administration appears to be conducting an "orchestrated attempt to undermine confidence in the social security system and to establish a basis for the outrageous cuts which it proposed in May."

Seidman protested the "cruelty" of showing doubt as to whether workers who pay into the system will ever get benefits from it.

"IT IS inconceivable that Congress would let social security benefits be delayed or unpaid," Seidman stressed.

Therefore, he suggested, Congress should write into law "a provision stating that social security benefits, like interest on the national debt, will be paid from general revenues in the event payroll taxes are insufficient. The present moral obligation to pay benefits should become a legal one. This would reassure beneficiaries and contributors, and strengthen public confidence in the program."

He reminded the panel that a similar provision was included in the Social Security Act more than 30 years ago.

AS TO THE Reagan Administration's cutback proposals, Seidman said the harsh effect of slashing early retirement benefits would be compounded by further tightening eligibilitiy for disability insurance.

Under the Administration plan, Seidman protested, no worker retiring at 62 would get a social security benefit as high as the official poverty threshold.

Seidman expressed labor's concern that the extreme severity of the Administration's proposals may increase the willingness of Congress to accept cuts "that are somewhat less drastic than the Administration's recommendations."

THAT APPEARS to be the Administration's "fallback strategy," Seidman said, and the various retrenchment proposals being talked of in Congress "give evidence that this strategy has been much too successful."

He told the Senate panel that the AFL-CIO is opposed to any increase in the age of retirement. Tampering with the early retirement provisions of social security places "an unequal burden on those in poor health and on blue-collar workers whose jobs require physical effort," Seidman protested. They would also have a "devastating impact on the early retirement provisions of collectively bargained pension plans," he observed.

Living standards of the elderly are declining under inflation's impact even with the present cost-of-living formula for social security benefits, Seidman noted.

HE AND OTHER union and senior citizens witnesses testifying at the hearings took sharp issue with the Administration insistence that general revenue funds not be used to supplement the payroll tax.

"The United States is one of the few advanced industrial nations in the world in which the social security system is financed almost entirely from payroll taxes," Seidman noted.

The AFL-CIO proposal to finance 50 percent of Medicare out of general revenues would allow the balance of the Medicare tax to be applied to the Old Age & Survivors Trust Fund, the basic retirement benefit fund.

AS A FURTHER backup, Seidman said, other transfers and reallocation among the various funds would provide needed flexibility. And, as former President Carter proposed in 1977, general funds should supplement the payroll tax during periods of exceptionally high unemployment.

"The AFL-CIO recognizes the need for strengthening the financing of the program," Seidman testified. "But we believe this can and should be done without reducing benefits for either beneficiaries or for those now contributing to the program who must depend on it in the future."

COPE'S COFFERS got a $22,000 boost with a check from the Office & Professional Employees presented by OPEIU Sec.-Treas. William A. Lowe, right, to COPE Director Al Barkan. The check represents 100-percent fulfillment of the union membership's quota for voluntary political contributions for 1981. This is the sixth consecutive year that OPEIU has reached 100 percent of its COPE quota.

Job Assurances Sought in Talks On Grain Sales

A larger share of grain sold to the Soviet Union should be processed into flour before it leaves the United States, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged in a letter to Agriculture Sec. John R. Block.

The current five-year grain agreement between the two nations expires on Sept. 30. Now that the Administration has lifted the boycott imposed by former President Carter, both sides are preparing for "exploratory talks" on an extension of the sales agreement.

KIRKLAND NOTED that the AFL-CIO had supported retaining the boycott "as long as Russian troops remain in Afghanistan." But if sales are to be resumed, he said, greater attention should be paid to the effect on U.S. jobs.

The United States is losing employment because U.S. wheat and soybeans are being processed at European mills, Kirkland stressed. By processing a larger share of the grain in the United States, he said, job opportunities will increase and the value of U.S. exports will be higher.

Kirkland urged a bilateral agreement on cargo sharing between the United States and the USSR that would in practice as well as theory provide for an even division of cargo shipments.

HE SAID the agreement should provide a rate structure that will enable U.S. vessels to receive a fair return and encourage expansion of the American-flag bulk fleet. Otherwise, he warned, the Soviet Union is likely to engage in "predatory" pricing tactics that will freeze out U.S. vessels.

"If grain sales are to be made to the Soviets," Kirkland urged, "they should be made under a multi-year bilateral sales and shipping agreement that mitigates wild swings in Russian purchases and enhances U.S. domestic price stability and employment."

Trade Concessions Opposed For Communist Countries

The AFL-CIO opposes extension of "most-favored-nation" status to the communist countries of Romania, Hungary and the People's Republic of China, Legislative Director Ray Denison told a House subcommittee, charging that "there is neither human rights nor economic nor political justification" for such treatment.

The three countries have been accorded MFN treatment under the 1974 Trade Act's waiver authority. MFN status provides the lowest tariff and the easiest access to the U.S. market that the United States grants any other country.

DENISON TOLD the House Ways & Means trade subcommittee chaired by Rep. Sam M. Gibbons (D-Fla.) that human rights conditions in Hungary and Romania have not improved as a result of granting those countries MFN status and that China remains a question mark.

"The issue before the committee is whether or not the granting of normal trade status to these countries encourages the free emigration of their citizens," Denison wrote Gibbons. "The evidence does not completely support that view."

In addition, Denison reiterated the AFL-CIO's longstanding objection to providing U.S. technology and production facilities for use under communist labor conditions to send products into the U.S.

"Over the years, we have listed a number of products and industries where itjury was already occurring in the U.S. and where jobs and production had already been lost," Denison observed. "Yet imports of textiles, garments, shoes, electronic equipment, glass, and steel products—all import-injured industries—persist.

"RECENT FIGURES show that increased imports of such equipment as railroad car parts have now been documented. We have also called attention before this committee to imports of compressors from the People's Republic of China, and there is evidence that the fastener industry, already impacted, is increasingly impacted from the PRC."

In Romania, Hungary and China, Denison concluded, MFN status is not necessary for either trade or contracts, nor does normalized treatment assure U.S. exporters that their sales will not be cut back whenever these countries' governments decide to curtail them.

Extension Urged On Tax Status of Legal Aid Plans

Group legal services should continue to be treated as a non-taxable fringe benefit, the AFL-CIO urged in a statement to a Senate Finance subcommittee.

A section of a 1976 tax law specified that for a five-year period workers would not have to pay income taxes on employer contributions to legal services plans—or on the value of any of the benefits workers and their families may receive under such plans.

That provision should now be made permanent, the AFL-CIO urged.

The statement, supporting a bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman Bob Packwood (R-Ore.), noted that legal services plans were rare when the law was passed.

But they have expanded rapidly, the statement noted, growing over five years from 75 to 400 plans and now covering about one million employees across the country.

These plans make it possible for moderate-income workers to obtain needed legal services and should not result in higher taxes on workers, the AFL-CIO urged.

Unless Congress acts before the end of the year, uncertainty over their tax status will discourage the growth of legal service plans, the federation's statement pointed out.

Tax Loophole New Yardstick For the 'Truly Conservative'

There was a time when a member of Congress could count on the financial support of the National Conservative Political Action Committee (NCPAC) merely by being consistently anti-union, voting for budget cuts and denouncing the "giveaway" of the Panama Canal.

But now, it seems, true conservatives should also work to preserve the commodity straddle tax loophole. And not even the Reagan Administration can pass through the eye of that needle.

COMMODITY SPECULATORS invented the straddle to defer paying taxes on their profits. It involves juggling buy-and-sell contracts to create temporary paper losses that are then used to offset real profits.

The Treasury Dept. estimates that it costs the government $1.3 billion a year in tax revenues and recently joined with the AFL-CIO in testifying for a bill to close the loophole.

The NCPAC is going all out to block the reform legislation, and an article in the July 4 issue of Congressional Quarterly explains how this became a New Right issue.

IT SEEMS that one of the nation's biggest commodity traders, Peter M. Todebush of Chicago, is a member of NCPAC's executive committee and a big contributor to the organization.

Todebush apparently had no great difficulty convincing NCPAC Chairman John T. Dolan to write to key House and Senate committee members expressing "shock" at the proposed legislation and urging its defeat.

Todebush is quoted by Congressional Quarterly as terming the bill "ideologically offensive" and asserting that it should be one of the issues to determine beneficiaries of NCPAC help in the 1982 elections.

DOLAN HAD a blunter explanation of why his group wants to keep the loophole open: "Anybody who can get out of paying any taxes at any time, I support, whether he's the poorest of the poor or the richest of the rich."

Convention Action

Newspaper Guild Spurs Solidarity Day Turnout

Memphis, Tenn.—Delegates to the Newspaper Guild's 48th annual convention here unanimously committed the union—at both the international and local levels—to join "to the fullest extent possible" in the AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day demonstration on Sept. 19.

The Guild and its members, along with the rest of organized labor, "is beginning to pay the price" of the election of a big-business-oriented administration and congressional majority, the delegates observed in a resolution.

"How high that price will mount depends on us. . . . The need for a massive outpouring by labor and its traditional allies [for Solidarity Day] is acute," the convention declared.

IT STRESSED that the Reagan Administration must be given the message that America's working people recognize that its economic policy is not fashioned for their benefit and "promotes poverty and discrimination."

At the same time, they said, the Reagan Administration is "orchestrating" a campaign to dismember the U.S. Freedom of Information Act—the law that aims to keep the processes of government open to public surveillance so that it can be subject to public control.

The convention pointed to pending and proposed bills that would, among other things, bar disclosure of material submitted to the government on defects in manufacturers' products, prevent court review of any CIA refusal to release information, substantially broaden disclosure exemptions for law enforcement records, relax deadlines for fulfillment of requests for documents and limit an applicant's requests to one per agency per year.

"All those concerned with the public's right to be informed must unite" in a campaign to preserve public disclosure that is "as determined as the campaign by those who would destroy it," the convention said.

It also warned that without amendment a proposed revision of federal communications law now in the Senate could open the door to the telephone industry entering the field of electronic publishing."

The bill, should be amended to prohibit AT&T and other telephone companies from becoming providers of electronic information and advertising where they control transmission of such information and advertising, the delegates said.

THE CONVENTION issued its call for support of Solidarity Day after hearing Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., point out that it will be "a day of solidarity with the miners whose black lung benefits Reagan has cut."

He cited also "victims of imprisonment, torture and murder at the hands of regimes whose human rights violations this Administration has decided it is in the interest of higher morality to overlook."

In other actions, the convention:

- Voted to increase dues and per capita payments to the international by 50 cents effective Sept. 1, with the additional funds to go to increase the union's staff of organizers by two, to 13. The increase will put the monthly per capita payment at $8.53 per month.

- Re-elected the union's three top officers—Perlik, president; Charles Dale, secretary-treasurer, and Harry S. Culver, international chairperson.

Four vice presidents also were elected by the convention when there were no opposing nominees for the positions. Nine other vice presidencies, all contested, will be filled by referendum in September.

Donahue Scores Safety Gap For Public Sector Workers

Unions face the double challenge of repelling Reagan Administration attacks on OSHA while stepping up their efforts to extend full safety protections to public sector workers, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue declared.

Addressing a two-day job safety conference sponsored by the federation's Public Employee Dept., Donahue said that basic protections against occupational injury and illness are lacking for 2.8 million federal employees and 13 million workers employed by state and local governments.

"HAZARDS THAT threaten the lives and health of American workers are not bounded by whether the employer is a chemical corporation, a federal shipyard, or a state or county highway project," he stressed.

Although occupational injuries and illnesses show a total disregard for job sector classifications, Donahue noted that public employees have been left in a kind of twilight zone—since they are not provided the same rights and protections workers in the private sector have under OSHA.

He pointed out the resources for the enforcement of standards for federal workers have been "puny and inconsequential," and will likely deteriorate further as a result of the Reagan Administration's budget cuts. Donahue also branded state programs for other public employees as weak and inadequately staffed.

But all workers—public and private—are in the same boat because "there is no question the Reagan Administration is out to gut the OSHA act," he warned.

RESPONDING to an earlier address by Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter, Donahue said he was unaware of any workers being "strangled" by enforcement of OSHA stadards.

Auchter, who heads the federal job safety agency, said that the Administration is moving on a broad front to reduce unnecessary federal regulation—"regulation that both labor and management have discovered is really strangulation."

Rep. Michael Barnes (D-Md.) told the conference that the combination of budget cuts, reductions of OSHA staff and shifting of federal jurisdiction to states will adversely affect job safety protection.

High Court Upholds Strike On Industry Pension Plan

The Supreme Court ruled that a union has the right to strike to back up a bargaining table demand that a company contribute to a multiemployer pension and welfare fund on behalf of its workers.

Its 8-1 decision, issued shortly before the court concluded its term, agreed with the position taken by the AFL-CIO and the National Labor Relations Board.

It reversed a ruling by the 3rd Circuit Court of Appeals which said a union's insistence on participation in a multiemployer pension plan amounted to dictating the choice of an employer bargaining representative, a Taft-Hartley law violation.

THE CASE involved the unaffiliated Mine Workers which sought to bring employees of a western surface mine under an industry pension plan. Because of parallels with other multiemployer plans, the AFL-CIO, the Sheet Metal Workers and a Sheet Metal Contractors' Association filed a brief supporting the union's right to strike.

Writing for the majority, Justice Potter Stewart said the appellate court was wrong in conceiving the role of an employer trustee of a pension plan as akin to that of a management representative at the bargaining table.

A trustee of an employee benefit fund, he ruled, "is a fiduciary whose duty to the trust beneficiaries must overcome any loyalty to the interest of the party that appointed him."

Further, the opinion noted, trustees don't function as collective bargaining representatives or in the adjustment of grievances.

Justice John Paul Stevens was the only dissenter in the case.

Brown New Chairman Of Mediation Board

Robert J. Brown has been designated chairman of the National Mediation Board, the federal agency that handles labor-management disputes in the railroad and airline industries.

Brown, who is 51, is a former Auto Workers' local officer in St. Paul and a member of the State, County & Municipal Employees during his several years of employment with the State of Minnesota.

Before becoming a member of the National Mediation Board in 1979, Brown had served as Under Secretary of Labor from March 1977 through August 1979.

Task Force Backs Two-Pilot Airline Crews

The current crop of new "high technology" airliners can be safely flown by only two pilots, a presidential task force has concluded despite testimony by the Air Line Pilots and Flight Engineers that the heavier workload in the computerized cockpits requires a third crew member for an "extra margin of safety."

The special panel appointed by President Reagan to study the crew complement issue found the McDonnell Douglas DC 9-80 to be safe for flight with a two-pilot crew and that the Federal Aviation Administration acted properly in its procedures for testing the "Super 30" before certifying it.

OTHER NEW generation aircraft soon to be marketed with cockpits designed for only two crew members also appear to be "potentially" safe, the report concluded.

The task force recommended, however, that the FAA take steps to strengthen and improve its process of certifying new jetliners by including consultation and participation by line flight crews in the procedure.

Both the ALPA and the FEIA have long been critical of the FAA's reliance on manufacturers' data in the certification process with the general exclusion of qualified line crews.

The report has been sent to the President, and Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis is expected to make the final decision to adopt its conclusions shortly.

ALPA PRESIDENT J. J. O'Donnell, stressing that he disagrees with many of the panel's major conclusions, said he will recommend to the union's executive board that the pilots abide by the results based on his commitment that the union would accept the panel's decisions "if the task force acted in a fair and objective way."

O'Donnell has called a meeting of the ALPA's executive board for July 14-15 to evaluate the full report and determine the union's position.

William A. Gill, Jr., president of the 7,000 member Flight Engineers, said the union is "very surprised and disappointed" by the decision.

Pointing out that no technical testing was conducted before the panel's decision was announced, Gill stressed that "the major issue in this matter is safety. We are convinced that removal of the flight engineers from the cockpit of future aircraft will endanger the lives of passengers and crew."

The union is currently studying the report and exploring its options "in order to prevent this serious threat to air safety."

The task force was established in March in response to a public information campaign staged by the flight crew unions to stimulate action on the safety controversy.

THE ALPA called off a scheduled work stoppage meant to dramatize the issue following announcement by President Reagan that he would appoint the special panel.

The task force, chaired by former FAA Administrator and Air Force Sec. John L. McLucas, included Fred J. Drinkwater III, chief of aircraft operations at NASA's Ames Research Center, and Lt. Gen. Howard W. Leaf, inspector general of the Air Force.

Unions Press Postal Talks Near Deadline

By James M. Shevis

U.S. Postal Service negotiators, under pressure from federal mediators, resumed face-to-face bargaining with the two major postal unions seeking new contracts before current agreements expire at midnight July 20.

Postal Workers President Moe Biller and Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto said that USPS officials, who at first refused direct bargaining, returned to the table and presented counterproposals on 14 secondary contract issues.

BILLER AND Sombrotto told reporters that they expected by the evening of July 19 to be able to assess whether an agreement might be reached before the old contracts expire and would consider extending current agreements if an accord appeared likely. They said they would not agree to a lengthy extension, however, only to around-the-clock bargaining.

Only hours before USPS negotiators returned to the bargaining table, Biller and Sombrotto told a National Press Club audience there had been absolutely no progress since talks got under way June 16. They charged that the USPS—specifically Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger—had adopted "stonewalling" tactics, and made a sham of the collective bargaining process.

"For all intents and purposes, there has been no collective bargaining," Biller said in remarks aired by National Public Radio.

Sombrotto, addressing the same group, said Bolger "seems committed to demonstrating that collective bargaining is unworkable. He is determined to provoke a nationwide postal strike."

TOGETHER, the unions that Biller and Sombrotto head represent about 500,000, or 90 percent, of the nearly 600,000 unionized postal workers in the United States. They are seeking a 17.7 percent wage increase over three years, cost-of-living adjustments under an improved formula, plus other improvements in benefits and working conditions, including safety and health, grievance procedures, and the allocation of time to allow union

TWO SENATE subcommittees considering trade issues hear AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland call for a fair trade policy keyed to maintaining a diversified U.S. economy instead of the "free trade" advocated by the Reagan Administration. With him are AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison and Economist Elizabeth Jager.

Donovan Urged to Bar Weakening Wage Rules

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has urged the Reagan Administration to release untouched new regulations governing the Service Contract Act and the Davis-Bacon Act. The proposed new rules had been scheduled to take effect early this year but were held up by the Administration following employer protests about them.

In a letter to Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan, Kirkland said the AFL-CIO is "gravely concerned" over reports that the Administration plans to scrap the pending rules in favor of its own proposals that would weaken the laws, which require contractors doing work for the federal government to pay area prevailing wages.

KIRKLAND POINTED out that the "embargoed" regulations, developed during the Carter Administration, are the fruit of two years of discussions between the government, the labor movement and employers. No group was completely satisfied with them, but there was general agreement that they were appropriate, Kirkland noted.

While the Reagan Administration has yet to formally issue its own proposals, Labor Dept. officials have conducted briefings outlining possible rule changes which Kirkland called "extreme."

The suggestion that Davis-Bacon and Service Contract Act rules might be relaxed to allow the greater use of helpers and trainees at lower wages could undermine the quality of governmental contract work," Kirkland asserted.

SUCH A change, he said, would damage apprenticeship programs, restrict one of the "major avenues to middle class living standards available to minorities," and "diminish the national resource of highly trained, productive, skilled tradespeople in the work force."

Kirkland said the AFL-CIO has found the methods of wage determinations under both laws to be "generally reasonable" and that the exceptions to the rules have been handled fairly.

He urged continued adherence to the

Kirkland Hits Continuing Loss of Jobs

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland branded the Reagan Administration's "survival of the fittest" trade doctrine "an abdication of responsibility" and warned that jobs continue to be wiped out in the name of free trade "in a world where free trade no longer has any meaning."

He called instead for a "fair trade" policy that would advance national goals of a diversified economy and full employment.

Kirkland presented labor's rebuttal to an Administration "white paper" on trade during joint hearings by two Senate subcommittees. The Administration's position paper, issued at the start of the Senate hearings, insisted that the future of U.S. enterprises and even entire industries facing import competition should be determined by world "market forces."

KEY WHITE HOUSE officials, including the chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers and the President's trade representative, testified in support of such a policy of "free trade" without government interference.

Kirkland protested that the Administration is basing its policies on an outdated textbook theory of free trade rather than on the realities of "the world as it is."

He noted that other nations have erected barriers to protect home industries, have enacted domestic content requirements for manufactured goods, and in various ways have subsidized exports.

"GOVERNMENT participation in trade must be recognized as an ongoing reality, not something to be avoided at all costs," Kirkland insisted. Both Congress and the President "have a responsibility for a trade policy that helps the nation at home as well as abroad."

In response to questions, Kirkland stressed that the AFL-CIO continues to believe in true reciprocity, achieved through "hard bargaining."

An important initial step toward fair trade, Kirkland insisted, is the enforcement of existing laws that prohibit dumping and other unfair trade practices, and

High Rates Add $17 Billion to U.S. Interest Payment

The Administration's midyear review of the 1982 federal budget offers no hope for relief from the record high interest rates that it now says will cost the government itself an additional $17 billion this year and next.

The review, prepared annually for Congress, forecasts basically sluggish economic growth the rest of this year and next, with inflation running slightly lower than expected.

"LITTLE OR NO real output growth is expected during the remainder of the year," the Office of Management & Budget said in the report. It anticipates an increase of 2.6 percent in this year's "real" gross national product—the value of the nation's total output of goods and services stripped of the impact of inflation since 1972. Next year's real GNP is projected to rise 3.4 percent.

The report forecasts unemployment this year averaging 7.5 percent and rising as high as 7.7 percent in the final quarter. In 1982, the Administration predicts the jobless rate will average 7.3 percent, the current unemployment level.

The persistence of high interest rates

Public Opposes Homework Revival

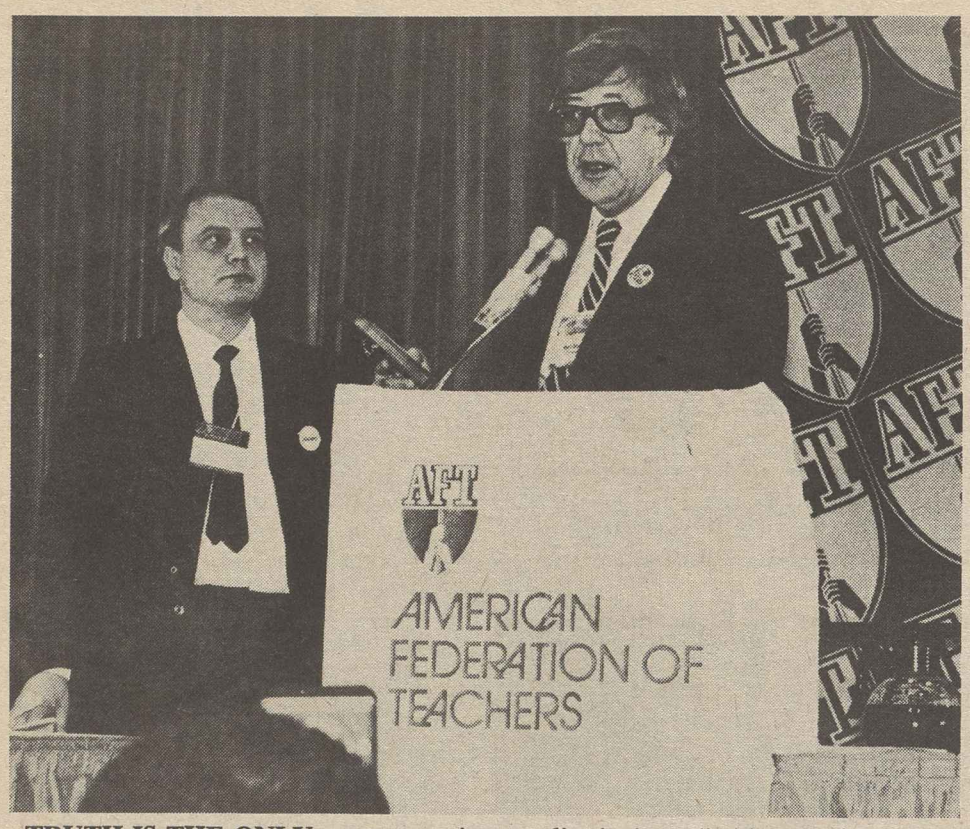
Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan's proposal to lift the government's 40-year-old ban against industrial homework is being buried under a torrent of unfavorable public reaction.

That's been the tone of the overwhelming majority of statements received by the Labor Dept. during the recently ended 60-day period for public comment.

EMPLOYER associations in the apparel industry don't like the deregulation proposal any more than do unions. State and local officials concerned at health and safety hazards in illegal work-at-home enterprises are appalled. And the chairman of a House Labor Standards subcommittee, Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), gave Donovan a letter signed by more than 140 of his colleagues asking that the ban on homework be continued.

Miller has now added to the already bulging Labor Dept. file of more than 6,000 letters of protest the 122-page transcript of a one-day hearing his subcommittee held in Los Angeles, which has been plagued by illegal sweatshops in the women's garment industry.

A state senator, Joseph Montoya, said California's resources are already spread thin to try to monitor conditions in the legal segment of the industry. "What might we expect from attempts to monitor homework in 30,000 or 40,000 additional homes?" he asked.



MERLE LINDA WOLIN, a reporter for the Los Angeles Herald-Examiner, told the subcommittee how she had posed as an illegal alien seeking work in the city's garment industry during an eight-month assignment that led to a series of 16 articles.

In her assumed role, she testified, "I earned less than the minimum wage, endured unsanitary, often dangerous working conditions, and saw many of my fellow workers toil commercially at home at what is known as industrial homework."

She talked with nearly 100 homeworkers, including some who worked 16 hours a day and others who brought bags of sewing from the shops where they worked during the day to be finished at night and on weekends. "They were all making below the minimum wage," she said.

EMPLOYER association witnesses said they would like to see federal wage-hour regulations and the ban on industrial homework made stricter and better enforced, rather than nullified or weakened. Peter Phillipes, a director of the Coalition of Apparel Industries in California, said elimination of the homework ban "would un-

TRUTH IS THE ONLY weapon against totalitarianism, dissident Soviet writer Vladimir Bukovsky told delegates to the annual convention of the American Federation of Teachers in Denver. Bukovsky received the union's Human Rights Award from AFT President Albert Shanker, right, in recognition of his opposition to civil oppression in the Soviet Union for which he was imprisoned.

Block Grant System Opposed

Teachers Assail Slash Of Education Programs

Denver—The 65th annual convention of the American Federation of Teachers overwhelmingly approved two resolutions of strong opposition to the education and economic policies of the Reagan Administration, rejecting the defense of those policies by Education Sec. Terrel H. Bell in an address to the convention.

The delegates' resolution on education decried the Reagan Administration's block grants as "a vehicle for eliminating billions of federal dollars for millions of handicapped and disadvantaged children."

THE RESOLUTION opposing "the ill-conceived Reagan economic program" supported the stand of the AFL-CIO and called for restoration of the "major cuts made in federal programs in education, health and social welfare."

The delegates gave a solid endorsement to the call for broad participation in the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day protest issued by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue in his address to the convention The rally set for the nation's capital also was strongly supported in speeches by AFT President Albert Shanker, Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.) and Executive Director John Leyden of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept.

AFT Human Rights Awards were presented by Shanker to Vladimir Bukovsky, a Soviet dissident whose opposition to civil oppression cost him more than 11 years of confinement in Soviet prisons and psychiatric hospitals, and to Bayard Rustin, chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and long-time civil and human rights activist.

In accepting the award, Bukovsky warned of the spread of communist rule and domination in Angola, Ethiopia, Yemen, Cambodia, Laos, Vietnam and Afghanistan. He called on "the American people for help," declaring, "Our only weapon against the darkness of totalitarianism is the truth, and I believe it will be invincible once again."

Rustin urged the delegates to make evident their commitment to human rights, saying, "If you and I keep quiet while people are being destroyed, that is a human indifference that creates tragedy." Rustin was saluted for "his untiring efforts to achieve personal freedom and human dignity for all people."

After considerable debate, the delegates adopted a resolution on El Salvador supporting the position of the AFL-CIO. It called for U.S. economic aid upon fulfillment of the government's agrarian reform program, a "fair general election," followed by a constituent assembly, and government efforts to bring about the cessation of the murders committed by "the extreme right and left."

THE AFT delegates voted to support a Service Employees local, 60 of whose members at the Denver Federal Building were fired after a non-union firm received the building's custodial contract on July 1. The delegates marched from the convention hall to join the picket line during a recess in their deliberations.

In other actions, delegates approved a two-step increase in per capita payments to $4 per month effective Sept. 1, 1981, and $4.40 per month effective Sept. 1, 1982, to meet the effects of inflation and expand the union's programs.

Unions, Industry Outline Plan To Preserve Rail Retirement

Railway labor and management joined in asking Congress to approve new financing arrangements for the 45-year-old railroad retirement system to safeguard it from threatened collapse.

Representatives of the two parties proposed a legislative package to the House Ways & Means Committee which would also provide limited borrowing authority to solve a temporary cash flow problem facing the retirement fund.

UNDER THE financing plan, worked out by railroad unions and carriers over the past two years, the railroads would increase their contribution under Tier II of the Railroad Retirement Act from 9.5 to 11.75 percent of a worker's taxable wage base of $22,200 during the 1981 calendar year. Employees would pay a 2 percent contribution on the same wage base, their first under Tier II.

Railroad workers' retirement benefits come from two sources, known as Tier I and Tier II. Tier I benefits are the same as social security benefits paid workers in other industries and are financed by worker and employer taxes at the same level. Tier II benefits are paid under a program financed entirely by the carriers and administered along with the Tier I program by the Railroad Retirement Board. The new legislative proposal, endorsed by two of the three board members, would in effect convert the Tier II program into an employee-employer contribution fund.

Maintenance of Way Employees President O. M. Berge, who is also chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association's pension committee, told the congressional panel that the additional taxes would generate over $500 million for the coming fiscal year and, together with certain curbs on benefits payments, make up a foreseeable shortfall in the retirement fund to keep the system solvent at least through 1991.

"Both the proposed increase in taxes and the borrowing are inseparable parts of the complete package," Berge said. "Since the future of the system as a railroad retirement pension program depends at this critical time on enactment of this complete package, we join the carriers in urging immediate enactment of the entire proposal."

Berge said the agreement between the industry and the RLEA, an organization representing 21 unions with members employed by the nation's railroads, is needed to avert the collapse of the pension fund, which he said would inevitably follow without enactment of the package. The proposal is before the House Ways & Means Committee since that panel must approve all federal tax changes.

SPEAKING FOR railroad management, Charles Hopkins, Jr., chairman of the National Railway Labor Conference, told the House panel that the proposed package would solve the fund's financial problems for the next 75 years.

The pending proposal would allow short-term loans from general revenues to tide over the railroad pension fund's liquidity position. While both the labor and management members of the retirement board support the loan proposal, Board Chairman William Adams, representing the public, expressed concern over the lending of general revenue funds for such purposes.

Friedman Appointed UAW Research Chief

Detroit—Sheldon Friedman has been named research director of the Auto Workers to succeed Howard Young, who is now director of UAW's social security department. Friedman had been a research associate with the union since 1975.

The UAW also announced that Stephen L. Schlossberg, director of government and public affairs at the union's Washington office since 1977, will return to private law practice Sept. 1. Schlossberg joined the UAW staff in 1963 and became general counsel in 1966.

Unions, Employers, Public Oppose Revival of Homework

dermine the Labor Dept.'s ability to enforce the minimum wage, overtime, child labor and health and safety standards that are so important to garment industry workers."

Amado H. Gallardo of the California AFL-CIO staff, who heads the state affiliate of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, said contractors who farm out work to be done at home avoid the cost of complying with social security and unemployment insurance laws, as well as safety and health standards, in addition to cheating on the wage-hour law.

"Yet even paying wages below the minimum is not low enough for these illegal contractors," he testified. "Very often firms report undocumented homeworkers to immigration authorities right before pay day so they can avoid paying any wages at all," Gallardo told the subcommittee.

Cornelius Wall, western regional director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, said the regulatory changes that Donovan proposed would increase violations of the wage-hour law "and make it increasingly difficult for fair employers to operate their factories and to meet unfair competition from those firms that rely on homeworkers."

The ILGWU, whose members are most directly affected by the Donovan proposal, also submitted a 66-page statement to the Dept. of Labor outlining the union's objections to lifting the homework ban.

IT CITED the complete lack of any documentation for the proposal to allow homework in the seven industries where it had been banned—women's apparel, knitted outerwear, embroidery, gloves and mittens, buttons and buckles, handkerchiefs and jewelry.

"Abolition of the ban on industrial homework will seriously erode the working standards of tens of thousands of garment and other workers and do irreparable harm to many, many small business employers and the community at large," the ILGWU stated.

Five Predecessors Denounce Donovan's Homework Plan

Five former Secretaries of Labor have joined in urging the Labor Dept. not to legalize homework in the apparel trades, as Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan proposed.

To do so, their letter warned, "would be to turn America back to the dark ages of industrial homework."

The strongly worded statement was signed by Arthur J. Goldberg, who served in the Kennedy Administration; Williard Wirtz, who served under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson; Peter Brennan, from the Nixon and Ford Administrations; John T. Dunlop, who was in President Ford's Cabinet, and Ray Marshall, who headed the department throughout the Carter Administration.

Their letter cited the "decades of sad experience" that led to the banning of industrial homework.

"Workers toted their bundles to their home, where no effective check could be made on what happened. They worked endless hours without overtime pay. They involved the whole family. . . . Safety and sanitary standards did not exist," the letter recalled.

To compete with these conditions, the letter continued, "wages had to be depressed" and "good employers had to imitate bad employers."

To legalize homework, the former Cabinet members warned, "is to invalidate every law passed in the last half-century to bring a measure of humanity to America's industrial workers."

Pacific Southwest Pilots Switch Affiliation to ALPA

San Mateo, Calif.—Pilots for Pacific Southwest Airlines voted overwhelmingly to join the Air Line Pilots Association.

In an election supervised by the National Mediation Board here, ALPA was chosen over the Southwest Flight Crew Association by a vote of 395 to 53. The latter had represented the PSA pilots since 1967.

Continuing Job Losses Cited

'Fair Trade' Policies Pressed by Kirkland

that are intended to provide relief for industries endangered by imports.

Kirkland spoke of the decline of American-flag shipping starting soon after World War II, and the subsequent decades in which imports made deep inroads in textiles, steel, shoes, autos, electronics and parts manufacture.

Now even service jobs are going abroad, following the flow of American capital, he noted.

"Millions of Americans have lost their jobs through no fault of their own as a result of trade policies. Lost jobs, devastated communities and eroded tax bases dot the U.S. landscape," he testified.

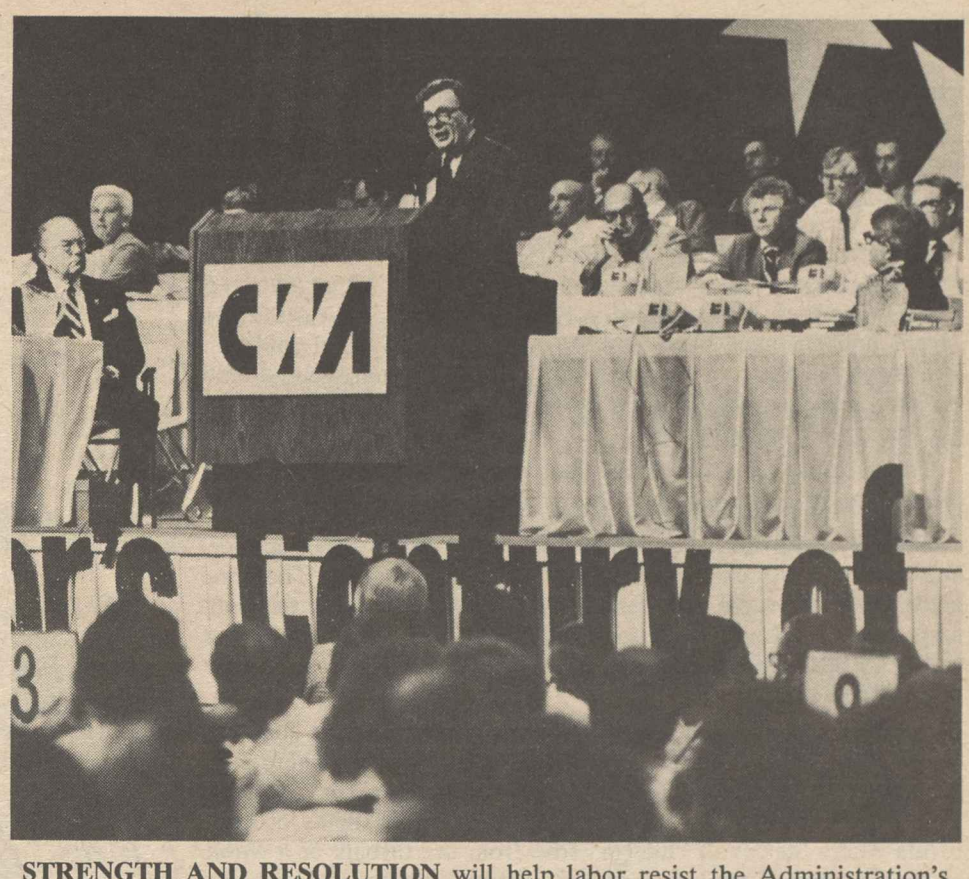
YET IN THE face of a demonstrated need for improving the trade adjustment assistance program for workers injured by exports, "the current budget would effectively end trade adjustment assistance. The paltry sum now available in the budget amounts to another broken promise to those who pay the price of trade liberalization," he charged.

Kirkland said in response to a question that the AFL-CIO had clung as long as it could to the ideals of open trade among nations. But union members were losing their jobs. "We followed our membership and reached the common sense conclusion that there must be something wrong. . . . We were exporting not goods, but the means of production."

In addition to effective enforcement of existing laws, Kirkland urged:

- Repeal of laws that give U.S. firms incentives to invest abroad "in order to take advantage of multibillion dollar tax subsidies and insurance for overseas investment. Firms that go abroad for cheaper labor should not be given subsidies to do so."
- An end to the zero tariff and import preference the United States now gives to imports of more than 2,700 products from 140 nations and territories. "These special privileges do not aid the neediest people abroad" as the law is intended to do, Kirkland testified, "and the imports injure U.S. industries and jobs."

IN RESPONSE to questions, Kirkland said zero tariff concessions should be negotiated bilaterally in terms of U.S. interests, humanitarian considerations and adherence to the health, safety and labor standards conventions that have been promulgated by the International Labor Organization but ignored by many of the nations that have ratified them.



Also, he said, "there should be some assurance that benefits of U.S. trade concessions go to the general population, not just an elite."

- Enactment of a domestic content law, such as those already in effect in most of the nations of the world which require companies to make a certain percentage of the contents of a product, such as a car or a machine, in that country. "The U.S. needs to adopt such content laws for essential industries or it will become an assembler of foreign-made parts," Kirkland insisted.

HE TERMED the "market-place" philosophy of the Reagan Administration "social Darwinism" of the type that bred the robber barons of the early years of American industrialization.

An America stripped of its industries cannot remain a world leader, Kirkland warned.

Trade decisions, he urged, must advance the goals of "a diversified industrial base with the skills and services of an advanced economy. Only a policy to create full employment and rising living standards at home will enable the United States to maintain its cooperative role as a leader in the world."

STRENGTH AND RESOLUTION will help labor resist the Administration's efforts to reverse years of social progress, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the 2,500 delegates to the Communications Workers' 43rd convention in Boston. Kirkland urged the delegates to build coalitions with labor's allies to fight damaging budget cuts and assaults on workers' protections by labor's foes.

CWA Delegates Rap Reagan On Economy, Social Security

Boston—The economic problems of the nation formed a dominant topic of debate and discussion at the 43rd annual convention of the Communications Workers here with the Reagan Administration drawing heavy criticism for mishandling the economy and seeking severe reductions in the social security program.

Calling social security a "40-year contract between American workers and the federal government," CWA delegates insisted in a resolution that there are "better, more responsible ways" to restore fiscal health to the system and eliminate waste than the proposals of the Reagan Administration.

THE CONVENTION called on President Reagan and Congress "to concentrate their efforts on finding an equitable method of financing our social security program."

CWA President Glenn E. Watts, in his opening address, set the tone for the week when he assailed the Administration's economic policies as "by and large, the economics of big business applied to government. The aim is to run a government of the corporation, by the corporation and for the corporation."

Other speakers sounded similar themes, including AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Massachusetts Senators Edward M. Kennedy and Paul Tsongas, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill and National Urban League President Vernon Jordan.

JORDAN WENT to the Bible to describe his view of the Reagan approach to domestic issues facing America's working people: "To those who have, to them shall be given. To those who have not, even that which they seem to have shall be taken away."

The ideal test of a budget, Jordan said, "should be whether it meets the needs of the nation while providing poor people with opportunities to join the mainstream. This budget fails that test."

In other actions, delegates adopted a resolution calling for more stringent penalties in criminal cases involving the use of firearms.

The delegates also spoke out strongly on the issue of sexual harassment in the workplace, supporting "the efforts of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to keep sexual harassment as a proper matter for Title VII anti-discrimination enforcement."

ON THE CLOSING day of the convention, Watts announced that CWA's Committee on the Future—established by CWA Executive Board action to visualize "what the future holds for American society, for CWA and for organized labor"—will hold its first meeting beginning July 30 in Chicago.

One member from each of the union's 12 geographic districts was elected to the committee during the convention week. These 12 rank-and-file members will have votes, while Watts was given authority to vote in the event of a tie and to serve as chairman. Other CWA officers and staff—appointed by Watts—will have seats without voting rights on the committee.

The delegates, after lengthy discussion, also placed before the committee the task of considering CWA's public image and its logo, or seal.

Continued State Role Urged In Setting Interest Rate Limits

States should be allowed to set interest rate ceilings for consumer loans and credit purchases, the AFL-CIO insisted in testimony before a Senate Banking subcommittee.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, urged rejection of two bills that would assert the principle of federal preemption so as to nullify usury laws that set interest ceilings.

ONE BILL under consideration is so drawn that it would affect only Arkansas, which for 107 years has had in its constitution a 10 percent ceiling on consumer credit charges.

Schechter noted that the people of Arkansas have repeatedly voted down attempts to raise or eliminate the ceiling.

Despite the complaints of retailers, he said, the evidence is that the 10 percent ceiling has been beneficial to the state's economy as well as to the pocketbooks of its residents. The large chains, he noted, solicit and extend credit at the 10 percent rate while advertising their goods at the same prices charged in nearby states without credit rate ceilings.

Also before the committee is a broader measure that would amend a 1980 law to make permanent federal pre-emption of interest rate ceilings on business and agricultural loans unless a state acts within three years to re-enact an interest ceiling and to nullify all consumer credit interest rate ceilings.

THE LEGISLATION would eliminate the present federal ceiling on business and farm loans, which is set by a formula tied to changes in the Federal Reserve System's discount rate.

Schechter urged that if state ceilings are to be voided, the federal government should impose an appropriate ceiling rate to keep interest "from rising to destructive levels." Further, he suggested, if the law is made permanent, states should be free to enact their own interest ceilings at any time instead of being restricted to the three years after passage of the law.

State interest ceilings have been made a scapegoat for the economy's failings, Schechter charged. In states that have eliminated ceilings, he noted, interest rates have risen rapidly—and so have business bankruptcies.

Donovan Urged to Shelve Weakening of Wage Rules

"30-percent rule" in applying the Davis-Bacon Act. That rule, retained in the Carter regulations, bases the prevailing wage for a job classification on the wage received by the largest number of workers in that class, as long as they account for at least 30 percent of all workers in the classification.

Kirkland dismissed contractor complaints about paperwork as a "euphemism to avoid compliance" with Davis-Bacon standards.

THE PENDING regulations for the Service Contract Act which strengthen the "conforming process" should also be maintained, Kirkland asserted. That process governs how the wage relationship is set between jobs with wage rates that appear in government surveys and those jobs unique to particular contractors. The Administration is considering giving employers freer rein in setting these wage rates.

Kirkland expressed concern over reports that the Administration wants to change the definition of contracts covered under the Service Contract Act to make it apply only to work defined as "principally for services."

This could amount to virtually a repeal of the law, Kirkland warned, since it would exclude over half the contracts now covered and leave thousands of workers without protection.

If the Administration's suggestions become rule, a contractor who sells the government office machines and also provides repair services would be exempt from meeting wage requirements since the principal purpose of the contract could be defined as sales rather than service.

The AFL-CIO believes, Kirkland told Donovan, "that when all sides are heard and the matters fairly weighed, you will issue the embargoed regulations without change and give them a fair trial."

Dotson Confirmed For Labor Dept. Post

The Senate confirmed by voice vote the nomination of Donald L. Dotson to be assistant secretary of labor for labor-management relations.

Dotson, 42, had been chief labor counsel of Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp., and earlier had been an attorney with Western Electric Co., Westinghouse and the National Labor Relations Board.

Several top Labor Dept. posts are still unfilled, including the undersecretary, the department's second highest position.

Unchanging Goals

WHAT WE HAVE in the AFL-CIO is not a governing body that makes rules for workers, but a working tool that workers employ for their own mutual benefit. It is a federation of autonomous unions, coordinating their efforts and moving forward on those issues on which consensus exists.

We have not succeeded in all of our aims. But we have made something more than a clearing in the wilderness. Education and leisure have been democratized in this country. Good nutrition and decent housing have been brought within the reach of millions. The dignity of the trade unionist on the job has been secured, and we have made a start toward universal health care, family security and retirement with dignity.

Those things we have done not by trampling on the rights of others, but by upholding the rights of all.

THE PAGES OF U.S. labor history are filled with sacrifice, and in some cases with the blood of American workers. The mine fields of Pennsylvania and Kentucky, the Haymarket riot, the Pullman strike, the Ludlow massacre, the "Battle of the Overpass" at Ford, all bear ample testimony to the struggle of this movement to grow and survive.

In more recent years, that struggle has continued in southern textile towns, on the concrete sidewalks of major cities where public employees, including teachers and hospital workers, struggle even for the recognition of their union, and in the fields of California where the cry of "huelga" rose from the throats of a whole new generation of the poor and the deprived, struggling to be part of a movement.

We are a movement born in struggle, and we are still prepared to struggle if, as, and when necessary, to protect our rights. And we are prepared to help others in their struggle as well. What we want for ourselves, we want for others—all others—and from the beginning we have reached out to our brothers and sisters in other lands.

Here at home, we have not the slightest intention of giving up or letting up on the unfinished task of humanizing our own society.

WE HAVE NOT the slightest doubt that in the long run our values will prevail, and that America will return to the goal of equal rights, equal justice, and equal opportunity.

We have a duty to help bring that about through reason and through a decent regard for the lessons of the past, rather than by repeating those painful experiences.

There is a lot of frustration among trade unionists around this country as we make that effort, but it is, happily, the frustration of optimists who think it is possible to change the world for the better, and are frustrated by the fact that it takes so long and isn't a steady haul.

It is, happily, the frustration of people who believe in what they are doing and know it is right, and yet are frustrated that the opposition sometimes blocks our progress.

It is, happily, a frustration manifested in the searching for new and better ways to seek our unchanging goals.

America's Allies Raise Cain Over Steep U.S. Interest Rate

By Gus Tyler

IN SWITZERLAND, a few days ago, the representatives of 24 nations charged that America's high interest rates were ruining their economies.

The American representative retorted that their low interest rates were wrecking our economy.

To most plain people, the exasperating exchange seems esoterically irrelevant. Our only experience with high interest rates takes place when we try to borrow some money, usually for a big item like a mortgage, and discover that just about nothing has risen in price as rapidly as the price of money itself.

WE HAVE a reason, a very personal reason, for being annoyed and angry. But why do big grown up nations—24 of them who are sufficiently advanced and industrialized to belong to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development—bicker so bitterly over high interest rates?

The reason is that high interest rates don't just affect us; they affect the whole world, especially the OECD nations who are generally our international allies.

The notion that high interest rates would control inflation became the prevailing principle of our economy about 1969 and has continued to dominate our business life ever since, through four administrations from Nixon down to and including Carter and Reagan. The theory was that high rates would curb borrowing and, thereby, curb the money supply, and, thereby, hold down prices.

THERE IS GOOD, sound evidence to prove that this mumbo-jumbo is a menacing myth and that it is counterproductive even if the United States were able to seal off its economy from the rest of the world. But in a world where currencies (money supplies) flow across national boundaries, the high interest rate theory is as effective as a sieve carrying water.

What happens is that money in other countries flows into the United States to take advantage of our high interest rates. The result is double: it increases our money supply, which is not what we intended to do; it decreases the money supply (the capital resources) of other countries, which is something that they don't want, because they need that money to provide growth and jobs in their economies.

So the other nations of the OECD complain. As a result of U.S. policy, said Claude Cheysson of France, "employment is falling everywhere, trade is suffering, and there is no industrial investment." In short, Europe is anemic from a loss of blood (capital) to the United States.

The U.S. Under Secretary of State for Economic Affairs, Myer Rashish, countercharged that the Europeans just lacked the political courage to bite the bullet in the macho manner of our own President Reagan. He wants them to do as we are doing: jack up the interest rates.

BUT IF THEY do—which they won't as they face the threat of their present 23.5 million jobless rising to 28 million by the end of 1982—they would reverse the money flow and begin to drain America of the capital we allegedly need to sorely improve and expand our own economy.

So to strengthen the dollar we will have to raise interest rates again and Europe will have to follow suit in an ever escalating war of economies where prices and unemployment both continue to rise along with political tempers domestically and internationally.

In short, the high interest rates that have been bad for us at home are now making for bad blood between the United States and our allies in other lands.

U.S. Jobs, Standards at Stake

Updated Trade Policy Needed To Counter Foreign Barriers

The following is from testimony by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at Senate hearings on foreign trade issues, July 13, 1981.

THE UNITED STATES needs a modern trade policy. As the United States trades with more than 150 nations and territories, imports and exports of products will be worth more than one-half trillion dollars this year. This trade will have a substantial impact on jobs, technology, investment and the industrial destiny of this nation.

Policies to deal with the price to our nation as well as the benefits of this enormous trade expansion should be restructured in a comprehensive, realistic and fair manner. It is time for this change.

The AFL-CIO has heard the explanations for trade policy come full circle since World War II. As U.S. seamen watched the shipping industry decline and their jobs go to foreign flags, they were told that the United States is not a service nation but a manufacturing nation and that exports of manufactures create jobs. However, in the three postwar decades, various types of manufactures went into deficit: textiles, steel, shoes, autos, electronics and some kinds of machinery.

EACH TIME, exports of a higher technology product was given as the "answer." But the lost steel plants in Pennsylvania, autos in New Jersey, railroad parts in California, shoes and machinery in Missouri, and electronics, glass, rubber and aluminum nationwide left expensive scars. Increasingly, huge imports of parts were a major factor even in aircraft and computer sales.

The AFL-CIO believes the United States must be a diversified manufacturing, agricultural and service economy, with the full complement of technological industries. Anything less is a failure to develop the resources and industries this nation can provide for full employment and rising living standards. Trade is part of that goal—not the other way around.

A FAIR TRADE policy can help build that goal. A policy of government abdication of responsibility in the name of free trade can make the losses from trade much higher than the gains for most Americans.

A fair U.S. trade policy would:

● Provide a full account of what happens in the real world, a world where free trade does not exist. Other nations in the world do not apologize for pursuing their national interest. Yet the United States is under constant assault when suggestions are made to move in the U.S. national interest.

● Enforce U.S. laws and international agreements against unfair trade practices so as to allow U.S. producers and workers a chance to improve industries impacted by trade. Procedures that now inhibit appropriate responses should be simplified.

● Monitor imports and exports and their impact on the U.S. economy. Such detailed monitoring is required now, but it does not exist. Without such monitoring, industries and workers now injured by imports are not able to make their case and solutions are not provided.

● Achieve reciprocity. Where other nations bar U.S. products through one means or another, the opportunity to enforce U.S. laws to gain access should be encouraged to even out the burdens in the world. Equivalent access to foreign markets is key.

● End the incentives U.S. firms now have to invest abroad in order to take advantage of multi-billion dollar tax subsidies and insurance for overseas investment. Firms that go abroad for cheaper labor should not be given subsidies to do so. These subsidies and pressures for expansion or relocation abroad should be repealed.

● Repeal counterproductive laws. For example, the United States now grants zero tariffs or preferences for imports of more than 2,700 products from 140 nations and territories. These special privileges, called the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP), do not aid the neediest people abroad, and the imports injure U.S. industries and jobs. This GSP should be repealed. At a bare minimum, Congress and the Administration should remove import-sensitive products from the list, guarantee that only the neediest countries receive the benefits, and exclude communist economies.

● Establish national security policy goals that provide not only an adequate defense but also a fully employed, strong economy. Only a strong United States that has the means to feed, house, clothe and transport its population can provide adequate national security.

● Provide realistic adjustment assistance for those injured by trade. The cost to the nation of losing its pool of skills is severe. Millions of Americans have lost their jobs through no fault of their own as a result of trade policies. Lost jobs, devastated communities and eroded tax bases dot the U.S. landscape. Yet these losses are not even measured, much less corrected.

DISCUSSIONS OF world trade barriers in Washington in 1981 lead the uninformed observer to believe the United States has many barriers to trade and the world has very few. The facts are the reverse. The world's economies have planning, import regulations of all kinds, export requirements and export subsidies, as well as requirements to produce within their borders. No such protection exists for U.S. industry, which only can move abroad and/or become importers.

Attempts to carry out international agreements or other pursuits of U.S. rights are regarded as protectionism—but little attention is paid to actions of other nations against the United States and to constant barriers to U.S. exports. That is not fair.

Unmet Demand Mounts

Continued Slump in Housing Tied to Tight Money Policies

THE SLUMP THAT has held housing construction to near-recession levels since the mid-Seventies deepened in late spring, and there is little hope for substantial recovery under the Administration's tight money and high interest rate policies, John S. Rogers, secretary of the Carpenters, declared on Labor News Conference.

The lag of new housing starts is so bad that it would now take nearly three times the current 1.3 million annual rate "just to meet the current demand," Rogers said. He said an "aggressive government policy" of housing finance that "takes a share of the money out of the monopoly game" could meet the nation's housing needs. He suggested that the Federal Reserve Board could, for example, require that a small percentage of bank funds be retained for only low-interest mortgages.

Rogers agreed that negotiated pension funds are a good source of housing funds, but noted that their potential is limited by legal fiduciary obligations that loans be made at current market rates, and also by the reality that most of the retirement plans are dominated by management trustees.

He pointed out that long-standing AFL-CIO policy encourages unions to "set aside certain portions of their portfolios for mortgages," and that the Carpenters have committed some 6 percent of their total portfolio for such purposes.

TURNING TO the conservatives' attack on the Davis-Bacon Act, Rogers said the Administration's approach is a serious threat to an important "stabilizing factor" in a "very volatile industry." He said repeal or weakening of the act could also do serious damage to the apprenticeship programs that are the best assurance that "we're building the master craftsmen of the 21st Century."

Rogers said the Carpenters union, which is now celebrating its centennial year, has played a key role in the battles for many of the social and economic programs that the Administration is now dismantling and has pledged its full support to the AFL-CIO Solidarity Day protest in Washington, Sept. 19.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

EMBOLDENED by a conservative political climate, reactionary forces in the land have launched an all-out drive to enact a singularly vicious piece of legislation.

Employing scare language conjuring up a specter of union-inspired violence, the National Right to Work Committee is spearheading a campaign to make strike-related "violence," or the threat of such violence, a federal crime.

This means that a striking worker involved in a picketline scuffle, or whose words or gestures were perceived as threatening, could be hauled into court by federal prosecutors, fined $10,000 and handed a 20-year prison sentence.

TO THIS END, Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), who chairs the Senate Judiciary Committee, has introduced a bill to amend a 1946 federal anti-extortion law known as the Hobbs Act. Thurmond's amendment would extend the act and its penalties to include labor disputes.

The Thurmond amendment, which 12 conservative Senate Republicans have co-sponsored, would overturn a 1973 Supreme Court ruling that union activities do not fall under the Hobbs Act. It was introduced in the House by Rep. J. Kenneth Robinson (R-Va.) with 32 GOP and five Democratic co-sponsors.

To drum up public and congressional support for the Hobbs amendment, the Right to Work Committee has pulled out all the stops.

In a mass mailing to some 2 million potential contributors to its ultra-conservative cause, the committee charges that "union terrorism" is on the rise and that, as a result of this terrorism, "hundreds of thousands of America's working men and women are prisoners of the pick-handle closed shop."

In addition, the right-wing committee has started a new publication called "Violence Task Force Report—A Monthly Probe Into Compulsory Unionism Violence."

To top it off, the committee is trying to buy TV time for its new 30 minute scare film—"The Specter of Violence."

To rebut the distortions, the AFL-CIO has produced a six-minute film which any TV station airing the Right to Work Committee film will be asked to broadcast under the federal Fairness Doctrine.

PROPONENTS OF the Hobbs Act amendment sometimes try to conceal their aims by claiming it would apply to employers as well as employees. But it wouldn't work that way since extortion, as prohibited in the Hobbs Act, means taking something material from someone else. Since the worker, not the employer, is trying to gain something material by striking, the employer in effect would be exempt from the amendment.

As a labor expert on legislation sees it, "if an employer or his agent went out to the picket line and threw a punch, he would be subject to state and local prosecution, whereas an employee who hit back would be subject to federal prosecution and far greater penalties."

The amendment would apply not only to actual violence but to "what somebody perceives to be a threat on the other end," the labor expert noted. "If someone says he was threatened by what somebody said or by the way he held his picket sign, we have an instance which might be subject to prosecution."

EXISTING state and local laws provide adequate sanctions against violence, whether on the picket line or the ball field.

Furthermore, the pro-amendment scare propaganda ignores the fact that strike-related violence is so rare that the FBI's comprehensive statistics on crime don't even include a category for it.

By imposing an unnecessary and slanted federal role on top of local law enforcement, Hobbs amendment proponents aim to put a damper on strikes and strikers.

LITTLE HOPE is seen for significant recovery from the slump that has held the housing industry to near-recession levels since the mid-Seventies as long as the Administration pursues its tight-money and high-interest rate policies, Carpenters Sec. John S. Rogers, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Jerome Cahill of the New York Daily News. The AFL-CIO public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

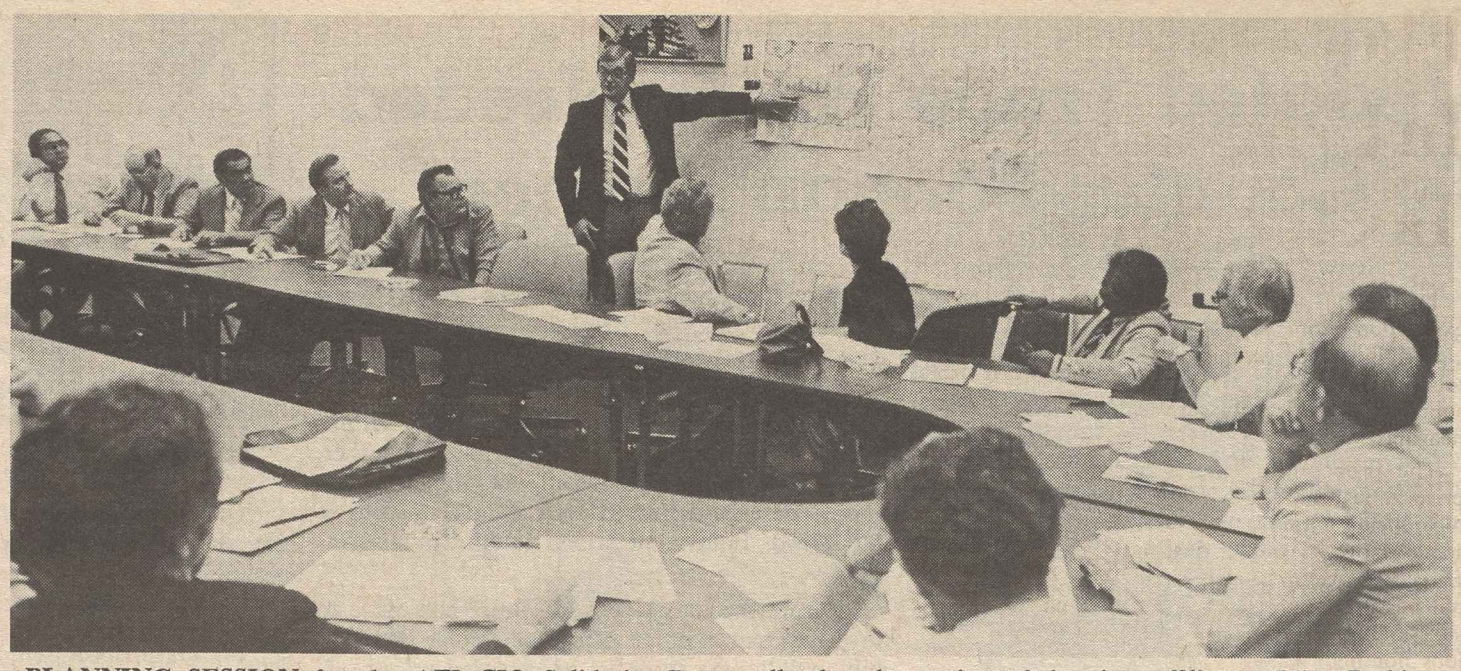
stewards to handle union business.

Two smaller unions, the Laborers' Mail Handlers division and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, are bargaining jointly at a second location.

Biller told newsmen following the APWU/NALC Joint Bargaining Committee's July 9 wage proposal presentation that "we can get an agreement by July 20 if management picks up the pace immediately and enters into good-faith bargaining. . . . Such a commitment would be, however, a complete reversal of everything they have shown up to this time."



MEANWHILE, Bolger threatened to fire any postal worker who strikes or slows mail deliveries. The threat came in an insert accompanying employees' July 17 paychecks.

The union's economic proposals are based on an analysis by independent Washington consultant Joel Popkin, a former senior staff economist for the Council of Economic Advisers in the Nixon and Ford Administrations. They call for a first-year wage increase of 5 percent, plus a 2.7 percent "catch-up" raise to make up for inflationary losses over the period of the old contract, and 5 percent general wage boosts in each of the other two years of the contract.

IN ADDITION, the unions are seeking an improved COLA formula that would provide a 1-cent increase in hourly wages for each quarter-point increase in the federal government's consumer price index. The existing agreement provides for a 1-cent wage increase for each four-tenths of a point rise in the CPI. The unions estimate that the new formula would recover about 88 percent of inflationary price increases, compared to about 65 percent under current agreements.

"We've offered the Postal Service a reasonable, well-supported wage proposal which recognizes worker needs, increased worker productivity, and the concerns of the American people," Sombrotto told the National Press Club audience.

Biller noted that the USPS's "stonewalling" tactics did not develop overnight. He reviewed the bargaining history that saw talks stalled seven weeks this spring while Bolger unsuccessfully tried to get the USPS bargaining unit redefined.

Auto Unions in 18 Countries Map General Motors Goals

Dearborn, Mich.—Trade union leaders representing General Motors Corp. workers in 18 countries agreed to closer international ties to counter the growing worldwide integration of big automakers such as GM.

"Because our wages and working conditions still vary considerably from country to country, while our actual jobs are the same, we feel that growing international integration of car and truck production—the so-called 'world car' and 'world truck'—is acting partly as a spur binding us closer together," they said in a resolution adopted at a two-day meeting here organized by the International Metalworkers' Federation.

THE 40 FOREIGN and 250 U.S. delegates to the conference pledged to work jointly and separately toward five goals: "substantial" reductions of worktime, less overtime and an end to all compulsory overtime, earlier retirement with no reductions in benefits, a uniform worldwide health and safety code, and the elevation of wages and benefits "to the highest level in the GM empire."

The world's largest automobile manufacturer, General Motors last year reported a loss of $762.5 million and laid off 101,000 workers. An IMF report prepared for the conference noted that "from a position of market dominance and ability to set prices, GM has descended to asking favors from its constituents and employees."

In response to the company's call for help from labor, the IMF resolution suggested that GM first put an end to any opposition to union organizing anywhere, recognize its workers' rights to organize, strike, and have shop stewards, retrain workers idled by new technology or plant closings, provide certain financial disclosures to labor, and offer a role in management for unions seeking it.

GM AND THE world auto industry in general are in the middle of a "giant shakeout" with deep impact on the present and future lives of workers that poses severe threats to many of the gains won by organized workers, the IMF said.

In addition to the huge number of layoffs, hundreds of thousands of other workers have gone on short hours, it noted.

"More layoffs seem imminent unless we urgently exercise our union power," the resolution warned.

UAW PRESIDENT Douglas Fraser, in an address to the meeting, said GM "has no loyalty to any nation or any flag. Its only loyalty is to profits." Emphasizing the need for a more international role for unions bargaining with GM and other major auto firms, Fraser declared:

"Unless we unite, workers from one country will be played against workers of another country as employers seek the nation with the lowest wage. To our Japanese brothers, I say: your workers are productive, intelligent, and skilled. They deserve more for what they produce."

Nations that think they can attract industry through low wages live in a fool's paradise, Fraser warned.

"WHAT HAPPENED after World War II is the best example of that," he said "The textile manufacturers left the U.S. for Japan to take advantage of low wages there, but they didn't stay in Japan.

"As wages in Japan rose, they went to Taiwan, Hong Kong, and Malaysia. The same thing could happen with the auto industry. We will have to bargain from an international point of view."

Rudolph Faupl Dies, Former Delegate to ILO

Fairfield, Calif—Rudolph J. Faupl, a former U.S. worker delegate to the International Labor Organization and retired international affairs representative of the Machinists, died here July 9 after a heart attack. He was 73.

Faupl served on the ILO's Governing Body as head of the U.S. worker delegation from 1958 through 1972. He also had been the IAM's representative to the International Metalworkers and the International Transport Workers federations from the late 1940s until his retirement in 1972.

In a message to Faupl's wife, Viola, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said that he was privileged "to have known Rudy and to have benefited from his wisdom and experience. His contributions to the international labor movement, and to the friendly relationships between the AFL-CIO and the labor movement in other countries are invaluable."

After coming to the United States from his native Hungary at age 15, Faupl became a machinist in Milwaukee. During the 1930s he served as an organizer for the Wisconsin federation of labor. He was a member of the War Labor Board during the early 1940s and became a grand lodge representative with the IAM in 1945.

In addition to his wife, Faupl is survived by two daughters and seven grandchildren. Services were held July 13 in Fairfield.

San Jose Accord Called Key Step To Wage Parity

San Jose, Calif.—Striking members of State, County & Municipal Employees Local 101 returned to work after overwhelmingly approving an agreement that both sides called a major step toward wage parity between men and women city workers.

The two-year pact, ratified by a vote of 295 to 27, calls for $1.5 million to help correct pay disparities between male and female employees. The contract covers 2,000 workers—the majority of them women—represented by AFSCME.

THE STRIKE for comparable pay began at 12:01 a.m., July 5. At the time the walkout began, the union sought a $3.2 million commitment over four years to correct inequities revealed in a city study requested by AFSCME leaders. The survey found that pay for jobs predominantly staffed by females ranged from 2 to 10 percent less than the overall average for the city.

"The workers feel every day spent on strike was worth the sacrifice," Local 101 President Mike Ferraro said of the nine-day walkout. City Manager Francis Fox said the agreement "resolves the major issues" in the dispute.

The settlement provides for a 7.5 percent general wage increase this year and an 8 percent boost next year.

IUD Names Turner Legislative Director

Brian Turner has been appointed legislative director of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., to succeed Marvin Caplan, who has retired after 18 years with the department.

Turner has been executive assistant to IUD President Howard D. Samuel and the department's economic policy director. He first joined the IUD staff in 1974 and at the start of the Carter Administration served as assistant to Samuel, who then was Deputy Under Secretary of Labor for International Affairs.

Caplan, a former newspaper reporter, joined the IUD staff in 1963 as a legislative representative and served during much of his tenure as director of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

Expansion of Merchant Fleet Called Vital for Naval Sealift

The United States could increase its naval support capabilities by turning to the private-sector merchant marine, Seafarers President Frank Drozak told the House Committee on Merchant Marine & Fisheries.

Drozak, who heads the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., said that long-term charters of 20 years or more with the U.S. Navy would provide the vessels and manpower needed to support the Military Sealift Command. The United States could achieve increased naval sealift at reduced costs by offering a build-and-charter program to the maritime industry, he said.

ALL THE EXPERTS agree that the United States currently does not have what is needed to supply and back up successfully its military forces overseas in the event of a major war, Drozak observed.

"Over the past couple of years," he said, "we have heard one expert after another tell Congress about the absolute importance of sealift to our total defense. We have also heard them say that the way to solve the problem is to increase the number of merchant vessels available to the armed forces. For the most part, they are in agreement that this means strengthening the private-sector merchant fleet."

U.S. inaction over the past 30 years has seen a drastic decline in the merchant marine in direct contrast to the Soviet Union, which has an integrated maritime policy under the direction of Soviet naval authorities, Drozak pointed out.

"Our Navy bureaucrats constantly raise the question of crew control of merchant vessels," he said. "History has proven that U.S. merchant mariners have honored their duty and performed it well in every national crisis—World War II, Korea, and Vietnam. The question of crew loyalty is non-existent with U.S. crews manning U.S. support vessels.

"IF WE ARE to be serious, then a strong recommendation ought to come from this committee for a meaningful blueprint for cooperation. And, most importantly, a directive should go to the Navy instructing it to continue its operations to its essential priorities and leave martime functions to the private sector."

During Vietnam, Drozak noted, the Seafarers met the nation's needs for trained seamen at its Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship at Piney Point, Md. The school is ready and waiting to train seafarers for any purpose the Navy would regard as necessary to meet its requirements to private industry, he said.

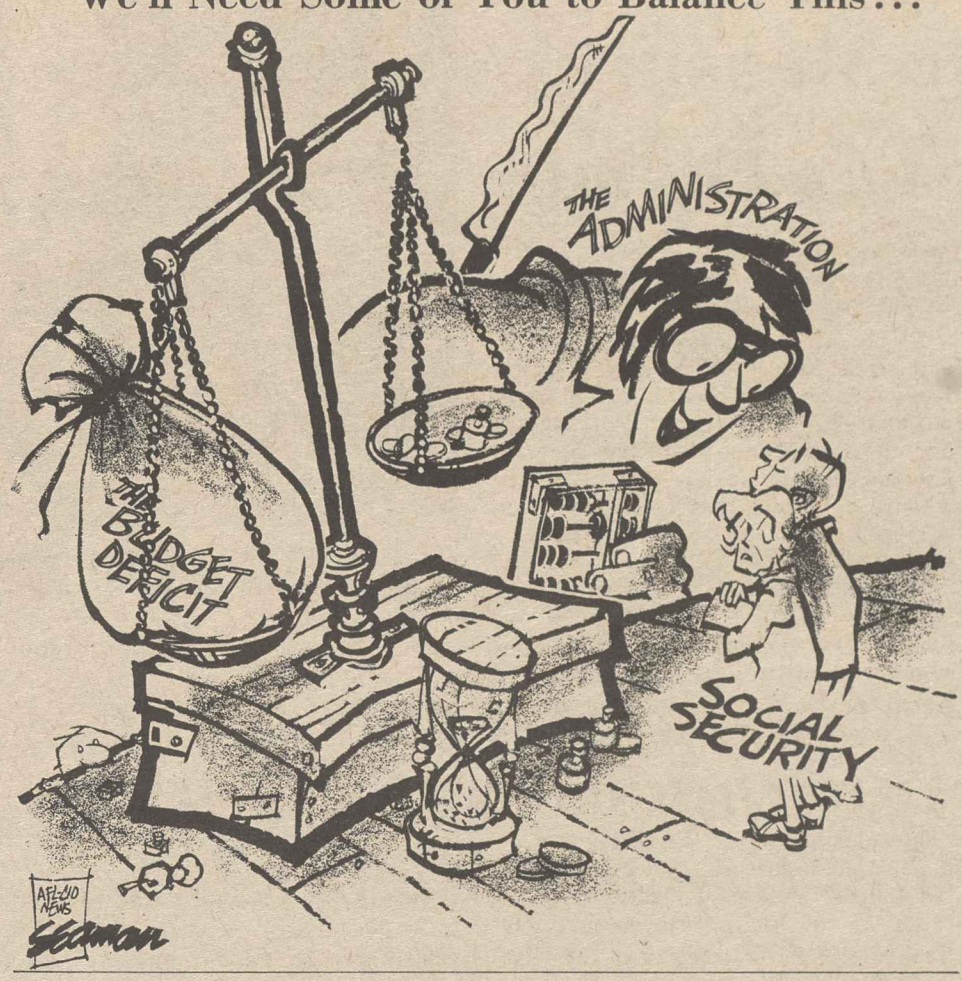
Flaws Cited In Urban Zone Tax Incentives

Legislation to give tax windfalls and exemption from regulations to firms locating in impoverished urban areas has too many flaws to merit the AFL-CIO's support, the federation testified at Senate hearings.

The proposal to set up "urban enterprise zones" has been touted as a means of inducing employers to locate in blighted sections of cities. But Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor stressed that the bill being considered by a Senate Finance subcommittee "would not create additional jobs nor help solve urban problems."

ITS MAJOR tax provision—to allow an enterprise zone business to deduct 50 percent of gross receipts from taxable income—"could have the effect of wiping out any federal income tax liability and could generate artificial losses which could be washed out against other incomes," Cantor pointed out.

Its principal beneficiaries, he said, would be profitable firms, and the device would be open to bookkeeping manipulations to avoid taxes on income from other sources.



Cantor also questioned whether provisions in the bill for "simplification" of government requirements for firms in the zones means that building codes, safety and health regulations and labor standards will be bypassed.

He told the panel that the AFL-CIO remains aware and concerned about the special development needs of inner cities, but believes programs should be better targeted to provide expanded job opportunities rather than merely pay employers to shift from one place to another.

THE AFL-CIO proposal in this area, he testified, is based on the concept of a reindustrialization program that would use business tax cuts as one means of assisting industries, areas and people whose needs are greatest.

Sen. John H. Chafee (R-R.I.), chairman of the subcommittee holding hearings on the measure, sponsored the bill in the Senate along with Sen. Rudy Boschwitz (R-Minn.). House co-sponsors are Rep. Jack F. Kemp (R-N.Y.) and Robert Garcia (D-N.Y.). In a letter to Chafee, Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldridge said the Reagan Administration "supports the thrust of the bill," but has not taken a position on its specifics.

'We'll Need Some of You to Balance This...'

Retreat on Clean Air Rules Would Sap Industrial Areas

Any relaxation of federal air quality standards inevitably would increase competition among pollution-free areas to attract industry from the Northeast and central states and contribute further to the decline of these areas, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers warned.

He said returning controls to the individual states would encourage "blackmail tactics" by big corporations to force competition between states and a lowering of air quality standards to gain or preserve jobs.

SHEINKMAN TOLD the Senate Committee on Environment & Public Works, chaired by Sen. Robert T. Stafford (R-Vt.), that "the end result from such tactics will mean that each state will feel impelled to destroy environmental controls as inducements to these corporations."

The federal Clean Air Act will expire on Sept. 31 unless Congress renews it.

American workers, and all citizens, need continuing federal standards, Sheinkman declared.

Even if the heavily industrialized areas of the country weaken their controls and allow businesses to pollute, the economy of those regions will not be significantly altered, Sheinkman said.

"THE OUTMIGRATION will continue," he said. "Top and middle management will be lured away to the pristine areas because they are clean. Management personnel and their families do not want to live in polluted areas. They have no desire for an early death from lung cancer.

"Soon they will move their plants to the Southeast and Southwest to escape the very pollution their modern processes created."

Sheinkman said that retention of federal standards would be accompanied by certain costs, but "these costs are not as heavy as some corporations would have you or the public believe."

RECENT SURVEYS indicate that pollution controls average about $140 per person a year in increased manufacturing costs, he noted. Against this he cited an analysis estimating the direct costs of treating lung disease at $19 billion a year and the indirect costs represented by lost productivity at $48 billion.

Sheinkman reminded the committee that the nation's greatest rivals in international trade—Japan and West Germany—have pollution controls as strict as or stricter than those in the United States and seem to have no trouble in competing in the world market.

Pilots Press Fight to Save Airline Safety, Labor Codes

The Air Line Pilots have urged Congress to preserve the labor protection provisions of the 1978 Airline Deregulation Act and to turn over to the National Transportation Safety Board the authority now held by the Civil Aeronautics Board to determine whether new airlines are fit to serve the public.

Under the 1978 law, the CAB is to be abolished by Jan. 1, 1985. The Senate Aviation Subcommittee, however, is hearing various proposals by the Administration and the agency itself, among others, to phase out the board as early as next year.

ALTHOUGH IT endorses an early CAB "sunset," the ALPA said, it wants the authority to determine airline fitness transferred to the NTSB.

"Congress recognized the possibility that deregulation might enable new carriers with questionable safety capabilities to serve the public," the ALPA said in testimony before the Senate panel. "In making this charge to the board, Congress also tacitly recognized that the Federal Aviation Agency's licensing procedures for air carriers were not enough to assure the required level of safety.

"With the demise of the CAB, the safety of the traveling public requires that the critical tests of carrier finess be continued."

THE ALPA said it was "shocked and dismayed" at the Administration's proposal to abolish the employee protection program written into the 1978 deregulation statute. Most airline labor groups had opposed deregulation and grudgingly accepted it only after protection provisions had been agreed to, the union pointed out.

Even the current program, which offers only modest protection to a limited group of employees, has been stalled by the industry, ALPA said. To date, not one employee has received benefits of any kind under the program, it noted.

Herbert Levine Heads Histadrut Council

New York—Herbert A. Levine, former director of Rutgers University's Labor Education Center, has been named national director of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut.

He fills the post that has been vacant since Greg Bardacke retired in 1978. The council has 49 local organizations in the United States and Canada to promote American labor's relations with Histadrut, the Israeli labor federation.

Levine is a recognized authority on labor education. He established a labor studies program at Rutgers' University College in 1967 and founded the university's labor studies department in 1973.

High Interest Ups U.S. Cost By $17 Billion

has forced the Administration to revise upward its estimates of federal spending by $6.1 billion for fiscal year 1981 and by $9.6 billion for fiscal 1982. The OMB now estimates that government expenditures will total $661.2 billion this fiscal year and $704.8 billion in fiscal 1982.

Commenting on the revised economic forecast, Chairman James Jones (D-Okla.) of the House Budget Committee said that the Administration had finally brought its 1981 figures in line with what his panel had been predicting since last April. But he said that the Administration's 1982 projections were still "dangerously misleading."

"THEY HAVE not learned to separate what they wish would happen from what is likely to happen, and the burden of the resulting errors will fall on the American people," Jones said.

The budget review notes that the Federal Reserve Board's high-interest rate policies—encouraged by the Reagan Administration—affect the budget through higher costs for the overall national debt, guaranteed student loans, federal housing programs, and other borrowing. Interest on three-month Treasury bills is expected to average 13.6 percent for the year, compared with 11.5 percent last year.

The midyear budget analysis presented a more optimistic view of the nation's inflation problems. Declines in prices of food and nonfood commodities, including the price of oil, are contributing to "the more hopeful outlook for inflation," the OMB report said.

THE ADMINISTRATION now projects a 9.9 percent average rise in consumer prices for 1981, compared to its 11.1 percent estimate in March, and a 7-percent average annual rate next year. In 1980, inflation averaged 13.5 percent.

The most recent data also suggest a marked slowing in the growth of personal income and final demand, while the rate of increase of industrial production continues to weaken from last fall.

The growth of nonfarm employment has shown a declining trend since January, and the most recent annual rate of housing starts has fallen to 1.1 million units, 20 percent below the peak reached last November, the report noted.

OMB DIRECTOR David A. Stockman told reporters at a briefing on the budget review that the study was published as required by law, that it contained no policy changes, and was "entirely a technical document."

At the same briefing, Chairman Murray L. Weidenbaum of the President's Council of Economic Advisers characterized the nation's economy as "spongy," and acknowledged that there could be two consecutive quarters of no growth—or even decline—in total business activity this year.

Weidenbaum said that any upturn in the economy might not occur until 1982, although the official forecast calls for an upturn in the fourth quarter of this year.

AFGE Wins Nationwide Vote Among Education Dept. Staff

The Government Employees won a two-year battle to become the exclusive nationwide representative of U.S. Dept. of Education employees. In a run-off election wrapped up July 13, AFGE beat back a challenge by the unaffiliated National Treasury Employees Union by a vote of 1,281 to 1,083.

The election brings the 5,000 employees in the Education Dept.'s headquarters and 10 regional offices into a single bargaining unit.

The AFGE had already outpolled NTEU by 958 to 942 in an election in May, but 63 votes for "no union" denied the AFL-CIO affiliate the majority needed to win, thus forcing the run-off election.

The AFGE had sought bargaining rights for the Education Dept. employees in 1979 when Congress voted to give the department separate agency status. It had been part of what was then the Dept. of Health, Education & Welfare, and the union based its request for exclusive nationwide recognition on the fact that it already represented most HEW education employees.

The Federal Labor Relations Authority ruled that certain provisions of the Civil Service Reform Act required that the Education Dept. workers be considered new employees under new conditions, requiring AFGE to petition for the election.

Senate Shifts Focus

Rights, Labor Measures Sidelined for Tax Debate

The Senate put off action on controversial civil rights and trade union issues to take up the Reagan Administration's multi-year tax cut package—a labor-opposed measure heavily tilted to reducing taxes paid by corporations and the wealthiest individuals.

Put on the back burner—possibly until after the August recess of Congress—is a military construction bill reported by the Senate Armed Services Committee. It would exempt military construction contracts from the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires payment of prevailing wages and benefits on federally funded construction.

LABOR SUPPORTERS in the Senate had indicated such a proposal would call for "extended debate," the Senate euphemism for a filibuster.

A low-keyed filibuster on a school busing issue did result in the Senate leadership's decision to set aside a Dept. of Justice authorization bill until after the tax legislation is passed.

While Congress has regularly expressed its distaste for busing as a means of overcoming racial imbalance and the effects of past segregation, it has so far stopped short of interfering with court actions based on the Constitution, or on Justice Dept. enforcement of constitutional rights.

THE FILIBUSTER was aimed at an amendment that would bar federal courts from ordering a student assigned or bused beyond the nearest school and would allow the Justice Dept. to file suits on behalf of students they believe have been subjected to court-ordered busing in violation of the restriction.

A letter to senators from AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said the proposal "attempts to deny the federal judiciary its appointed role in enforcing the Constitution" and in effect would let Congress overrule Supreme Court constitutional decisions by a majority vote.

Six Democratic and six Republican senators joined in a letter to their colleagues opposing the amendment. Two attempts to invoke cloture failed, and the bill was set aside temporarily. But the second vote produced 54 senators for closing debate, just six short of the 60 votes needed under Senate rules. A third try is expected soon after the tax bill is off the Senate floor.

A SENATE LABOR subcommittee has approved two bills opposed by the AFL-CIO, but the full Labor & Human Resources Committee has not yet taken them up.

One measure would largely repeal the eight-hour-day provisions that are written into laws governing federal procurement, service and construction contracts. At present, contractors must pay overtime after eight hours in one day. The subcommittee bill would allow straight-time pay either for up to 10 hours a day on a four-day, 40-hour workweek, or for nine hours a day for four days in a week with four hours of work on the fifth day.

The other union-opposed measure awaiting full committee action would transfer coverage of sand, gravel, clay and stone mining from the more stringent standards of the Mine Safety & Health Administration—which includes mandatory inspections and safety training—to the general jurisdiction of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration.

EVEN AS the Senate was starting debate on the Reagan tax cut bill, the largest House-Senate conference in congressional history was getting under way on the budget reconciliation bill—the program cuts and changes in law that have been adopted to assure that federal spending does not exceed the budget ceiling voted by Congress.

Actually, more than 40 conference subcommittees will deal with differences between the House and Senate versions affecting legislation coming under the jurisdiction of the various committees.

While the Administration dictated much of the contents of both the House and Senate bills, some of the differences affected programs of importance to labor generally or to unions with special concerns. Unemployment insurance, the future of the Conrail system, funding for Medicaid and the future of the low-income weatherization program are among the scores of issues to be resolved.

THE TAX BILL debate in the Senate found the Democratic minority divided on what changes, if any, to seek in the Administration bill. The most closely contested issue, in fact, appeared to be an amendment supported by a majority of the Senate Finance Committee that would vastly increase future revenue loss to the government by indexing tax brackets to the inflation rate.

The AFL-CIO asked senators to oppose that amendment because it would perpetuate existing inequities and commit the government to a tax cut each year—even beyond the three years of tax cuts provided by the Senate bill. "Such a measure would seriously undermine any future efforts to achieve tax justice," the AFL-CIO said.

THE HOUSE Ways & Means Committee, meanwhile, continued to shape a "Democratic" tax bill that would be even more generous to business interests than the Administration plan but would tilt individual tax cuts somewhat more to middle-income and lower-income households.

In one controversial action, the House committee voted to allow professional commodity speculators to continue to benefit from a complex tax avoidance device called a "straddle" involving the juggling of contracts to buy and sell various commodities. That's a loophole that the Reagan Administration, as well as labor, had urged Congress to close.

SOCIAL SECURITY CUTS proposed by the Reagan Administration are unjustified and unnecessary, the AFL-CIO testified at Senate hearings. Social Security Director Bert Seidman presents the AFL-CIO funding proposal. At left is Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten.

Moves to Cut Social Security Pose Union Bargaining Issues

The Reagan Administration's proposals for major cutbacks in social security protections would require renegotiation of collective bargaining agreements covering large groups of workers, union representatives testified at Senate hearings.

Auto Workers Legislative Director Dick Warden cited UAW contracts providing benefit levels keyed to assumptions of social security retirement income at various ages. Thus, an early retirement option commonly would provide a higher contribution from a company fund before a worker is eligible for social security payments.

SIMILAR problems would face many public sector bargaining units, the State, County & Municipal Employees testified. AFSCME Legislative Director Josiah Beeman said many public retirement systems are based on a combination of social security and supplemental benefits.

Both unions, in statements to a Senate Finance subcommittee, stressed labor's support for the injection of general revenues into the social security system and the flexibility of inter-fund borrowing among the various trust funds so that a temporary surplus in one fund could be used to offset a short-term deficit in another.

THEY ENDORSED, as has the AFL-CIO, a proposal to use general revenue funds to pay half of the Medicare portion of the social security payroll tax, thus allowing the balance of the tax to be shifted to replenish the basic old age and survivors insurance fund.

Warden and Beeman also stressed, as had AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman at the same hearings, that cutbacks in benefits are not necessary to maintain the solvency of the system, that the "crisis" has been deliberately exaggerated by the Administration, and that the proposed changes have spread uncertainty about the reliability of social security benefit commitments.

Message to SOHYO Stresses Cooperation

No nation can hope to solve its own economic problems by itself, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkand said in a message to the 63rd annual convention of SOHYO, the General Council of Trade Unions of Japan. Coordinated policies and actions with other countries are necessary, he added.

The AFL-CIO has joined with other free labor movements in countries of the 23-nation Organzation for Economic Cooperation & Development in presenting an agreed labor position on international economic questions to the heads of state at the summit meeting scheduled in Ottawa on July 20, Kirkland noted.

He said SOHYO has an opportunity "to contribute to the solidarity of the international free labor movement by joining with all free trade unions to promote in all countries freedom of association as the cornerstone of those human rights to which all workers are entitled."

Protests Rejected on Virginia OSHA Plan

Labor and local government petitions to shelve Virginia's job safety and health plan in favor of federal enforcement were rebuffed by Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter as the Reagan Administration signed an agreement permitting the state plan to remain in effect.

The AFL-CIO had sought to have the state plan vacated since its inception in the early 1970s on the grounds that it is riddled with deficiencies, leaving workers in Virginia poorly protected from occupational hazards.

AUCHTER NOTIFIED the current petitioners—the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, the Fairfax County Board of Supervisors, the Virginia AFL-CIO and the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.—that their objections to the plan were denied after the agreement was reached with state officials.

This is the second challenge to a state plan to be withdrawn by Auchter since he took over as head of Occupational Safety & Health Administration. On Mar. 27, Auchter dismissed petitions against the Indiana state plan, which former OSHA Director Eula Bingham charged had a "consistent pattern of poor performance in critical program areas."

The AFL-CIO, the Steelworkers and the Indiana AFL-CIO are appealing Auchter's decision in that case and a similar appeal is contemplated in the Virginia case.

SECTION 18 of the 1970 federal job safety law permits a state to operate its own safety program if it comes up with an OSHA-approved plan that is "at least as effective" as the federal program.

Currently, 24 OSHA-approved state plans are in force in 22 states as well as in the Virgin Islands and Puetro Rico. Connecticut's plan covers public employees only, with private sector workplaces remaining under federal jurisdiction.

Under Bingham, OSHA had initiated action to withdraw federal approval of the Virginia plan as a result of the petitions filed against it. The state subsequently sued to block the OSHA effort, but dropped the suit after the agreement was signed by State Atty. Gen. Marshall Coleman and U.S. Atty. John S. Edwards.

The federal job safety agency acknowledged at the same time that it was removing more than 20 OSHA inspectors from the state as a part of the Reagan Administration's budgetary and regulatory cutbacks.

AUCHTER described the Virginia agreement as the start of "a new spirit of cooperation between two levels of government for safer and healthier workplaces." But Virginia AFL-CIO President Julian Carper challenged this assessment.

"I just don't think that workers' safety and health is going to be enhanced by this action," Carper said.

Audrey Moore, a member of the Fairfax Board of Supervisors, termed the denial of the county's petition "a real disaster—especially for the younger workers who are not as knowledgeable about the dangers on a construction site."

The high incidence of worker fatalities at construction sites in northern Virginia led the county to begin its own inspection program after petitioning OSHA to remove the state plan.

THE STATE AFL-CIO noted in its 1980 petition to OSHA that because enforcement of the state plan is handled by district courts rather than an administrative agency, there is a total lack of uniformity in procedural practices.

"Primary responsibility for enforcement is left with 128 commonwealth attorneys who are unwilling or unable to contribute to the orderly development of state law. They are untrained, largely autonomous, and are highly sensitive to pressure from the local power structure," Carper said.

He called job-site inspections under the state plan "a farce."

10,000 Condemn Slashes As Budget-Balancing Ploy

By Susan Dunlop

Thousands of older Americans jammed the steps of the U.S. Capitol at a July 21 "Save Our Security" rally sponsored by the labor-supported National Council of Senior Citizens as a highlight of its legislative conference.

The nearly 10,000 demonstrators, led by the more than 3,000 delegates to the three-day conference, braved 90-degree heat to hear senators and representatives blast the Reagan Administration's proposals to cut social security benefits as part of its plan to balance the federal budget.

AS DEMONSTRATORS waved signs and banners urging Congress to preserve social security benefits, inside the Capitol both houses were voting on measures intended to save the $122 a month minimum benefit slated for elimination under the Administration's budget program.

The House voted overwhelmingly for a non-binding resolution favoring continuation of all current benefits, but the Senate voted along party lines to reject an amendment to a tax bill that would have restored the benefit. (Story, Page 8.)

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, addressing the rally, stressed that the labor movement is a "strong and unshakable" ally of older Americans. Kirkland scored the Administration's attempts to "sacrifice the retirement security of millions of Americans" to cut federal spending.

HE DECLARED that Americans "will remember who voted to take away from American workers the protections they fought for, voted for and paid for."

Kirkland urged the demonstrators to join with the AFL-CIO on Sept. 19 at the federation's Solidarity Day Rally in Washington.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill (D-Mass.) told the gathering that social security had been "supported by a president who cared, Franklin Roosevelt, and passed by a Congress who cared" as a way of responding to America's "economic and spiritual crisis of the 1930s."

The Reagan Administration should be held to its campaign promises to make the protection of benefits "the overriding concern" of any reform of the system, he declared.

SEN. EDWARD M. KENNEDY (D-Mass.), among several dozen legislators appearing at the rally to express support for social security, branded the attempts to cut the program "a breach of faith with 36 million social security recipients and 100 million American workers who continue to pay for the program and look to it for benefits."

At the conference's general sessions, NCSC President Jacob Clayman told the delegates that older Americans must plan strategies to defend the positive federal programs that have helped them and to deal with the effects that the coming budget cuts are likely to have.

Clayman cited the importance of programs to combat hunger, subsidize housing, pay medical and energy bills and provide other social services. He warned that the 20-year-old NCSC's 4,000 local clubs and 4 million members must vigorously resist the sharp reduction or outright elimination of these programs pressed by

Leaders Urge Approval

'Good' Postal Settlement Put to Vote of Members

By James M. Shevis

Leaders of the nation's two largest postal unions urged rank-and-file members to ratify the new agreement with the U.S. Postal Service that will provide basic pay raises and bonuses totaling $2,100 over the three-year term plus uncapped cost-of-living increases.

Postal Workers President Moe Biller and Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto, detailing highlights of the contract at a press conference following a 30-hour bargaining session, called the agreement a good one and predicted its ratification within 30 days.

While the unions did not get all that they wanted, Biller noted, "overall we got enough for me to say it's a good contract under the circumstances and I recommend approval." The agreement came 16 hours after expiration of the unions' old contracts and averted a possible nationwide postal workers' walkout.

Two other postal unions, the Laborers' Mail Handlers division and the unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers, bargaining jointly with USPS but separate from the two principal postal unions, reached somewhat different results.

The Mail Handlers broke off talks and said it would submit certain unresolved issues to arbitration as provided by the 1970 Postal Reorganization Act. Negotiators for the Rural Letter Carriers agreed to a tentative contract whose details were not made known.

THE APWU AND THE NALC, which together represent 500,000 of the country's nearly 600,000 unionized postal workers, had warned that a strike against the USPS could develop, even though a walkout is prohibited by federal law.

In the later stages of the bargaining Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger finally took a direct part in the negotiations—which involved the largest number of workers covered by collective bargaining this year. The agreement was hammered out after the unions agreed to extend their 1978 contracts on an hour-by-hour basis while the talks continued at a Washington hotel.

Earlier, in the small hours of the morning, a tentative agreement had come apart over differences on specific contract language. Federal Mediator Nicholas Fidandis unveiled the final agreement to reporters, saying: "This is the real thing."

BOLGER, who joined Biller and Sombrotto at the press conference, said the package would cost $4.8 billion over the life of the contract, a figure that includes estimated cost-of-living adjustments. He said the pact's cost would not cause the price of a first-class postage stamp to rise

Real Earnings Continue Skid For 7th Month

Living costs continued to outstrip pay gains in June, and the buying power of the average worker's paycheck dropped for the seventh consecutive month.

The consumer price index climbed seven-tenths of 1 percent on a seasonally adjusted basis—up from a six-tenths of 1 percent rise in May and a modest four-tenths of 1 percent increase in April.

SINCE JUNE of 1980, the price index has risen 9.5 percent. Real spendable earnings—after-tax pay adjusted for inflation—are down 2 percent from a year ago and two-tenths of 1 percent from the previous month.

Housing prices, including mortgage interest rates, were the big culprit in the May to June rise in the consumer price index, as was the case the previous month. Housing expenditures rose 1.1 percent over the month and medical care costs shot up nine-tenths of 1 percent—putting both categories in double digits on an annual basis.

Donahue Urges Expansion Of Alliance for 'Just Society'

Delegates to the National Urban League's annual conference gave a warm reception to the AFL-CIO's call for enlarging the already strong alliance between the trade union and civil rights movements to encompass all groups sharing the goals of "a just society."

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said the excesses of the Reagan Administration are stirring into political action groups that "have never before involved themselves in legislative matters or tried to play a direct role in the nation's economic life."

AND THEY ARE discovering, he said, "as the labor movement and the civil rights movement discovered long ago, that they cannot do it alone."

After hearing an array of Cabinet members defend the Reagan Administration programs and assure the delegates that it would in time bring prosperity to everyone, Urban League delegates gave their strongest applause of the day to a different message from the AFL-CIO's secretary-treasurer.

Addressing the conference's business-labor luncheon, Donahue blasted the Administration's program "for transferring resources from those who have little to those who already have a great deal—in the pious hope that the rich, when they are richer, will somehow take care of the poor."

"in order to finance tax cuts that are designed to benefit the wealthy and the corporations."

Corporate funds are being used to buy up other companies, not to create jobs, Donahue noted. "Making money is the business of U.S. business, not making jobs."

Donahue spoke of the attempts to undermine fair labor standards, to close down the safeguards of the Voting Rights Act and to wipe out job training and affirmative action programs.

"ON SOLIDARITY DAY, Sept. 19, we are going to put on our walking shoes," he said, and "bring our concerns to the attention of the policymakers in Washington as forcefully as possible."

Urban League President Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., is a member of the Solidarity Day Advisory Board, and Donahue told the delegates, "It's your kind of demonstration as much as ours."

Its intent, he said, is "to show that there is a deep and abiding sense of solidarity among the American people where issues of social justice and fair play are concerned. We want to put a little iron into the backbone of the lawmakers who have swallowed the line that the voters don't care."

IN HIS KEYNOTE speech opening the conference, Urban League President Jordan termed the Reagan Administration's right-wing ideology "a clear and present danger to black people and poor people."

Instead of ideas, Jordan charged, the Administration relies on slogans. "Like most slogans, they contain a grain of truth. And like most slogans, they oversimplify and distort. They reinforce the meanest instincts of selfishness. They cut society loose from its moral bearings."

VERNON E. JORDAN, JR., president of the National Urban League, welcomes AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at the league's annual conference.

Latino Council Leaders Explore Labor Concerns

Some 40 leaders of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, including the organization's top national officers, took part in a four-day leadership conference at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

A highlight of the conference was an informal, spirited discussion between the LCLAA leaders and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue about common areas of interest and concern of the federation and the Latino support group.

An example of a critical common problem, Donahue indicated, was the looming fight with the Reagan Administration on the extension of the Voting Rights Act, which has been called the nation's most effective civil rights law.

"WE HAVE A big fight on our hands over the Voting Rights Act." Donahue said. "The significance of LCLAA's role in this struggle is enlarged because of the constituency you represent."

Kenneth Young, executive assistant to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland; Jim Kennedy, legislative director of the Railway & Airline Clerks, Ernie Post, PAC director of the Steelworkers, participated in a panel on political processes. Walter Davis, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, led a workshop on community relations.

Top LCLAA officers who took active roles in the conference included Henry L. (Hank) Lacayo, national chairman; Jack Otero, executive vice chairman; Oscar Sanchez, secretary-treasurer; Maria Portalatin and Mike Garcia, vice chairpersons, and Alfredo Montoya, executive director. Rudy Mendoza, a vice chairperson and chairman of the education committee, coordinated arrangements.

Suit Wins Cut In Compensation Insurance Rates

Chicago—An Illinois court has ordered insurance carriers to refund $750 million in workers' compensation premiums to employers in the state and to roll back rates by 24 percent.

The Cook County Circuit Court upheld the Illinois AFL-CIO and several employer groups in their 1979 suit charging that a 23.8-percent premium increase granted by the state insurance department in September 1979 was unjustified.

THE ROLLBACK in that rate ordered by the court will reduce current workers' compensation premiums charged to employers by $360 million annually, the state federation said.

Illinois AFL-CIO President Robert G. Gibson called the ruling a "tremendous victory." He said the order makes clear that the increases in workers' compensation insurance costs in the state must be laid at the doorstep of insurance companies, not injured workers.

Since the state's general assembly passed reforms of the workers' compensation laws in 1975, Gibson charged, "employers and their associations have irresponsibly continued to blame the tremendous increases in workers' compensation costs on the benefits paid to workers injured on the job."

Gibson pointed out that insurance carriers in the state were granted premium increases of more than 80 percent in 1975 and 1976 "without any public notice or any public hearing." In 1979, the state insurance department permitted the additional 23.8 percent rate hike.

THE STATE federation went to court to stop the increases in 1976 and it won a $50 million refund order in 1978, Gibson said.

In the light of the current decision, he said, the employers "and their spokesmen in the General Assembly" should "abandon their rhetoric which accuses injured workers" of responsibility for the increased costs.

Paperworkers Moving Offices to Nashville

The United Paperworkers is in the process of moving its headquarters from Flushing, N.Y. to Nashville, Tenn. and the union has requested that mail be sent to the new location.

The UPIU's new mailing address is: 702 Church St., P.O. Box 1475, Nashville, Tenn. 37202. The union's telephone number in Nashville is (615) 254-6666.

Union officers said the change was made to bring the headquarters closer to the localities where most members work.

Industry Pressure Charged

OSHA Scored on Move To Fire Cancer Expert

The top cancer specialist of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration, Dr. Peter F. Infante, was targeted for dismissal after he aroused the ire of the formaldehyde industry's trade association, House hearings revealed.

If the firing attempt succeeds, AFL-CIO Safety Director George H. R. Taylor warned, it will have "a chilling effect" on OSHA's professional staff and send a message that scientific judgments must defer to industry profits.

REP. ALBERT GORE (D-Tenn.), chairman of the Science & Technology subcommittee that conducted the two-day hearings, said it was clear that the Formaldehyde Institute "wanted this guy out of government" and instigated his dismissal.

Formaldehyde, which is used in a number of industrial processes, was identified by the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health (NIOSH) as a cause of cancer in animals and a suspected cause of cancer in humans. The Consumer Product Safety Commission last January banned its use in home insulation, and NIOSH had prepared a warning bulletin on the possible hazards of the chemical.

Assistant Sec. of Labor Thorne G. Auchter, who heads OSHA, acknowledged that he withdrew the warning bulletin on formaldehyde from distribution by OSHA on the basis of a memo from an aide reporting on a meeting with two representatives of the Formaldehyde Institute.

THE "CHARGE" against Infante was that after OSHA had backed away from its warning about formaldehyde, he had written a letter on government stationery to a World Health Organization research unit citing a chemical industry study that 95 of 240 rats exposed to formaldehyde had developed tumors and enclosing a copy of a current bulletin issued by NIOSH, which is an agency of the Dept. of Health & Human Services and which has not retracted its warning about formaldehyde.

Infante's letter did not mention OSHA's position on the issue, but it led to a complaint by an industry official that he was "one of the primary movers and shakers" against formaldehyde, and the dismissal action was initiated soon thereafter.

At the subcommittee hearings, Gore suggested that "the only charge they could come up with is that he used OSHA stationery" in passing on what he considered pertinent scientific data.

THE HEARINGS led to a dramatic confrontation between Assistant Sec. Auchter and the career senior civil service executive who signed the letter initiating dismissal proceedings, Bailus Walker, who recently resigned as OSHA's director of health standards.

Walker testified that he was ordered by Auchter to fire Infante. Auchter, who is the official who is supposed to "review" the dismissal and determine whether it is appropriate, denied Walker's account.

WALKER, who signed the dismissal letter, testified that he considered formaldehyde a carcinogen. So did four other government toxicology experts, including the director of the National Cancer Institute.

An estimated 750,000 workers are exposed to formaldehyde on the job and Taylor, the director of the AFL-CIO's Occupational Safety & Health Dept., said the episode demonstrates OSHA's "subservience" to business concerns.

The action against Infante also brought a sharp protest from Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel, who called on Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan to "countermand the proposal to fire Dr. Peter Infante for transmitting information published by our government to support his conviction that formaldehyde causes cancer . . . a view widely held within the scientific community."

The Administration is also under fire from the scientific community for the dismissal of NIOSH Director Anthony Robbins by Health & Human Services Sec. Richard Schweiker. Robbins was ousted after a U.S. Chamber of Commerce publication criticized him as "a radical, anti-business" social activist.

Congress Urged to Kill Bid To Deregulate Radio, TV

Unions and public interest groups have urged House-Senate conferees to strip from the budget reconciliation bill a package of controversial changes in laws governing radio and television broadcasting.

Provisions inserted by the Senate, but never considered by the House, would virtually deregulate radio broadcasting and substantially reduce the obligations of television stations to serve their communities.

THE COALITION, which includes the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees, stressed that the changes in communications laws would have virtually no impact on the budget. A fact sheet on the Senate changes noted that the only budget link was a provision for modest "user fees" for the right to use public airwaves.

Senate Commerce Committee Chairman Robert Packwood (R-Ore.) is quoted in the fact sheet as explaining that a plan to impose Coast Guard user fees on owners of small boats proved politically unpopular. "So what we did was come up with user fees on the owners of radio and television stations. As part of the package for getting their support on user fees, we agreed to lessen the regulations on them. It was a package."

AT A NEWS conference, the protesting groups cited these effects of the Senate communications amendments:

- Radio stations would be granted permanent licenses instead of having to seek a renewal every three years.
- New licenses for radio and television stations could be awarded by lottery, instead of going to the best-qualified applicants.
- Radio stations would no longer have to seek to meet community needs, and enforcement of the fairness doctrine would be much more difficult.
- Television licenses would be awarded for five years instead of three years, and the renewal procedure would be almost automatic, with reduced opportunity for citizen challenge.
- Persons who contend they could do a better job of serving a community would no longer be able to challenge the current television or radio broadcaster.

Unions taking part in the protest included the Auto Workers, Bakery Workers, Machinists, State, County & Municipal Employees, and the Steelworkers.

2 OPEIU Victories Rebuff 'Consultants'

New York—The Office & Professional Employees hailed recent victories in Knoxville, Tenn., and Oklahoma City, where management consultants sought to defeat union organizing drives.

OPEIU President John Kelly said that in spite of frantic, last-minute attempts and distribution of false and misleading anti-union propaganda by high-priced union-busting lawyers, clerical workers at an insurance company known as Oklahoma Farmers Union picked OPEIU over "no union" by a vote of 80 to 67.

In an election at the East Tennessee Baptist Hospital in Knoxville, management consultants failed in their anti-union tactics as workers chose OPEIU as their bargaining representative, 131 to 80.

Postal Union Accord Goes To Members

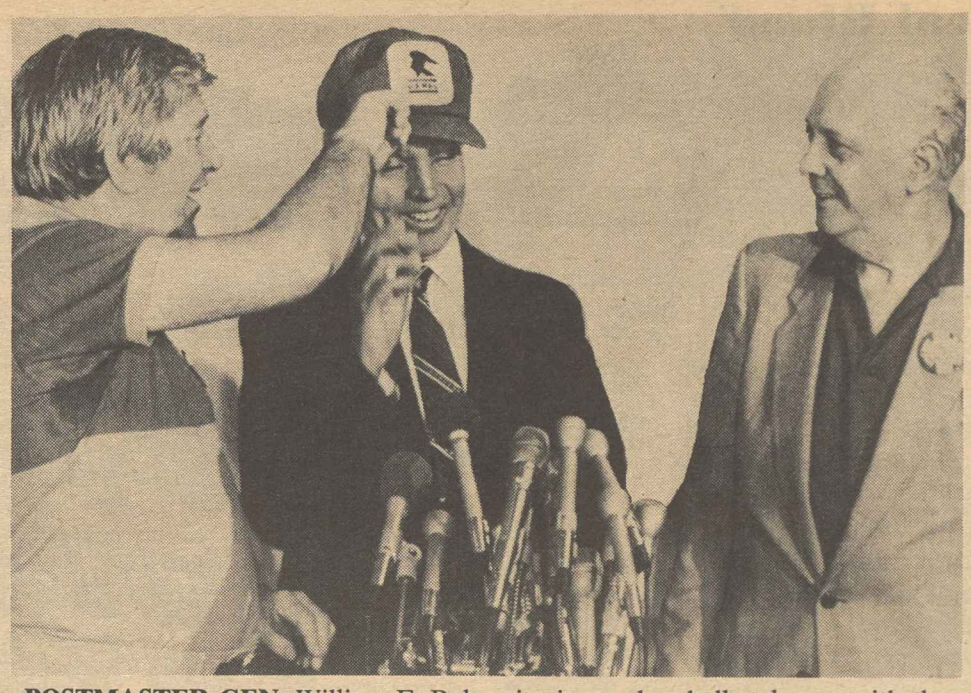
beyond 20 cents, or 2 cents more than the current price.



Earlier this year, the independent Postal Rate Commission allowed USPS to raise the first-class rate from 15 to 18 cents, but rejected its request for a 20-cent stamp. The decision is under appeal. Bolger said that the 20-cent rate would "hold us for a couple of years."

Under the new agreement, postal workers' salaries would rise by $300 in each of the next three years. In addition, employees would receive a $150 bonus upon ratification of the contract, and a $350 "productivity" bonus in each contract year. According to the unions, the typical postal employee now earns $21,146 a year. Thus, the pact would boost present wages about 10 percent over three years in addition to any increases under the COL adjustment clause.

THE PRODUCTIVITY bonus could exceed $350 under an undisclosed formula, the unions said. The agreement maintains current provisions for cost-of-living increases without a "cap," or limit, a hotly contested point during the bargaining. Semi-annual COL increases of one cent for each increase of four-tenths of a point in the consumer price index generated an average total of $3,619 in wage boosts under the old contract.

This would not be rolled into base rates until the expiration of the new contract in 1984, the unions said. However, workers within six years of retirement would have the option of rolling the COL amount into the base pay used to calculate retirement benefits in exchange for foregoing 7 percent of the COL increase. All other employees would have this amount added to the base pay used to calculate pensions by 1984. The timing of the COL roll-in had been a major bargaining issue.

Details on most fringe-benefit improvements were not announced. It was learned, however, that USPS would continue to pay 75 percent of workers' health-insurance premiums and that some increases would be provided in uniform allowances.

28-Member Advisory Board Named for Solidarity Day

Twenty-eight officers of national organizations have responded to the invitation of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to join a Solidarity Day advisory board to help with plans for the Sept. 19 Washington protest march.

The advisory board, which includes AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, held its first planning session July 22 at AFL-CIO headquarters.

KIRKLAND DESCRIBED the march as labor's way of demonstrating its determination to resist attempts to turn back social and economic progress.

The Solidarity Task Force has also released a tentative agenda for the one-day demonstration. Marchers will gather beginning at about 10 a.m. near the Washington Monument for a program of entertainment and prominent speakers. From there, the march will proceed around noon to the west front of the Capitol where the program will continue until about 5 p.m.

Marchers are being encouraged to bring their families and plan picnics on Washington's historic mall that day.

THE SOLIDARITY Day office at AFL-CIO headquarters has available names of coordinators from unions and support organizations that will join the march. Each organization will handle its own transportation and organization of its delegation.

The members of the Solidarity Day advisory board are Arnold Aronson, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights; Tony Bonilla, president, League of United Latin American Citizens; Kenyon Burke, National Council of Churches; Jacob Clayman, president, National Council of Senior Citizens; Sam Church, president, United Mine Workers; Murray Finley, president, Clothing & Textile Workers; Douglas Fraser, president, Auto Workers; Dorothy Height, president, National Council of Negro Women.

Also, Benjamin L. Hooks, executive director, NAACP; Rev. Jesse Jackson, Operation PUSH; Vernon Jordan, president, National Urban League; Coretta King, co-chair, Full Employment Action Council; Henry Lacayo, chair, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement; Msgr. Francis J. Lally, U.S. Catholic Conference; Rev. Joseph Lowery, Southern Christian Leadership Conference; Lloyd McBride, president, Steelworkers; Joyce Miller, president, Coalition of Labor Union Women; Charles Pillard, president, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers; Reese Robrahn, executive director, American Coalition of Citizens with Disabilities.

Also, Bayard Rustin, chair, A. Philip Randolph Institute; Chuck Senci, director, Concerned Seniors for Better Government; Albert Shanker, president, American Federation of Teachers; Donald Slaiman, president, Jewish Labor Committee; Eleanor Smeal, president, National Organization for Women; Jessica Smith, executive director, Frontlash; Sharon Stark, president, Consumer Federation of America; Douglas Tuthill, chair, U.S. Students Association, and William Wynn, president, Food & Commercial Workers.

Watts Cites Alarming Rise In Office Workers' Stress

Cincinnati, Ohio — Modern technology may have streamlined office procedures, but it has done little or nothing to reduce stress that is literally killing clerical and secretarial workers, Communications Workers President Glenn E. Watts told a government-sponsored conference on office worker safety and health here.

"New technology and new work environments carry with them new and alarming health and stress problems for American wage-earners," Watts said in an address at a four-day conference sponsored by the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health.

"WE MAY BE ON the verge of the paperless office, but we have yet to devise the pressureless office."

Watts cited the findings of a study released a year ago that women clerical and secretarial workers developed coronary heart disease nearly twice as frequently as other women workers. He blamed video display terminals, poor lighting and ventilation, and relentless supervision by machines as well as managers.

"A NIOSH study of a San Francisco office found higher levels of job stress among clerical operators of VDTs than in any occupational group studied, including air traffic controllers," Watts noted.

HE SAID THAT modern research has exploded the myth that "only top-level executives and those people who make weighty decisions experience the effects of job stress. The executive's "loyal secretary" is also very much a prime candidate for a heart attack."

The old idea that "stress is all in your head—it's nobody's fault but your own if you let things get to you"—is as outdated as the manual typewriter, Watts added. Medical researchers have documented beyond any reasonable doubt that job-related stress is a prime cause of heart disease, he said.

Watts's 625,000-member-union, which represents a majority of the nation's telephone workers, recently concluded an agreement with the Bell System to reduce job stress by instituting quality-of-work-life programs in Bell installations across the country.

"If we can increase job satisfaction, we will have taken a giant step to combat modern job stress which technology is bringing to the workplace," he said.

UAW Opens Drive for U.S. Content Law

Dearborn, Mich.—The Auto Workers are undertaking a major campaign for legislation to require foreign and domestic car companies with large U.S. sales to build most of those vehicles in the United States.

UAW President Douglas Fraser, announcing the drive here at the 6th annual Automotive News World Congress, said government-ordered restrictions must be enacted if America is to preserve employment and shore up its industrial base.

FURTHERMORE, Fraser said, the union will not permit domestic automakers to carry out threats to move production of parts for American cars to other countries unless they get an immediate break on labor costs in the United States. Ford and General Motors have indicated they do not want to wait until their contracts with the UAW expire in September 1982 before they seek labor cost concessions.

"We have no intention of reopening those agreements," Fraser said. "Yet let me make it clear that the UAW fully intends to approach 1982 bargaining in a responsible manner. We are realists. We understand that bargaining doesn't go on in a vacuum. You have to face the economic realities that exist when you go to the table."

Fraser's proposal for "local content" requirements would mean that a percentage of the parts and components going into a vehicle would be produced in the United States. Legislation he said he hopes will be introduced in Congress this summer would require that auto companies with annual sales in excess of 200,000 units have at least 75 percent North American components in their fleets—effectively requiring large Japanese auto companies to set up assembly plants here.

THE PROPOSAL also would require that the Big Three U.S. automakers—Ford, GM, and Chrysler—observe a 90-percent local content requirement, a level they currently are meeting. The law would be phased in beginning with the 1983 model year, Fraser said.

He said he is also seeking to enlist the domestic parts supplier industry in the legislative drive, mailing personal request letters for help to more than 1,000 companies that provide parts and components for the auto industry.

"On this issue, the parts sector and trade unions should have common cause," Fraser observed. "When General Motors threatens workers with statements it intends to buy or build more components 'offshore,' your companies may very well be victims as well," he told supplier industry executives. "When Ford talks about out-sourcing parts overseas, it's your firms as well as our workers who are being blackmailed."

THE REAGAN Administration has said that it opposes local content requirements and other aid to specific industries as being anti-free trade, to which Fraser responded:

"Some may object that our content proposal runs counter to the principles of free trade. If other nations' policies prevent auto trade from becoming a two-way street, our country cannot afford a one-way traffic jam of the unemployed."

SOLIDARITY DAY advisory board holds its first meeting at AFL-CIO headquarters. The 28-member panel of representatives of groups taking part in the demonstration with the AFL-CIO will help with plans for the Sept. 19 march in Washington to protest the Reagan Administrations assault on vital social programs.

'The Blade Draws Real Blood'

WE HAVE TO make sure that American workers understand, in the most real and human terms, exactly what all the talk about budgets and taxes means for them.

It is their social security that is going to be cut—and with it their plans for a secure and decent retirement. It is their hospitals and schools that will be closed or left to deteriorate. It is their safety and health, leisure time and paychecks that will be threatened if OSHA is hobbled, if the protective legislation so many of you have fought for is dismantled.

According to Administration doctrine, the root of all economic evil is the federal budget.

We have to remind the budget cutters of two important facts —one, that the budget-cutting blade draws real blood; and, second, that we will note well and long remember who was holding the knife.

SOME OF THE politicians will tell you that they are only carrying out the will of the people, as expressed at the polls. Well, I am sure you will have to look long and hard in Congress to find any sitting member who got there by campaigning against social security.

Yet, you will find increasing numbers—safely between elections —who have bought the Administration's line that social security is about to go under, and that if we don't dump the ballast of "excessive benefits" it will go down with all hands on board.

It is true that the social security system has problems which must be resolved. It is also true that these problems can be resolved without cutting benefits and without breaking the faith American workers have put in this system for almost 50 years. The Administration's proposed cuts in overall social security benefits add up to a sum twice as large at what is necessary to balance the system for the next 75 years.

THE HEART OF the plan—the proposed cuts in early retirement and disability provisions—ignores the fact that fully two-thirds of all people who retire before 65 do so because they are sick, their jobs have been destroyed, or they are subject to some form of compulsory retirement plan. The 80 percent of full benefits paid to these workers is based on the cool calculations of actuarial tables and insurance principles, not on principles of charity.

We must work together to prevent the Administration's tactics from driving a wedge between active workers and those who are receiving benefits.

We must also counter the danger that the Administration's dire predictions about the imminent collapse of the system will frighten many Americans into accepting cuts they would not otherwise tolerate.

At the same time, we must make sure that our opponents are forced to run on their records, that they are not allowed to conceal under piles of political rhetoric the fact that they voted to destroy programs that have helped improve the lives of every American citizen.

Shifting the Site of Pain

'Urban Enterprise' Proposal Would Aggravate Job Needs

By Gus Tyler

THE KEMP-GARCIA BILL is one of those political dreams. A conservative Republican (Kemp) joins with a liberal Democrat (Garcia) to sponsor a bill to create jobs in poverty areas, presumably mainly black and Hispanic. The idea is to ease taxes for employers who set up shop in these hard-pressed neighborhoods (designated as "urban enterprise zones").

Yet, dreamy and dramatic as the proposition appears, it may well be one of those attractively simple solutions that, upon examination, turns into a most unattractive counterproductive complexity. Consider the following:

AN EMPLOYER who sets up a factory under the proposed aegis would have a clear edge over his competitors by virtue of the subsidy he will be getting from Uncle Sam. (Exempting someone from paying a regular tax is, in effect, the same as taking money out of the federal treasury to make a gift to the beneficiary of the exemption.)

Such an employer is very likely to have another edge. Opening a new facility in a depressed neighborhood would mean employment of people at wages close to the minimum, since it is fairly certain that such a work force is not apt to be unionized in the first days or years of operation.

With such a double edge in his favor, such an employer can compete successfully in the open market for work for his plant and his people.

Now what does this do to other workers who are getting more than the minimum in an already established plant and whose employer must pay full taxes? Clearly, they are now disadvantaged with less work and smaller earnings.

THE IRONY IS that these workers—the newly disadvantaged—will also be drawn from marginal populations, mainly black and Hispanic. Small-scale production in urban areas draws heavily from minorities for its employees.

As a consequence, some ghetto people who will be working in the "neighborhood" will be disemploying other ghetto people who are not working in the precinct. But the total number of employed in the country will not go up and neither will the total number of minority folk with jobs go up.

At best, we will have achieved a redistribution of unemployment within minority people, getting jobs for some at the expense of others.

That's what would happen "at best." But we won't get the best. The people who will be losing their jobs will be those who are relatively better paid; those who will be getting jobs will be poorer paid. So, the total wage level for these workers will fall and poverty-plagued minorities will be poorer than ever.

Also, since total buying power will consequently fall, there will be fewer jobs in the nation as a whole. This means more unemployment both inside and outside the ghettos and barrios.

IT IS, of course, quite understandable that "minority" spokespeople in Congress would favor the Kemp-Garcia proposal because it seems like a quick way to get jobs into their precincts. It is also understandable that a conservative, like Kemp, would favor a bill that puts him with the poor and disadvantaged minorities.

In a way, it's most unfortunate that, in practice, the bill will merely mean more poverty and unemployment for the poor in a grim game of musical chairs that merely shifts the site of pain.

'... So Much to Gain By Working Together'

We are told social programs breed dependency. Tell that to young people in training programs who will lose their chance to learn and earn their way out of poverty. Tell it to sick people whose public health clinics are shut down.

We are told that it's bad to look to government for special help, that everyone should be treated the same. Tell that to the affluent who will get huge tax cuts on top of their loopholes. Tell it to the special interests.

We've got to reach across class and ethnic lines to win victories for all people. America's tragedy is the racism that drives a wedge between whites and blacks who have so much to gain by working together.

For Workers, Allies

Solidarity Day Offers Chance To Stand Up Against 'Mandate'

The following is from an address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue to the National Urban League Business-Labor luncheon, July 21, 1981, Washington.

WHAT WE ARE facing, in broad outline, is a very neat and well-rounded program for transferring resources from those who have little to those who already have a great deal—in the pious hope that the rich (when they are richer), will somehow take care of the poor.

So we have budget cuts that deprive children and old people and the unemployed and the disabled and the disadvantaged in order to finance tax cuts that are designed to benefit the wealthy and the corporations.

We have business-tax revisions that are designed to give huge benefits to the biggest and strongest corporations—the ones with the biggest inventories of physical assets and machinery—while giving little or nothing to small business or to businesses that depend more on manpower than robots.

WE HAVE administrative and legislative assaults on regulations designed to protect the lives and health of workers and consumers to help those who maximize profits at the expense of those who work and those who buy.

We have no re-industrialization program worth the name. We have quite a few proposals to encourage business to do what I have heard called "maximizing human resourecs" to encourage productivity.

To do that, apparently, you need to be able to pay less than a minimum living wage to youngsters at the bottom of the economic ladder. You need to minimize opportunity by wiping out jobs and training programs and affirmative action programs of all kinds.

You need to put government construction into the hands of the lowest bidder, regardless of the fact that he brings with him the lowest bidders he can find among workers—that is, those with the least bargaining power, the hungriest and most desperate workers in a depressed industry.

TO MAXIMIZE these human resources even further, we are told, it is necessary to work them longer hours without paying overtime. The eight-hour day, in the construction industry, interferes with productivity.

Along with that, of course, it is necessary to move industrial operations into the home. Obviously, productivity can be much higher if you can exploit people who are desperate for work—and their children, too—without paying the rent, without worrying about hours and overtime or health and safety laws or minimum wages or unions.

Now, once you put all this together, how do you keep it? Well, our opponents have thought of that. They remember how all these terrible restrictions on productivity and free enterprise came about in the first place. They remember the years and decades of constructive legislative and political action on the part of the trade union movement and the civil rights movement.

So, they are using their financial power as never before to control the legislative and electoral process. They have invented the negative political campaign, in which the candidate they support lies back as a perfectly innocent bystander while independent political action goes after his opponent—the candidates speaking up for the public interest, the one we think of as the good guy—with the dirtiest tricks and falsifications money can buy.

AND AT THE SAME TIME, of course, they are doing their best to kill or cripple the Voting Rights Act that opened the way for millions of minority citizens, for the first time in history, to take a hand in their country's political decision-making. They want to close the door on that, and keep it closed.

These are some of the methods by which our opponents are doing their best to take us back to 1881. In response, we can't afford to be any less united than our opponents.

We still have friends on the Hill, timid and demoralized though many of them may be. And we need to demonstrate, for the benefit of the lawmakers who have been cowed by the Administration's claim that it has a mandate from the people to rearrange American society along economic lines.

On Solidarity Day, Sept. 19, we are going to put on our walking shoes in the District of Columbia to prove that no such mandate exists, and every member of the Urban League is cordially invited to attend.

WE CALL IT Solidarity Day because it is meant to show that there is a deep and abiding sense of solidarity among the American people where issues of social justice and fair play are concerned. We want to put a little iron into the backbones of the lawmakers who have swallowed the line that the voters don't care.

Solidarity Day is for everyone, not just union members. The point is to show how broad a cross-section of America is willing to stand up and be counted in opposition to the President's program and in favor of jobs and justice.

And we want to show that come what may—win, lose or draw—whether it takes another hundred years or a thousand, we will not go away.

Targeted Program Urged

Long-Term Tax-Cut Schemes Lack Fairness, Effectiveness

BOTH OF THE long-term tax-cut programs devised by the Reagan Administration and the House Ways & Means Committee fail the tests of equity and economic effectiveness, an AFL-CIO legislative representative declared in a network radio interview.

Stephen Koplan said on Labor News Conference that the proposals to give business an across-the-board tax cut of two-thirds of a trillion dollars over 10 years ought to be scrapped in favor of a one-year program carefully targeted toward areas and industries most in need and in which real productivity gains are most achievable.

Koplan urged that proposed three-year individual tax cuts that would bring greatest benefits to high-bracket taxpayers be replaced by a 20-percent refund of social security taxes paid by workers and a 5-percent credit for social security taxes paid by employers.

He pointed out that the lion's share of the proposed business cuts would flow to electrical and gas utilities—regulated industries in no need of special tax windfalls—and to the oil refining industry. What America needs, he said, is a coherent re-industrialization program under which a Reconstruction Finance Corporation would direct tax benefits to companies needing help.

"Anything beyond one year is putting a mortgage on the future at a time when there is tremendous uncertainty," he said. "We have suggested a one-year business tax cut that is targeted and has a $5-billion cap for tax cuts and $5 billion more for non-tax subsidies, and a one-year individual tax credit of $16 billion for workers and $4 billion for employers. Then Congress could look to see whether it should be reauthorized."

ORGANIZED LABOR asks three things of whatever tax package is adopted, Koplan said:

"One, on the business side we would like to see a substantial cutback, through targeting, in the amount of revenue lost to the Treasury. Second, on the individual side, we have called for substantial equity in the lower and middle-income brackets. Third, we urge that Congress not mortgage the future."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE SCARE CAMPAIGN mounted by the Reagan Administration against the social security system surely must be one of the more irresponsible actions by national leaders.

Most responsible observers are aware that social security has a short-term and a long-term problem.

The short-term problem is directly related to the stagflation of recent years. High-level unemployment caused a reduction of employer-worker payments into the fund while inflation caused a sharp increase in benefits paid out.

The long-term problem will come when the post-World War II baby boom generation reaches the retirement age around the year 2011.

The present contrived crisis developed last spring when Reagan budget chief David Stockman saw an opportunity to exploit the short-term problem.

Using the bankruptcy rhetoric, he apparently talked Reagan into proposing a wide range of cuts to "save" social security.

THE WAVE OF anger that swept the nation persuaded the Senate to slap down Reagan's major proposal, 96-0, in a sense of the Senate resolution.

What led the Administration to miscalculate so badly?

Wilbur J. Cohen, chairman of the new Coalition to Save Our Security and a former Secretary of Health, Education & Welfare, gave this explanation:

"The major reason for the Reagan-Stockman proposal to cut social security is to meet the two goals of increasing expenditures for defense while at the same time promising to balance the budget.

"Because the federal unified budget includes general revenue expenditures from the U.S. Treasury as well as social security payments from earmarked trust funds, every penny cut from any aspect of social security payment permits Mr. Stockman to recommend higher military spending while still claiming he's balancing the budget."

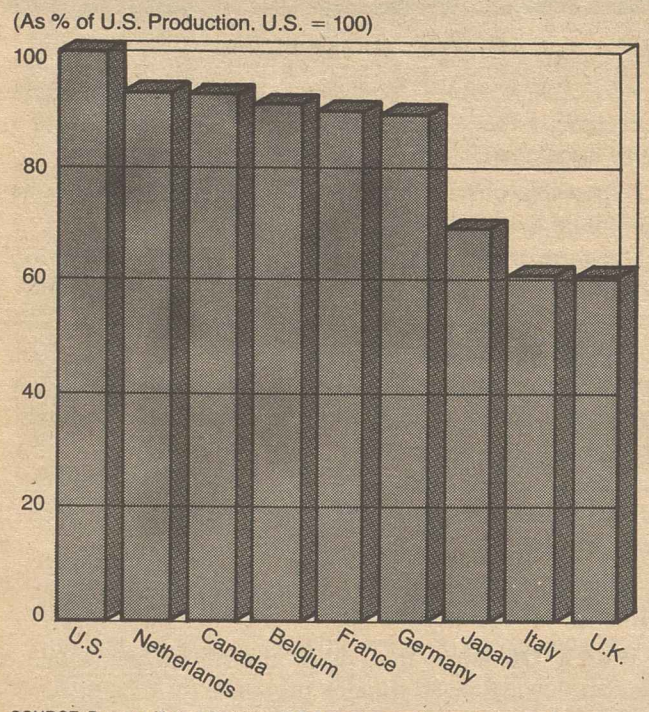
The social security cuts also enable Reagan and Stockman to cover losses of federal revenue from tax cuts in the event the Reagan economic recovery strategy fails to work.

COHEN RECOMMENDED that social security — and also state unemployment insurance—be completely removed from the Federal Unified Budget to thwart the Stockman maneuver.

A CBS-TV special aired July 16 showed that a good deal of misinformation is at large about social security, especially among the young. The New York Times the next day ran a story on a Times/CBS News poll with the headline, "Poll Shows Americans Losing Faith in Future of Social Security System."

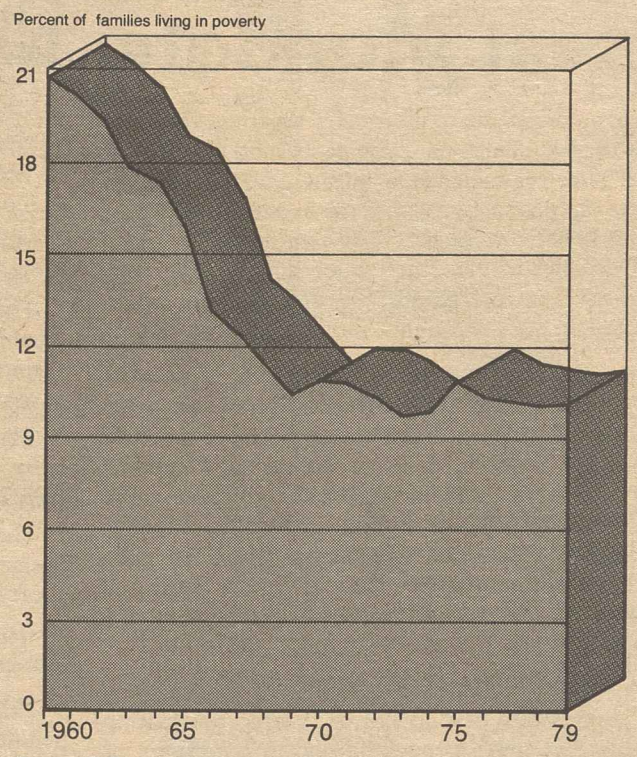
Little wonder. The CBS-TV special showed conservative politicians and normally fair-minded reporters wallowing in hyperbole. Problems were "gargantuan" and "horrendous" and the situation was a "time bomb." Health & Human Services Sec. Richard Schweiker saw everybody jumping aboard the disability "gravy train."

BROOKINGS INSTITUTION expert Henry Aaron calmly noted that 70 percent of those who apply for disability benefits are denied them. And half of that group never works again, he said.



CBS commentator Dan Rather salvaged the program by concluding that constructive solutions exist and Congress will choose among them.

It was left to Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) to wonder why the Reagan Administration wants to take benefits away from young survivors, from the crippled, from the low-income families. "Does the government of the United States have to do that?" he asked.



TAX PROGRAMS being shaped in Congress fail the test of fairness and would put a mortgage on the nation's future, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan, center, said on Labor News Conference. Questioning him were Sandra Teeley of the Washington Post and Ben Rathbun of the Bureau of National Affairs publication, Daily Labor Report. The public affairs interview is aired weekly on Mutual Radio.

Supply-Side Economics: Rehash of Old Fallacies

The so-called supply-side economic policy espoused by the Reagan Administration is directly at odds with the beliefs of those who seek equity and the economic advance of common people, former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall declares in the American Federationist, the AFL-CIO's monthly magazine.

SUPPLY-SIDERS basically believe that by putting more money in the hands of the wealthy through tax breaks, the incentive to invest will be created and that investment will generate more jobs and income and reduce inflation. But there is a deep, underlying fallacy to this theory, which runs directly counter to the traditional "demand-side"—or Keynesian—economics on which almost all of the nation's labor programs have rested since the 1930's, Marshall points out in the Federationist article, which is based on remarks at the May council meeting of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

"It's the same trickle-down economics that has always existed and was found to have been a basic cause of the depression of the 1930s," says Marshall, who was Secretary of Labor for all four years of the Carter Administration He plans to return this fall to a teaching post at the University of Texas.

"We say it's wrong because you will never have enduring prosperity unless all major groups share in that prosperity. Supply-siders are deliberately limiting their version of prosperity to those who will have enough money to invest."

MOST OF THE basic propositions of the supply-siders have no empirical evidence to support them, Marshall observes. In fact, they run contrary to strong empirical evidence from around the world, he notes, adding that "the only experiment in place of supply-side economics today is in Britain, where Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher's Government started out saying the same thing that the supply-siders started out saying in the United States—namely, that there is a painless solution to the problems of unemployment and inflation."

Subsequent events in Britain obviously make it difficult for the Thatcher Government to say there's a painless solution to the problem, Marshall observes, "so now they have to say there is a painful solution but it's worth it: we have to go through a painful process in order to solve the problems of inflation, unemployment and inefficiency generated by government involvement. But looking at the experience of the United Kingdom should not give them a great deal of optimism about empirical justification for their policies, because the Thatcher record shows increases in both inflation and unemployment."

The Reaganites pin much of their hope on a tax cut, contending that such a reduction will automatically stimulate savings and investment. But Marshall asserts there is not much evidence to support this belief.

"People are just as likely to spend that money as to invest it," he notes. "Even if they invest, there's no assurance that the investment will be in job-creating activity."

Another serious problem for the supply-siders is their monetarist theory—their rigid belief that inflation can be caused by only two factors, government or an increase in the money supply, Marshall notes. Other factors are much more important to inflation than government spending and, in fact, there is no necessary relationship between a budget deficit and inflation, he points out.

"THE MAIN REASON for inflation in recent times has been increases in the cost of energy, the cost of food prices, and the cost of money itself, i.e., the interest rates," Marshall observes. "Supply-siders can't accept that; they argue that the increase in the money supply is the only way to cause inflation."

All the economic solutions being tried in the UK and suggested in the United States have one common characteristic, and that is that ultimately they will use unemployment to check inflation, Marshall points out. The opposite approach should be used, he says.

"Dealing with unemployment is the most important problem because unemployment is inflationary," he stresses. "America needs a policy to continue to reduce unemployment by a combination of aggregates, monetary-fiscal policies, and selective programs."

Senate Indexing Amendment Expands Tax Revenue Loss

The Senate on July 16 adopted a labor-opposed amendment to the Administration's tax bill that would sharply curtail future government revenues by indexing income tax brackets to offset inflation. The indexing would be in addition to the three years of tax reductions already in the bill.

The amendment, passed by a 57-40 vote, would cause billions of dollars of revenue losses each year. The AFL-CIO charged also that the add-on indexing "would undermine efforts to enact changes in the future to promote tax justice."

Pilots Accept Panel's Verdict On Cockpit Crew Complement

The Air Line Pilots have agreed to abide by the findings of a special presidential task force that there is no need for a third cockpit crew member on several new types of passenger jet aircraft.

A second AFL-CIO affiliate, the Flight Engineers, registered strong displeasure, however, saying it remains convinced that "maximum safety for future airline passengers has been compromised" by the decision.

The panel's recommendations were issued earlier this month after a three-month study. The crew size controversy was one of several issues that prompted ALPA last March to threaten a one-to-three-day industry-wide strike.

"We obviously were disappointed when the President's Task Force on Crew Complement did not support our contention that the three-man crew should remain the industry standard for cockpit manning," ALPA President John J. O'Donnell said in a statement after the union's executive board voted to accept the panel's recommendation.

"However, when we requested the formation of the Task Force from the Reagan Administration, we pledged to accept the findings of a fair and impartial investigation of the issue. This action fulfills our part of the pledge." The Flight Engineers said that no member of the union would lose a job because of the decision.

10,000 Seniors Rally To 'Save Our Security'

the Administration as part of its planned $40 billion cuts in domestic spending.

IN A KEYNOTE address to the conference's general session, Kirkland urged the delegates to lobby to save social programs now and to look ahead to the 1982 elections.

"It is not too early," he said, "to begin working to guarantee that our friends in Congress are not overwhelmed by a vicious right-wing assault."

"Our opponents should be forced to run on their records," Kirkland declared, without concealing the fact "that they voted to destroy programs that have helped improve the lives of every American citizen."

He pointed out that members of Congress did not get elected by campaigning for cuts in social security, yet many are now supporting the Administration's position that the system can only be saved by slashing benefits.

The system's problems, he told the delegates, can be solved without cutting benefits and without backward steps.

THE HEART OF the Administration's plan, Kirkland said, would cut early retirement and disability provisions, ignoring the fact "that fully two-thirds of all people who retire before 65 do so, not because they are malingerers, but because they are sick, their jobs have been destroyed, or they are subject to some form of compulsory retirement plan. The 80 percent of full benefits paid to these workers is based, not on overweaning generosity, but on the cool calculations of actuarial tables and insurance principles."

Kirkland stressed, too, that the Administration should not be allowed "to drive a wedge between active workers and those who are receiving benefits." He pointed out that younger workers are willing to pay the costs of social security because they understand that cutting back the system will not only mean lower benefits for themselves in the future, but also a greater immediate burden in paying through other sources for programs to aid the elderly.

He pointed out that the problems facing the social security system can be realistically met through interfund borrowing, partial financing from general revenues and income tax credits.

Kirkland called on the delegates to rally citizens in their home congressional districts to pressure legislators to support such measures.

Workshop sessions at the conference focused on specific dangers to older Americans posed by the Administration's budget cutbacks. The topics included threats to income protection, health care and Medicare, housing and high energy costs, reductions in food stamps and social services, and programs to create jobs for older workers and combat discrimination.

AFL-CIO COPE Director Al Barkan urged the delegates "to declare the 1982 election campaign open now." The alliance between labor and senior citizens is strong enough to work "all out for a veto proof" Congress that will stop the Administration's drive to reverse 50 years of social progress, Barkan declared.

OTHER LABOR speakers at the conference included Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner and Machinists President William W. Winpisinger.

The 3,000 delegates approved a resolution pledging to fight "attempts to reduce the federal government's continuing obligation to work for social justice in America" and specifically condemned attempts to balance the federal budget by cutting back social security benefits and eligibility.

THE DELEGATES devoted the time before and after the social security rally to personal visits to representatives on Capitol Hlil. The meeting also included a ceremony dedicating the NCSC's new headquarters. Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), chairman of the House Select Committee on Aging, was a guest of honor at the event.

Other speakers included Sen. Howard M. Metzenbaum (D-Ohio): Sen. John Heinz (R-Pa.); Sen. Paul Sarbanes (D-Md.); Rep. Lindy Boggs (D-La.); Rep. Toby Moffett (D-Conn.); Coretta Scott King, president of the Martin Luther King Foundation; Clarence M. Mitchell, president of the National Black Caucus of State Legislators; Carol Greenwald, president of the National Consumer Cooperative Bank; and Eleanor Smeal, president of the National Organization for Women.

SOCIAL SECURITY SYSTEM'S ills can be cured by interfund borrowing, funds from general revenues and income tax credits, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland tells delegates to the National Council of Senior Citizens legislative conference in Washington. Kirkland called the Reagan Administration's plans to cut benefits "stealing from social security to balance the federal budget." Seated are NCSC President Jacob Clayman, left, and Executive Director William Hutton.

Union Stresses Urgent Need For Chemical Labeling Rules

America's workers have a right to know about the health risks they encounter on the job, and an effective labeling requirement is "desperately needed," the Chemical Workers testified at House hearings.

Richard Lewis, an occupational health specialist with the ICWU, said the union's files are bulging with requests from locals for help in identifying chemicals carrying only trade names and sometimes identified only by manufacturer code numbers.

WORKERS WANT to know: "What is it?" and "what will it do to me?" he testified.

Lewis quoted from a typical letter sent to the ICWU health and safety staff:

"Four members have been complaining of a rash on their arms and bodies. One member has been getting sick while in contact with this dust."

Yet the only information about the suspect substance, he testified, was a meaningless code number.

THE HEARINGS being held by an Education & Labor subcommittee concern the Reagan Administration's withdrawal of a hazard identification regulation that had been proposed last January. Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan withdrew the regulatory proposal, terming it a "midnight regulation" of the outgoing Carter Administration, and cancelled hearings at which interested parties were to have commented on the proposal.

The AFL-CIO had charged that withdrawal of the regulations was a politically motivated response to pressure from the chemical industry.

Earlier in the hearings, the Chemical Manufacturers Association had contended that industry labeling standards are adequate and that chemicals that could be hazardous under certain conditions need not carry a warning label if there is no danger when a product is used in the way it is intended.

LEWIS TOLD the subcommittee that experience proves that accidents and misuse of products occur. And in the absence of clear warning of hazards, "some workers tend not to push for ventilation or equipment repair or even report malfunctioning equipment because of job production pressures."

The day-to-day health hazards that workers encounter shouldn't be obscured by "impersonal" statistics, Lewis said.

He told the subcommittee of an episode last summer at a Conoco plant in Baltimore.

AN ICWU MEMBER refused an order to clean a chemical tank that contained benzene residue because he considered the job too dangerous.

The company subsequently hired four temporary day laborers with no experience in dealing with toxic chemicals. As the men were leaving the tank to take a break from the harsh fumes, Lewis recounted, one of them fell unconscious and could not be revived. An autopsy confirmed that he had died of acute benzene poisoning.

AFGE Protest to Spotlight Immigration Service Cutback

The American Federation of Government Employees has sharply rapped the Reagan Administration for its inaction on national immigration policy and its budget cut recommendations for the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Mike Harpold, president of AFGE's National Immigration & Naturalization Service Council, announced at a Washington press conference that the union has scheduled a day of protest Aug. 21 to draw public attention to the country's "serious immigration problems."

AFGE PRESIDENT Kenneth T. Blaylock, who also spoke at the press conference, said the informational pickets, airport handbilling and other activities planned for the protest day are part of an overall effort by the AFGE to counter widespread anti-government worker attitudes.

"We are going to take the real story of what is happening to the American people," Blaylock declared.

What is happening at INS, Harpold pointed out, is an Administration recommendation to cut 1,335 positions at the INS, which is an agency of the Justice Dept.

THESE CUTS would mean a 38 percent reduction in the number of investigators and a 12 percent reduction in inspectors, according to the union's estimates.

Harpold reported that inspectors, as well as other INS employees, now often work a mandatory 160 hours per two-week pay period—double the normal 40-hour workweek.

Moreover, the Administration has proposed the cuts at a time when the numbers of immigration applications, foreign tourists, and illegal aliens are increasing at record rates, Harpold said.

IN A JULY 2 letter to President Reagan, Blaylock said the absence of an INS commissioner since 1979, proposed manpower reductions and the lack of a clear immigration policy conflict with Reagan's stated goals of "improving the economy, reducing unemployment and eliminating waste and inefficiency in the government."

He cited a recent Government Accounting Office estimate that at least 5 million illegal and legal aliens who are working illegally in the nation "cheat" the government and economy out of some $11 billion.

The economy would be improved, government costs could be met, and unemployment, which stood at 7.8 million in June, could be reduced "if we could recapture just 50 percent of the 5 million jobs," Blaylock told the President. Reagan has not responded to Blaylock's letter.

HARPOLD SAID these factors are contributing to serious morale problems in the agency. So far, INS personnel have carried out their duties "effectively and humanely," he said, but, without clear direction and relief from overtime duties, they may not be able to maintain their current level of performance.

He said the AFGE council wants to see the Administration put most of the March 1981 recommendations of the Select Commission on Immigration Refugee Policy into legislative proposals. The commission recommended strengthening ports-of-entry border enforcement efforts, increased Border Patrol operations, full funding and staffing for interior immigration enforcement, sanctions against employers who knowingly employ illegal aliens, and the granting of preference classifications for the immediate families of legal aliens. (PAI)

Federal Grants Urged to Improve Language Skills

Legislation that would use federal grants to encourage the teaching of foreign languages was endorsed by the AFL-CIO at House hearings.

The legislation is based on recommendations of a presidential commission appointed during the Carter Administration and would provide grants to improve foreign language programs in elementary and secondary schools and as incentives for colleges to expand foreign language class enrollments.

AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields told a House Education & Labor subcommittee that language skills in the United States lag far behind the rapid advancements in the means of communication and in the need to communicate.

"The concept of a global village has become reality," she said. But few Americans can effectively speak a second language, and "language training in the public school system of our country lags far behind that of all the other industrialized market economies of our world."

Britain's Jobless Rate Climbs to 11.8 Percent

Britain's unemployment rate climbed from 11.1 percent to 11.8 percent in July, spurred by an influx of young workers unable to find their first jobs.

Unemployment has more than doubled in the two years since Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and her Conservative Party government took office.

By contrast, food and beverage costs rose only three-tenths of 1 percent, after declining the previous month and showing no change in April. But they nevertheless were 8.4 percent higher than a year ago.

THE RISE in interest rates also was reflected in higher automobile finance charges that, along with higher auto prices, offset a 1.5 percent drop in gasoline costs.

Average weekly earnings of workers in private sector, non-farm jobs were $254.88 in June, up $2.50 from the previous month and $21.55 more than a year ago.

But after taxes and the impact of inflation, a married workers with three dependents who earned the average had "real" spendable earnings in terms of the 1977 value of the dollar of $147.21, a drop of 8 cents from the previous month but $3.02 a week less than a year ago.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics has switched its index of "constant dollar" earnings to a 1977 base from the previous 1967 base. All other government indexes using a base year earlier than 1976 are being gradually shifted to a base of 1977=100. The CPI will change over next January.

THE LAST previous CPI revision was in January 1971, when the current 1967 base was substituted for the former 1957-59 base period.

Before adjustment for taxes and inflation, average hourly earnings in June were seven-tenths of 1 percent higher than the previous month. But this was partly offset by a drop of three-tenths of 1 percent in average hours worked. Despite the dip for the month, hours worked in June averaged three-tenths of 1 percent over a year ago.

DOUBLE THREAT is posed by federal and local budget cuts, Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock, left, tells 1,000 demonstrators in a march organized in Washington to protest slashes in the U.S. and D.C. budgets. The cuts could endanger public workers' jobs and public service, Blaylock said. The march, organized by AFGE District 14 is part of the union's strategy to build up to AFL-CIO Solidarity Day, set for Sept. 19 in the nation's capital.

Senate Rejects Minimum Pension

The White House kept Senate Republicans in line and thwarted a Democratic move to prevent a reduction in social security payments to most of the 3 million elderly persons now receiving the minimum benefit of $122 a month.

BUT HOUSE Republicans, all of whom must face the voters in the next election, ran for political cover. They joined in passing by a near-unanimous vote a non-binding resolution urging "that necessary steps be taken to insure that social security benefits are not reduced for those currently receiving them."

Just three weeks earlier, House Republicans aided by a bloc of conservative Democrats had pushed through a budget reconciliation bill that included the benefit cuts the resolution was protesting.

The Senate battle was more meaningful, since it came on an amendment proposed by Sen. Donald W. Riegle, Jr. (D-Mich.) to the Administration's tax bill, and therefore would have had the force of law.

If adopted and subsequently approved by the House, the amendment would have nullified the cutback in social security benefits called for in both the House and Senate versions of the budget reconciliation bill that is now in conference.

THE REAGAN White House went all out to beat the Riegle amendment. Aware of the political heat Republicans were taking from the Administration's social security proposals, Reagan promised that before Congress returns from its August recess, he will make a televised address to the nation in which he would "call on the Congress to lay aside partisan politics and join me in a constructive effort to put social security on a permanently sound financial basis."

THE WHITE HOUSE even had an explanation for the apparent breaking of Reagan's campaign pledge not to reduce social security benefits for anyone now receiving them.

What the President had in mind, the White House explained, was "earned" social security benefits. The $122-a-month minimum benefit couldn't be considered "earned" because it was more than recipients would otherwise get on the basis of their pre-retirement earnings in jobs covered by social security.

On the Senate showdown, three Republicans crossed to vote with the Democrats and four Democrats went the other way.

THE SENATE had originally voted to wipe out the minimum benefit by an almost identical 53-45 margin on June 23.

In the House, Republicans got the green light from their leadership to get off the hook and avoid a "wrong" social security vote.

The result was that House Republican Leader Robert H. Michel (Ill.) made a speech arguing that ending the minimum benefit would not hurt those who are really needy since there are other welfare programs that can take up the slack. But then he said Republicans would vote for the Democratic resolution to demonstrate "that you're going to have to get up a lot earlier in the morning to make us your political pawns."

ELIMINATION of the minimum benefit for those now receiving it was included in the Republican version of the budget reconciliation bill, which was written largely in the White House. It was adopted by the House, with the help of some conservative Democratic votes, as a substitute for a budget bill that would have ended the minimum benefit for those qualifying in the future—but retained it for those already receiving it.

Before adopting the Republican substitute, the conservative coalition had blocked a Democratic attempt to force separate votes on social security and other controversial ingredients of the Republican bill.

Despite the Republican maneuver, House Democratic Leader Jim Wright (D-Tex.) said he didn't see how the House conferees on the budget bill can agree to a final version including the social security cuts in view of the overwhelming House vote.

GOP, Democratic Tax Plans Compete for Business Favor

The Republican Senate and the Democratic-controlled House Ways & Means Committee continued an economically risky competition to come up with the most lavish tax cuts for corporations and the most politically saleable package of individual income tax reductions.

As the AFL-CIO News went to press, the Senate was continuing to add to the Administration's tax bill, which the AFL-CIO protested would force America's workers to carry a larger share of the total tax burden and at the same time leave essential programs underfunded.

AMONG THE "Christmas tree" amendments added by the Senate are reductions in the windfall oil profits tax and interest exemptions that would be most profitable to taxpayers with big bank accounts.

The Senate also adopted other tax changes that, when added to other provisions of the bill, would starve the federal government of revenue and compel future budget cuts even deeper than the Reagan Administration has sought.

One amendment, which the AFL-CIO vainly urged the Senate to reject, would index the various tax brackets for the effect of inflation so as to bring about multi-billion-dollar annual reductions in tax revenue each year after the three-stage tax cut in the Administration bill.

THE INDEXING amendment was adopted by a 57-40 vote. (Rollcall, Page 7.)

In a letter to senators, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison protested that its enactment would perpetuate inequities already in the bill, and "severely limit the federal government's powers to use fiscal measures as a means to stabilize the economy, promote balanced growth and reverse the unemployment spiral."

Denison said that while indexing would be of some help to low-income and middle-income taxpayers, benefits "would be far overshadowed by the absolute and relative reductions in the taxes owed by higher-income individuals and the huge and continuing losses to the Treasury."

Meanwhile, the House Ways & Means Committee continued to shape a bill that would be even more generous to oil producers and royalty holders than the Administration measure—with the goal of weaning away conservative oil state Democrats who have been part of the conservative coalition supporting the Reagan program.

THE COMMITTEE'S problem was that the Senate bill, with the Administration's concurrence, was being made so generous for oil interests that it was hard for the House Democrats to keep ahead.

A more direct conflict is in the individual tax cut portion of the bill, where Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) has been trying to come up with a two-year formula tilted more to the middle-income taxpayer than the Administration bill. His most recent proposal called for a third year of tax cuts—as the Administration has proposed—provided the economy has improved to the extent predicted by the White House.

Interest Rates Drag Down Nation's Economic Growth

The nation's economic growth declined in the April-through-June quarter, reversing the sharp surge of the previous three months.

In large part due to high interest rates, "real" gross national product—the value of the nation's total output of goods and services adjusted for inflation—fell 1.9 percent on an annual basis during the second quarter, the Commerce Dept. reported. The drop was the first since last year's recession, and followed an 8.6-percent rise in the previous quarter.

THE GOVERNMENT also reported that inflation, as measured by a broad-guaged index within the gross national product, posted an annual rate of only 6 percent during the April-June quarter, the smallest rise in three years. In the second quarter of 1978, prices went up 5.8 percent.

The April-June GNP, after adjustment for seasonal fluctuation in prices, was $2.88 trillion, the first decline since last year's recession-struck second quarter, when the GNP plummeted 9.9 percent. Fewer auto sales contributed most to last quarter's decline, with the value of cars sold dropping by $10.5 billion.

The GNP decline was widespread through the economy, led by an $18.5-billion drop in final sales and a badly slumping housing industry. Fixed investment showed a 9.7-percent plunge, computed on an annual basis, and residential housing investment, measured alone, fell by 20.6 percent.

Tax Cuts, Budget Package Shift Economic Burdens to Workers

Aluminum, Brick & Clay Workers Okay Merger

Columbus, Ohio—A new 50,000-member union was formed here as convention delegates of the Aluminum Workers and the Brick & Clay Workers unanimously approved a merger agreement.

The merger, effective Sept. 1, will unite some 35,000 members of the Aluminum Workers and 15,000 members of the Brick & Clay Workers. The emerging organization will be known as the Aluminum, Brick & Clay Workers International Union (ABC).

AFTER CONVENING separately at different sites, delegations from both unions met at a downtown square and marched to the merger convention hall to voice their final approval of the agreement.

The combined delegation elected Aluminum Workers President L. A. Holley to a four-year term as president of the ABC by about a 3-to-2 margin over Allan Sutherland, research and education director of the Aluminum Workers.

H. Max Webster, incumbent secretary-treasurer of the Aluminum Workers, will hold the same post with the ABC for the next two years.

President Roy L. Brown of the Brick & Clay Workers was elected assistant to the president and organizing director.

SEC.-TREAS. Roy Lukens of the Brick & Clay Workers was elected assistant to the secretary-treasurer of the ABC. The merger convention also elected 19 vice presidents—13 from the Aluminum Workers and six from the Brick & Clay Workers—to serve on the ABC's executive board.

With the exception of Holley, all of the union's top officers will face re-election at the ABC's convention in 1983.

In an address to the delegates, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue commended the leadership of the two unions for the lengthy and successful effort to bring about the merger.

Through launching the ABC, he stressed, "you have created a new vehicle

Congress Tilts Program To Benefit Business, Rich

By David L. Perlman

Congress began packing for a month-long summer vacation after passing tax cuts heavily tilted to the most profitable corporations and the wealthiest individuals.

The last item on its agenda was final action on $35 billion in budget cuts, including reductions in unemployment insurance, social security benefits, food stamps and school lunches.

Tax Cuts

America's workers will shoulder a bigger share of the nation's tax burden under the nearly identical Republican-drafted bills passed by the House and Senate.

Almost every loophole business has used to lower its tax payments will be enlarged. The oil industry especially will benefit, getting to keep a bigger share of windfall profits from decontrol. And individual tax cuts in the twin bills reflect what AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland termed "naked favoritism toward the rich."

IN THE SPOTLIGHTED political battle in the House, President Reagan again demonstrated his ability to break the Democratic majority. This time, a record high of 48 Democrats bolted to give the Administration a 238-195 victory over the "Democratic alternative."

It wasn't much of a choice, as the trade union movement saw it. The AFL-CIO had called for rejection of both versions as almost equally destructive in terms of the nation's needs and tax equity.

A THIRD VERSION, which the AFL-CIO backed as "far more equitable," was beaten on a 288-144 vote. It was sponsored by Democrats Morris K. Udall (Ariz.), David R. Obey (Wis.) and Henry S. Reuss (Wis.), but opposed by the party's leadership.

Its defeat left only the bill shaped by the Democratic majority of the Ways & Means Committee and the Republican substitute bill before the House.

Budget

The budget reconciliation bill put together by a House-Senate conference committee destroys or weakens many of the programs the trade union movement has supported over the years.

The damage, however, wasn't done by the conferees. In some cases, they salvaged programs marked by the Reagan Administration for elimination.

EARLIER, Congress had rubber-stamped the Administration's budget targets and swallowed the White House strategy of using the budget process to accomplish a large part of the Administration program, including substantive changes in laws. And just last month, a conservative coalition in the House adopted almost sight unseen a Republican budget reconciliation bill cluttered with scores of last-minute changes made to win over conservative Democratic votes.

All that was left to the conference—actually a series of some 58 mini-conferences dealing with various subject areas—was to resolve the differences between the Republican bill passed by the Senate and the Republican bill passed by the House.

The conference decisions hadn't all been assembled when the AFL-CIO News went to press. But in some of the areas of special interest to labor, this is what the $35 billion in budget cutbacks would do:

SOCIAL SECURITY—After next February, persons receiving the minimum social security benefit of $122 a month will have their payments reduced—unless Con-

Union Contracts Boost Wages 11.3%

Major collective bargaining agreements reached in private industry during the first six months of 1981 will give union members an average 11.3 percent wage increase during the first year of the contracts and an average annual boost of 9.2 percent measured over the life of the pacts, the Bureau of Labor statistics reported.

The settlement data for the first half of the year compare with first-year increases averaging 9.5 percent and annual raises of 8 percent averaged over the full term under contracts previously bargained by the same parties.

The data exclude any changes due to cost-of-living adjustment clauses and are derived from contracts covering 1,000 or more persons each.

The settlements covered a total of 927,000 workers in 233 bargaining units.

The higher contract yields resulted largely from higher settlements in the construction industry. The average first-year wage boost of 13 percent in that sector compared to 10.1 percent in other industries. Settlements in construction covered 42 percent of all workers under agreements reached during the first half of 1981. The coal settlement covered 17 percent.

In key contracts covering 5,000 workers or more, wage and fringe benefit increases together averaged 11.4 percent for the first year and 10 percent annually over the life of the agreements, BLS reported.

CONTRACTS negotiated during the first six months of the year had an average duration of 31.2 months, the same as the expired contracts bargained previously by the parties.

Other highlights of the report:

- Settlements in manufacturing industries averaged 8.1 percent for the first year and 6.4 percent annually over the full term.
- Non-manufacturing settlements provided an average first-year increase of 12 percent and annual increases averaging 9.8 percent over the life of the agreements.
- Construction pacts averaged 13 percent in the first year and 10.9 percent a year over the life of the contracts.
- Cost-of-living clauses covered 195,000 workers, or 21 percent, of those under settlements reached during the first six months of 1981. Clauses were introduced

Budget Ax Cuts Key Social Programs

gress reverses course. A Democratic-led effort was being made in the House to delete that provision from the final version of the reconciliation bill.

Social security benefits for surviving children over 18 attending college will be phased out. A parent caring for a child will receive benefits only until the child is 16, although the child's benefits will continue to be paid until 18. On the plus side, the conferees rejected a Senate provision that would have further restricted eligibility for disability insurance benefits.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—As of Oct. 1, 1981, there will no longer be a national trigger based on the insured unemployment rate that will allow an additional 13 weeks of extending benefits to be paid, on top of the normal 26-week maximum of state programs. Further, state extended benefit programs will "trigger-off" sooner than otherwise because of a change in the calculation of the unemployment trigger.

A year later, new restrictions on eligibility for extended benefits will be imposed, including a requirement of 20 weeks of employment during the "base period" on which entitlement is based. And an insured unemployment rate of 6 percent will be required to trigger extended benefits in a state, up from 5 percent under present law.

FOOD PROGRAMS—Eligibility for food stamps was limited to households with gross monthly incomes not more than 130 percent of the poverty level, except for the elderly or disabled. Overall funding was cut $1.66 billion for fiscal 1982, nearly $200 million more than the Administration had sought.

The unrelated child nutrition program, primarily school lunches, will be cut by $1.5 billion. The budget "savings" will come from making fewer children from low-income households eligible for free lunches and raising the price of school lunches for the 16 million children who pay for their meals.

EDUCATION—A number of school programs were consolidated into block grants instead of being earmarked for specific purposes, with total funding cut. But the conversion was less than the Administration had sought. The basic program of aid to disadvantaged children will continue, although with $500 million less in funding than the projected need. Impact aid to school districts with federal installations was reduced but not eliminated.

Eligibility for college student loans was tightened, with only households with incomes under $30,000 a year exempt from a means test. The interest rate, now 9 percent, will rise to a 12 to 14 percent range.

FEDERAL PAY—The budget cap would limit federal employees to a 4.8 percent pay raise next October, instead of the 13 percent they could get under the current comparability formula. But the conference scrapped a House-passed provision that would have substantially increased the cost to employees of health insurance coverage by requiring their health plan to pick up costs for retirees that are now paid through Medicare.

JOBS—The $5.7 billion "savings" in the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act includes wiping out the public service jobs program.

RAILROADS—Both Conrail and the passenger train network, Amtrak, are given a better chance for survival than under the Administration's proposals. The actions make it more likely that Conrail can be sold to private operators intact, rather than through a piecemeal process that would result in abandonment of freight service.

COMMUNICATIONS—With only a thin link to the budget, the Senate sought to use the reconciliation bill to achieve a union-opposed deregulation of radio and television broadcasting. Some of the worst features were modified by the conference. But radio station licenses are extended from three years to seven years, television stations from three to five years, and selection of new TV stations will be made under a complex lottery system rather than an assessment of community needs.

HEALTH CARE—Medicare patients now must pay the first $228 of hospital costs. This will rise to $256 now and to $328 by 1984. The premium cost for the voluntary insurance for non-hospital medical expenses will also go up more than it would otherwise.

Medicaid spending ceilings will be reduced, but not through the "cap" on federal payments to states sought by the Administration. Also rejected was an Administration provision to reduce the minimum federal payment from 50 percent to 40 percent of state expenditures.

HOUSING—Subsidized housing for low-income families was reduced even below the Reagan budget. The fiscal 1982 ceiling would be 153,000 additional subsidized apartments, down from 210,000 this year, 260,000 sought in the Carter Administration budget last January, and 175,000 proposed by the Administration. Rents paid by tenants will rise in steps from 25 percent of income to 30 percent.

TRADE ADJUSTMENT—This labor-supported program to assist workers whose jobs are wiped out by imports is virtually demolished. The budget "savings" is $1.3 billion; the amount left is $317 million, largely for retraining-related costs. Regular state unemployment insurance benefits will replace the more generous trade adjustment formula.

Economic Index Declines 1.3% as Housing Slumps

The slump in housing starts pulled down the government's index of leading economic indicators for the second month in a row. Commerce Dept. figures show the composite index down 1.3 percent in June on the heels of a 1.5 percent drop in May.

The index, used to predict the direction the economy is headed, had inched up in March and April after dropping in the previous three months.

MORE THAN half the June slide was attributed to the sharp drop in the number of building permits issued, one of the 10 measures on the index. Lowered prices for raw materials accounted for another third of the decline.

Also down were the average work week, vendors' delivery performance and the nation's money supply. The only indicator unchanged was the layoff rate.

Indicators showing improvement were new orders for manufactured consumer goods, new plant and equipment orders and contracts, stock prices, and total liquid assets held by U.S. business.

THE JUNE decline in the composite index drops is to 133.8 compared with a 1967 base of 100 and mirrors the slump of 1.9 percent in an annual rate of the gross national product in the April-June quarter. The GNP had shown an 8.6 percent increase in the previous three months.

In another economic development, the U.S. merchandise trade deficit narrowed in June to a seasonally adjusted $3.12 billion compared to deficits of $3.44 billion in May and $3.46 billion in April.

The Commerce Dept. report on the measure of how much the nation sells abroad versus how much it imports said that the slimmer deficit was due to "strong growth" in exports which managed to offset an increase in oil imports.

THE TOTAL VALUE of June exports was set at $19.9 billion, up 5.3 percent, and the value of imports was $22.9 billion, up three percent.

The rise in oil imports was due to federal government purchases to add to the nation's strategic oil reserve, the Commerce Dept. said.

Reagan Tax Script Shifts Burden

The distribution of the individual income tax cut in the Democratic version was "marginally less inequitable toward America's workers" than the Reagan bill, Kirkland said. "But the differences between the two bills are overwhelmed by the similarities," he stressed.

Both versions, Kirkland said, "widen the gap between the haves and the have-nots in our society. . . . They single out oil companies and those who collect oil royalties for special tax cuts that will cost the Treasury many billions of dollars."

The Senate completed action on its bill the same day, and a House-Senate conference will work out the differences.

In terms of individual tax cuts, both measures provide a 5 percent cut effective Oct 1, 1981, a 10 percent reduction on July 1, 1982, and another 10 percent on July 1, 1983. There would be a modest, two-step lowering of the "marriage penalty" for households with two earners.

Beyond that, the House and Senate bills would establish a bracket-indexing system that would reduce federal revenues each year with the biggest cuts coming during periods of high inflation. In terms of the nation's future needs and basic economic principles, that's "the most dangerous feature" of the tax bills, Kirkland said.

THE BIGGEST tax breaks go to the most profitable corporations, wealthy investors and especially oil producers and people with oil royalties and investments.

Corporations get extra-fast depreciation writeoffs under a formula that gives bigger savings to capital-intensive firms than to labor-intensive enterprises. The capital gains tax rate is cut, and the exemptions from estate and gift taxes would rise from a current level of $175,625 to $600,000, along with a sharp drop in the maximum tax rate.

IRONICALLY, a bidding war launched by the Democrats for the votes of southern conservatives resulted in billions of dollars in additional tax benefits for oil producers and investors beyond what the Administration had initially sought.

On two previous budget votes in the House, the Democratic majority had been broken when a bloc of southern conservatives bolted to vote with the Republicans.

In an effort to avoid this, House Ways & Means Committee Chairman Dan Rostenkowski (D-Ill.) supported a string of new tax breaks for the already hugely profitable oil industry. And the Administration countered by adding other tax concessions to their bill, both the version before the Senate and the substitute bill they were preparing for the House floor.

The Democrats on the Ways & Means Committee did, however, adopt a two-year income tax reduction that would give persons with incomes under $50,000 a year a larger share of the tax reduction than the Administration had proposed. And their bill would have made a third-year tax cut contingent on the improvements in the economy that the Administration has forecast.

BUT PRESIDENT Reagan's televised speech, coupled with a massively financed Republican advertising campaign, left the Democrats on the defensive, with a "me-too" position on taxes that generated little support either in business ranks or in the party's traditional base. Forty-eight Democrats ended up voting for the Reagan bill. Only one Republican, James M. Jeffords (Vt.), broke with the Administration.

Labor's position, Kirkland said for the AFL-CIO, is that business tax cuts should be "targeted toward areas and industries that can make the most constructive use of them." And individual tax cuts should be "distributed more fairly and with a little less naked favoritism toward the rich."

AFL-CIO Vice President Fred J. Kroll Dies at 45

Philadelphia—AFL-CIO Vice President Fred J. Kroll, president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, died July 30 at a Philadelphia hospital after a five-year battle with leukemia. He was 45.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in a statement described Kroll as a "forceful and successful leader of railroad and airline workers and a recognized spokesman for a new generation of trade unionists."

HIS VOICE, Kirkland said, "will be missed in the AFL-CIO Executive Council and in the leadership of the railroad unions."

FRED J. KROLL

Born in Philadelphia on Oct. 29, 1935, Kroll was a second-generation trade unionist whose father and mother both were members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

He joined the Railway & Airline Clerks in 1953 when he went to work for the Pennsylvania Railroad as an IBM machine operator. Eight years later, he was elected chairman of BRAC Local 587 in Philadelphia, marking the start of a lifelong career with the union that led to the presidency of the international in 1976. He was re-elected by acclamation at BRAC's 1979 convention.

Kroll was elected to the AFL-CIO Executive Council as a federation vice president in February 1978 at age 42. He was at the time the youngest member ever to hold a council seat. He was a member of several Executive Council committees, and served as a trustee of both the Asian-American Free Labor Institute and the American Institute for Free Labor Development.

He was elected chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association in February 1980.

SURVIVORS include his wife, Hildegarde; three daughters, Karen, Anita, and Michelle; three brothers, and his parents. The family requests that in lieu of flowers contributions be made to the Herbert L. Orlowitz Institute for Cancer at Hahnemann Hospital in Philadelphia.

The funeral was scheduled to take place in Washington, Aug. 3. Arrangements were incomplete at the AFL-CIO News press time.

With Screen Actors, Musical Artists

AFTRA Delegates Clear 1st Step of Merger Plan

Cleveland—The 44th convention of the Television & Radio Artists gave the go-ahead to plans aimed at merger with two other entertainment unions, the Screen Actors Guild and the American Guild of Musical Artists.

The 350 delegates representing AFTRA's 54,000 members voted approval of the first of three steps toward merger with SAG. Phase I of the proposal will pave the way for joint action by the unions in establishing contract proposals, conducting negotiations and ratifying national contracts covering workers in commercials and "prime time" television programs.

AFTRA'S NATIONAL board unanimously authorized the opening of merger talks with the 5,000-member Musical Artists which represents performers in opera and ballet. AFTRA, SAG and AGMA are all affiliates of the Actors & Artistes.

Bill Hillman, president of AFTRA, told the delegates the merger talks with SAG remain "on target" and that Screen Actors representatives had participated in "useful, frank and civilized airing of all issues" with AFTRA's merger coordinating committee which met prior to the convention.

The union's executive secretary, Sanford Wolff, told the delegates the proposed merger with AGMA "makes particular sense in terms of our mutual interests." Many AGMA members also belong to AFTRA and vice versa, Wolff pointed out, adding that as broadcasts of opera and ballet have increased, AFTRA has worked closely with the Musical Artists on their broadcast agreements.

WOLFF ALSO stressed that with government and private support for the arts declining, "in the future the economic salvation of these art forms lies in the electronic media."

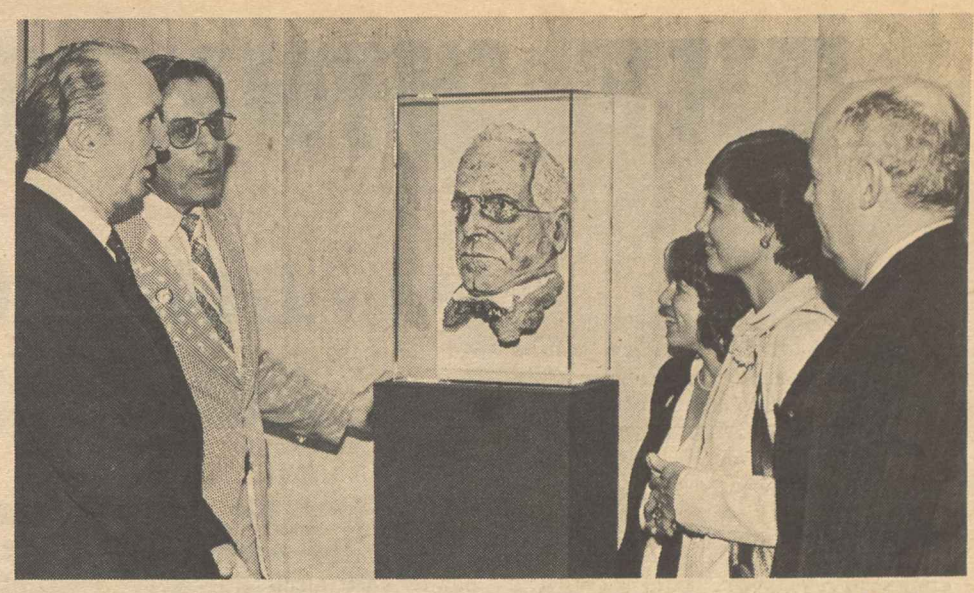
AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the delegates that other recent mergers among AFL-CIO unions have made the unified organizations "stronger than the sum of their separate parts. They have become more efficient, more effective, and better able to serve their members than either could do alone."

Working people "need all of the unity we can achieve at this time, Kirkland said, asserting that social and economic policies of the Reagan Administration are based on a philosophy of "subordinating the public interest to private profit."

KIRKLAND SCORED the Administration for its cuts in budgets that fund public radio and television and its attempts to relax regulations that require broadcasters to present all sides of opinion on issues as well as provide public service air time.

The same drive for budget cuts will hurt schools, the elderly, the disabled, the unemployed and the disadvantaged, he said, and the assaults on fair regulation are found elsewhere in the Administration's efforts to curb wage and hour and safety and health protections for workers.

He told the delegates that the AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington on Sept. 19 will give union members and their allies the opportunity "to show that there is a deep and abiding sense of solidarity among a huge cross-section of the American people where issues of social justice and fair play are concerned."



THE CONVENTION unanimously re-elected Hillman to his third one-year term. Jackson Beck of New York and Rubin Weiss of Detroit were unanimously re-elected as first and second vice presidents.

Other vice presidents elected are Tom Pettit, Washington; Stan Farber, Los Angeles; Brad Phillips, New York; Mimi Honce, Atlanta; John Sandifer, Seattle; William Burkitt, Dallas; and Frank Maxwell, Los Angeles.

The delegates re-elected Elizabeth Morgan of New York and Peter Cleveland of San Francisco as treasurer and recording secretary.

THE UNION'S highest award, the George Heller Memorial Gold Card, was presented to Rubin Weiss in recognition of contributions to AFTRA and its members.

Other resolutions adopted by the delegates included a call for stepped-up enforcement of contract anti-discrimination clauses, creation of a committee to study the needs of handicapped members, and the establishment of scholarship funds.

IMAGES OF LABOR in art and film are featured in joint summer exhibitions at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington. The exhibition of 32 original works on labor themes by top American artists was commissioned as part of the "Bread and Roses" cultural project of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union's District 1199. The series of 24 labor films, "The Union Makes Us Strong," was compiled by the Service Employees. Viewing a bust of Samuel Gompers at the opening of the exhibitions are, from left, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, District 1199 Executive Sec. Texas Unions Mounting Up For Solidarity Day Rally

Austin, Tex.—A record number of delegates to the Texas AFL-CIO Convention pledged strong support for the Solidarity Day protest in Washington Sept. 19 and state AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard told a press conference that Texas would be well represented at the demonstration.

Hubbard said, "We cannot let the Reagan Administration undo 50 years of social progress without a fight. We've been in the streets before on picket lines, in civil rights marches and in a demonstration of support for a minimum wage for farm workers.

"WE'LL BE IN the streets in Washington on Sept. 19 to let the President know that Americans of conscience still care about retired people's social security, job development for youngsters from poor families, safety rules in workplace and educational opportunity for every child in the country."

Hubbard was re-elected to his fifth two-year term and Joe D. Gunn was re-elected secretary-treasurer. Hubbard is a member of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and Gunn is a member of the Communications Workers.

The delegates unanimously approved an increase in the per capita payment to the state federation from 30 cents to 40 cents a month.

Key speakers included Hispanic civil rights leader Ruben Bonilla, who is general counsel for the National LULAC organization; and Texas NAACP President A. C. Sutton, both of whom told delegates they personally will be in Washington for Solidarity Day along with other members of their organizations.

THE DELEGATES spent a day and a half of the four-day convention in 36 workshops covering topics ranging from grievances to polls, priorities and candidate recruiting.

House Majority Leader Jim Wright, who represents Fort Worth, Tex., in Congress, told delegates that Republicans had cried wolf about the "bankruptcy" of social security for the last 20 years. He stressed that "Congress will not allow the social security system to go bankrupt."

The convention expressed strong opposition to President Reagan's proposed "guest-worker" program, as part of his immigration policies, saying that it would be especially harmful to workers in unskilled and semi-skilled jobs in states along the Mexican border. The state chapter of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement adopted a similar resolution.

HUBBARD TOLD the delegates in his report that membership in the Texas AFL-CIO had increased by 42,000 in the last two years and that it would top 300,000 by mid-August.

The convention put heavy emphasis on fund-raising for the Texas COPE. Cash contributions, pledges and sales of promotional items totaled $143,550.

'Adjustable' Mortgage Safeguards Urged

The AFL-CIO asked Congress to erect stronger safeguards against a proliferation of "adjustable rate" home mortgages that could lead to huge, unpredictable and unaffordable increases in home payments.

Henry B. Schechter, director of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, expressed concern at increasingly permissive home loan regulations that have led to a shift from fixed rate, fixed payment mortgages toward various types of adjustable interest rate loans.

Initially, he noted in testimony before a House Banking, Finance & Urban Affairs subcommittee, restrictions on variable rate mortgages gave homebuyers a reasonable degree of protection against sharp increases in monthly payments.

But "with each successive set of regulations, the disclosure requirements to protect the borrower have been reduced," he testified. "The potential for borrower options as to standard versus adjustable rate mortgages has been significantly eroded, and the shift of interest rate changes from lender to borrower has become practically unlimited."

Schechter noted that a further easing of regulations regarding "balloon payment home loans," which require periodic refinancing of mortgages, has been proposed by the Federal Home Loan Bank Board and would mark a reversion to conditions that existed in the 1920s.

IF ONE OF the proposed regulatory changes had been in effect in December 1977, a homebuyer with a $50,000 mortgage would have seen his monthly mortgage jump from $420 to $621 in just three and one-half years.

He warned that allowing such rapid rises carries the potential for a wave of "defaults, distress sales and foreclosures."

To protect home buyers and to counteract economic instability, the AFL-CIO testimony proposed that all federally chartered or federally insured lenders should be required to make at least half their mortgage loans or purchases fixed rate, fixed payment plans.

Further, borrowers should be given detailed disclosure information that would enable them to make an informed choice as to the type of mortgage they wished.

Schechter urged also that interest rate increases under adjustable mortgages should be limited to one-half percent a year and to a cumulative increase of 3 percent over the life of the mortage.

Experience in California, where variable rate mortgages have been common, and in other countries indicates that higher mortgage costs do not result in more new housing being built, he testified.

SCHECHTER stressed labor's belief that credit controls offer the most effective solution through channeling available funds to loans that serve a desired national goal without pushing up interest rates.

He said the AFL-CIO "applauds" a non-binding "sense of the Congress" resolution introduced in the House by Representatives Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.) and Fernand J. St Germain (D-R.I.) and by District of Columbia Delegate Walter E. Fauntroy. It would call on the Administration to implement a policy of encouraging banks to target available credit on uses that will contribute to increasing productivity and lowering inflation.

THE RESOLUTION should be strengthened to prod the Administration to use the authority it has under the Credit Control Act of 1969, Schechter urged. He also suggested that legislative action be started now to make the Credit Control Act permanent, since it is scheduled to expire next June. The brief use of credit controls contributed to a drop in the mortgage interest rate from 16.25 percent to 12.25 percent during the spring of 1980, he noted.

New Film Focuses On Solidarity Day

A new 7-minute film, "Born Out of Protest," has been produced by the AFL-CIO to promote the Solidarity Day demonstration Sept. 19.

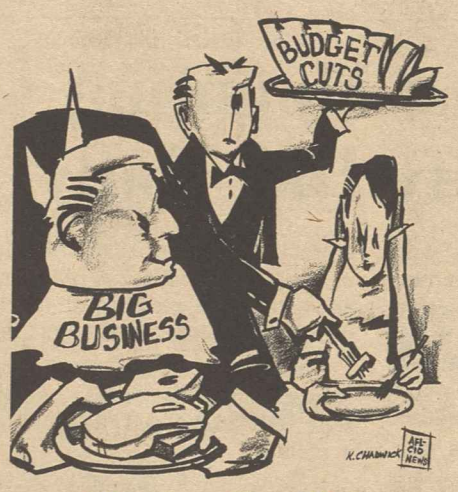
Unions and allied groups can obtain copies of the film from the AFL-CIO Solidarity Day office, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006, telephone (202) 637-5380. Prints will also be available at AFL-CIO regional offices.

The film features interviews with a steelworker, a building tradesman and a parent leaving a day care center, who tell why they will be in Washington Sept. 19. It also traces how American trade unionists were "born to protest" and have marched, demonstrated and picketed for everything they've ever won, including the 8-hour day and women's and civil rights.

Air Traffic Controllers Vote Down Contract

The Air Traffic Controllers asked the government to reopen negotiations immediately, following overwhelming rejection of a tentative contract reached in June.

PATCO President Robert E. Poli said more than 95 percent of the membership voted against ratification of the June 22 pact. The vote, completed this week, showed 13,495 against the agreement and 616 in favor of it.



The union, an affiliate of the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, said that the agreement failed to address certain issues and did not offer adequate monetary benefits or a satisfactory solution to the controllers' work-hours problem.

THE WINNERS AND THE LOS

Budget Cuts Sacrifice Workers and the Needy

When the Reagan Administration's budget went to Congress, Americans were told we must all sacrifice. Now that the budget is nearly completed, it is clear who made the sacrifices —the workers, the children, the retirees, the students, the laid-off and the sick. But no sacrifices by the wealthy and the large corporations.

Here's who is making the sacrifices in the Reagan budget...

The New Equality

Social Security—Eligibility tightened and minimum benefit eliminated for three million elderly people.	$ 11 billion
Medicare—Elderly required to pay more for medical services.	$ 4 billion
Unemployment Insurance—Reduced ability to trigger extended benefits except for short-term, high unempoyment situations.	$ 3 billion
Trade Adjustment Assistance—Eliminated original payment levels; provided reduced benefits available to fewer workers.	$ 3 billion
Federal Employees—Pay increases held to below comparability and full inflation adjustment for retirees eliminated.	$ 17 billion
Comprehensive Employment and Training—Eliminated all public service jobs.	$ 16 billion
Higher Education—Needs test applied for some Guaranteed Student Loans and grants to students from low-income families reduced.	$ 3 billion
Elementary & Secondary Education—Reduced aid where federal facilities place burden on community.	$ 2 billion
Medicaid—Reduced payments to states, causing higher costs or reduced medical care.	$ 3 billion
Food Stamps—Strikers' families and one million working poor eliminated.	$ 6 billion
School Lunch—Costs to children from near-poor families increased.	$ 5 billion
Energy Assistance—Assistance to low-income people with high fuel bills reduced.	$ 2 billion
AFDC—Benefits reduced, primarily those available to the working poor.	$ 4 billion
Housing—Subsidized housing reduced, rents increased, and funds for repairs reduced.	$ 1 billion
Rail—AMTRAK subsidies cut, CONRAIL to be sold in whole or in parts.	$ 2 billion
Highways, Airports & Mass Transit—Funds reduced for construction and purchase of equipment.	$ 5 billion
Maritime—Eliminated funds to rebuild merchant marine.	$0.1 billion
Economic Development—Funds for urban and rural economic development reduced.	$ 2 billion
Postal Service—Postage costs for non-profits, such as labor, religious and education groups increased. Some Post Offices may be closed.	$ 3 billion
Other social service, health, education, nutrition, economic development and energy programs.	$ 48 billion
Total specified cuts	$140 billion
Unspecified cuts in 1983 and 1984	$ 74 billion
Total cumulative cuts by 1984:	$214 billion

And that's only the beginning. The Reagan Administration plans to cut Social Security by $82 billion by 1986, while tax giveaways to the wealthy will continue to grow larger.

*Also reduced $43 billion in new budget authority, which would have been spent in subsequent years.

SERS UNDER REAGANOMICS

Rich and Corporations Get Windfall Tax Cuts

Then, when the Reagan Administration's tax cut package went to Congress, Americans were told it was an "across-the-board" cut for all. But now that the tax bill nears final enactment it's clear who is getting the hefty cuts and a lot more—the rich and the large companies.

By 1984 these will be the giveaways to the rich in the Reagan tax bill...

Room Service

Tax Cuts for Wealthy Persons—About 1/3 of total rate cuts go to those now earning over $50,000—yet they equal only 6% of all taxpayers.	$ 55 billion
Estate and Gift Tax Cuts—Raise combined limit on estates and gifts subject to tax from $175,000 to $600,000.	$ 3 billion
—Slash the tax rate on net estates in excess of $2.5 million from a 70% top mariginal rate to a 50% rate.	$ 1 billion
—Widen special gimmicks for valuing for estate tax purposes for wealthiest farms, woodlands and other business real estate.	$ 1 billion
—Increase annual exemption from gift tax from $6,000 to $20,000 for married ($3,000 to $10,000 for single).	$600 million
Oil Tax Cuts—$2,500 windfall profit tax credit for oil royalty owners, replaced by 2 barrels per day exemption in 1982-1984.	$2.9 billion
—Phased in reduction of windfall profits tax rate on "new" oil from 30% to 15%.	$400 million
—Exempt tax on stripper oil production by independent producers.	$700 million
—Continue percentage depletion deduction for oil and gas production at a 22% rate, instead of scheduled phasedown.	$ 2 billion
Foreign Earned Income—Phased-in exclusion from taxes of $95,000 for Americans working overseas by 1986 plus additional special deductions for housing costs and a shortened overseas residence period to qualify.	$1.5 billion
Extension of so-called Targeted Jobs Tax Credit—Subsidizes employers. Would have otherwise expired at the end of this year.	$500 million
Depreciation—Provides monstrous across-the-board speed-up for businesses whereby government absorbs costs of buildings, equipment and vehicles. Greatest benefactors of these provisions are electric and gas utilities and oil companies.	$55.8 billion
Retirement Funds—Increase and extend individual retirement account provisions which primarily benefit upper income persons.	$3.5 billion
—Double deductions for self-employed individuals (from $7,500 to $15,000) that they can take annually by setting up a retirement for themselves.	$300 million
Unearned Income—Cut top rate on capital gains to 20% and shorten holding period for long-term capital gain treatment.	$600 million
—Create special exemption of $2,000 from tax for savings certificates ($1,000 for single).	$4.7 billion
Tax Straddles—Continue to exempt from tax the income of professional commodity traders. (Would have resulted in a revenue gain for Treasury of $400 million)
Giveaway cuts by 1984:	$133.5 billion

Above are only the outrageous tax giveaways. Overall, the tax reductions amount to far more in individual and business reductions during the next several years, and threaten to cause massive deficits, higher inflation, and more unemployment.

Additional cuts by 1984: $152.6 billion

Total cumulative cuts by 1984: $286.1 billion

The 'Me Too' Tax Cuts

PRESIDENT REAGAN got the tax bill he wanted, and there was rejoicing at the White House. A press aide described the President as "thrilled and jubilant."

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce hailed the "true bipartisan spirit" shown by the House of Representatives, and a wire service bulletin carried the news that the House had given Mr. Reagan "another smashing victory over the Democratic majority."

Indeed, President Reagan won a victory. But he won it before the House voted on a tax bill, and before he made his impassioned television address to the nation.

He won when the Democratic decision-makers chose to abandon previous positions in an effort to come up with a bill so loaded with extra benefits for business groups and especially for the oil industry that the conservative Democrats who had voted with the Republicans on other key votes would simply have to side with the Democrats this time.

THE REPUBLICANS countered by sweetening up their own bill, skewing it even more to the most profitable corporations and their biggest stockholders. By then, neither bill was worthy of labor's support. As AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a statement:

"Both of these bills are designed to bring huge benefits to the corporations and the super rich, at the expense of school children and pensioners, the unemployed, the disabled and the disadvantaged.

"They would take $700 billion out of the federal treasury over the next five years . . . through savage cutbacks in health services, social security, aid to schools, food stamps, unemployment compensation, aid to states and cities, and a long list of other social programs that help people who have no place else to turn.

"BOTH OF THE tax bills would hand over half of the $700 billion to business and the richest 5 percent or so of the population. Neither bill makes any pretense of providing tax cuts where they are most needed, or where they would do the most good in stimulating the economy, creating jobs and getting America moving toward the goal everyone shares — a full-employment economy."

The AFL-CIO statement cites the many and costly tax giveaways to benefit a scant few who are already the most prosperous among us. It notes the array of "savings incentives that totally ignore the needs of those who have nothing to save." And it warns of mortgaging the nation's future to long-term commitments to continuing tax cuts.

So in the end, it didn't really matter which tax bill received the most votes in the House, except as a measure of political muscle.

ONCE AGAIN, the swing votes of conservatives whose ties to the Democratic Party grow fainter and fainter went to the Republicans and the Administration.

It's too bad that, in a futile bid for their votes, mainstream Democrats were so quick to abandon the programs that should distinguish them from their political opponents.

A "me too" policy does not become the party that has for so many years been at the cutting edge of social progress and social justice.

Nation's Economy

Weidenbaum Muddles Outlook With His 'Spongy' Diagnosis

By Gus Tyler

THE NATION'S economy is "spongy," says Murray L. Weidenbaum, chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers.

For those who do not look upon "spongy" as a highly scientific term, Weidenbaum offers an exhilarating explanation: "I use the term spongy deliberately because a sponge is something you can temporarily depress—that is, through monetary and fiscal restraint—and it's an item that bounces back and I anticipate that this economy, being basically healthy, will bounce back."

By this definition, "spongy" becomes an upbeat word that could be used by any mechanic or professional entrusted with the care of broken down people and things. "Doctor," I say, "I am aching and paining all over. What shall I do?" He replies blithely, "Don't worry. You're spongy."

I go to the car mechanic. "My transmission won't work, my tires come off the rims, and my ignition won't ignite. What shall I do?" He replies: "Relax, Mac, your car is spongy."

WEIDENBAUM IS supposed to be a doctor. He is the one man entrusted officially with the responsibility of advising the President of the United States on what has to be done to restore our economic health to maximize employment in this country. He is supposed to come up with a prescription to ease our economic aches and pains. Instead of which he applies a sponge as a soporific, substituting a metaphor for a medicine.

To Weidenbaum's credit, it should be noted that he offers a reason for his spongy language. "My foggy crystal ball doesn't provide a clear set of numbers calibrated that closely." In other words, he doesn't know what's ahead. So instead of saying, "I'm all fogged up," he says that the economy is spongy.

HOW LONG WILL the sponge be depressed? Weidenbaum says that he expects this sad state to continue "until the fourth quarter of 1982."

After that, sometime somehow, the sponge will spring back. Why? Because sponges are spongy.

Intrigued by this notion, I consulted a friend who specializes in both natural and artificial sponges. "If you put downward pressure on a sponge," I queried, "how long will it take for a sponge to spring back?"

"IT WILL SPRING back when you take the pressure off. What are the pressures and how long will they be kept on?"

"The pressures," I quoted Weidenbaum, "are monetary and fiscal restraints imposed by budget cuts and by high interest rates decreed by the Federal Reserve Board."

"Never heard of such pressures on a sponge before," said my friend, "but when will they be lifted?"

"They'll be lifted," I explained, "after the sponge springs back."

"IN THAT CASE," said my friend, "the sponge will never return to its normal state."

"But Dr. Weidenbaum says it will spring back by 1983," I said.

"Never heard of him," said my friend. "I guess his specialty is not sponges. He's probably an economist. They're spongy."

The Original Plan

A 3rd Party to Social Security

The following article by J. Douglas Brown appeared as a letter to the editor of the New York Times, May 22, 1977, and its point remains valid today. The author headed the Social Security Advisory Council in 1937-38 and was a member of four succeeding councils.

IT IS SURPRISING to one who has participated in the developing of the Old Age Survivors & Disability Insurance program (social security) since 1934 to read statements that government contributions to the system would undermine the integrity of the program, causing dire results. The planners of OASDI took precisely the opposite view. They were convinced that, as the system matured, government contributions would be necessary and fully justified to preserve the integrity of the system.

The Advisory Council on Social Security of 1937-38, which laid down the basic framework of OASDI as it has since operated, made in its final report of Dec. 10, 1938, the following recommendations on financing:

"I. Since the nation as a whole, independent of the beneficiaries of the system, will derive a benefit from the old-age security program, it is appropriate that there be federal financial participation in the old-age insurance system by means of revenues derived from sources other than payroll taxes.

"II. The principle of distributing the eventual cost of the old-age insurance system by means of approximately equal contributions by employers, employees and the government is sound and should be definitely set forth in the law when tax provisions are amended."

The signers of these unanimous recommendations included six representatives of labor, thirteen representatives of the public and six representatives of employers. Among the members were the chairmen or presidents of United States Steel, General Electric, Curtis Publishing, Provident Mutual Life Insurance and the Bowery Savings Bank and the treasurer of Eastman Kodak. The AFL and CIO, the National Association of Manufacturers and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce were ably represented. The council held many meetings over more than a year.

THE PLANNERS of the old-age insurance program estimated that government contributions would be needed by 1962 to offset the accrued liability assumed by the system in the early years in lifting millions of our people from old-age needs-test relief fully financed from general taxes.

To introduce government contributions now would, step by step, be fulfilling a proper and justifiable plan for financing a mature and effective system of contributing social insurance based on the mutual responsibility of the employees, employers and the general taxpayers of the country in protecting our people against hardship caused by old age, disability or premature death, without dependence upon needs-test relief.

Protection from Chiselers

Davis-Bacon Tenets Still Valid

The following is from an article by Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., in the Washington Post, June 25, 1981.

THE DAVIS-BACON ACT was motivated by problems arising on a program of federal public works begun in 1926. A few unscrupulous contractors had decided that the way to win government work was to cut wages well below the locally prevailing level in order to underbid competitors. The result was that federal projects often led to disruption of wages and working conditions within the project area.

The basic principles that led to the passage of the Davis-Bacon Act are still valid today. Incentives still exist for contractors to use wage cutting as a device for winning government contracts, and persistently high unemployment still makes construction workers vulnerable to wage-cutting pressures.

The charge by Davis-Bacon opponents that the law is little more than a device to impose union wage rates on all federal construction, even in areas where these rates do not prevail, is completely unfounded. In fact, a majority of all Davis-Bacon wage rates are set below union scales.

The general accuracy of Davis-Bacon determinations was confirmed in a 1976 study by the Council on Wage & Price Stability, which found that these wages are not typically higher than actual average wages in the communities studied.

There is also the complaint that building trades workers are overpaid and that it is our rapidly escalating wages that are the cause of inflation in constructon.

It is true that hourly wages are relatively high in construction. However, because of time between jobs, seasonal shutdowns and the periodic depressions that plague our industry, few building trades workers are able to work year round. This high unemployment means the average annual income in construction is below that in sectors such as manufacturing and transportation.

ANYWAY, IT IS not wages that are pushing up construction costs. Over the past five years, construction wages have risen at an average rate of 6 percent per year, while material prices and financing costs have increased by 9 percent per year, and the profits of large construction contractors have increased by 13 percent per year.

Efforts at controlling construction costs should be directed at items that are causing the problem —land costs, interest rates, material prices—not at reducing the wages and living standards of construction workers.

Religion-Labor Conference

Common Goals Spur Coalition

STRENGTHENING the ties between the union and religious communities to work more effectively for common goals is the thrust of the newly formed Religion and Labor Conference, Director Alan Kistler of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services said on a network radio interview.

Kistler, a co-chairman of the conference, said the group will serve as "a focal point for exchange of information" that will help local coalitions work to ease community problems, such as housing, employment, plant closings and cutbacks of unemployment insurance, workers' compensation and other worker protections.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Kistler said that the "ultimate binding element" between religion and labor is that "the roots of both run in the soil of Judeo-Christian teachings of justice, fairness and respect for human dignity."

Both institutions, he stressed, have not only concern for the poor, the underprivileged, the disadvantaged and the distressed, but also a "history and tradition of action to implement those concerns into the lives of people."

Kistler said the coalition is not directed at increasing union membership. "That," he said, "would be to exploit the natural affinity" between religion and labor.

HE POINTED OUT that the fundamentals of unionism—"fraternity, justice, respect for human dignity and the improvement of the commonwealth"—draw a positive response from those whose religious affiliation commits them to the same basic objectives. He said that is why the religious community has often "taken a leading role in supporting a labor objective, whether it be a J. P. Stevens boycott or an organizing drive.

"We want to develop those ties," he stressed.

Reporters questioning Kistler on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Stephenie Overman, of the National Catholic News Service and Doug Harbrecht of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The program is aired weekly on Mutual Radio.

By Press Associates, Inc.

IN 1980, falling water produced 23 percent of the world's electricity, accounting for 5 percent of total world consumption of energy. But most of the world's hydropower potential remains untapped.

The technically usable water potential is 19,000 trillion watt-hours, produced at dams with a capacity of 2,214,700 megawatts. By contrast, the total world hydro production currently is only 1,300 trillion watt-hours, generated by dams with a capacity of 363,000 megawatts.

A new study by Worldwatch Institute stressed that if all economically available hydropower were harnessed, it would be sufficient to meet most of the world's electricity needs.

David Deudney says in Rivers of Energy: The Hydropower Potential that "hydropower promises to be a cornerstone of a sustainable energy economy in the post-petroleum era . . . Hydropower is clean, renewable, and, above all, an inflation-proof energy source."

UNLIKE FOSSIL fuels, water power resources are dispersed throughout the world. In more than 35 countries, falling water already generates more than two-thirds of the electricity.

The modern era of large-dam construction, Deudney notes, can be traced to the establishment of the Tennessee Valley Authority in 1933. This governmental body was given broad powers to build dams, borrow money and condemn private property to promote rural electrification, control soil erosion, improve navigation, harness power, and create recreational facilities.

TVA, which organized construction throughout an area of a million square miles, spread the benefits of its programs among thousands of small farmers and townspeople.

SUCCESSFUL hydroelectric projects have made similar contributions in developing countries. In Egypt, for example, the power from Aswan Dam electrified 99 percent of the nation's villages and created many jobs in labor-intensive local industries.

However, the study notes, there can be problems in developing nations where construction of large facilities brings soil erosion, water-borne diseases and dislocation of population. Such problems can be largely avoided through small-scale plants. In China, some 90,000 small hydro units built since 1968 provide electric light and power for rural industries.

In the industrial world, the United States and, to a lesser degree, Europe, Japan and the Soviet Union have many existing dams that have become viable sources of power due to rising oil prices.

In the United States, just since World War II, nearly 3,000 dams have been abandoned. Fewer than 3 percent of dams in this country currently generate electricity. At stake is as much as 50,000 megawatts of electricity—which could meet about 10 percent of the nation's energy needs.

The federal government has taken steps to encourage small-dam restoration including offering low-interest loans to investors and boosting tax depreciation benefits. The most wide-ranging stimulus is the "limited power producer" section of the 1978 public utility regulatory law. Private utilities now are required to buy power from small producers and to pay for it at a rate equal to the utilities' "incremental cost"—in most cases, what the utility would have to pay for new coal or nuclear capacity.

THESE GOVERNMENT incentives help overcome the high costs of renovating abandoned dams which, once refurbished and maintained, provide an inflation-proof source of energy that can last for centuries, Deudney points out.

He also suggests that the United States develop the 140,000 megawatt hydro potential in Alaska, at the same time raising power rates in more settled regions. Alaska would benefit from the new jobs created and the Pacific Northwest could avoid expensive fossil and nuclear plants.

COALITION of labor and religion to work for common goals in the tradition and history of both institutions is the aim of the newly formed Religion and Labor Conference, Director Alan Kistler, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services said on Labor News Conference. Kistler, who co-chairs the organization, was questioned by Stephenie Overman of the National Catholic News Service and Doug Harbrecht of Scripps-Howard newspapers.

Merger Voted By Aluminum, Brick Unions to carry forward the struggle to fulfill the hopes and aspirations of the members you're privileged to represent."

Donahue pointed out that since the 1955 merger of the AFL and the CIO, 39 affiliates of the federation have merged. He said the federation will continue to assist other affiliates seeking voluntary mergers and to work to resolve any technical problems they may encounter.

Officials of the two unions have been conducting merger discussions for the past two years. The ABC will be based in Bridgeton, Mo., a suburb of St. Louis, where the Aluminum Workers now has its headquarters.

THE PRIMARY focus of the convention was on the drafting of the ABC's constitution and bylaws. The per capita payment for the new union will be based on the equivalent of two hours pay per month, a schedule that is carried over from the Aluminum Workers' bylaws.

The Brick & Clay Workers trace their history to the late 1800s to the Terra Cotta Workers Alliance organized by the Knights of Labor. The union was chartered in 1893 by the AFL as the International Brick, Tile & Terra Cotta Workers Alliance. In 1915, it adopted its present name, the United Brick & Clay Workers of America.

THE ALUMINUM WORKERS were chartered as an organizing committee by the AFL in 1932 to represent workers in what was then a relatively new industry. A number of local unions were formed during the next two decades, and the Aluminum Workers International Union was chartered as an affiliate of the AFL in 1953.

Major convention speakers included President Frank Drozak of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept., Sec.-Treas. Earl McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and Howard Chester of the Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee.

PILOT PROGRAM to encourage grass roots lobbying support for AFL-CIO legislative goals gets off the ground at the first meeting of the Connecticut 4th Congressional District Legislative Action Committee. COPE Regional Director Madeline Matchko explains the new program to some 70 members of 25 local unions at the committee's meeting in New Haven, organized with the help of the Connecticut AFL-CIO President John J. Driscoll. Frank Carrano, president of the New Haven Central Labor Council is standing at center.

OSHA Grants Exceptions To Tighter Lead Standards

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has initiated a long-delayed provision to improve safeguards for workers with high levels of lead in their blood, but at the same time it granted temporary variances from the tighter restrictions to about 30 firms, including several major lead smelters.

If the firms meet certain conditions, they can be exempt from the provision for up to a year. Primary and secondary smelters, as well as some battery manufacturers, had sought an industry-wide one-year delay in lowering the "trigger level" on blood tests for removing workers from jobs with high exposure to lead.

AS IT IS, OSHA's Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter held up implementation of the lower trigger level for all lead industries except primary and secondary smelters from Mar. 1 until May 15. For companies that don't qualify for the variance, the provision went into effect July 21.

Under the 1978 federal lead standard, which the Supreme Court upheld in rejecting challenges by the lead industry and the Reagan Administration, employers are required to transfer workers with high blood lead levels to other jobs in the workplace without loss of pay or other rights.

The new trigger level for medical removal is 60 micrograms of lead per 100 grams of blood, a reduction of 10 micrograms from the previous level. The affected workers may be returned to their regular jobs after the lead level in their blood drops to 40 micrograms.

AN ESTIMATED 800,000 U.S. workers face the threat of lead poisoning from high exposure to the metal on the job. About 7,500 workers are expected to be affected by the variances OSHA is granting.

High levels of exposure to lead can result in anemia, kidney failure, nervous system disorders, brain damage and death.

Mike Wright, industrial hygienist for the Steelworkers, called the OSHA action denying an industry-wide delay of the new trigger "a partial victory" for workers. Although OSHA is now meeting the provision that it should have instituted in March, Wright said, the job safety agency still is giving too much latitude to the companies by granting variances.

'81 Pay Boosts Average 11.3% For First Year

or re-established in four agreements covering 42,000 workers, and dropped in seven agreements covering 25,000 workers.

SETTLEMENTS with cost-of-living provisions generally tend to yield lower basic wage increases than those without such clauses. Possible future COL adjustments, however, add to the base. First-year wage increases negotiated in the first six months of the year averaged 7.6 percent in agreements with COL clauses compared with 12.3 percent in those without such provisions, BLS said. Wage adjustments over the life of the agreements averaged 6.3 percent and 10 percent annually, respectively.

BLS said that in the first half of this year 2.9 million workers received COL increases under major agreements. The average gain for these workers was 3.5 percent, or two-thirds of the rise in consumer prices during the months of COL review.

An additional 2.2 million workers under COL clauses did not receive pay increases from this source, BLS said, because their contracts did not call for review, the maximum increase already had been granted, or the government's consumer price index had not risen to the level necessary to trigger a COL increase under their contracts.

DURING THE current July-September quarter, 104 major agreements covering 343,000 workers are due to expire or may be reopened for wage negotiations.

Kirkland Warns Social Cuts Threaten Support for Defense

Chicago—Vital popular support for defense spending could be weakened by slashes in social programs, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland asserted in a speech before the national convention of the Fraternal Order of Eagles here.

The AFL-CIO has been a "consistent and steadfast" supporter of strong defense policies "as a requirement for survival in a dangerous world," Kirkland said. He stressed that in a democracy cuts in needed social programs such as social security, jobs programs and aid to cities, coupled with tax cuts for the rich, can undermine public support necessary to maintain high levels of military spending.

"It makes no sense," Kirkland told the delegates, "for an Administration dedicated to repairing America's standing in the world to create new anti-defense constituencies among the elderly, the jobless, the working poor, the minorities, the sick and the disabled."

All Americans must feel that they have a stake in the survival of our society, Kirkland said, pointing out that such feelings of anticipation have been "enhanced by federal programs that have cushioned our economy against unemployment, created jobs, eased poverty, attacked discrimination, trained the unskilled, taught the young and helped the needy."

Referring to Administration statements that Americans are entitled to nothing from the federal government, Kirkland pointed out that the Constitution requires the federal government to "provide for the common defense and the general welfare."

"THE AMERICAN people are entitled to both," Kirkland emphasized. "They are not required to choose one or the other. That is the mandate of the Constitution. It supersedes any other mandate, real or imagined, which the Administration labors to extract from last November."

Kirkland was given the fraternal order's Murray-Green Award, named after the late CIO President Philip Murray and the late AFL President William Green who had both been active in the organization. The award was established to recognize the long-term relationship between the organization and the labor movement.

Kirkland praised the Eagles for their efforts since their founding in support of programs that aid workers and their families, including workers' compensation, health care and social security.

First Backpay Checks Sent To Darlington Mills Victims

Winston-Salem, N.C.—This time the check really is in the mail for some 400 former employees of Darlington Mills in South Carolina.

The first mailing of back pay checks that will total nearly $5 million has been sent from the National Labor Relations Board regional office here to former workers at the Deering-Milliken textile factory that slammed its doors in 1956 after employees voted to be represented by the Textile Workers.

The settlement was worked out in December 1980 by NLRB General Counsel William A. Lubbers between the union, now ACTWU, and Milliken. It ends the union's 25-year struggle for just treatment of the 525 Darlington workers who lost their jobs when the mill shut down. Milliken, after decades of protracted legal stalls, agreed to the settlement when the Supreme Court upheld the NLRB decision that the company violated the law when it closed the plant as punishment for the union vote.

Amounts of the checks range from a few dollars to more than $30,000. The first checks went to 380 living former employees, and checks to heirs of the 144 deceased workers will be mailed shortly. The settlement will be complete when the probate problems concerning a final group of heirs are resolved.

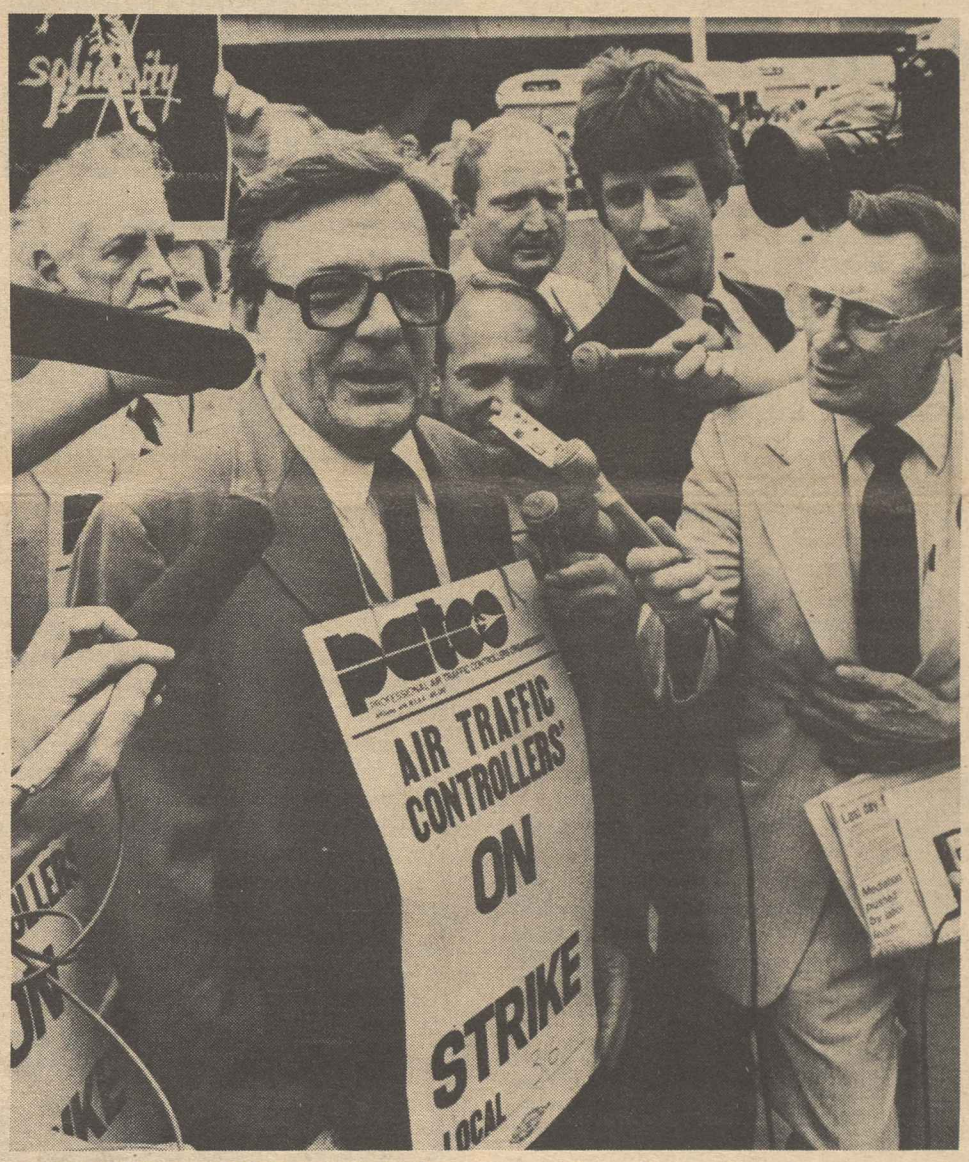
Striking Air Controllers Supported, Kirkland Blasts Government Tactics

By James M. Shevis

Chicago—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland assailed the Reagan Administration's "brutal, repressive" measures against striking air traffic controllers, and the federation's Executive Council called on the Administration to resolve the dispute through negotiations instead of mass firings.

"Punitive measures are no substitute for fair dealing," the council said. It urged "joint and constructive efforts to work out a settlement that will be fair to the controllers, the government and the flying public."



AS THE LABOR movement rallied to its support, the 13,000-member Professional Air Traffic Controllers (PATCO) held firm in its determination to achieve a redress of long-festering grievances from the Federal Aviation Administration, which employs its members at air traffic control and regional routing centers across the nation.

Neither massive fines against the union and its members nor wholesale dismissals and the jailing of at least five striking controllers succeeded in cracking the union's solidarity.

If anything, the jailings stiffened the determination of members of PATCO, an autonomous affiliate of the Marine Engineers. And the sight on national television of one striker being led to an Alexandria, Va., jail in handcuffs and leg irons after telling a federal judge he intended to stay on strike brought phone calls of protest from outraged viewers.

"THE INCARCERATION of our people hasn't helped," PATCO President Robert Poli said, adding that the union would challenge the government's actions. "I

Asks Strong Outpouring On Sept. 19

By John M. Barry

Chicago—The AFL-CIO General Board sounded the call for a strong outpouring of trade unionists to protest the Reagan Administration's attack on social programs and workers' rights.

"We intend to demonstrate our disapproval by our presence in Washington, D.C., on Sept. 19—Solidarity Day," the board declared in a unanimous resolution.

IT RECOUNTED the record of the first seven months of the Administration, starting with its budget-balancing slashes in aid for the needy, ranging through its efforts to block or weaken job safety and health protections, and culminating in the top-heavy tax cut just enacted by Congress.

Organized labor cannot "watch from the sidelines" as this counter-revolution is "consolidated on the backs of workers," Federation President Lane Kirkland told the board.

"It is time to call up the ranks," he said. "It is time to muster our friends and allies. It is time to draw upon our ultimate source of strength, and to call upon those in whose name we speak to come forth in a display of solidarity for a humane and fair America."

KIRKLAND'S ADDRESS opened the one-day meeting of the board, which is made up of Executive Council members and principal officers of affiliated national and international unions and constitutional departments. With leaders of many state and local central bodies also participating, registration for the session reached 250, despite travel delays during the Air Traffic Controllers' strike.

The delegates also were given a preview of the new film, "A Time of Challenge," prepared for showing around the country as part of the federation's centennial observance. At the afternoon session, given over to discussion of plans and arrangements for Solidarity Day, they viewed another film, "Born Out of Protest," designed to promote participation in the Sept. 19 demonstration.

The board's resolution, introduced by Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, called on "all affiliates, departments and state and local central bodies to give top priority to the success of Solidarity Day and commit all necessary resources to assure an effec-

Council Brands Reagan Policies 'Class Warfare'

Chicago—The Reagan Administration is imposing economic policies on the nation that will put more people out of work, aggravate inflation and bring greater inequity to the American economy, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

"These policies add up to class warfare against the poor and the working people of America," the council declared.

IT DENOUNCED the central elements of the Reagan program—sharp slashes in essential social programs coupled with tax cuts favoring the wealthy and giant corporations, along with encouragement of the Federal Reserve Board's high-interest rate policy that stifles production and fuels inflation instead of curbing it.

The council reaffirmed the federation's alternative program put forth six months ago with emphasis on specific inflation-fighting measures, a job-creating reindustrialization program, and a fair tax system to restore consumer buying power.

The statement on the national economy was one of a series on domestic issues, trade union matters and international affairs adopted at the council's summer meeting here.

THE MEETING opened with a memorial tribute to Vice President Fred Kroll, who died in Philadelphia only four days earlier.

The council welcomed to its membership Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, who was elected to fill a vacancy created by the resignation of Vice President Emmet Andrews, former head of the Postal Workers. (Story, page 2.)

Throughout the meeting, the council received reports on the status of the Air Traffic Controllers' strike, which began hours before the session opened. A council statement expressed solid support for PATCO's position in the dispute and called on the government to abandon its "punitive measures" against the union and engage in "frank and open" bargaining. (Story, this page.)

During the noon break on the final day of the meeting, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland led council members as they joined PATCO strikers on the picket line at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport.

In its statement on the national economy, the council recalled that at its February meeting it had described President Reagan's program as "a high-risk gamble with the future of America, with workers and the poor taking the lion's share of the risk" and the only sure winners being wealthy individuals and corporations.

"THE PASSING months have confirmed this judgment," the council said.

It saw little prospect under the Reagan program for progress in combating joblessness, which has grown by 2 million persons in the past two years, or in the long-term fight against inflation.

"The Administration's policies on energy, housing, taxes, interest rates and money supply will make inflation worse," the statement observed.

Nor is there any likelihood of a significant reduction soon in the sky-high interest rates, which have seen the bank prime rate shoot above 20 percent and mortgage rates above 16 percent.

Yet, interest rates must be reduced, the council insisted.

"THE HIGH COST of money spreads throughout the economy," it noted, "and is built into the cost of all goods and services. Credit controls and selective credit regulation are needed to stop unproductive speculation and corporate takeovers and to target investment in housing, agriculture, small business and other basic

AUTO WORKERS President Douglas A. Fraser is welcomed as a member of the AFL-CIO Executive Council by Federation President Lane Kirkland. Fraser was elected a vice president of AFL-CIO at the council's meeting in Chicago.

UAW's Fraser Welcomed To Executive Council Seat

Chicago — Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser was elected to the Executive Council as a vice president of the AFL-CIO, marking a return of UAW representation to the ranks of the federation's leadership.

Fraser was nominated by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and elected unanimously by the council to fill a vacancy created by the resignation of Vice President Emmet Andrews, former president of the Postal Workers.

THE COUNCIL earlier had accepted Andrews's resignation with "deep regret," lauding his "diligence and devotion to the cause of democracy and human rights" during his service on the council and as a leader of the Postal Workers.

Fraser, who led the 1.3-million-member UAW to reaffiliation with the AFL-CIO effective last July 1, has been president of the union since 1977. Before that he had been a vice president of the UAW for seven years and a member of its executive board since 1962.

He was born in Scotland Dec. 18, 1916, and came to this country with his parents at the age of 6. After attending Detroit schools, he went to work as a metal finisher in the DeSoto plant of Chrysler Corp. when he was 18.

FRASER SOON became active in UAW Local 227 and was elected to various offices culminating with the local presidency in 1943. He joined the UAW staff as an international representative in 1947 and four years later became an administrative assistant to UAW President Walter P. Reuther. He was elected co-director of Region 1A in 1959, and at the 1962 convention, delegates elected him to his first term as a member of the UAW executive board.

Fraser has been associated with Chrysler bargaining throughout his service with the UAW. He led negotiations that won the union's pacesetting early retirement program in 1964, the first U.S.-Canada wage parity agreement in 1967, and the auto industry settlement pattern in 1973 following a nine-day strike.

When Chrysler agreed to union representation on its board of directors, Fraser was elected to a seat on the board at the company's 1980 stockholders' meeting.

HE HOLDS office or membership in numerous labor, civic and governmental bodies, including the presidency of the World Automotive Council of the International Metalworkers' Federation.

Even before the UAW's reaffiliation, he worked closely with AFL-CIO officers as chairman of the Committee for National Health Insurance and member of the executive committee of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights. He is on the boards of the Full Employment Action Council, the NAACP and the National Urban Coalition, among other organizations.

Tributes to Kroll Cite Leadership And Dedication

Chicago—Fred J. Kroll, the late president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, was honored by the AFL-CIO Executive Council as a "forceful, faithful, and inspiring" union leader whose early death is "a tragic blow" to his family, his union and the trade union movement.

Kroll, who had also been an AFL-CIO vice president, died July 30 of leukemia at the age of 45.

The council cited Kroll as "a respected representative and spokesman of a younger generation of trade unionists." At the time of his election, he was the youngest person ever elected to the Executive Council.

KROLL BROUGHT to the AFL-CIO's governing body "a combination of buoyant optimism and energy, long with moral strength, intellectual power and seasoned judgment, grounded in the highest traditions of the American trade union movement," the council said.

His "counsel and companionship enriched us," his colleagues said.

BRAC's own executive council, in a tribute to Kroll, said his example "will guide us as we carry on the struggle to achieve the goals for which he worked and in which he so steadfastly believed: the good fight for human dignity, responsive democratic institutions and action for economic justice for all working people."

Funeral services were held Aug. 3 at the Church of the Little Flower, Bethesda, Md. and burial was at St. Gabriel's Cemetery in Potomac, Md. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue represented the federation at the services.

Otter Confirmed to Head Wage & Hour Division

The Senate confirmed William M. Otter as head of the Labor Dept.'s Wage & Hour Division. A 58-year-old attorney from Kentucky, he is the seventh Reagan appointee confirmed for a Labor Dept. post.

One other nominee is awaiting confirmation, while four presidential appointments at the department remain to be filled. Still to be confirmed is the appointment of Ford Barney Ford as head of the Mine Safety & Health Administration.

Vigorous Defense Pledged

Deregulation Drive Hit As Assault on Workers

Chicago—"The Reagan Administration is engaged in a broad attack on regulations designed to protect workers," the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged, and it pledged a vigilant defense of those safeguards in the courts.

The council said the Administration's objective is "to gut standards already on the books, to postpone indefinitely standards which were scheduled to go into effect, to reinterpret existing regulations so as to narrow their scope, and to generally reduce enforcement so that employers may violate with impunity."

TO ACHIEVE its purpose—"pro-business, regulation-free environment"—the Administration has filled key posts with unqualified, inexperienced officials and has allowed the Office of Management & Budget to "usurp" the decision-making authority on regulations, the council charged.

Its statement focused on three areas of particular concern to workers—prevailing wage laws, the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

On the Davis-Bacon Act, which requires the payment of prevailing wages on federally financed construction projects, the council noted that the Reagan Administration had embargoed revised regulations developed after lengthy review and issued last January. In their place the Administration is considering new changes that would no longer protect community wage standards and permit employers to compete for government contracts on the basis of cut-rate wages and classifications.

UNDER THE Service Contract Act, half of all contracts currently covered would be excluded by an Administration proposal to apply the law's prevailing wage requirements only to contracts "principally for services" rather than those "substantially for services."

The Administration also is seeking to undercut the wage protections of the Urban Mass Transit Act, which insure workers in the mass transit industry that their basic wages, working conditions and job security will be maintained.

On the Fair Labor Standards Act, the council said Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan "has been sending mixed signals," leading strike force raids on apparel sweatshops while at the same time proposing to lift the ban on industrial homework in eight industries.

Donovan also has reduced the number of compliance officers to enforce the federal wage-hour law, while advocating stricter penalties for non-compliance, the council noted.

And the Secretary at first said he would withhold any recommendation on a subminimum wage for youth until after the Minimum Wage Study Commission completed its work, only to announce within a month after the commission issued its report that he supports such a subminimum for disadvantaged young people.

Also, Donovan still has a "freeze" on the rule issued last January that would have increased the minimum salary test for a worker to be considered a true executive, administrative or professional employee and thus exempt from the law's requirement of time and one-half pay for overtime beyond 40 hours a week. Under the present law, such a worker can be paid only $155 a week for a 48-hour week, whereas a non-exempt worker earning the minimum wage would receive $174 for the same workweek.

"IT IS OUR view that the title of executive or administrator is small consolation for a legal 'subminimum' wage," the council observed.

On the job safety law, the council said the Administration "has moved swiftly and deliberately to wipe out major gains in worker protection of the past four years." It cited the illegal postponement, weakening or revocation of standards on exposure to cotton dust and lead, hazards identification, walkaround compensation, hearing conservation, cancer policy, and access to medical records.

And while the Supreme Court has upheld the AFL-CIO's position that the requirement of cost-benefit analysis in the development of safety and health standards is prohibited by the OSHA law, the Administration has announced that it will simply substitute "cost-effectiveness" studies in its continuing effort to weaken these standards.

IN ADDITION, enforcement of existing standards is being watered down through reliance on inadequate state plans and drastic cuts in staff, the council pointed out.

"The AFL-CIO will continue to monitor the actions of this Administration as they affect worker standards," the statement pledged. "If the officials charged with the enforcement of labor laws continue to undermine them, we will bring appropriate legal action to enforce the laws that were established to protect basic worker standards."

Coors Boycott to Continue 'Until Justice Is Obtained'

Chicago — The nationwide AFL-CIO boycott of Coors beer will continue "until justice is obtained for Coors workers," the federation's Executive Council pledged.

The four-year-old boycott has played a role in forcing down Coors sales, market shares and income, the council pointed out, noting that the Colorado-based brewery has been knocked out of its formerly dominant sales position in three states where the boycott has had broad

Coors' sales volume in its nine prime markets has declined, a council report noted.

THE COUNCIL keyed the success of the boycott to support by union members, state and local labor councils, other interested organizations, and AFL-CIO constitutional departments, particularly the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

In its statement, the council urged continued backing of the action, including increased financial aid.

The boycott was launched in April 1977 when members of the AFL-CIO directly affiliated local union at the Golden, Colo., brewery struck over company harassment, discriminatory practices, violations of privacy and other policies "against worker dignity."

The union was decertified as a result of a management-initiated election in which only striker replacements were allowed to vote.

"THE CONDITIONS that compelled the Coors union employees to strike for human dignity, a decent contract and genuine collective bargaining still prevail," the council pointed out, noting that the boycott continues wih the full support of the labor movement.

The council called for "all affiliates, central bodies, organizations and others concerned with corporate decency in the workplace" to step up their support of the boycott, including financial aid.

public investment essential to productivity, essential to fighting inflation and essential to economic progress."

The council stressed its continued commitment to the "detailed and specific" alternative economic program it adopted six months ago, calling for policies to deal effectively and fairly with the causes of inflation and the weaknesses that prolong unemployment.

"We declared that such policies must deal with the basic causes of inflation and must concentrate on putting America back to work," the statement said. "Such policies must include adequate resources to provide needed investment in specific industrial and geographic sectors within an overall full employment program that meets the commitments of the Humphrey-Hawkins Full Employment & Balanced Growth Act."

IN OTHER statements, the council assailed the Reagan Administration's "backward" philosophy of government that forms the basis for its "trickledown" economic policies, its tax-cutting spree favoring business and the wealthy at the expense of workers, its attack on federal regulations that protect workers, its moves to weaken civil rights enforcement, and its drive to "gut" the social security system.

The Administration drew a sharp warning from the council that it risks shattering the national consensus for a stronger defense if it pays for massive boosts in the military budget by continuing to slash domestic programs that aid low-income groups.

The council also called for a thorough review and overhaul of the nation's immigration policy, voicing deep concern at the shortcomings of the Administration's proposals in this area. Other statements stressed labor's firm opposition to the deregulation of natural gas prices while urging renewal of the President's standby authority to impose oil price controls and gasoline rationing in an emergency, called for measures "to check the monopolization of America" through corporate takeovers, supported the Ohio AFL-CIO in its fight to preserve the exclusive state fund for workers' compensation, urged an end to the discrimination against Vietnam war veterans and called on the nation to "give them the honors and benefits traditionally extended to veterans, supported renewal of the manufacturing clause in the U.S. copyright law to prevent decimation of the American book publishing industry, and proposed a series of safeguards for states adopting short-time jobless benefit programs for reduced workweeks to avoid layoffs.

THE COUNCIL also reviewed the boycott of Coors Brewing Co. products, found it effective, and urged increased support by the labor movement and consumers.

In the area of international affairs, the council called for an American policy on human rights keyed to the "universal principle" of freedom of independent association no matter what the character of a country's ruling authority may be. It also took note of the 20th anniversary of the construction of the Berlin Wall and called for its destruction as a violation of the Helsinki Accord. Another statement urged a strong American protest against the South African government's latest arrests and intimidation of trade union leaders.

In the course of its sessions, the council viewed films and television spots designed to promote the Solidarity Day protest and the federation's centennial observance. Kirkland and Solidarity Day coordinator John Perkins gave reports on preparations for the march in Washington, Sept. 19, and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue reported on materials developed by the federation or in the works to commemorate the AFL-CIO's 100th anniversary.

The council also viewed and heard another film and tapes of radio announcements developed to counteract the National Right to Work Committee campaign to apply the Hobbs Act's anti-racketeering penalties against unionists—but not employer representatives—who engage in picket-line scuffles.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL is briefed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at its summer meeting in Chicago. Council members adopted statements covering a wide range of issues, including worker protections, the nation's economy, slashes in social programs by the Reagan Administration and international affairs.

KIRKLAND AND International Rep. Irving Brown, the U.S. worker delegate to the International Labor Organization, reported on the AFL-CIO's participation in the ILO meeting at Geneva in June. William Doherty, executive director of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, filled in the council on the situation in El Salvador and the efforts of trade unionists there to press ahead with the land reform program against the opposition of both the left and the right.

The council approved the creation by the AFL-CIO of a Labor Institute for Public Affairs, as recommended in a report of the public relations committee presented by Vice President Glenn Watts. As envisioned, the institute would provide expertise on disseminating information via various media technologies, such as cable and satellite TV, commercial and public service time on networks and local stations, public radio and television, with special attention to how labor can achieve maximum results with limited funds.

Committee reports also were presented by Vice President Lloyd McBride and Organization Director Alan Kistler on organizing and field services, Vice President J. C. Turner on the campaign to encourage voluntary COPE checkoff clauses, Social Security Director Bert Seidman on investment of union pension funds, and Vice President Murray Finley on mergers.

Donahue gave detailed reports from the finance committee and on the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust.

THE COUNCIL voted contributions to the following organizations: League for Industrial Democracy, National Society to Prevent Blindness, Human Resources Development Institute, National Planning Association, Citizens for Tax Justice, Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition, Economics Education Foundation for the Clergy, Jewish Labor Committee, Frontlash, NAACP, United Negro College Fund, and the International Labor Program of Georgetown University.

The next council meeting will be held in Washington, Sept. 18, the day before Solidarity Day.

tive, powerful expression of protest against the policies of the Reagan Administration."

AFL-CIO Vice President Peter Bommarito, speaking for the council in strong support of the resolution, said Solidarity Day is "a fitting expression of who we are, what we do and why we trade unionists banded together in the first place."

BOMMARITO, the president of the Rubber Workers, ran down the list of offenses against workers:

- The "calloused and brazen" attempt to undermine the Occupational Safety & Health Act and the Mine Safety Act.
- The effort to impose federal criminal sanctions against strikers involved in picket-line altercations, but not against management representatives committing the same offenses.
- The assault on prevailing wage protections that cover employees of federal contractors.
- The undermining of overtime standards under the Walsh-Healey Act.
- An economic "game plan" that encourages record high interest rates, threatens rising unemployment and fails to contain inflation.
- Income tax policies that shift an ever greater share of the burden to the paychecks of workers.
- The move to slash social security benefits for the elderly, widows and their children, and the disabled.

Throughout that litany, Bommarito said, "the common theme is to repress workers and quiet the voice they can express through their unions."

In discussion from the floor, a dozen speeches representing a broad cross-section of American unions were as one in condemning the Reagan Administration's policies and pledging strong participation by their members in the Solidarity Day protest in September.

KIRKLAND OBSERVED that President Reagan himself issued the challenge to organized labor that led to the call for Solidarity Day. He referred to Reagan's comment on union officials last Feb. 19 that "I happen to think that sometimes they're out of step with their own rank and file. They certainly were in the last election."

"Reagan has thrown down the gauntlet," Kirkland observed. "He claims his victims as allies. He would make working people accomplices in his assault on their interests.

"I do not believe that we can quietly turn our backs and walk away from this challenge, and still be true to our mandate. . . .

"We are not free to pick and choose our principles according to public opinion polls or media fashions.

"WE ARE NOT free to favor social security one day and acquiesce in its dismemberment the next. . . .

"We are not free to favor the minimum wage, health and safety regulations, unemployment insurance, aid to education, food stamps, tax justice, public service jobs, and equal rights one day, and then discover on the next that these were merely ways of the government 'getting on our backs.' "

Kirkland noted that labor over the past hundred years has been no stranger to rallies and demonstrations, although normally it tends to rely on other methods of expression and persuasion—lobbying, political action, education, organizing and collective bargaining.

"But these are not normal times," Kirkland stressed.

"We are not challenged on this or that specific issue. What is challenged is a broad range of programs, which we helped to create, and which rescued millions from the economic jungle.

"WHAT IS challenged is a philosophy of government," the AFL-CIO president declared.

He cited the Administration's often expressed attitude that government is an oppressive burden on the backs of the people.

"Ironically," he commented, "the functions of government most burdensome to the people, in this Administration's view, are those that minister to the needs of the people whom the free market leaves behind. These unfortunates, according to the Reagan philosophy, are also burdened by government—burdened by social security, burdened by food stamps, burdened by unemployment insurance. To remove this burden from their backs, David Stockman has proclaimed that nobody is entitled to anything from government."

But labor has a different philosophy of government, Kirkland stressed.

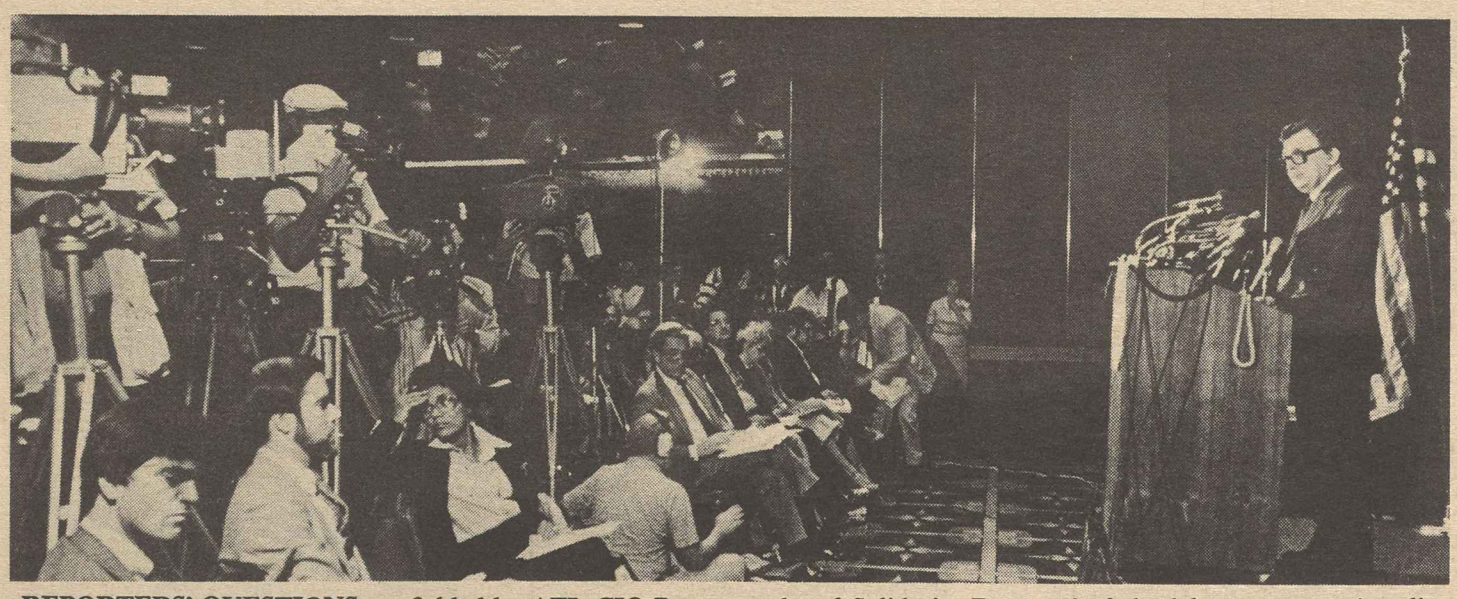
IT IS NOT for big government as an end in itself, he said, and having "a long memory," it approaches all government with "a healthy skepticism and vigilance."

"But in a democratic society," he said, "the people have the right to shape the government into an instrument that meets their needs."

Kirkland noted that at one time the government was not an instrument of the people, when most citizens, including the majority who were women, were denied the right to vote, and the government belonged to "white men of property" and "served the interests of those who owned it."

Through protest, struggle and organization, he said, the people were able to reshape government "into an instrument for the reduction of gross inequality and injustice," making it more nearly a government "of, for and by the people."

"THIS IS the kind of government we helped to build—and are still working to perfect," he said. "This is the kind of government the Administration seeks to dismantle."



Taking note of the federation's centennial year, Kirkland observed that labor's own mandate has been built and tested over a century of struggle and achievement.

"It is time to renew our mandate," he told the general board.

Foreign Trade Deficit Surges in Second Quarter

The nation's trade deficit, measured on the so-called balance of payments basis, expanded sharply in the April-June quarter as a stronger dollar made American-made goods less competitive overseas.

The Commerce Dept. reported the second-quarter deficit was $6.99 billion, up from a first-quarter trade deficit of $4.6 billion. About one-quarter of the increase in imports was due to the increased cost of imported oil.

REPORTERS' QUESTIONS are fielded by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland during a news conference between sessions of the Executive Council meeting in Chicago. He spoke of Solidarity Day, and of the labor movement's solidarity with striking air traffic controllers standing up against mass firings, heavy fines and jail sentences.

New Tax Bill Takes from Workers To Give to Corporations, Wealthy

Chicago—The tax cut bill passed by Congress at the Administration's insistence will "shift hundreds of billions of dollars from the paychecks and programs that sustain working Americans to the rich and corporations," the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

The council cited revenue losses that will mount from $36 billion in fiscal 1982 to an estimated $250 billion in the fifth year. Most of the benefits will go to the most prosperous corporations and to the wealthiest individuals.

"THESE ARE funds that should be channeled and directed to creating jobs," the council insisted.

It said the revenue that will be given up is needed for "revitalizing and rebuilding the nation's cities, industries and distressed areas; meeting the needs of the poor, the old and the disadvantaged, and providing an effective and fair reduction in the tax burdens of moderate- and middle-income Americans who are paying more than their fair share."

The council statement scored the Administration tax bill as the product of "private greed, political expediency and trickle-down theories" of economics.

IT WARNED that "shoestring public budgets" will add to social tensions as well as economic problems. The huge revenue loss will "assure a continuance of inflation and sky-high interest rates."

And it contrasted the difference between the modest tax reduction of a typical working family and the 12 times greater savings to a family with a $100,000 income over the three-year period.

Business taxes will be slashed by more than $170 billion between now and 1986, the council statement projected. That would drop the effective corporate tax rate from about 30 percent at current levels to 14 percent.

OVER THE SAME period, the council said, the tax changes will reduce the corporate share of federal income tax receipts from 21 percent to 12 percent. And corporate taxes will drop from 12 percent of the federal budget to an estimated 8 percent of the budget.

Even that doesn't take into account the full tilt of the Administration tax bill, the council noted. It cited also:

- Near elimination of the federal estate and gift tax.
- Special "savings incentives which benefit higher income individuals, completely exclude those who are unable to save, contribute nothing to the level of funds available for productive investment and heighten the competition for available funds."
- Still more "tax preference to oil producers, oil royalty owners and corporate executives."

Congress gave final approval to the tax bill while the Executive Council was in session, approving a House-Senate conference agreement on similar bills passed by both bodies.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) made a last-minute effort to get the Senate to send the bill back to conference because it included a number of special concessions to oil producers and royalty holders that had been added by the House. He said the bill's exemptions from last year's oil windfall profits tax would cost $33 billion in needed revenues over the next 10 years. But the recommittal motion was beaten, 55-20.

THE EXECUTIVE Council statement reiterated the AFL-CIO's support for "a carefully designed tax reduction program." The federation had proposed a social security tax credit for workers, a smaller credit for employers, and business tax concessions carefully targeted to reindustrialization goals set by a tripartite body.

It stressed that the AFL-CIO "will continue to press for a tax structure that is based upon ability to pay and that assures a public sector adequately equipped to deal with the economic, social and defense needs of the nation."

Corporate 'Merger Fever' Held Bad for Nation's Health

Chicago—The unrestrained corporate growth by mergers and acquisitions must be better controlled and regulated in the national interest, or all Americans will suffer, the AFL-CIO warned.

"These giant corporations try to dominate and control not only specific business activities but seek to influence the entire U.S. economy and society," the Executive Council charged in a statement here.

"THEIR INTERESTS are frequently inimical to that of workers and individual taxpayers and contrary to America's basic economic, political, and social goals."

The "merger fever" is rapidly rising, the council noted, adding that the rate of corporate mergers increased a third faster in the first half of 1981 than in the same period of 1980. DuPont, Mobil, and Seagram—all giants in their own right—have seized center stage in the battle for control of Conoco, the nation's ninth largest oil company, it pointed out.

"But cash-rich oil giants like Exxon, Gulf, Standard Oil of California, and Texaco, with billions of dollars on tap, are on the prowl for still more corporate mergers and acquisitions," the council observed. "Their merger mania makes a joke of the theory that big windfall oil company profits would go into new investment in energy exploration and development."

CONSUMERS clearly suffer from concentrated economic power resulting from merger and acquisitions of corporate giants, the AFL-CIO warned, yet the Reagan Administration sees nothing wrong in the monopolization of America.

"Conglomerate mergers and multinational corporations' decisions to shift production to overseas plants often result in plant closings and plant shutdowns that throw workers and local communities on the scrap heap," the council said. "Job loss and loss of local industry are inevitable as corporations concentrate on profits and ignore their social responsibilities to workers and communities."

The council recommended the following measures to check the growing merger trend:

- Require federal chartering of corporations with more than $1 billion in assets or sales.
- Require major oil companies to divest their holdings in other sources of energy and to be limited to only a single aspect of the oil industry. The major oil firms should be strictly prohibited from acquiring, by merger or otherwise, other companies with assets of more than $100 million each.
- The President and the Federal Reserve Board should use their existing powers to require the allocation of bank credit to productive uses and not for corporate mergers and acquisitions. This would protect small business, consumers, and the housing industry.
- Congressional enactment of legislation enabling consumers, business, and government victims of corporate price-fixing to recover triple damages, even if they were not direct customers of the price-fixing violations.
- To protect the economic rights of workers and their communities against plant closings and plant relocations, business firms relocating or shutting down a plant should be required to give early advance notice and to provide aid to affected workers and communities.

Berlin Wall Still Barrier To Freedom

Chicago—The AFL-CIO called on the United States government to use the occasion of the 20th anniversary of the construction of the Berlin Wall to characterize the structure for what it is: a continuing violation of human rights and a major obstacle to peace, security, justice, and cooperation in Europe.

"The wall must be demolished if there is to be lasting peace, security, justice and cooperation," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said. The council urged the government to raise the issue of the Berlin Wall's continued existence in discussions on the implementation of the 1975 Helsinki agreement.

"WE SHOULD make clear to the Soviet regime that the Berlin Wall dishonors the pledge made at Helsinki, and that the wall must be demolished," the council statement said. Construction of the wall by the East German Communist regime, under control of Soviet occupation forces, began 20 years ago this month.

In signing the Final Act of the Helsinki Conference on Security & Cooperation in Europe, the council observed. East Germany and the USSR solemnly undertook to "act in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter of the United Nations and with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights," and agreed to make it their aim to facilitate freer movement and contacts . . . among persons."

The presence of the wall can no more be reconciled with the Helsinki pledge than could the 1979 Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, the council said.

Describing the wall as a "monument to the inhumanity and to the economic and social failures of Communist dictatorships," the AFL-CIO pointed out that the barrier was built to prevent the mass flight of people trying to escape a regime which systematically denied its inhabitants fundamental human rights.

THE WALL was lengthened from Berlin to divide the German nation by bunkers, mines, dog blockades, and enough barbed wire to encircle the globe.

Despite these almost insurmountable obstacles, the council noted, people in East Germany have not stopped trying to escape. Hundreds have been killed or wounded trying to scale the wall, and thousands more dragged away before even reaching it.

"We realize that there is a strong tendency among the leaders of Western countries after 20 years to accept this situation, and no longer raise this issue," the council said.

"But we should not deceive ourselves. As long as Berlin and Germany are divided, peace in Europe is threatened. As long as Soviet rulers keep a city divided, denying freedom of movement for people they have encaged, no one should take seriously their talk of co-existence as 'detente.' "

Attacks on Black Unions In South Africa Denounced

Chicago—The AFL-CIO called on the Administration to protest the South African government's latest attacks on unions of black workers, and to urge the South African government to recognize and accept workers' basic trade union rights.

The Executive Council urged all other groups which support free trade union principles to register a similar protest over the continuing suppression of black workers' rights in South Africa.

Last February, the council noted, after decades of brutal suppression, the South African government claimed to be moving toward recognition of black trade unions. The events of the past few months, however, indicate that this was a false hope, the council said.

"There is no disguising the fact that black trade unions are a major target of government reprisals," the council observed. Fifty-seven trade unionists already have been arrested, it said, and many others are facing government pressure and intimidation.

Scare Tactics Assailed

Social Security Attacks Tied to Budget Motive

Chicago—The biggest danger facing the social security system is not its financial ills but the Administration's plans to slash benefits, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

The council accused the Administration of "gross exaggeration" of the financial woes of the system "to convince the public that major cuts are necessary to assure adequate financing."

WORKERS PRESENTLY employed, particularly those counting on early retirement, will bear the brunt of the proposed cutbacks, the council emphasized.

The Administration is trying to conceal the fact that it is attempting to "balance the federal budget on the backs of the elderly," the council declared.

Including social security in the federal budget is "completely inappropriate," the council said, pointing out that "long-term social security benefit entitlements should not be influenced by year-to-year variations in the federal budget." The system's problems can be met without cutting benefits, the council asserted.

THE COUNCIL urged Congress to "honor its commitment to American workers—those still at work, as well as those who have retired."

"It is inconceivable," the council stressed, "that Congress would break that commitment after a 45-year record of responsible action on social security."

The Administration's proposed benefit cuts would chop early retirement benefits by 43 percent, disability benefits by one-third and the overall program by 21-23 percent.

Hardest hit, the council pointed out, will be early retirees, most of whom are forced to leave their jobs because they are laid-off or in poor health. The cut would reduce the maximum early retirement benefit below the poverty level for anyone retiring next year at age 62.

OTHER DESTRUCTIVE changes are proposed by the Administration, the council said, including postponement of the cost-of-living adjustments for all retirees and modification of the benefit formula so that all future retirees would get a 10 percent cut.

The Administration's plan would also restrict the disability program by basing eligibility solely on medical criteria, and it would apply the lower disability maximum family benefit to retirement and survivors' benefits. Also, children's benefits would be eliminated in early retirement cases and, benefits accrued to public workers from other employment would be denied.

The council commended the House of Representatives for its vote to block elimination of the social security minimum benefit as called for in the budget reconciliation bill. It urged the Senate to also act to rescind the cut.

Unless the cut is rescinded, some 3.1 million current beneficiaries will see their checks shrink. Among these are some of the nation's poorest retirees, the council said, including a "disproportionate" number of elderly women.

The AFL-CIO, which has supported the social security system since its beginning, has suggested alternatives to help solve the system's current financial problems, the council stressed.

For example, the Old Age & Survivor's Insurance fund's short-term financial difficulties could be handled by interfund borrowing—loans from other trust funds in the system now running surpluses.

The council recommended strengthening these short-term solutions with standby authority for borrowing from general funds. This would permit review of any changes in the system "in a calmer atmosphere free from the pressures of the budget-cutting mania which inhibits thoughtful, responsible legislation," the statement declared.

The AFL-CIO believes payroll taxes should be supplemented by general revenue funding as the "fairest and most feasible" way to cope with the system's financial strains and avoid future increases in the social security tax, the council pointed out. A first step, the council said, would be to finance half the cost of Medicare from general revenues.

THE COUNCIL'S statement made clear that while AFL-CIO unions have many retirees, "most union members are contributors to—not beneficiares of—the social security program."

There will not be a breach between beneficiaries and contributors over this issue, the council stressed, explaining "the elderly of today are our parents and grandparents. Social security allows them to retire with dignity and to avoid being a financial burden on their children. All of us will be senior citizens some day and all of us have a stake in making this retirement system as good as it can be and keeping it secure."

MEXICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR President Fidel Velasquez is greeted by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland at a luncheon during the Executive Council's meeting in Chicago. The visit of Velasquez was in response to a long-standing invitation and epitomized the constructive and friendly relations between the two federations and the workers of both countries.

Neglect, Hostility Threaten Basic Civil Rights Protection

Chicago—The AFL-CIO warned that the nation's basic civil rights protections are threatened by neglect or hostility from the Reagan Administration and reaffirmed labor's commitment to the effective administration and enforcement of those measures

The Executive Council noted that the Administration and its conservative supporters in Congress "have all but completed their effort to dismantle federal programs" that have given a measure of economic dignity to the jobless, the aged and the disadvantaged.

"THERE IS every indication that the next target will be some of the major federal civil rights laws enacted to enhance the economic, political and social rights of the victims of discrimination," the council said.

It stressed that the job of providing women and minorities with a full measure of equal opportunity is far from over.

"We recognize how much remains to be done by all of us," the council said, "and we reaffirm our commitment" to such measures as the Voting Rights Act, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the executive order designed to counter discrimination by government contractors, and "the major measure that must be added to our Constitution"—the Equal Rights Amendment.

"Passive reliance on promises of voluntary action has proved unavailing," the council statement observed. "The undeniable truth is that, standing alone, all the pledges and guarantees of equal opportunity are meaningless. Only aggressive action to open doors previously shut to women and minorities will work."

It reaffirmed the labor movement's support for positive programs of recruitment, hiring, training, upgrading, promotions and wage equalization to ensure that minorities and women gain equal access to jobs and equal treatment on the job.

In taking note of the AFL-CIO's centennial year, the council traced the record of the federation's support for equal rights dating back to Samuel Gompers and its vigorous efforts to win enactment of the major civil rights laws now on the nation's statute books. To carry those efforts forward, the council called specifically for:

- Prompt passage of the bill reported by the House Judiciary Committee to extend the Voting Rights Act.
- Rejection by Congress of proposals to limit or prohibit the courts and Justice Dept. from carrying out their constitutional obligations.
- Maintaining the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's vigilant role through the presidential appointment of "strong and knowledgeable people" to policy-making positions on the commission and provision of sufficient staff and budget.
- Continuation and strong enforcement of the program to counter discrimination by federal contractors and an end to the "backsliding" evident in the Labor Dept.'s proposals to weaken and reduce the program.

'Backward' Philosophy of Government Hit

Chicago — The Reagan Administration has proclaimed a backward philosophy of government that favors private wealth at the expense of workers and the poor, the AFL-CIO Executive Council charged.

"The needs of complex 20th-Century societies cannot be met by 19th-Century political dogmas," the council declared in a statement on the role of government. It added:

"THE NOTION of an ever declining federal government, restricted to defense functions and monetary regulation, may have had a place in pre-industrial small-town America, but it is inappropriate to a society whose economy is dominated by ever larger corporations and conglomerates, which exists in an interdependent world economy, and which faces burgeoning problems of unemployment, urban blight, transportation, education, health and housing."

It was precisely because the so-called free market proved incapable of addressing such problems that the American people turned to the government, enlarging its role and looking to it as an instrument for the protection of rights and the promotion of social justice, the council stressed.

It cited such federal achievements as rural electrification, the railroad and interstate highway systems, public works, reforestation, soil conservation, the rescue of failing banks and the cushioning of the nation "against the cruelties of the business cycle." This progress, the council pointed out, benefitted not only the people, but private business as well.

THE COUNCIL also pointed to the federal government's role in providing jobs for the unemployed, striking down Jim Crow laws, guaranteeing voting rights for minorities, expanding educational opportunities, setting health and safety standards on the job, providing medical care for the needy, establishing social security for the elderly and creating a "minimal security net" for the victims of the free market.

"Thus, according to the Administration, did the government climb on the backs of the people," the council statement observed.

It said the Administration is now trying to persuade the people that all this was "a colossal historic mistake" and that they should turn once more to the very market forces that failed to meet their needs.

"To reduce the protective role of government while encouraging an increasing concentration of corporate power is not an exercise in expanding freedom," the council observed. "It is nothing more than a shift of power from democratically shaped institutions."

The council said the Administration is engaging in "regressive engineering" that would distribute the rewards upward and the burdens downward on the economic ladder "in the name of supply-side economics."

The common theme that runs through all the Administration's policies—economic, social and political—is "a bias in favor of private wealth, an indifference to workers and the poor, and a hostility to government efforts to protect their interests," the council declared.

"There is nothing new in this philosophy of government, and nothing to commend it to the labor movement or to the American people."

Pennsylvania House Seat To Remain Democratic

Labor-backed Joseph F. Smith was elected to the House from a Philadelphia district, and will be counted as a Democrat even though he ran as an independent with Republican endorsement.

Smith, a Democratic member of the state Senate, lost the Democratic primary to David B. Glancey last May, but easily won the general election.

He will replace Democrat Raymond E. Lederer, who resigned after his conviction for involvement in an Abscam case.

More Aid Asked For Viet Veterans

Chicago—The government should stop shortchanging Vietnam veterans and provide them with extra services suited to their special needs, the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged.

The problems facing men and women who served in Vietnam have been ignored "in an effort to erase from our minds" the war, the council said in a statement.

These difficulties, including higher than average unemployment, lack of job skills and health problems which grew out of their service experience should be faced. Vietnam veterans need extra job training and placement help, the council said, and they should be extended the education and housing assistance provided to veterans of other wars.

Facilities such as the storefront rehabilitation centers already in existence in many communities are particularly suited to these "forgotten" ex-GI's needs, the council pointed out.

Tilted Against Workers

CONGRESS, spurred and goaded by the Administration, is on a tax cutting spree for business and the wealthy and against workers that defies logic, precedent and fair play.

A combination of private greed, political expediency and trickle-down theories has produced a tax bill that will:

- Shift hundreds of billions of dollars from the paychecks and programs that sustain working Americans to the rich and the corporations.
- Add to the economic problems and social tensions that are the inevitable result of shoestring public budgets financed by inequitable tax structures.
- Assure a continuance of inflation and sky-high interest rates.

In fiscal year 1982 the Administration's measure amounts to a $36 billion drain of the treasury—by 1986 the annual loss will be $250 billion. Between now and 1986 over $730 billion in revenues will be lost and approximately half of that amount will go to business and the wealthiest 5 to 10 percent of the population.

THESE ARE FUNDS that should be channeled and directed to creating jobs; revitalizing and rebuilding the nation's cities, industries and distressed areas; meeting the needs of the poor, the old and disadvantaged; and providing an effective and fair reduction in the tax burdens of moderate- and middle-income Americans who are paying far more than their fair share.

Business taxes will be slashed by over $170 billion between now and 1986. As a result, the corporate income tax by 1986 will account for only 14 percent of federal income tax receipts compared to 21 percent currently and only 8 percent of the total budget compared to 12 percent currently.

Effective corporate income tax rates will plunge from current levels of approximately 30 percent down to 14 percent.

The basic individual and business income tax cuts, however, do not tell the whole story of the massive shift that is being undertaken in the responsibility for financing the nation. Congress, again with the Administration's blessing, has included an array of other costly and unfair measures which widen the tax avoidance opportunities for the wealthy.

AMONG THE most glaring are provisions which would:

- Nearly eliminate the federal estate and gift tax.
- Provide a variety of so-called "savings" incentives which benefit higher income individuals, completely exclude those who are unable to save, contribute nothing to the level of funds available for productive investment and heighten the competition for available funds.
- Provide even more tax preferences to oil producers, oil royalty owners and corporate executives.

The AFL-CIO will continue to press for a tax structure that is based upon ability to pay and that assures a public sector adequately equipped to deal with the economic, social and defense needs of the nation.

Cotton Dust Ruling

Rebuff to 'Cost-Effective' Claim Denies Industry License to Kill

By Gus Tyler

WORKERS IN COTTON mills should not be exposed to the perils of cotton dust. That's what a 1970 law clearly intended.

But some employers found this to be unduly onerous. So they—together with the Reagan Administration—have been pushing the idea that the law should not be applied where it is not "cost effective." In other words, if it is too expensive, it should be exempt.

By a vote of 5-3, the Supreme Court ruled out the "cost-effective" argument. As Justice William J. Brennan put it: "Congress itself defines the basic relationship between costs and benefits by placing the 'benefit' of worker health above all other considerations, save those making attainment of this 'benefit' unachievable."

THIS FORTHRIGHT decision has shocked many in the business community. "How could the court be so insensitive to the economic factor, to the basic need to calculate cost effectiveness?" They scratch their heads in disbelief over the unrealistic attitude of the justices.

Yet, what would happen if we applied the cost-effective logic to all our basic laws? For instance:

"Thou shalt not kill unless it is cost effective."

It's not difficult to imagine an imaginary case. I am threatened with death by someone. I proceed to surround myself with an expensive bodyguard; I buy a costly armored car to convey my mortal parts; I employ detectives. The bill keeps running up.

I FIND OUT that for a much smaller sum I can contract to kill the man who menaces me. So after my accountant has tallied the sheets, I conclude that the "cost-effective" thing for me to do is to hire a hit man.

I go to the courts charged with murder. My defense is clear. I did what was cost effective. After all, I should not be expected to heed the dictum that "thou shalt not kill" if to follow that rule would be cost ineffective.

The analogy between the commandment on killing and the law on cotton dust is really not so far-fetched. When Congress laid down the law on preventing the poisoning of the respiratory system, it was doing little more than implementing the order not to kill.

Cotton dust kills—perhaps not always and not instantaneously. But it does kill many eventually.

Congress was so convinced. So it moved to stop the killing. In effect, it wrote a law that said: "Thou shalt not kill with a weapon called dust."

It did not say that thou shalt not kill unless it is cheaper to kill. To do so, would be like saying "thou shalt not commit adultery unless you enjoy it."

A Challenge for Labor To Renew Its Mandate

The mandate of the trade union movement imposes special obligations. Each of us is bound by a sacred trust to represent faithfully the interests of our members, and, by natural and logical extension, the interests of the working people of America. That is our mandate.

It was built and tested over the century of struggle and achievement we celebrate this year.

Now in our centennial year, that mandate is challenged. The challenge comes from an Administration which seeks to conceal the radical character of its program by claiming the support of those who would suffer the most from its execution.

I do not believe we can quietly turn our backs and walk away from this challenge and still be true to our mandate. Our job, knowing what we know, is to resist that injustice and to prevent the damage—not to wait until disaster strikes in the hope of turning workers' misery to later political advantage.

It is time to call up the ranks. It is time to muster our friends and allies. It is time to draw upon our ultimate source of strength and to call upon those in whose name we speak to come forth in a display of solidarity for a humane and fair America.

It is time to renew our mandate.

Wage Standards, Job Safety

Worker Safeguards Threatened By Assault on Key Regulations

The following is from a statement adopted by the AFL-CIO Executive Council Aug. 3, 1981, in Chicago.

THE REAGAN Administration is engaged in a broad attack on regulations designed to protect workers. The attack is all-inclusive. The objective is to gut standards already on the books; to postpone indefinitely standards which were scheduled to go into effect; to reinterpret existing regulations so as to narrow their scope, and to generally reduce enforcement so that employers may violate with impunity.

To achieve the ends to which it aspires—a pro-business, regulation-free environment—the Reagan Administration has appointed officials with little or no knowledge or experience and only limited interest in determining the purpose of the regulations and the situations which they were designed to correct. Decision-making on regulations is usurped from the responsible agencies by the Office of Management & Budget through a new Executive Order (12291).

DURING THE YEARS 1978 and 1979, the Dept. of Labor made a careful review of the administrative rules covering the Davis-Bacon and Service Contract Acts. On the basis of this review, revised regulations were issued in January 1981. These regulations have now been embargoed and new changes under consideration by the Reagan Administration would seriously undermine the effectiveness of these statutes.

For example, the Administration is considering the elimination of the Davis-Bacon reporting requirement essential in the determination of compliance. Further, the Administration is proposing a new method of establishing prevailing wages under Davis-Bacon which would no longer protect prevailing wage rates and would—instead—permit employers to compete for contracts on the basis of cut-rate wages and cut-rate classifications.

Under the Service Contract Act half of all contracts currently covered would be excluded from coverage by changing the definition from contracts substantially for services to principally for service.

THE STANDARDS for labor protection incorporated in the Urban Mass Transit Act are also under attack. These protections have assured workers in the mass transit industry that their basic wages, working conditions and job security would be maintained.

The Secretary of Labor has been sending mixed signals as to his intentions under the Fair Labor Standards Act. He has led strike force raids on sweatshops in the apparel industry at the same time as he has proposed revoking the regulations prohibiting industrial homework.

He seems to have been totally unaware of the horrors of industrial homework—substandard wages, child labor, long hours of work and unsafe and unhealthy working conditions.

He proposes stricter penalties for noncompliance with the provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act at the same time as he reduces the number of compliance officers.

He indicates that he will postpone any recommendation with repsect to a subminimum wage for youth until after the Minimum Wage Study Commission completes its work. However, within a month after the commission issued its report rejecting a youth subminimum, he stated that he favors a "youth differential" or special subminimum for disadvantaged teenagers.

He has apparently decided to maintain a "freeze" on amended regulation 541 issued as a Final Rule by the Dept. of Labor on Jan. 13. This regulation would have increased the minimum salary tests necessary for an employee to be considered a bona fide executive, administrative or professional employee for exemption from the overtime pay requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The present salary tests are so low as to be meaningless for the purpose for which they were intended. Under the present law a nonexempt employee earning the minimum wage would be paid $174 a week for a 48-hour week. An exempt executive or administrative employee working the same number of hours would meet the salary test for exemption if paid only $155 a week.

IN THE AREA OF occupational safety and health, the Administration has moved swiftly to wipe out major gains in worker protection of the past four years. Attacks have been made on standards for cotton dust, lead, hazards identification, walkaround compensation, hearing conservation, cancer policy, and access to medical records. These regulations have been postponed illegally, targeted for weakening or revoked entirely.

The Administration's attempts to roll back worker protections under the guise of a cost-benefit test have been slowed down by recent Supreme Court decisions which upheld OSHA's cotton dust and lead standards, as well as the AFL-CIO position that cost-benefit analysis was prohibited by the OSHA legislation.

But OSHA has announced it will merely substitute "cost-effectiveness" analysis for "cost-benefit" analysis in continued efforts to weaken these and other rules.

IN ADDITION to weakening standards in the area of occupational safety and health, enforcement will be watered down. For example, in states where there is dual federal and state jurisdiction, federal compliance activities will end Oct. 1, 1981. Decisions made by the previous Administration to withdraw inadequate state plans in Indiana and Virginia have been reversed though the glaring deficiencies in these programs still exist. Also, drastic cuts are being made in OSHA enforcement.

The AFL-CIO will continue to monitor the actions of this Administration as they affect worker standards. If the officials charged with the enforcement of labor laws continue to undermine them, we will bring appropriate legal action to enforce the laws that were established to protect basic worker standards.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

HIGH ON THE LIST of Reagan Administration bugbears is government regulation—"deregulation" being one of the pillars of the Administration's program for "economic recovery."

The Administration, like big industry, has blamed regulation of the workplace and environment for a multitude of evils: excessive costs to business, inflation and unemployment increases, productivity declines, slowdowns in capital investment, and more.

Now the Council on Economic Priorities has produced a study, "Occupational Safety and Health in the Chemical Industry," by Ruth Ruttenberg and Randall Hudgins, which begins to dispel some of the rhetorical accusations concerning Occupational Safety & Health Administration regulations and enforcement activities.

Ruttenberg and Hudgins, both economic analysts, studied data from OSHA, primary chemical producers, the Commerce Dept. and Federal Reserve Reports for the period 1972-1979. They especially focused on the eight largest chemical companies: DuPont, Dow, Union Carbide, Monsanto, W. R. Grace, Allied Chemical, American Cyanamid, and Celanese.

THE STUDY FOUND that over the eight-year period, the chemical industry performed well. Total industry sales increased 165 percent. After-tax profit for the eight largest companies increased 160 percent.

Significantly, output per production worker manhour increased from 7.4 percent per year in the pre-OSHA period, 1966-1971, to 7.8 percent in the 1971-1976 post-OSHA period.

The chemical industry spent some $1.4 billion on health and safety over the eight-year period, according to the study. This works out to about 0.16 percent of 1979 sales or an average of only 2.9 percent of total capital expenditures for new plant and equipment over the period.

The annual cost of health and safety per worker was only $140, according to the study.

The report estimates that the $140 per worker annual investment produced a 23 percent decline in occupational injury and illness between 1972 and 1979.

The authors also pointed out that the chemical companies had spent millions of dollars in legal fees fighting OSHA regulations and enforcement activities. The companies did this even though the average penalty for a chemical company over the eight-year period amounted to only $74.79 per citation.

"Fees to engineers to abate hazards rather than fees to lawyers to abate already low penalties might be a more cost-effective way to promote safety and health," the authors suggest.

THE STUDY addressed other byproducts of regulation, such as the fact that improved safety and health reduces the cost of workers' compensation insurance for the industry and prevents major losses of plant and equipment caused by incidents such as fire and explosion.

The Administration's policy requiring that all federal regulations be subjected to so-called "cost-benefit" analysis has been attacked by labor and others as having no moral basis. Critics argue that the cost of human suffering and death cannot be equated in dollars and cents.

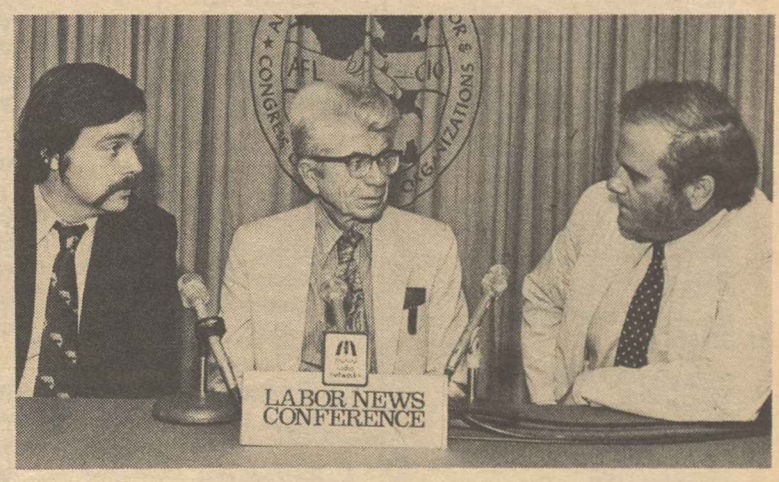
The OSHA law has the principle of feasibility written into it. According to the act and the federal courts, a health and safety regulation must be technologically possible and the regulated industry must be able reasonably to afford compliance.

Recognizing these feasibility concepts, OSHA through the years allowed industries generous time periods to comply with new standards.

The Ruttenberg-Hudgins study on the chemical industry indicates that OSHA regulations are economically feasible and they are not the economic ogres industry and the Administration have made them out to be.

Seidman Scores Scare Talk

Attacks on Social Security Tied To Reagan's Political Motives



THE ADMINISTRATION'S drive to slash social security benefits is based on two political considerations that have nothing to do with any fiscal problems or structural weaknesses in the system, Director Bert Seidman of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security said.

The first, Seidman said, is that the Administration really believes that the social security program should be "smaller and less effective." The second, he said, is that it wants to build up, through benefit cuts, "a huge surplus" in social security funds that can be used to balance the budget.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Seidman stressed that despite scary talk that social security is on the brink of collapse, it faces no unmanageable problems. He said that current shortfalls, caused by wages rising less rapidly than prices, can be met merely by borrowing among the three separate social security funds without going outside the system or reducing benefits.

AS FOR LONG-TERM projections that a rising number of retirees in relation to the number of active workers will strain the system after the year 2010, Seidman said, "that isn't the whole story."

"What counts," he declared, "is the total number of dependents. While there will be more people over 65," he pointed out, "the 'total ratio' won't be any higher than it is now and somewhat lower than it was 10 and 20 years ago."

BENEFIT SLASHES in social security pursued by the Reagan Administration are based on political motivations rather than efforts to resolve funding problems, Director Bert Seidman, center, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security charged. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Calvin Zon, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Lance Gay of the Washington Star. The program is broadcast weekly on Mutual radio.

Key House Rollcall on Tax Cut Issue

On the AFL-CIO's ledger, the key House vote on the tax bill was the 288-144 rejection of a labor-supported substitute that would have been more equitable, less inflationary and would have slashed about $400 billion of the most shameful giveaways to the wealthy from the tax bill.

Right votes (R) for the amendment sponsored by Rep. Morris K. Udall (D-Ariz.) were cast by 139 Democrats and 5 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 102 Democrats and 186 Republicans.

Numerals show congressional districts. A—absent, P—present but not voting.

'Guest Worker' Plan Hit

Employer Curbs Sought In Immigration Proposal

Chicago—The key to controlling illegal immigration is stiff penalties against employers who hire illegal aliens, backed up by a secure identification system, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

Its statement on immigration reform stressed that U.S. immigration policy is and has been in "disarray," and urged Congress to provide "sound solutions" to the social, political and economic problems involved.

The Administration's recently released proposals for immigration reform provide a "basis for action," the council said, but the AFL-CIO is "deeply concerned" by shortcomings in the program.

IT SHARPLY criticized the proposal to bring up to 50,000 Mexican "guest workers" into the United States each year as a threat to U.S. labor standards.

The council called for a "fair" amnesty program for illegal immigrants already part of American communities, including "compassionate regard" for families.

The AFL-CIO is opposed to the Administration's proposed "guest worker" program and to its suggested revision of the H-2 temporary worker program. Both would undermine U.S. working conditions, the council said.

THE LABOR movement would support the concept of expanded legal immigration, the statement emphasized, after illegal immigration is controlled and U.S. unemployment problems are cured.

It pledged that the AFL-CIO will "take an active role in the effort to pass constructive legislation."

Among the shortcomings in the Administration's policy cited by the council is the proposal for mild civil sanctions, primarily fines, against employers who knowingly hire illegal aliens.

The council called for a sharper system of sanctions against employers "including injunctions backed by criminal contempt for repeat violators.

THE BASIS for such a system is counterfeit-proof identification, such as a secure social security card, the council said. The Administration's program would permit employers to request as identification documents such as birth certificates and drivers' licenses.

The Administration's plan for penalties "relies on documents easily counterfeited and freely available for sale," the council pointed out. It said the proposed sanctions "will not even be a minor inconvenience to those who hire illegal workers."

In its statement, the council praised the efforts of Immigration & Naturalization Service employees to call attention through their union to the need for improved border patrols and interior enforcement. Such control and enforcement require additional funding and staffing for INS, the council noted.

The AFL-CIO supports a "fair and generous" program to legalize the status of illegal aliens who have become part of their communities, providing it is tied to programs to cut further illegal immigration.

IN ADDITION, the statement said, conditions with "compassionate regard" for families should be set "with a minimum of formality to make citizenship possible for individuals who presently have a strong attachment to this country while not encouraging illegal immigration in the future."

The council expressed "serious reservations" about portions of the Administration's amnesty proposal. Certain "preconditions" for legalization that would apply to illegal aliens but not to Cuban or Haitian refugees are unfair and wrong, the council stressed.

The total 15-year waiting period for citizenship, the denial of reunification of families, the demand for payment of taxes "without the right to earned benefits accorded other taxpayers such as unemployment compensation," and the requirement of proficiency in English "are so harsh as to belie the very concept of amnesty," the statement asserted.

THE AFL-CIO is against any program that would permit "importation of foreign labor to undercut U.S. wages and working conditions," the council said, scoring the Administration's proposal to allow up to 50,000 Mexican "guest workers" into the United States annually.

Such a program will worsen unemployment, the council warned, and will undermine "the already low level of wages in those industries that are most likely to hire such temporary workers." Women and minority workers are most likely to feel the job losses and income cuts, the council pointed out.

The council opposed the suggested expansion of the so-called H-2 temporary worker program through revision of its certification requirements. Along with the guest worker program, and the proposal to increase legal entries from Mexico and Canada to 40,000 a year, immigration would swell to some 100,000 people, "far more than present conditions justify."

The AFL-CIO supports expanded legal immigration, the council emphasized, "over the long run and after illegal immigration is controlled. Unemployment problems must be cured first, the council said, then we must "absorb into our society" the millions of illegal immigrants and refugees already in the United States.

The council urged Congress in its consideration of the problems of illegal immigration to maintain the government's authority "to continue its historic policy of providing refuge to the victims of political oppression."

Richard Kilroy Elected to Head Railway Clerks

The executive council of the Railway & Airline Clerks unanimously elected Richard I. Kilroy as president to fill the unexpired term of Fred J. Kroll, who died July 30 of leukemia. Kilroy has been a BRAC vice president since 1973.

BRAC council members also elected Al Archual, general chairman of the union's Conrail system board in Philadelphia, to take over the vice presidency vacated by Kilroy. Both terms of office run through Aug. 31, 1982.

Kilroy, 54, began his career as a block operator with the Pennsylvania Railroad in 1951 as a member of the Railroad Telegraphers. He served as a local chairman and as system chairman on the Pennsylvania.

He became a vice president of the union, which was renamed the Transportation Communication Employees, in 1968. After the union merged with BRAC the following year, Kilroy became a division vice president. He was elected an international vice president four years later.

AT HOUSE HEARINGS, a Government Employees delegation protests Administration plans to disperse the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health to Atlanta and Cincinnati. AFGE President Kenneth Blaylock is joined at the witness table by Darlene Christian and Joseph Cook, officers of the AFGE local representing NIOSH employees, and Legislative Rep. Terry Rogers, right.

Labor Scores Planned Shift Of NIOSH from Washington

A scheduled transfer of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health from the Washington, D.C., area to Atlanta and Cincinnati is a "bureaucratic hijacking" that will weaken its usefulness, the AFL-CIO charged at House hearings.

Safety & Health Director George H. R. Taylor urged an Education & Labor subcommittee to do "all in its power" to block the move, which he said will slow decision making, substantially increase travel costs and flout the intent of Congress.

NIOSH, which is a part of the Dept. of Health & Human Services, is supposed to be the industrial health twin of the Labor Dept.'s Occupational Safety & Health Administration (OSHA). But it is at a lower level in the department hierarchy. While OSHA is headed by an assistant secretary of labor, NIOSH comes under the Centers for Disease Control, which are headquartered in Atlanta.

Taylor asked the subcommittee to consider legislation that would move NIOSH out of the Centers for Disease Control, declaring that the agency's experience bears out labor's belief that the placement of NIOSH within the CDC "flouts" the intent of the law.

Taylor noted that past proposals to move NIOSH out of Washington had drawn strong opposition from NIOSH directors, congressional committees, and the trade union movement.

HHS Sec. Richard S. Schweiker announced the plan to transfer NIOSH to Atlanta and Cincinnati after he had fired NIOSH Director Anthony Robbins at the insistence of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

The new NIOSH director, Dr. J. Donald Millar, comes from the Atlanta-based Centers for Disease Control, Taylor pointed out.

When the announcement of the move was made last month, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland protested that the change would subordinate the mission of protecting workers' health and safety and cause it to lose experienced and needed staff members who do not intend to make the move. He urged HHS Sec. Richard S. Schweiker to reconsider.

TAYLOR TOLD the House panel that the AFL-CIO has never received a reply to its protest.

Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock and officers of the AFGE local representing Health & Human Services Dept. employees also testified against the dispersal of NIOSH.

"NIOSH is mandated by statute to work closely with the Mine Safety & Health Administration and OSHA," Blaylock stressed. Relocating the agency would largely "put it out of action in the occupational safety and health field," he charged.

Council Outlines Safeguards For 'Short-Time' Jobless Aid

Chicago—The concept of "short-time" unemployment compensation for workers on reduced workweeks during economic downturns is, on balance, a worthwhile approach as long as appropriate safeguards are maintained, the AFL-CIO Executive Council said.

The arrangement permits workers to draw jobless benefits for the working time they forego in short workweeks instituted to avoid layoffs. Thus, it amounts to work sharing with a partial income replacement, the council noted.

THE SYSTEM has been tried successfully in some European countries, and California has experimented with it since 1978. Arizona recently enacted a short-time compensation law, and several other states are considering such laws.

Union reports on the California experience have been generally positive, the council noted. It pointed out that although about a fourth of major collective bargaining agreements permit shorter workweeks in lieu of layoff, short-time is rarely used because there are no provisions for income replacement.

"If compensation is made available," the council observed, "these contracts would allow senior workers to elect the shorter workweek they may well prefer and at the same time preserve employment opportunities for the recently hired, including minorities and women."

THE COUNCIL cautioned, however, that the scheme is not an alternative to other anti-recession programs, since no new jobs are created and the benefits will be available to relatively few workers. It stressed, too, that care must be taken that short-time compensation programs do not endanger the unemployment trust funds that in many states are already in financial trouble.

The council urged that state laws establishing short-time compensation systems include the following safeguards:

- Adequate funding for the unemployment insurance trust fund to protect the rights of all workers.
- Agreement with unions representing the workers where short-time arrangements are adopted.
- A wage replacement level of at least two-thirds of a worker's lost pay up to 40 percent of the workweek.
- Full retension of pension, insurance and other fringe benefits.
- Protection against manipulation of short-time compensation that would discriminate against recently hired workers, especially women and minorities.

State Injury Insurance on Ohio Ballot

Chicago—The Executive Council urged all AFL-CIO affiliates to work for the defeat of a November referendum in Ohio that would permit private insurance companies to sell workers' compensation policies in the state, thereby ending Ohio's exclusive state fund plan.

Under the exclusive state fund system, private insurers are not allowed to sell workers' compensation insurance to employers. Therefore, investment income is retained by the fund to pay benefits and lower employer costs, and there is no need for overhead expenses and profit margins.

FIVE OTHER states—West Virginia, North Dakota, Nevada, Wyoming and Washington—also have exclusive state funds. In a dozen other states, private insurers compete with state funds. Ohio's fund is the largest of the six state funds, with more employers covered than all the other exclusive fund states combined.

For this reason, the council charged, the insurance industry has decided to attack and destroy the Ohio plan, which had been established in 1913 in a law sponsored by then State Sen. William Green—who succeeded Samuel Gompers as president of the American Federation of Labor. The attack is being led by out-of-state insurance interests through the American Alliance of Insurers, the council said.

An amendment to the Ohio constitution, backed by a group calling itself the Committee for Free Enterprise Competition, has been forced on the November ballot to do away with the state plan.

IN RECOGNITION of the lower costs inherent in exclusive state funds, a number of employers in Ohio have joined with the state's trade union movement to oppose the amendment.

The Executive Council, noting that other states are considering establishment of exclusive funds because of Ohio's success, said that the attack on the Ohio system is a blatant effort to destroy the flagship of the exclusive state workers' compensation funds of America, and should be resisted by the total trade union movement.

Earl McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.

Congress Asked to Reject Decontrol of Natural Gas

Chicago — Natural gas price controls should be continued and Congress should renew the President's emergency powers to deal with oil and gasoline shortages, the AFL-CIO Executive Council urged.

Natural gas price controls are scheduled to be phased out by 1985 under present law and prices have already been allowed to rise faster than the overall inflation rate, the council noted. Low- and moderate-income families are already hurting and immediate decontrol threatens a "disastrous shock to the economy," the AFL-CIO warned.

The statement stressed that deregulation "cannot be justified on economic grounds. Current prices are more than adequate to stimulate exploration for new gas. Drilling for natural gas is at record levels with every available drilling rig in use."

NATURAL GAS prices "should be based on cost of production plus a reasonable profit," the council said. Deregulation "would give windfall gains to major oil companies already bloated with enormous profits."

While resisting legislation to abolish natural gas price ceilings, the AFL-CIO is pressing Congress for permanent legislation giving the President standby authority to impose oil price controls and to ration gasoline and other oil products to cope with an energy emergency.

Existing authority, granted in 1973 following the Arab oil embargo, will expire after Sept. 30 unless Congress acts.

THE COUNCIL statement and Senate testimony the previous week by Associate Legislative Director Howard Marlowe stressed that Congress should not wait for a catastrophe before it acts.

The President should be able to act "overnight if need be, in the event of shortages or excessive price increases caused by OPEC or otherwise, and in the event of security emergencies," the council said.

Marlowe's testimony before the Senate Energy & Natural Resources Committee, urged permanent legislation rather than a short-term extension of emergency powers.

"WE BELIEVE a program that rations gasoline and other oil products fairly and prevents prices from soaring is essential to maintain public morale during an energy crisis. A program that allows prices and profits to soar while most Americans endure financial hardship and inconvenience invites cynicism," he warned.

The Executive Council statement noted estimates that a 20 percent shortfall of crude oil supply would send the price of a gallon of gasoline soaring to a range of from $7 to $14.

"Opponents of rationing under any circumstances would reduce consumption through the combination of so-called market forces and rising prices," the council noted. "That inequitable policy would price oil products out of the reach of low- and moderate-income families," it protested.

Major Firms Show Surge In Second Quarter Profits

After-tax corporate profits in the second quarter of 1981 soared over the same period of a year earlier despite a sharp drop in the economy, a Wall Street Journal survey of company earnings indicated.

The Journal survey of 516 major corporations showed a 23 percent increase in after-tax earnings during the April-June period. Over the same three months, "real" gross national product—the value of the nation's total output of goods and services—fell at a seasonally adjusted 1.9 percent annual rate.

However, in this year's first quarter, profits dropped 2 percent from a year before despite strong economic growth due largely to a slide in oil company earnings.

Contributing to the second quarter profits surge was a rebound in steel industry earnings. The Journal reported steel profits up 112 percent. Also helping to boost April-June earnings was the auto industry. For the first time in over two years, the Journal said, all of the Big Three automakers showed a profit.

In a separate sample, Business Week magazine said that companies reporting second-quarter profit gains over a year earlier outnumbered firms reporting declines by 3 to 1, with companies in several industries registering particularly strong showings.

THE STEEL industry's sharp earnings gain last quarter was particularly evident among firms that manufacture pipes and tubes in oil and gas exploration and production, the Journal reported. U.S. Steel, the nation's largest steelmaker and largest producer of pipe, doubled its operating net to $167.6 million on a 20-percent sales gain, and seventh-ranked Armco lifted its profits 43 percent to a record $85.5 million on a 26 percent increase in sales.

In other industries, aerospace companies boosted their profits 21 percent during the April-June quarter, the Journal said. Department store profits rose 75 percent, utilities 21 percent, chemicals 30 percent, tobaccos 16 percent, publishing companies 14 percent, and petroleum products 8 percent.

Reprieve Approved For 2nd Class Mail

Publications of non-profit organizations, including union newspapers and magazines, got a reprieve from sharply higher postage rates in the final version of the budget reconciliation bill. But bulk mailings, sent out under third class postal rates, will cost substantially more after Oct. 1.

Under present law, postal subsidies for both second class and third class mailings of non-profit groups are scheduled to be gradually phased out by 1987. As a budget saver, the Senate version of the reconciliation bill would have eliminated the subsidy for both categories immediately; the House bill would have ended the third class subsidy and cut the second class funding.

A conference committee agreed, however, to continue the second class subsidy unchanged while denying funds for third class mailings.

Kellogg Adds Union Label To Packages

The Grain Millers and the Kellogg Co. have reached an agreement under which the company—the largest cereal-maker in the country—will print the union label on each of its family-sized cereal packages.

Kellogg, whose workforce is entirely unionized, announced its decision in Washington at a meeting with top officials of the 35,000-member union.

GRAIN MILLERS President Frank T. Hoese said that he viewed the action as a sign of a maturing relationship between the two parties. The union has had a labor contract with the firm since 1937.

"We're very pleased to have the Kellogg company put the union label on its family-sized cereal packages," he said. "We'd like to see all the companies we do business with do the same thing."

The company's decision to print the Grain Millers' label is not part of a collective-bargaining agreement and is based solely on a voluntary, mutual understanding.

Doug Sackett, director of manufacturing personnel for Kellogg, said that he expected the label to be showing up on cereal packages "in four to five months."

Sackett said that the label will be printed at the bottom of one of the side panels of each family-sized cereal package. Such packages make up 97 percent of the company's production. The label will go on 50 different packages of 24 products, such as Product 19, Corn Flakes, 40% Bran Flakes, and Sugar Corn Pops.

KELLOGG, which will become the first cereal company to carry a union label, also plans to print the label of the union local which makes the cereal packages, the Printing Specialties & Paper Products Union, Local 480 of the Printing & Graphic Communications Union.

The cereal company employs 5,000 workers in Battle Creek, Mich.; Memphis, Tenn.; Omaha, Neb.; Lancaster, Pa., and San Leandro, Calif. It has participated in the Union-Industries Show for the past two years.

Richard Leonard Dies, Retired IUD Official

Logan, Ohio—Richard T. Leonard, who served as assistant to the president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. for 16 years until his retirement in 1972, died of cancer here Aug. 3. He was 79.

A founding member of the Auto Workers, Leonard helped organize a Chrysler Corp. DeSoto plant in the mid-1930s and was a delegate to the UAW's first convention in 1935. He also served as the union's welfare director, on the UAW executive board and as a vice president. After joining the CIO staff in 1948, Leonard was appointed Arizona director.

He later served as assistant to CIO Presidents Philip Murray and Walter P. Reuther. Following merger of the AFL and CIO in 1955 he was appointed assistant to the president of the IUD.

121 National Organizations Get Behind Solidarity Day

A total of 121 national organizations have announced support for the AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day protest demonstration planned for Sept. 19 in Washington.

Solidarity Day coordinator John Perkins reported that additional endorsements are being added each day. The demonstration is intended to focus the frustration of millions of Americans over the Reagan Administration's cutbacks in social programs.

In addition to the 121 national organizations, Perkins said that large numbers of local and state groups and coalitions will participate in the demonstration along with union contingents.

Among the national groups are the African Methodist Episcopal Church, American Coalition of Citizens with Disabilities, Consumer Federation of America, Frontlash, League of United Latin American Citizens, League of Women Voters and the NAACP.

The list also includes the National Consumers League, National Council of Senior Citizens, National Farmers Union, National Education Association, National Organization for Women, National Urban League, the Wilderness Society, United Mine Workers, and various Catholic, Protestant and Jewish organizations.

Human Rights Tied to Free Associations

Chicago—The cornerstone of United States human rights policy should be the universal principle of freedom of independent association, the AFL-CIO Executive Council declared.

"The right of ordinary citizens to create and maintain their own institutions, regardless of who owns the means of production or what political party is in power, is fundamental to all other rights," the council said.

"Without organizations through which to assert their rights and protect themselves from the state or other strongholds of power," the council averred, "citizens are deprived of the means to secure either their policy liberty or a wider measure of social and economic justice."

THE OPEN and forceful promotion of freedom of association should be undertaken by the United States, using all appropriate instruments, public and private, the AFL-CIO declared. It warned that the alternative to such a positive policy now may be increasing reliance later on purely negative and punitive sanctions, or the abandonment of a human rights policy altogether.

The promotion of human rights and of political democracy serves the legitimate security interests of the nation, the council pointed out.

Persistent violations of human rights by governments friendly to the United States are warning signals of their instability and ultimate unreliability.

"WE BELIEVE that the struggle of workers, under all social systems, for free and independent trade unions provides a useful perspective from which to formulate a more effective human rights policy," the council affirmed.

"We recognize that in running the gamut from authoritarian to totalitarian societies, the policy we propose will encounter different obstacles and thus require different methods of implementation. Nonetheless, it rests on a single standard of judgment and a universal principle which the American people can understand and support."

WOMEN TRADE UNION leaders from 15 Central and South American nations attended the 1981 collective bargaining and leadership programs for women of the American Institute for Free Labor Development. The 38 women, participated in graduation ceremonies at AFL-CIO headquarters after attending two seven-week institutes at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. Among the topics covered were negotiations, economics, communications and human and trade union rights. Field trips included visits to unions and plants in New York and Boston. Attendants Press Texas Airline on Resuming Talks

Houston—The Association of Flight Attendants asked the National Mediation Board to intervene in its contract negotiations with Texas International Airlines after the carrier walked out of talks July 20.

At the same time, AFA President Linda A. Puchala said that the union "will be contacting labor groups in every city served by Texas International to gain support for our efforts to reach a fair and equitable contract."

Puchala said that the airline, one of four companies owned by the holding company of Texas Air Corp. headed by Frank Lorenzo, had made no effort to return to the bargaining table since it abruptly broke off talks, further evidence of its progressively deteriorating labor relations.

AFA MEMBERS conducted informational picketing against the Houston-based carrier July 30, 31, and Aug. 1 at the Houston International Airport and on July 30 and 31 at the Dallas-Fort Worth Airport to protest the company's refusal to bargain in good faith.

Airline unions charge that Lorenzo's most recent creation, New York Air, was formed from Texas International assets, and that New York Air is avoiding union contract obligations. They also cite negotiating difficulties that TXI is currently experiencing with the Air Line Pilots and the Machinists as well as the recent suspension of five Texas International pilots for speaking out against the airline's management at a Continental Airlines stockholders' meeting.

Senior Citizens Cite Need For Federal Energy Aid

The National Council of Senior Citizens has released the findings of two studies that underline the need for continuing federal weatherization and energy assistance programs for low-income households.

In a press conference announcing the study results, NCSC Executive Director William R. Hutton said "no one should doubt the severity of the crisis low-income households face because of rising energy costs."

Noting that elderly and disabled persons are especially susceptible to death from cold and overheating, Hutton declared that without assistance, "this winter and summer, old people are going to be dying out there, and we want to interest people to help."

HUTTON CALLED the current energy policy of the Reagan Administration "inhumane and inequitable."

The Administration has proposed to terminate the Dept. of Energy's participation in the weatherization program and instead allow states and communities to use Dept. of Housing & Urban Development block grants for weatherization projects if they so choose. However, this option has been open to states under the weatherization legislation and has not been used.

The Administration also has proposed to cut the federal energy assistance program by 25 percent and fold $1.4 billion in funding for the program into Dept. of Health & Human Services emergency energy assistance block grants to states which do not specifically target low income persons.

THE STUDIES were conducted by the Grier Partnership and the Consumer Energy Council of America for Project Energycare, an information and referral program to help poor elderly and disabled persons obtain aid in meeting escalating energy costs. Energycare has 85 community-based branches operated by the NCSC and funded through the Community Services Administration.

With regard to energy assistance, the Grier study pointed out that the price of home heating oil has increased six-fold since 1973, from 20 cents to $1.25 per gallon, while the consumer price index has doubled. Natural gas quadrupled in price during the same period.

Social security and Supplemental Security Income benefits, on which many poor elderly people subsist, are tied to the CPI and, therefore, energy costs consume ever-increasing percentages of fixed, low-income budgets, the study pointed out. An estimated 5 million elderly persons have incomes less than 125 percent of the federal poverty guidelines, according to the Grier's data.

Some examples from the study's state-by-state breakdown of average 1981 home energy expenditures, compared with projections for 1982, show:

- In Maine and New Hampshire, the average expenditure was $1,773 in 1981 and is projected for more than $2,100 in 1982.
- In New York, the average expenditure was $1,851 in 1981, projected to reach $2,200 in 1982.
- In 11 states, average home energy expenditures exceeded $1,400 in 1981.
- In no state will the average energy expenditure for 1982 be less than $500.

The CECA study concluded that weatherization saves energy and is a cost-effective way to use federal energy dollars. It also said that weatherization helps low-income households reduce fuel bills by an average of 27 percent.

A combination of weatherization and energy assistance programs for low-income households would be the most cost-effective approach to alleviate the burden of rising energy costs for the poor, CECA said. (PAI)

Printing Clause Held Essential to Copyright Law

Chicago—The AFL-CIO urged Congress to enact pending legislation that would permanently retain the manufacturing clause in the U.S. copyright law which requires books written by American authors living in the United States to be printed in either the United States or Canada in order to receive U.S. copyright protection.

Elimination of the clause would result in a massive move by American publishers and printers out of the country and the publishing of American authors' books abroad, as well as widespread job losses in the U.S. printing industry, the Executive Council warned. The provision, in effect in varying forms since 1891, is slated to expire July 1, 1982.

"Removal of the manufacturing clause from the Copyright Act will not produce any tangible benefits for the American consumer," the council's statement said.

"The manufacturing clause is a vital defense against wholesale destruction of the U.S. industry. It should be preserved."

If the clause were eliminated, the Labor Dept. estimates, there would be a huge drop in employment opportunities in firms such as paper mills which supply the printing and publishing industry. It is estimated that the total job loss in the United States could run as high as 367,000, the council observed.

August Schedule Listed By Labor Studies Center

A weeklong session on arbitration was held at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in Silver Spring, Md., and other training programs sponsored by six unions and the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) are scheduled for the balance of August.

The arbitration program included preparation and presentation of a mock case before a professional arbitrator, with proceedings videotaped for review.

Using the campus for their own leadership training during August are the Clothing & Textile Workers, Aug. 2-3; Flight Attendants, Aug. 10-14 and 24-27; Teachers, Aug. 17-21; Communications Workers, Aug. 23-28; Operating Engineers, Aug. 23-28 and Aug. 30-Sept. 4; Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, Aug. 30-Sept. 4

The AIFLD will have 40 trade union leaders from Latin American countries on campus, Aug. 24 to Sept. 30, to study collective bargaining and leadership techniques.

A scheduled institute for principal officers of state and local central bodies on techniques for using the news media to tell labor's story was cancelled because of the air traffic controllers' strike. It was to have been co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Information and the Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Information on these and other labor studies programs may be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone (301) 431-6400.

Council Backs Strikers

Kirkland Blasts Attempt To Bust Air Controllers

think it's brutal overkill and a blatant union-busting tactic on the part of the Administration."

At a news conference during the Executive Council meeting, AFL-CIO President Kirkland told reporters:

"I do not believe that meeting this issue by brutal, repressive measures, invoking the full force and power of the government of the United States against these workers, who are attempting by the only means that they feel is left to them to bring proper attention to their serious problems, is a contribution to the resolution of it, nor will it advance the cause of public safety."

KIRKLAND SAID that PATCO members, who work long hours under highly stressful conditions, rarely qualifying for full pension benefits because of medical reasons, felt that they had no recourse but to strike an employer that has repeatedly turned its back on their pleas for justice.

"I respect the law," Kirkland told reporters, "but events here and elsewhere in the world have demonstrated that when working people feel a deep sense of grievance, they will exercise what I think is a basic human right to withdraw their services, and not to work under conditions which they no longer find tolerable."

Kirkland said in response to a question that the no-strike "oath" that air controllers and other federal employees must sign is like the "yellow-dog contracts" that have long since been outlawed in the private sector.

Kirkland, who accused President Reagan of strikebreaking in his militant, intractable handling of the walkout, led the Executive Council and other national and local labor leaders in an hour-long march with controllers picketing Chicago's O'Hare International Airport.

He said he hoped "reason will prevail," and suggested that appointment by the Administration of an experienced, impartial mediator "could offer a way out" of the impasse.

SUCH A recommendation was forwarded to the White House the evening of Aug. 3, when the walkout began, by Air Line Pilots President John J. O'Donnell, who told reporters in Chicago that he made the recommendation to Reagan's labor liaison, Robert Bonitati, and suggested former Labor Sec. W. J. Usery for the role.

Meanwhile, expressions of support for the controllers—as well as warnings that the Administration's uncompromising policy toward the strikers could have far-reaching implications—came from other labor groups.

BRITISH controllers were considering supportive action, as was the International Transport Workers' Federation, a trade-union secretariat linking transportation unions in the free world.

President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees said that the Administration's actions signal a major attack on public employees generally.

Government Employees President Kenneth Blaylock observed that "if the FAA were operating in the private sector, they would have faced charges of failure to bargain in good faith from the National Labor Relations Board. Instead, they enjoy the full force of federal legal machinery and the judicial system in attempting to stifle the legitimate demands of PATCO and the workers it represents."

Blaylock added that the Administration's repressive measures against the union "lead to the unmistakable conclusion that it is intent on breaking it."

THE CONTROLLERS' walkout followed rejection of a June 22 government offer by 95 percent of PATCO's members. The controllers, whose rejection of the proposal was announced five days before they left their jobs, want higher wages than Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis allowed for in the government's package.

But they are especially seeking agreement on issues that transcend simple economics. These include earlier retirement, a shorter workweek, more say on choice of equipment they use, better training for rookie controllers, and a greater recognition by the government of the stress of their jobs.

PATCO members claim that few of their number last long enough on the job, 25 years, to collect full retirement benefits. They point to FAA statistics, obtained by the union through the Freedom of Information Act, showing that between 1976 and 1979 about 89 percent of U.S. controllers who retired did so for medical reasons before they were eligible for full retirement benefits.

ONLY THE United States, among all the world's major countries, they note, requires controllers to work a 40-hour week. In Canada, controllers work a 34-hour week and get a 21-day "sabbatical" every five years for extensive physical and psychological examinations to check for stress.

The Canadians got the work pressure relief only after a strike, the union noted.

WIVES OF STRIKING Air Traffic Controllers join the picket line in support of their husbands at a regional control center in Nashua, N.H. Spouses of PATCO members also picketed at a number of other locations across the country.

Congress Gives 2nd Helping To Profit-Rich Oil Industry

Congress recessed until Sept. 9 after giving rubber-stamp approval to the heart of the Reagan Administration's economic program—heavy budget cuts in virtually all non-defense segments of government, coupled with a tax policy geared to putting more cash in the hands of business firms and wealthy investors.

Both the House and Senate brushed aside last-ditch liberal efforts to cut back on the embarrassment of added benefits for the profit-rich oil industry. In addition to the assortment of tax cuts all business firms will receive, the oil industry will reap tax reductions expected to total $11.8 billion over the next five years.

EVEN AS the measure was being cleared for the President's signature, a high-level Administration official dropped a strong hint of a future proposal that would come close to eliminating entirely the tax obligations of the wealth.

The trial balloon was sent up by Assistant Sec. of the Treasury for Economic Affairs Craig Roberts in an interview with Fred Barnes of the Baltimore Sun.

Roberts said the Administration will consider moving to wipe out the progressive income tax system, under which those with the highest incomes are taxed at the highest rates.

Graduated income taxes hurt the poor by slowing "their climb up the ladder," Roberts insisted. He said the Administration may end up proposing "a flat rate of, say, 15 percent," without exemptions or deductions.

SUCH A FLAT rate would mean a higher total tax for wealthy, it would be a huge reduction from the present 50 percent tax rate ceiling.

Another Administration option, Roberts suggested, might be "moving away from income taxes altogether to a consumption tax." He presumably had in mind a value-added tax or some other form of national sales tax.

Technically, the stringent budget that Congress established is a non-binding target subject to refinement in a second budget resolution.

But at the Administration's prodding, Congress passed and sent to the President before the recess a budget reconciliation bill that made permanent changes in many of the nation's laws to ensure that spending does not exceed the tentative budget ceiling.

THERE WAS some hope for at least a partial reprieve in one element of the budget reconciliation bill, the much criticized provision eliminating the $122 a month minimum social security benefit.

The House voted 404 to 20 to continue the minimum benefit, which the budget reconciliation marked for elimination next March. The Senate put off consideration of the measure until after the recess.

The first item the Senate will take up when it returns, however, will be a showdown on an attempt to prevent federal courts from requiring school busing to achieve racial balance. Three attempts to break a filibuster supported by the civil rights movement failed, the last time by only a single vote. Another try at getting the 60 votes needed to limit debate is scheduled the day the Senate returns.

THE HOUSE, too, is approaching decision on a civil rights issue although it has not yet been scheduled for floor action.

Before the recess, the House Judiciary Committee approved by a bipartisan 23-1 vote a strong bill extending the 1965 Voting Rights Act, which is scheduled to expire a year from now. Efforts to reach a compromise on conditions under which jurisdictions became exempt from the law fell through, but those who sought to soften the law agreed to bring the bill to the House floor.

Social Cuts Imperil Support for Defense

Chicago — The AFL-CIO's traditional and steadfast support for a strong national defense should not be construed as "a blank check for the Pentagon," the Executive Council declared.

The council warned in a statement that the Reagan Administration's policies are threatening to shatter the national consensus for a stronger defense effort.

"By increasing defense spending at the expense of vital social programs, the Administration risks the creation of new anti-defense constituencies among workers, the poor, minorities and the elderly," the council said, adding:

"Popular support for a strong defense and foreign policy cannot be sustained by unjust social and economic policies which generate social tension, class conflict and political polarization. Nor will such policies produce the economic strength required for military strength."

The council called on Congress to submit the Administration's defense budget "to the closest scrutiny."

"IF, AS THE Administration says, we cannot solve our social problems by throwing money at them, we cannot solve our defense problems that way, either," the council declared.

It said that just as the AFL-CIO has in the past opposed across-the-board cuts in defense spending without regard for the weapons or strategies that would be affected, it also rejects the notion that vast increases in military spending will by themselves add substantially to the nation's military strength. It's not how much money is spent, but what it buys in relation to the country's security needs that should be the standard, the council stressed.

It charged that the Reagan Administration "has put the cart before the horse" by seeking huge increases in the defense budget without having resolved key issues of strategy or decided what weapons systems are needed to implement that strategy. Additional billions have been committed to the Pentagon, but no decisions have been made, for example, on deployment of the missile, on the B-1 bomber, or on other major defense questions.

THE COUNCIL noted that the Administration's budget proposals would boost defense spending, in constant 1972 dollars, from $72.5 billion in 1980 to $116.4 billion in 1985. Over the same span, non-defense spending would be reduced from $222.4 billion to $201.6 billion.

The statement called on Congress to crack down on the wasteful spending, huge cost overruns and poor management of resources that have characterized the Defense Dept. Those practices are indefensible even in prosperous times, the council observed, but they are intolerable "at a time when the defense burden is being shifted more and more to workers and the poor."

Petition Drive Launched for Solidarity Day

Unions, AFL-CIO central bodies and allied organizations taking part in Solidarity Day have begun collecting signatures on petitions keyed to the goals of labor's Sept. 19th demonstration.

The petitions will increase the impact of Solidarity Day, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a letter asking participating groups to reproduce and circulate the one-page document. They will show that those who come to Washington to demonstrate "are backed up by legions of like-thinking Americans in communities across the land."

"WE SPEAK for ourselves," the petition asserts, denying the claim of "the present Administration and a me-too Congress" to represent the views of America's workers.

The petition affirms the support of the signers for:

- Jobs and justice for all Americans.
- A safe workplace.
- Payment for all benefits guaranteed by the social security program.
- Full educational opportunity for all our children.
- The protection and expansion of civil rights, women's rights and voting rights.
- Decent housing and health care for all.
- A healthful environment.
- Fair trade laws that help rebuild the American economy.
- Energy programs that serve the nation and its people, not simply the oil giants.
- Tax justice.
- Interest rates that encourage, not impede, economic growth and job creation.

SIGNED PETITIONS, Kirkland said, should either be sent to the Solidarity Day office at the AFL-CIO headquarters or brought to Washington on Sept. 19.

The Solidarity Day committee stressed the importance of the petitions in showing the grassroots support for the programs that the trade union movement and its allies have been defending and advocating.

Circulation of the petitions by itself will stimulate interest in the demonstration, Solidarity Day Coordinator John Perkins noted. And it is a key element in an effective followup.

"Solidarity Day is not intended as a one-day media event," Perkins stressed.

OSHA to Keep Cancer Expert, Drops Charges

The Reagan Administration has called off its campaign to fire the top cancer expert at the Occupational Safety & Health Administration after running into a hornet's nest of protest.

Dr. Peter Infante is back on the job as director of OSHA's Office of Carcinogen Identification & Classification, and charges against him of insubordination and misrepresenting the agency's position on formaldehyde have been dropped.

Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter withdrew the charges in a letter to Infante dated Aug. 7, three weeks after a House Science & Technology subcommittee held hearings on the attempts to dismiss the cancer expert.

AFTER TWO days of testimony, Subcommittee Chairman Albert Gore (D-Tenn.) concluded that the formaldehyde industry's trade association "wanted this guy out of government" and instigated his dismissal.

Formaldehyde is suspected by the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health of causing cancer in humans. The National Cancer Institute takes a similar

Labor Support Spreads In Air Controller Strike

BUS TRANSPORTING AFL-CIO Executive Council members and staff from Chicago to Washington carried a message of support for striking Air Traffic Controllers. Public Employee Dept. Executive Director John Leyden, left, and President Kenneth Blaylock of the Government Employees show the banner.

Unions Hit Mass Firings By President

By James M. Shevis

Organized labor's support for the air traffic controllers' strike gathered momentum as the AFL-CIO and its affiliated unions joined in urging the Reagan Administration to return to the bargaining table and resolve the dispute that has resulted in mass firings, fines, and jail sentences.

With President Reagan unrelenting in his directive to fire members of the 13,000-strong Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization who struck for better work conditions, the federation called upon its state and local bodies across the country to rally their members and their congressional delegations in the controllers' behalf. Actions and expressions of support by foreign air traffic controllers also underscored worker backing for the walkout.

THE FEDERATION directed its staff members to cancel all air travel plans, and postpone any AFL-CIO meeting where attendance would require participants to fly. State and local central bodies were instructed to follow the same course.

At its meeting in Chicago, the Executive Council called on the government to engage in "frank and open" negotiations aimed at alleviating the controllers' "clearly justifiable grievances."

Because the Administration has not responded to its call to reason, the AFL-CIO is asking state and local bodies to participate in petition drives, letter-writing campaigns to congressmen and senators, rallies, handbilling and informational picketing to generate such a response.

Individual affiliates proclaimed their support for the controllers, who struck after months of frustration in trying to negotiate a settlement of longstanding differences with the Federal Aviation Administration. PATCO members are employees

The AFL-CIO on Wheels

Bus Riders Walk Line On Long Voyage Home

By John M. Barry

"We're getting used to traveling by bus, and I highly recommend it," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told a cheering throng of Air Traffic Controllers and their families outside strike headquarters in Elyria, Ohio.

Bus travel in these times "is absolutely safe," Kirkland stressed. "They're good union drivers, and there are no white knuckles."

He thus summed up the reasons for the chartered Greyhound bus journey from Chicago to Washington by which he and his wife and 32 AFL-CIO officers and staff members made it back to base from the Executive Council and General Board meetings.

IN THE COURSE of the council sessions, it became apparent from the Reagan Administration's harsh response to the PATCO strike that there would be no flying back to Washington. There was tacit unanimity on that point. A number of council members and staff representatives arranged to drive or managed to find train accommodations. For the rest of us, the chartered bus offered the best solution.

But what started as a simple, if long, voyage home became an exercise in trade union solidarity and, more than that, an adventure of the spirit.

The big Greyhound cruiser had scarcely left Chicago's city limits on Friday morning, Aug. 7, when someone pointed out that the route would take us within a few miles of the air traffic control center outside Cleveland. Why not swing by and give a bit of encouragement to the PATCO pickets? The idea stirred anticipation on the bus as the riders saw the chance to demonstrate support for the strikers and publicly express their outrage at the Administration's tactics.

AT THE FIRST rest stop on the Indiana Turnpike, John Leyden, executive director of the federation's Public Employee Dept. and a former president of PATCO, phoned ahead for directions. There were more calls from subsequent rest areas as the bus coursed across Indiana and Ohio, and Leyden was able to work out a rendezvous with escorts from PATCO Local 203 who met us at Exit 8A of the Ohio Turnpike and led us to the local's headquarters.

State Employees Win Pact In 22-Day Minnesota Strike

St. Paul—Some 14,000 Minnesota state employees, their ranks unbroken after 22 days on the picket lines, returned to work with a tentative two-year agreement that carried the unanimous endorsement of the executive board of Council 6 of the State, County & Municipal Employees.

The strike was legal under a 1980 state law and prison guards, the principal group of employees not allowed to strike, demonstrated their support by joining the picketing in their off-duty hours.

THE AGREEMENT, subject to ratification, assured every worker a pay raise of at least $100 a month in the first year of the contract, ranging up to $184 at the top grades. But the highest percentage increase went to lower-paid workers. Food service workers, for example, got a 13.3 percent raise.

Workers who struck represented a broad range of white-collar, blue-collar and service occupations. Three of the bargaining groups will receive a 6 percent raise next July 1, and an additional 3 percent on Jan. 1, 1983. Other units will receive two cost-of-living allowances the second year of the contract.

The strike began July 20 after AFSCME members had voted by a 77 percent margin to reject the state's contract offer.

Minnesota government offices hired about 700 temporary workers during the Labor Support Expanding In Air Controller Strike of the FAA, part of the Transportation Department.

STEELWORKERS President Lloyd McBride instructed all USWA officers and staff members to refrain from flying on commercial aircraft except in emergencies.

Kenneth Blaylock, president of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. as well as head of the Government Employees, urged members of PED affiliates similarly to avoid flying until the PATCO strike has ended, and encouraged AFGE locals "to lend moral support, including informational picketing alongside PATCO members."

Teachers President Albert Shanker urged his members to observe PATCO picket lines, assist PATCO locals and members during the strike, and to write Reagan and members of Congress of their dissatisfaction with the Administration's repressive handling of the dispute.

WOODWORKERS President Keith Johnson, warning that the Administration's harsh and brutal measures against PATCO "could well be the opening salvo" in its long expected anti-union campaign, asked IWA members to give "all possible aid and support" to the striking controllers.

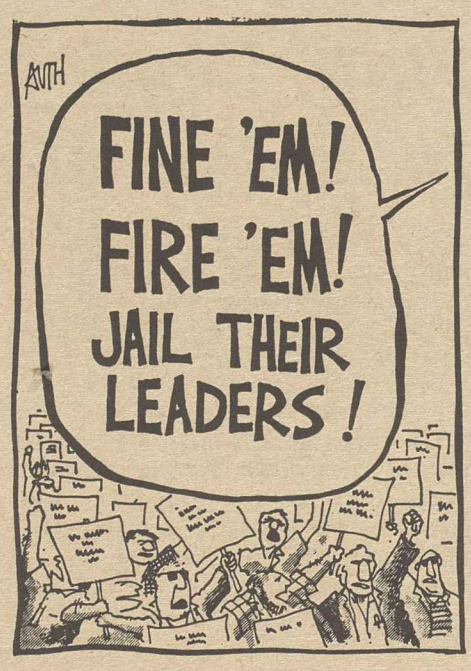
Air Line Pilots President John J. O'Donnell observed that the Administration's position appears to have hardened into a form of "philosophical warfare" against labor. "Little, if any, meaningful discussion is going on regarding the issues that initiated the dispute," he added.

The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. urged the Administration to end its "punitive" tactics. IUD staff will shun air travel.

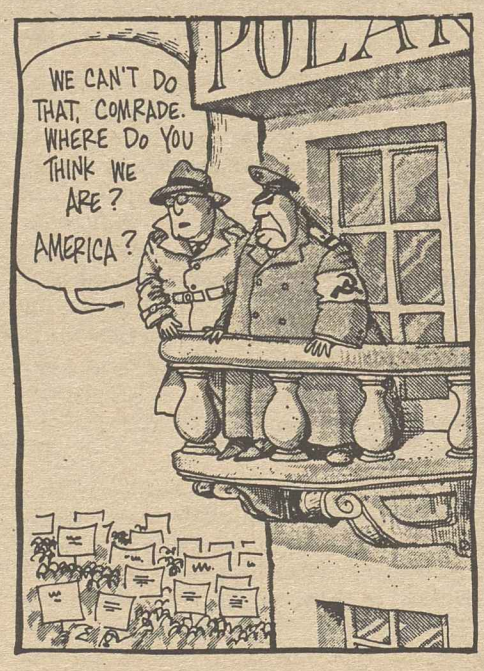
TEXAS AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard said it was ironic that the Administration encouraged workers in Poland to form free unions and speak out against government repression while at the same time it is trying its best "to break a national union in this country."

At a press conference following the AFL-CIO General Board meeting in Chicago, Federation President Lane Kirkland said that he felt confident that the public will come to see the Administration's handling of the strike as "an exercise in repression . . . to avoid any sort of reasonable discourse and any real effort to examine the real merits of the case and the justice of that cause."

In the maze of legal developments surrounding the dispute, PATCO filed an unfair labor practice charge against the FAA for refusing to bargain since the controllers struck on Aug. 3. At a hearing before the Federal Labor Relations Authority called by the FAA to seek decertification of the union as the controllers' representative, PATCO attorney Gary Klein asked Administrative Law Judge John Fenton to consider that the agency "is engaged in blatant union-busting."



Meanwhile, PATCO President Robert Poli appeared in Federal District Court in New York to give a deposition in a multi-million dollar suit brought against the union by the nation's airlines. Poli, who arrived by chartered bus, warned reporters that air travel was unsafe due to replacement of PATCO members by supervisory personnel and inexperienced military controllers.



IN WASHINGTON, federal Judge Harold Greene refused the Administration's request for further action against the striking controllers, saying the government "cannot have it both ways." It cannot take action against workers it has fired, he reasoned. Greene also cut outstanding fines against PATCO from $4.75 million to $750,000, and reduced the fine against Poli from $6,000 to $2,000.

Overseas sympathy for the striking Americans girdled the globe. Transatlantic flights over Canada were delayed or canceled for two days as members of the Canadian Air Traffic Controllers' Association in Gander, Newfoundland, refused to clear flights to the United States over Canadian air space on grounds the reduced number of American controllers made U.S. air space unsafe.

THE CANADIAN boycott ended when the government promised to investigate union complaints that border skies were dangerous. Spain's controllers decided to refuse clearance to U.S. flights, however, and a boycott by Portuguese controllers was announced. The International Association of Air Traffic Controllers also was meeting in Amsterdam to consider the American air traffic situation.

The controllers seek improvements, including shorter hours and early retirement. The stress of their life-or-death responsibilities has forced many controllers to leave their jobs for medical reasons before they reach retirement age.

Iron Workers Convention

Lyons Scores Reagan On Economic Policies

Hollywood, Fla.—The Reagan Administration's tactics of fighting inflation by risking further unemployment came under sharp attack here at the opening session of the Iron Workers' 36th convention.

Iron Workers President John H. Lyons warned the 1,084 delegates that Reagan economic policies will lead to long and deep recessions which the nation can ill afford.

"EVERY ONE percentage point in unemployment costs the government about $25 billion a year," Lyons stressed. With full employment, he said, essential programs could be funded and the budget would show a surplus.

The high interest rates that are part of the Administration economic strategy have pushed the unemployment rate in the construction industry 43 percent above the national average, Lyons charged.

Increased investments by the wealthy won't help a wage earner buy a home with a 16 percent mortgage, he said. Gains that union members made in the past "are slipping away from us," he warned.

Former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) warned, as did Lyons, of the attacks on the Davis-Bacon Act, which sets prevailing wage standards for federally funded construction, and other labor protections.

KENNEDY CHALLENGED Republican senators who seek to repeal Davis-Bacon to prove that the law is inflationary. He also asked the Administration to "look at their own high interest rates" to discover one of the real causes of inflation in the construction industry.

He said "attacks on social programs are really attacks on organized labor which fought over the past 50 years to achieve those programs."

Marshall warned that if the Davis-Bacon statute were repealed, it would destabilize the construction industry, encourage fly-by-night contractors, result in shoddy work and higher costs for maintenance and repairs, and remove the incentive for developing skills and acquiring training and apprenticeship.

In his report to the convention, Lyons unveiled a new study of the effects of the open shop on the construction industry. The nation's two largest open-shop contractors, Daniel Construction and Brown & Root, are "making major inroads into the synthetic fuels market," he pointed out, and other non-union firms are making incursions into the industry.

"THE STAKES are too high to sit idly by while the Business Roundtable plots the destruction of construction unions," Lyons said. "Their philosophy and method of carrying it out constitutes a violation of the antitrust laws."

Also addressing the convention were Rep. Claude D. Pepper (D-Fla.), who lashed out against the Administration's proposed social security cuts, President Paul J. Burnsky of the AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. and Sec.-Treas. Joseph F. Maloney of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

Drozak Hits Bid To Weaken Law On U.S. Shipping

The AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. called on Congress to reject any weakening of the Jones Act, which reserves domestic shipping rights for U.S. vessels.

MTD President Frank Drozak told a House Merchant Marine panel recently that poking loopholes in the law would threaten the nation's defense as well as "severely weaken our economic base."

Past military sealifts have been possible "because the Jones Act provided the United States with a healthy shipbuilding mobilization base and a pool of skilled personnel to operate vessels," he noted.

Drozak, who is also president of the Seafarers, opposed legislative exemptions sought by the Pacific Northwest lumber industry.

He reminded the House panel that "more than 185,000 American workers and their families owe their livelihoods to domestic waterborne transportation protected by the Jones Act."

81,000 Win Contract Gains At California Supermarkets

Los Angeles—Members of nine locals of the Food & Commercial Workers approved a new three-year contract covering more than 81,000 food clerks employed by 21 Southern California supermarket chains and independent supermarkets.

The pact, ratified by a margin of 63 percent of those voting, covers 65,000 employees of the chains and binds also the independent supermarkets that had agreed to accept the terms of the union's settlement with the Food Employers Council.

THE AGREEMENT, reached on the eve of a strike deadline, will raise hourly wages by $1.90 over three years, and provide cost-of-living adjustments and increases in employer health and welfare pension contributions.

The nine UFCW locals directly covered by the contract are in Bakersfield, Long Beach, Los Angeles, Santa Barbara, San Bernardino, Riverside, San Diego, Pomona, and Santa Monica.

Union negotiators valued the overall package at $3.56 an hour for the life of the contract in pay increases, COL adjustments, and fringe benefits.

THE PACT will increase journeyman clerks' pay by 80 cents an hour in the first contract year, and by 55 cents an hour in the second and third years. In addition, there will be a guaranteed COL raise of 25 cents an hour the first year, 20 cents the second and 25 cents the third.

Clerks' helpers will receive increases of 40 cents an hour the first year and 25 cents an hour in each of the other two years. Other worker categories will receive increases in appropriate proportion to journeymen's wages.

Jobless Rate Dips on Drop In Workforce

The nation's jobless rate fell three-tenths of 1 percent for the second month in a row, dropping to 7 percent in July. That's the lowest it has been since April 1980, when it was 6.9 percent.

But the improvement was more statistical than real.

The two-month decline in the unemployment rate was primarily the result of a shrinkage in the total workforce—the number of people employed and actively looking for work.

THE WORKFORCE total was nearly one million less than two months ago, and the number of persons with jobs in July was 273,000 below the May level. While both employment and the workforce rose in July, the rise was not enough to offset the previous month's sharp decline.

Bureau of Labor Statistics Commissioner Janet L. Norwood cautioned against over-optimism on the basis of the July drop in the unemployment rate.

"I don't know what will happen in August, September, and October," she told reporters at a news conference.

Norwood said that "the auto industry continues to show weakness and has recovered only a small portion of the jobs lost during the past two years."

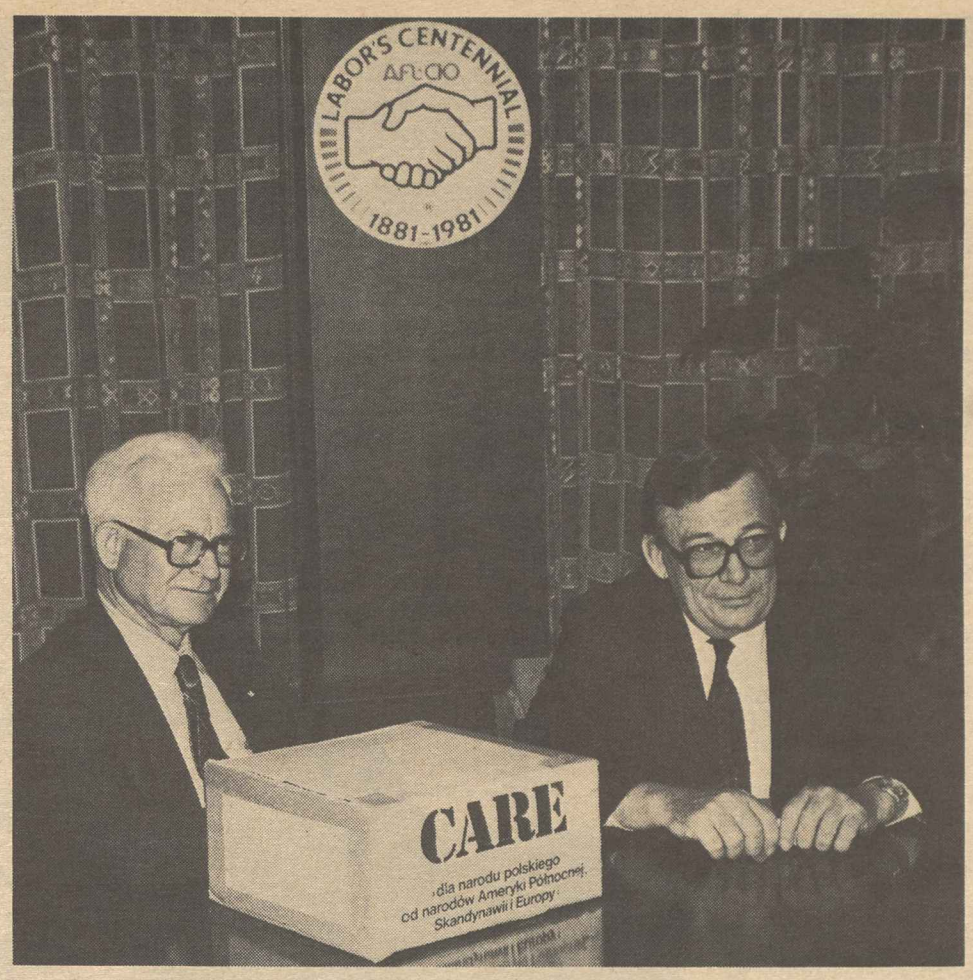
Construction employment, which continued to decline in July, remains below the low point of last year's recession.

DESPITE THE downturn in the economy in the second quarter, total employment last month rose by 570,000, with most of the new jobs going to adult males, especially those 20 to 24 years old. For men 25 years and over, the jobless rate dropped from 5 to 4.7 percent in July. For those 20 to 24 years old, the unemployment rate declined sharply from 12.8 to 11.3 percent, its lowest level since March 1980.

The jobless rate for adult women, 6.7 percent, remained about the same. The rate for all teenagers dropped from 19 to 18.1 percent. The unemployment rate for minority teenagers dropped from 38.6 to 36.4 percent.

For blacks of all ages, the jobless rate last month fell six-tenths of 1 percent to 13.6 percent. Unemployment among Hispanic workers was measured at 9.9 percent, a three-tenths of 1 percent drop, the bureau reported.

EMPLOYMENT IN the construction industry remained at depressed levels in July, as an additional 20,000 jobs were lost, BLS said. Joblessness in the industry was measured at 15 percent, "still well above the rates that prevailed earlier this year," the bureau said.



In contrast, manufacturing employment continued to improve in July, rising by 110,000 to 20.5 million. Both durable and non-durable goods industries registered job increases, with fabricated metals, machinery, electrical equipment, and apparel showing the most improvement.

Top Executive Pay Averages $616,500

Top officers of major industrial corporations collected double-digit pay raises last year, according to a survey by a management consultant firm.

In 100 major companies surveyed, the median salary and cash bonus of chief executive officers came to $616,500, up 11.7 percent from the previous year.

Other high-ranking executives did even better. Compensation for the second highest official in these companies rose 14.4 percent, to $455,800. The third layer of executives averaged a 12.4 percent increase, to $353,700. The survey was conducted by the firm of Towers, Perrin, Forster & Crosby.

CARE PACKAGES of food like that shown here are being sent for distribution to the elderly in Poland under a program developed by the international aid and development cooperative. CARE President Wallace J. Campbell and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland discuss the emergency food program. The federation is a member organization of CARE. The agency plans to send 200,000 packages to Poland in the next year.

OCAW Keynote Challenges Reagan's Election Mandate

Denver—President Reagan's "election mandate" was sharply challenged at the opening of the 16th biennial convention of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers.

In his keynote address, OCAW President Robert F. Goss blamed voter apathy for the election result. "Much has been made by the President of the mandate of the last election. But Reagan was elected because almost half of the people stayed home; we stayed away from the polls," Goss said.

"He was not mandated to destroy unions, to gut OSHA, to take away food stamps, to cut back help to the elderly, to cut out student loans, but that is what's happening.

"THE REAGAN Administration has given tax cuts to the oil industry, to multinational oil companies, and to people making over $50,000 a year, and that doesn't apply to very many people in this gathering."

Focusing on the makeup of the Administration, Goss noted that both Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan and OSHA Administrator Thorne Auchter are employers and charged that they do not truly represent working people.

"We work in the most profitable and hazardous industries and we have found no help in developing a safe work environment," he said.

The OCAW president also noted that "a sophisticated union-busting industry is developing in this country."

"ANTI-LABOR forces took over our country during the elections last fall and are trying to retrogress us back to the 1930s, and we're already there in some respects," Goss said. "Anti-labor forces are eating our lunch every day."

Approximately 850 delegates and 150 OCAW staff members attended the convention that was to conclude Aug. 14 with the election of officers. Goss is being challenged by Anthony Mazzocchi, director of the union's health and safety department. Thirteen candidates are running for the four officer positions.

Whenever possible, delegates as well as staff employees used alternative means of transportation to the convention. The OCAW executive board had notified them of their support of the Air Traffic Controllers' strike.

Those traveling to the convention used autos, buses and trains, many of them driving several days from the east coast and other distant areas of the United States and Canada.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, President Joyce Miller of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, and Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.) were scheduled to address the convention but canceled their appearances because of the PATCO strike.

Delegates adopted resolutions condemning the Reagan budget and tax program, high interest rates and so-called "right-to-work" laws. Other resolutions endorsed Solidarity Day, "grass-roots" political action and urged "vigorous defense" of the social security program.

Kirkland Cites Inspiration of Polish Unions

Chicago—The workers of Poland have "reinvigorated the cause of democratic labor everywhere in the world," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared in a telethon here to raise funds for the food and medical needs of the Polish people.

"They have written a new and dramatic chapter in the history of freedom," Kirkland said in remarks aired on WGN-TV. Solidarity, the new labor federation in Poland, has become more than a narrow trade union movement, Kirkland added.

"IT HAS BECOME the vehicle for a broad national movement of the whole Polish people against a failed tyranical system imposed upon them by the Soviet Union," he said.

The AFL-CIO, which is the largest supporter of Solidarity in the West, having raised a quarter of a million dollars for office supplies and equipment for the organization, pledged $1,000 to the Polish-American Charities Committee's campaign for food and medical supplies for the Poles.

Organized by the Polish-American Congress headquartered here, the telethon had raised $1,032,000 by the following day. President Robert Gibson of the Illinois State AFL-CIO, who introduced Kirkland, said that "more is still coming in."

GIBSON SAID that while the majority of pledges came from the Chicago area, where there is a heavy Polish-American population, calls came in from all over the nation. The telethon was beamed to some 1,200 outlets through WGN's tie-in with cable television.

He said that the food and medical supplies will be purchased in the United States, and shipped directly to Poland, where Solidarity members will help in their distribution to the needy.

Congratulating the organizers of the telethon and the viewers for their generous response, Kirkland said that the AFL-CIO is prepared to work with Polish-American groups, church and charitable organizations, and other concerned Americans to provide food and medicine to the Polish people.

And, as for assistance to the Solidarity trade-union movement in Poland, "we will continue this as long as they need it and want it," he said.

IUD Assails New Strategy To Oust Established Unions

Chicago—The AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. called for a mobilization of union resources to keep major business firms from destroying collective bargaining relationships where they already exist.

"This effort takes the form of company-stimulated decertification elections," IUD's executive council said in a resolution unanimously adopted here.

IUD AFFILIATES that participate in coordinated bargaining are beginning to feel the impact of this relatively new level of union busting, the council statement observed.

At Reliance Electric, what had been regarded as an increasingly productive union-management relationship was shattered by decertification elections in three plants, two of which were lost by the union, the department noted. A generally peaceful relationship between a number of IUD affiliates and management at the Square D Corp. recently was overthrown by a decertification petition filed at a Square D plant in Texas, with the reported support of the local plant manager.

Trying to hold off unionization is nothing unusual for American corporations, the IUD noted. But it has been rare for major American companies to try to overturn a collective bargaining relationship once it became established.

The practice "represents a menacing new direction taken by American industry, a threat not only to many individual unions, but to the basic role of free trade unionism in our democratic system," the council declared.

The IUD urged responsible corporate leaders to weigh the ultimate effect of these new anti-union efforts on the basic relationships between labor and management and on the fabric of industrial life in a free society.

In another resolution, the IUD promised to work to reform U.S. trade law and policy to make fair trade a reality. "Sensible international economic policy is a vital part of the industrial policies needed to reindustrialize the United States," the resolution observed.

THE DEPARTMENT pledged to continue to work toward stemming the flood of imports, ending export performance requirements and other "job-stealing" rules imposed by foreign governments, pressing for a system of minimum international labor standards, and continuing to fight for an end to the special multinational tax breaks which encourage U.S. industry to invest and create jobs abroad rather than in the United States.

In other business, the IUD approved the affiliation of the Office & Professional Employees International Union, bringing the number of department affiliates to 59.

To Call Up the Ranks

EACH OF US is bound by a sacred trust to represent faithfully the interest of our members and, by natural and logical extension, the interests of the working people of America.

Unlike the wily politician, we are not free to shift from constituency to constituency, to trade off one set of interests for another, to bob and weave among the issues, just so long as the election day tally comes out in our favor.

We have a constituency with self-defined interests. We have an agenda that flows from the aspirations of our members. It did not come from a moistened finger thrust into the political breeze.

WE ARE NOT free to pick and choose our principles according to public opinion polls or media fads.

We are not free to favor social security one day and acquiesce in its dismemberment the next.

We are not free to favor voting rights one day and find it unnecessary the next.

We are not free to favor the minimum wage, health and safety regulations, unemployment insurance, aid to education, food stamps, tax justice, public service jobs, and equal rights one day, and then discover on the next that these were merely ways of the government "getting on our backs."

When old discredited policies reappear in the guise of "a new beginning," we cannot pretend ignorance of their likely consequences. We cannot give the Administration the benefit of the doubt when there is no doubt in our minds.

WHEN GOVERNMENT social programs are blamed for all our economic ills, we cannot retreat into amnesia, conveniently forgetting the grim conditions that gave birth to those programs.

When the President calls for a "new federalism" to reduce the role of the federal government and turn power back to the states, we cannot act as if we were not around when "States Rights" was invoked to keep blacks out of polling booths and universities, to keep wages and social benefits low, to obstruct union organizing, and to maintain the power of narrow political and commercial cliques in the state houses.

When the Administration launches a radical counter-revolution to undo the progress of half a century, we cannot pretend that we are in the midst of business-as-usual.

Some of our political friends have suggested that now is not the time to mobilize resistance to the counter-revolution. Wait, they say, until the full impact of Reaganomics hits your people. Wait until they're really hurting. Then they will have only the President to blame.

But that is not what our mandate is for. To watch from the sidelines as the counter-revolution is consolidated on the backs of workers is a betrayal of our stewardship. Our job, knowing what we know, is to resist that injustice and to prevent the damage—not to wait until disaster strikes in the hope of turning workers' misery to later political advantage.

It is a time to call up the ranks.

No Solution to Unemployment

Thatcher's Cheap Pay Subsidy Pushes Down Britain's Wages

By Gus Tyler

TO STEM THE RIOTS in Britain, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has proposed an economic program that is in violation of her basic economic principles and yet is so fettered by her conservative prejudices that it just won't work.

Her plan is to create jobs for youths of riotous age, using government funds for the purpose to the tune of about $1 billion next year.

Apparently, Thatcher has concluded that jobless youth are prone to riot. So she is planning to put the young to work with the aid of government funding.

THE STEP—necessary as it is—is strictly out of step with Tory philosophy. If the unemployment rate in Britain now stands at 11.8 percent, that is a condition that should be cured by "market forces," according to conservative orthodoxy.

By that dogma, the high unemployment rate should bring down wages to make it possible for employers to hire workers at a profitable price. Thus unemployment with its low wages would be the road to greater employment at reduced wages, according to the classic calculations of the conservatives.

Whatever merit there may be to this bit of economic logic—and it is dubious whether there is any—the theory makes no allowance for the fact that people are people and not just so many numb numbers. People riot and people vote and they are doing both to the dismay of the Tories.

THE RIOTS have been running continuously for several weeks. In a by-election recently, the Tory party polled less than 10 percent of the total vote. Within the Cabinet there has been rising pressure for the Government to do something to spur employment and to give up the crude course of trying to revive the economy by starving people into submission. Agriculture Secretary Peter Walker demanded policies that would "move the country to being one nation at work instead of two, one employed and one unemployed." So, finally, Maggie, the metallic maiden, yielded.

But, even as she did, she didn't. She did decide that she could not count on "market forces" to do the job and that the Government had to step in. But the way in which she intervened once more exposed her class prejudices.

The key point in her program is a proposal to make weekly payments of $28.50 to companies for each employee under 18 hired at $76 or less per week. In other words, the Government will subsidize employers to employ young people, provided the pay is low enough.

The program will probably not create a single job in Britain without displacing someone else from some other job. No doubt, there will be employers who will be delighted to get the subsidy from the government as a reward for paying a low wage. They will indeed employ some youth.

But these employers, advantaged by cheap labor and government subsidy, will be in a position to undersell and undercut and undermine other employers who presently employ people—young and old—at the going wage and without subsidy.

SO THE THATCHER program will merely redistribute unemployment while lowering the general wage level. The only beneficiaries will be those employers who get the subsidy—a rather predictable consequence of a mind set that is determined by the attitude of the employer class.

Thus has Maggie lost her purity while gaining nothing in return for the humiliating sacrifice.

Let the Country See There's No Mandate

Our organization, the American Federation of State, County & Municipal Employees, will with other unions do everything possible to make Solidarity Day a national happening so that the country as a whole can see that there is no mandate for the programs that are coming from this Administration.

There is no mandate for the reduction in minimum benefits of social security.

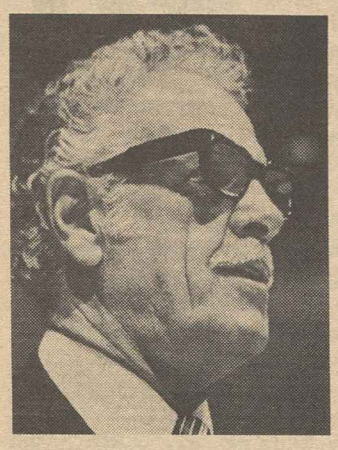
There's no mandate across the country for the reduction of school lunches, for cutting the whole host of programs in the name of balancing the federal budget.

There's certainly no mandate for the reduction of jobs, particularly where young adults for the first time have made an opportunity to go to work.

There must be a minimal standard of life below which we will not expect anyone to exist in our society.

—AFSCME Sec.-Treas. William Lucy at AFL-CIO General Board meeting.

Voicing Labor's Concerns



Solidarity Day Provides Forum For Basic Aims of Unionists

The following is from an address to the AFL-CIO General Board by Vice President Peter Bommarito in Chicago, Aug. 6, 1981.

SOLIDARITY DAY is a call to action. We know that an America that has 7 percent unemployment demands action.

In this, the centennial year of American labor, Solidarity Day is a fitting expression of who we are, what we do, and why we trade unionists banded together in the first place .

Our primary mission is to support the process of collective bargaining—which is nothing more than free men and women, negotiating in a free society, achieving a voice in their fate on the job. To pursue that goal, we will use any tool we can lay our hands on. Our tools may, at a given time, include education, organization, legislation or negotiation with either friend or foe.

A few years ago, we noted well that corporate America and its conservative political allies were expressing an attitude toward workers and their unions that was turning, in a word, nasty. In the fight for labor law reform in 1978, for instance, America's companies unswervingly lined up behind the outlaws in their ranks in a blind expression of a bunker mentality—us against them, with no interference from the light of reason.

IN CORPORATE and conservative America, among those who have much and intend to keep it, the motives and issues were not new—indeed, they were much like the motives and issues faced by Samuel Gompers as much as a century ago.

The methods, however, had changed. The company goon with the club and brass knuckles had been replaced by the sharpie with a briefcase, whose "seminars" taught America several new euphemisms for old-fashioned union-busting. At the same time, and on an equally slick and fast track, they cranked up in the political arena a new tool called the independent political action committee which could bring the methods of the gutter to the attack against any candidate they chose, while their candidate, the beneficiary of these methods, stood above the fray, unaware, of course, of how many dollars were poured into his victory.

It was against that backdrop we came to November 1980. And we lost.

Our opponents did not win with an overwhelming mandate. In fact, the presidential election was decided by just over 50 percent of Americans who turned out to vote. So, it could better be called one-half of one-half of a mandate.

But they did win. And they did win enough offices to get started on turning back the clock on social progress in America.

TODAY, less than seven months into the new Administration, we can see the shape of the attack. In the halls of both the legislative and executive branches of government, they are working their will through either legislative initiative or administrative fiat to achieve a whole host of goals that can only be called anti-worker.

Unfortunately, the attitudes that make such a wholesale attack on workers possible are on display now. All Americans have seen the harsh and punitive actions of the Administration against the air traffic controllers, who agreed by a 95 percent vote that their situation was untenable, their working conditions intolerable.

We trade unionists would also ask one question of the nation's opinion molders and media. Why is it that one year ago this month, when some public employees at the shipyard in Gdansk, Poland, felt similarly compelled and went on strike the free world was electrified and applauding? Are these the same voices who today say the only option for an American public employee is to go to jail?

Throughout that list of anti-worker initiatives, the common theme is to repress workers and quiet the voice they can express through their unions. It's anti-worker, pure and simple.

Nowhere has the philosophy behind this tax-cutting and budget-cutting insanity been more clearly displayed than in the attack on the social security system. Incredibly, the social security cuts are being advanced by a candidate whose principal pronouncement on the issue was to say, in the nationally televised presidential debate on Oct. 19, 1980, that he would begin work on social security "with the promise that no one presently dependent on social security is going to have the rug pulled out from under them and not get their checks."

THERE ARE SERIOUS questions for us about many of the other officials who were elected last November with our help. In kowtowing to the Executive Branch and its much ballyhooed "mandate," our congressional friends showed they know when it's time to rise above principle and worship the great god expediency. Together they left us with a choice between jelly beans and jelly fish.

We trade unionists know we stand pretty much alone in the fight to advance the workers' rights. But that never deterred us during the first century of American labor, and it sure isn't going to stop us now.

We will, now and in the future, continue to use all the tools of education, organization, negotiation and accommodation that are necessary for us. But for now, we're going to begin at the very beginning. And that's on the streets of Washington, D.C., on Sept. 19.

3 Million Jobs Endangered

Decontrol Plan Seen Bringing Doubling of Natural Gas Prices

THE REAGAN Administration's plan to end price controls on natural gas would more than double current prices and cut more than three million more jobs out of the already staggering economy, AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Howard Marlowe warned on Labor News Conference.

The impact of natural gas decontrol will be both "enormous and severe," Marlowe said. He stressed that industries as well as consumers will suffer. He pointed out that 60 percent of the nation's homes use natural gas for either heat or cooking, and that the production process of "a number of industries are very dependent upon natural gas.

Marlowe said that if natural gas controls are lifted, the producers will push prices to a "market-clearing level," which will be "determined by the OPEC price of oil on the world market." He noted that the current price restraints have held natural gas rates below the OPEC level, even though "the oil companies are the gas producers."

Marlowe turned aside the contention that "if the price is held artificially low by government action, the industry does not have the incentive to explore for and produce from new sources." In fact, he pointed out, the Reagan decontrol plan would wipe out the current incentive, which permits producers to charge higher prices for newly discovered gas.

Under decontrol, the price of all gas will be the same, whether it comes from existing or newly discovered sources, Marlowe said. "The incentive then," he said, "will be to manage the sale and production of gas on hand, so that it produces the profits that the oil companies want."

ANY SENSIBLE PLAN to curb inflation must include putting rapidly escalating health care costs under control.

Total health expenditures in the United States rose from $10.8 billion in 1950 to $167.9 billion in 1978. These figures represent only a partial picture as they do not include administrative costs or government public health expenditures.

Costs for hospitalization, surgery, doctors' care and auxiliary services such as laboratory tests, x-radiography, and physical therapy have become so prohibitive that a serious and prolonged illness can financially ruin a middle-income family without health insurance.

THOSE WITHOUT health insurance—and there are some 27 million according to current estimates—may often be turned away from hospitals if they cannot pay the costs.

Past unsuccessful legislation debated by Congress would have restrained health care costs directly by restricting hospital charges and physicians' fees. This year, however, several bills pending in Congress seek to control costs indirectly through insurance companies and consumers.

These current measures would apply a "free-market" approach to the health care industry. Theoretically, costs would be lowered by providing incentives for employers and consumers to choose lower cost health plans and thus inducing insurance companies to compete by lowering premiums.

The Committee for National Health Insurance (NHI), chaired by Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, has produced a study of one of the pending bills, the Administration-supported National Health Care Reform Act of 1981 (H.R. 850).

THE COMMITTEE points out problems with what it calls "the have-less insurance approach" of this bill, which was drafted by Management & Budget Director David Stockman and introduced into the House earlier in the year by Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.).

Under the Stockman-Gephardt plan, employers who are now permitted to deduct group health insurance premiums for employees from federal income taxes would only be allowed to deduct a maximum contribution, which is as yet unspecified in the bill. Any health premium payments above that amount would be considered taxable income to the employees.

Medicare recipients would have the choice of continuing in Medicare or receiving vouchers to purchase membership in a qualified plan. Those totally without health coverage also may receive vouchers to buy into health plans, but only after the competitive system becomes established and if the states choose participation in the system.

The committee found other flaws in the plan:

- Lower-cost, lower-benefit plans would mean less health care coverage. Workers with less coverage would end up paying higher deductibles and co-insurance payments or, as the committee says, "workers would be offered a bribe to disinsure themselves."
- The maximum amount to be paid by individuals is $2,900, after which catastrophic benefits would become operative. However, CNHI points out that for tens of millions of low-income persons, $2,900 may be "catastrophic."
- The maximum non-taxable premium to be paid by employers is not stipulated, therefore no actual cost estimates can be made.
- Union members with negotiated comprehensive health coverage paid by employers would be penalized.
- Higher cost "preventive" health care would be discouraged.
- Poverty-level Americans without Medicaid coverage would be threatened with no coverage. The committee estimates that 47 percent of those at or below the poverty level are not covered by Medicaid.

THREE MILLION more jobs cut from the economy and cooking and heating gas bills at least double current charges will be the price of the natural gas decontrol plan the Reagan Administration is pushing, AFL-CIO Associate Legislative Director Howard Marlowe, center, warned. Marlowe was questioned on Labor News Conference by Alan Adams, left, of Employment Relations Report newsletter and Drew Von Bergen of United Press International. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is broadcast weekly on the Mutual radio network.

AFL-CIO Bus Makes Picketing Detour

The greeting was stunning. A crowd of some 300 strikers, their families and supporters, led by Local 203 President Ed Zagovic, roared their welcome, arms upthrust, as driver Bill Johnson maneuvered the bus into a parking spot. Area trade unionists on hand included Cleveland AFL-CIO President Sebastian Lupica, CWA Vice President Martin Hughes, Russell Schroeder of the federation's field staff, Lorain County AFL-CIO President Andy DeAngelis and local UAW and IUE leaders.

For the most part, the crowd was made up of young men and women, many with babies in backpacks and strollers or with toddlers at their side. They were white and black and brown and represented a wide mix of nationalities. But there were no old-timers among the strikers, underscoring PATCO's point that few of its members last long enough under the pressures of their job to make it to retirement with full benefits.

KIRKLAND, speaking through a bullhorn from the top of a table set up in an open field, took special note of the youngsters seated around him on the grass and recalled meeting others like them when the Executive Council joined the PATCO picket line at O'Hare Airport earlier in the week.

"I couldn't help thinking," he said "how they must feel when they turn on television and watch the President of the United States, in all his majesty and might, standing in the Rose Garden calling their fathers and mothers criminals and offenders, villains and persons violative of the principles of this republic"

"Your parents are heroes in whose courage you can take pride," he told the young people.

"They have the courage to overcome fear and to stand up against all the force that can be brought to bear to repress and deny the legitimate aims of ordinary people trying to work for a living, trying to do the best that they can."

Kirkland expressed labor's firm support of the strikers' cause and predicted that ultimately American public opinion will come around to their side.

"THEY'LL CONSIDER the spectacle of a President and an Administration that applauds the example of the Polish workers risking their necks and their freedom —committing what were then illegal acts —striking government employment to establish a genuine, free and independent trade union for themselves.

"And yet when the same thing happens here, it's met with a kind of brutal oppression that I'm sure the Russians and the old-time members of the central committee of the Communist Party of that country would have loved to be able to exercise in that case."

AFL-CIO Vice President Ken Blaylock, president of the Government Employees, drew resounding cheers when he told the strikers that "by your commitment, your determination and your courage, you are an example for the rest of the federal workforce, and they are taking notice throughout this country."

"YOUR STRENGTH is gaining daily," Blaylock said. He noted that AFGE was being "totally swamped" with calls from members wanting to know how they could help.

"They're rallying to your people all over the country—strike, line protection, line rotation, family assistance—they're walking with you and more are coming every day."

Federation Vice President Dave Fitzmaurice was warmly welcomed as a Cleveland native who had begun his union activism there before moving on to head the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers.

Fitzmaurice remarked at the solidarity PATCO members were displaying in the face of great odds. He urged the strikers to stand fast against the legal and punitive actions the Administration was taking. "Strikes aren't won in the courts," he reminded them. "They're not won on television. They're won on the picket line."

PICKET LINE at Chicago's O'Hare Airport took on a family day atmosphere as children of striking Air Traffic Controllers joined in with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Executive Council members in a demonstration of support.

When the speaking and handshakes had ended, the personal messages of support conveyed, the Washington passengers reboarded their bus for a short drive to the picket line at the air traffic control center in nearby Oberlin.

There the iron authority of the federal government was blatantly on display. A temporary restraining order issued by the federal court in Cleveland restricted picketing to six persons along grass pathways rigidly demarcated by day-glo orange pylons. U.S. marshals were camped inside the gatehouse and patrolled the entrance to guard against deviations.

Kirkland and his wife, Irena, along with Blaylock, Fitzmaurice and federation staffers, relieved the pickets for tours on the line. They were cheered on by the crowd across the road, gathered in the parking lot of a supermarket whose manager had braved the ire and rebuffed the complaints of FAA officials to permit PATCO to use the lot as a staging area.

PROVISIONS FOR the remainder of the journey were restocked at the market and Georgia Dunfee of Sec.-Treas. Tom Donahue's staff, who served as a combination supply officer and wagon master, managed to round up pizzas and beer.

"On to Pittsburgh!" The cry came half in jest from Rex Hardesty of the Dept. of Information staff who worked the phones with Leyden at each stop to get word out. The response at first was scattered laughter, but then the question again posed itself: why not? The only real problem was whether the bus could make it to the headquarters of the Pittsburgh PATCO local at a reasonable hour of the night.

At the next stop, the timing was checked out with the new driver, Cindy Kvamme, and more phone calls were placed.

A SCOUTING PARTY met us at the Beaver Falls exit of the Pennsylvania Turnpike and guided the bus through suburban towns to the VFW hall in Sewickley. There members of PATCO's Pittsburgh Local 245 had gathered with their families for a dinner rally to hear reports of the strike's progress. They had remained at the hall long after the scheduled close of the rally when they learned that the caravan bound for Washington would stop by.

Leyden was greeted by old friends from his days at PATCO's helm—Local 245 President Ed Wintermeyer and Vice President Roger Flaherty among others. He told them of "the solidarity, the strength and the resolve" he had seen on the PATCO lines in Chicago and Cleveland, and he insisted: "You will prevail. You will win."

Kirkland congratulated the assembled strikers for carrying on a courageous battle for justice.

"You're exercising a basic human right which no legislature or no tool of employers in the country can override by law," he declared. "There is a concept of natural rights that underlay the creation of this country, and Thomas Jefferson expressed it when he swore eternal enmity to every form of tyranny over the mind of man.

"YELLOW-DOG contracts are one form of tyranny," Kirkland observed, "whether they're put in by government regulation or private power. The trade union movement fought them for a hundred years in private employment, and now we're fighting them in public employment."

Again, Kirkland spoke directly to the many strikers' children in the crowded hall and told them they would "look back on this day as a moment when you found out just what great people" their parents were.

"They're fighting for their brothers and sisters," he said. "They're fighting to make a tough job a better job for their brothers and sisters and for all those who come after them to work in that job. That's what the trade union movement is really all about."

To the strikers themselves, the AFL-CIO president declared:

"We're with you in spirit. We're with you in any way and every way that it's possible to be with you. And we're proud to be amongst you and to have this chance to join you."

Blaylock again reported on the rising level of support for the PATCO strikers among federal employees across the country. On the question of legality, he pointed out that if the government had observed the intent and principles of the federal pay comparability act, wages would not be an issue in the controllers' strike.

Before closing, Blaylock read a hand-printed letter to the President from seven-year-old Tiffany Lynn Sanko, daughter of one of the Pittsburgh strikers:

"YOU CAN TAKE away our money. You can take away our car. You can take away our house, but you can go too far. You can't take away our special love from me and my family."

Leaving the hall at close to 11:30 p.m., the Washington group was pressed with expressions of thanks from the strikers and their families.

"We're so grateful to you for coming out of your way," one young wife said as she presented her two youngsters to shake the hand of an AFL-CIO staffer. "This has been a real boost. You don't know how much it means to us."

After a pause, the reply came: "Not nearly as much as what you're doing means to us."

IT WAS A subdued group of travelers that began the final leg of the return trip. A new driver, Angelo Maccagnan, gave a time check for the benefit of those who wanted to make last-minute entries in the arrival pool.

Reading lights were turned off one by one. It began to rain, and the rhythmic slapping of the windshield wipers helped some to catch a little sleep. But soft conversations continued among seat mates as they reflected on the events of the day and the images left by the faces of the strikers, faces that reflect firm determination, yet traces of anxiety.

It had been a day of renewal, another replenishment of the spirit of solidarity.

The first hint of dawn appeared in the East as the bus reached Rockville, Md., on the outskirts of Washington, and daylight broke through as it wound its way through the city's streets.

ARRIVAL TIME at AFL-CIO headquarters was 5:43 a.m., our driver reported, which meant that Ken Young, executive assistant to Kirkland, had won the pool.

There were suggestions along the way that the journey deserved a name. "A Ride for Freedom, Justice and Human Rights" was one proposal. "A Ride for Fair Play" was another. They didn't seem to catch on. In days to come, those who were there will recall it simply as "the bus trip." That will be enough.

Elevator Constructors Vote To Allow Per Capita Step-up

Seattle—Convention delegates gave the executive board of the Elevator Constructors authority to raise monthly per capita payments 50 cents each year, beginning next Jan. 1. The present rate is $5.90 a month.

There will be no change in the separate defense fund payments, which remain at 30 cents a month.

President Everett A. Treadway was re-elected to his second five-year term by acclamation, as were Sec.-Treas. John N. Russell and Jerome A. Mullett, assistant to the president.

The 298 delegates also re-elected five of the union's incumbent vice presidents. Of the three new vice presidents, Russell Hansborough of Washington, D.C. was elected without opposition. In contested elections, the Canadian delegation elected J. Warner Baxter, regional director for Canada, over incumbent William J. Morran, and Richard Scariot of Miami defeated LeRoy Phillips.

Elected to the union's labor committee, which will oversee standard contracts for the next five years, were George Popp, Jr., of Baltimore, A. H. Schumann of Houston, John DeRosa of New Haven, Conn., and James Hale of Chicago.

Major convention speakers included President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. and Washington Lt. Gov. John Cherberg.

USWA Files For Vote at 14 DuPont Plants

Pittsburgh—The Steelworkers have filed petitions for representation elections at 14 DuPont plants employing some 12,000 workers.

The petitions, filed with the National Labor Relations Board in Washington, mark a major step in the union's campaign to organize the multi-billion-dollar conglomerate headquartered in Wilmington, Del. The firm employs about 65,000 workers at plants across the nation.

STEELWORKERS President Lloyd McBride said that the petitions seek representation elections at DuPont plants in Old Hickory, Tenn.; Chattanooga, Tenn.; Kinston, N.C.; Cape Fear, N.C.; Belle, W.Va.; Newark, N.J.; New Johnsonville, Tenn.; Willow Bank, Del.; Florence, S.C.; Germay Park, Del.; Cleveland, Ohio; Newport, Del.; Martinsburg, W.Va., and Gibbstown, N.J.

USWA Organizing Director John L. Oshinski said that the petitions were filed in Washington rather than at NLRB regional offices because the union wants to consolidate the petitions to avoid duplication of proceedings, and to achieve a uniformity in scheduling of election dates, tallying of ballots, and rules and regulations governing the elections.

"THE EXTRAORDINARY union-busting strategy employed by DuPont calls for rigorous election procedures to give DuPont workers a fair opportunity to make their choice," Oshinski said.

Oshinski said top DuPont executives in Wilmington dictate the company's labor relations, denying workers the right to companywide bargaining, thereby forcing them to negotiate at the plant level—where, in some cases, there are independent local unions with meager resources and, in other cases, no organization whatsoever to represent the workers.

BACHELOR OF ARTS degrees, awarded by Antioch University in cooperation with the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, are presented to the six newest graduates of the independent labor studies curriculum. The seven-year-old degree program recognizes experience in the labor movement as well as earned college credits. Thirty union leaders have earned college degrees in the program which now has more than 125 students enrolled. At the most recent graduation ceremonies, from left, Michael Anderson, Antioch registrar; Russell Allen, the center's deputy director; Lana M. Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Delegates Elect Martin Ward to 3rd Term as President

Las Vegas—Carrying his whole slate with him, Martin J. Ward was re-elected to his third consecutive five-year term as president of the 350,000-member United Association of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters by the more than 3,700 delegates attending the largest general convention in UA history.

Ward defeated Joseph Mazzola of San Francisco, 2,368 to 1,222 in voting machine secret balloting which decided the contest for two of the six vice presidencies and for three international representatives' positions.

Sec.-Treas. Joseph A. Walsh was unopposed for his election to a second five-year term. So were executive board incumbents Donald T. McNamara of Detroit, Edward F. Brabec of Chicago, Joseph L. Arsenault of Fairfax, Alaska, and J. Russell St. Eloi of Ottawa, the UA's Canadian director.

VICE PRESIDENT John J. Murray of New York turned back a challenge of George Daly, 1,899 to 1,595 and Vice President Thomas C. Payne of Atlanta was re-elected to the executive board over C. Randy Gardner, 1,891 to 1,593.

In his keynote address, Ward stressed the traditional trade union values of honesty and integrity. These are not worn out attributes, he said. They stand in opposition to the all-too-prevalent attitudes of "me first and anything goes"—attitudes which, he said, weaken the union and diminish the motivation of members to do their best on the job and in the union hall.

Ward said that jobs must be regarded as the highest priority. Local organizing and collective bargaining activities are the backbone of this effort, he said. Supplementing these efforts are national agreements and the need for members to actively join in the drive to organize non-union contractors. He added that contract maintenance agreements are another important area of job opportunity.

THERE ARE three major difficulties presently affecting all working people, Ward said. They are the economic situation with its high interest rates and inflation, the political attacks on social protections and legislative advances labor has worked for, and the shift in public opinion toward a more conservative pro-business bias.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept., one of the principal speakers at the convention, announced that Ward will head a new BCTD committee.

Georgine said Ward's committee will explore possibilities of establishing a coalition of labor contractors, manufacturers, suppliers and the designer professions that would identify the critical issues facing the construction industry in the 1980s.

Georgine also called on building trades unions to direct the investment of their pension funds so they benefit members by providing union work.

Labor Studies Center Lists Courses for 1981-82 Term

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies has published a new catalogue for the 1981-82 academic year offering 56 institutes, workshops and programs. The courses are open to all full-time union officers, representatives and staff of AFL-CIO affiliates. There is no charge for tuition.

In this 13th year of the center's operation, AFL-CIO affiliates have scheduled 57 other training programs, many co-sponsored by the George Meany Center.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland, in a foreword to the catalogue, urges every union "to use this facility to the utmost."

This year's catalogue indicates that the center's most popular subjects continue to be organizing techniques, grievance arbitration and collective bargaining.

The five-day basic institute on organizing techniques will be offered six times during the school year. There's also a two-week advanced organizing workshop. Grievance arbitration preparation and presentation is offered five times, twice at the George Meany Center and once each at state universities in Colorado, Illinois and Oregon.

Collective bargaining is the subject of four institutes this year: two on public sector negotiations, one on private sector negotiations and one on new developments in collective bargaining.

Two institutes are scheduled on labor law for union officers.

Under the heading, Leadership Development, five study programs are offered: basic skills for union leaders, psychology for union leaders, union administrator and business agent, effective speaking and a two-week program for new staff.

At the direction of the Executive Council, the center is offering seven three-day sessions on pension fund investments. Two will be at the Silver Spring campus, the others at five regional locations.

Tool courses are being offered in audio-visual techniques, education techniques, grantsmanship for union leaders, newswriting and editing for union publications, media relations for union officers, and public communications for public employee unions.

With the Building & Construction Trades Dept., the center has scheduled institutes for building trades business agents at the Silver Spring campus and at Michigan State University and the University of Oregon.

THREE COURSES have been developed to help officers of unions using or considering the use of computers. They are introduction to computers, advanced computer workshop and "mini" computers for local unions.

The year will end on a musical note next June when the center will sponsor The Great Labor Song Exchange, a three-day workshop and coaching session designed to preserve and promote labor's inspiring musical tradition.

The charge for room and board at the Silver Spring campus is $60 a day. Copies of the catalogue are available on request to Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., director, George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903, Telephone (301) 431-6400.

Pilots Supported in Effort To Put Pressure on N.Y. Air

The Air Line Pilots stepped up a corporate campaign against New York Air with assistance from the AFL-CIO in locating unions that may have funds invested in the non-union airline, its holding companies, creditors and stockholders, and corporations represented on its board of directors.

This latest action is another step in bringing pressure on New York Air to recognize an existing contract between ALPA and Texas International Airlines, its corporate sibling. Both airlines are owned by Texas Air Corp., which in turn is held by Jet Capital Corp. Frank Lorenzo, a Texas-based entrepreneur, is the controlling individual behind all four companies.

IN A LETTER sent to 27 affiliated unions which may have pension fund investments or other dealings with the cited companies, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland asked for their cooperation as "part of the AFL-CIO's efforts to assist the Air Line Pilots Association . . . in its fight to prevent the establishment of a non-union airline by Texas International Airlines."

Last February, the AFL-CIO Executive Council branded New York Air "unfair" and termed it "unworthy of union support through investment or stock purchases."

ALPA maintains that its contract with Texas International also applies to New York Air. The New York operation was spun off using profits, aircraft and personnel from Texas International, but unlike its sister airline, is totally non-union. A coalition of unions representing Texas International employees has charged Lorenzo with setting up a runaway shop to avoid existing labor contracts.

Pickets from ALPA, the Flight Attendants, the Transport Workers, and the Machinists have been passing out boycott information on New York Air at airports used for its flights.

AFL-CIO Convention Slated to Open Nov. 15

The 14th Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO will take place in New York City, beginning Nov. 15, 1981.

The meetings of the convention will be in the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

OSHA Proposal Criticized

Rule Change Threatens Access to Health Data

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration is proposing to erect stiff monetary barriers to workers and their unions seeking access to workplace health records and data on exposure to toxic substances.

This is all a part of the proposed "interim modification" of the OSHA standard on Access to Employee Exposure & Medical Records that was issued by the Carter Administration in May 1980.

AS OUTLINED by Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter, the standard would be modified by "strengthening" the trade secret protection provisions of employers. This could be achieved, Auchter suggested, by allowing employers to establish monetary penalty clauses in confidentiality agreements employees must sign before gaining access to their records.

George H. R. Taylor, the AFL-CIO's job safety director, warned that the proposed changes in the regulation could effectively block access to medical records and scientific information sought by a worker's physician or union.

By using the trade secret provision as a shield, employers could withhold all types of pertinent information, Taylor said. "A trade secret could be anything they declared it to be."

Sheldon Samuels, safety director of the Industrial Union Dept., expressed concern that the proposed confidentiality agreement could halt the release of all information on workplace hazards by employers.

He said the monetary penalty clause could make both workers and their unions liable in civil suits that could add up to millions of dollars in damage payments.

IN ADDITION to proposing the changes in the standard, OSHA asked a federal appeals court to delay for six months a briefing schedule on the challenged regulation until next February while the agency reviews its provision.

Industry groups, including the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and the Chemical Manufacturers Association, sought to block implementation of the regulation largely on the argument that its provisions inadequately protected trade secrets.

The IUD had sought in a court suit to strengthen the original standard so as to assure union-designated physicians access to workplace records.

The access standard now permits workers to examine and copy their own medical and toxic exposure records. It also allows union representatives access to the records of a particular employee if they have written consent from the worker.

ACCORDING TO an AFL-CIO analysis of the standard, trade secret data that disclose manufacturing processes or the percentage of a chemical substance in a mixture may be withheld, but sufficient alternate data must be provided to evaluate the chemical.

Employers may also require a written agreement from workers or their union when releasing so-called trade secret information that prohibits the misuse of the data. The standard presently does not permit monetary sanction clauses in the access agreements.

OSHA to Keep Cancer Expert view of the chemical, which is used in a number of industrial processes.

An estimated 750,000 workers are exposed to formaldehyde on the job, according to Director George H. R. Taylor of the AFL-CIO job safety department who had warned that the firing of Infante would have a chilling effect on OSHA's professional staff.

THE CONTROVERSY over Infante began after OSHA halted distribution of a NIOSH warning bulletin on the possible health risks of the chemical and Infante aired his personal views on the formaldehyde hazard in a letter to the International Agency for Research on Cancer. Infante's letter did not mention OSHA's position on the formaldehyde issue.

In his letter to Infante, Auchter admitted that the cancer expert may not have been appraised of "my policy decision not to take immediate regulatory action on formaldehyde" in dismissing the charge of misrepresenting the position of OSHA.

Transportation, Health Costs Push Up Budget for Retirees

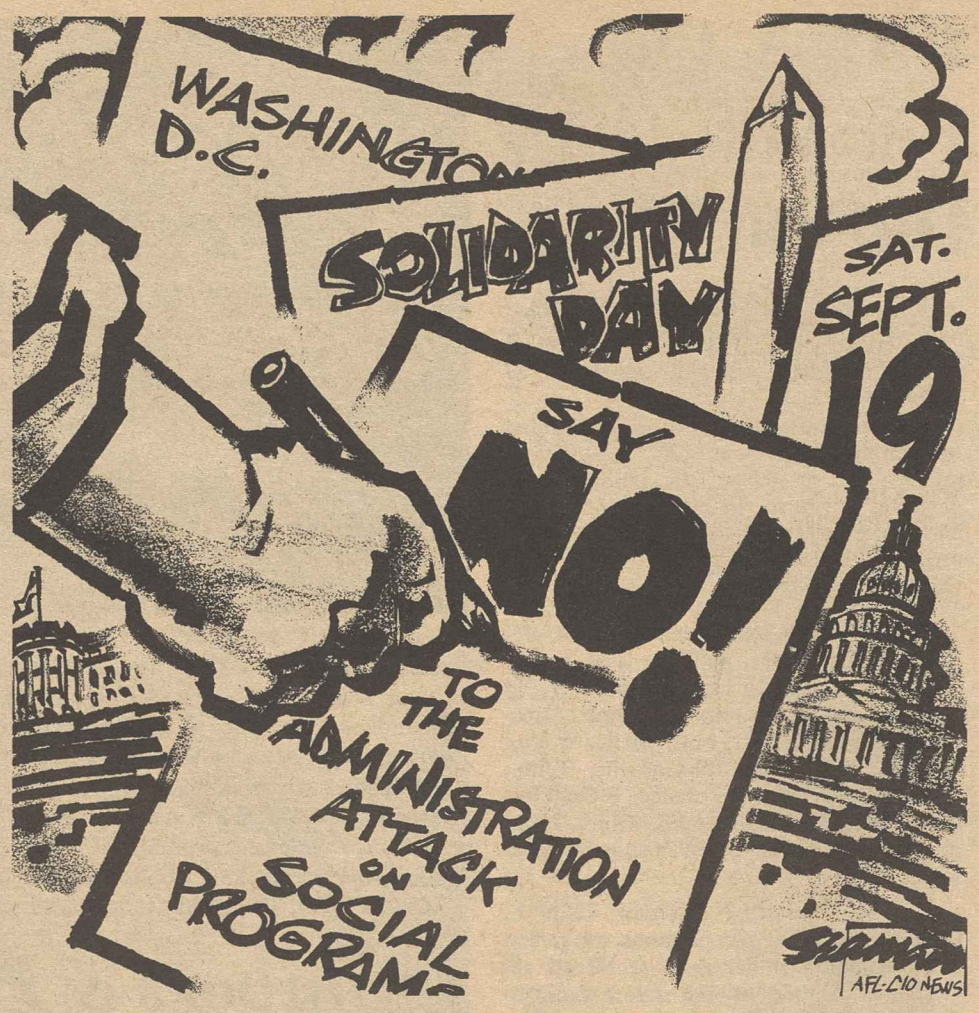
The typical retired couple last year required 10.2 percent more income than the previous year, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

In its annual updating of three hypothetical budgets for a retired man and wife, BLS said that a couple living on an "intermediate" budget needed $9,434 in the year that ended last November.

COUPLES ON a lower-level budget needed $6,644, or 10.3 percent more, while those on a higher budget needed $13,923, or 9.9 percent more. BLS said these were the largest increases in the cost of living for retired people since 1974, when the comparable increases ranged from 11 to 11.5 percent.

The 1980 inflation rate was 12.6 percent, while living costs from last November to June have risen 6.8 percent.

Higher costs for transportation and medical care were the major factors in raising last year's budgets, BLS said. Transportation costs rose about 16 percent for the lower and intermediate budgets and 14 percent for the higher budget. Medical care prices also rose sharply, increasing costs approximately 13 percent at all three levels.



BLS HAS calculated the hypothetical budgets at three economic levels for typical retired budgets for the last 15 years, adjusting them each year to reflect increases in the cost of commodities and services. The couples include a husband age 65 or over who are assumed to be self-supporting and living in an urban area. The figures assume no payment of income taxes and paid-up mortgages where homes are owned.

Food costs at all three levels rose 10.6 percent last year. Personal care costs increased by 8.9 percent while clothing went up 4.8 percent.

BLS said that a couple living on an intermediate budget would spend 33 percent of its income on housing, 29 percent on food, 10 percent on medical care, and 10 percent on transportation.

Blaylock Protests Cutback In Federal Comparability Pay

Government Employees President Kenneth Blaylock charged that the Administration's decision to give federal white-collar workers less than one-third of what the President's Pay Agent has determined they need to make their salaries comparable to those in the private sector is "not only unfair, but totally insensitive."

The Pay Agent, a statutory body comprised of Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan, Director David Stockman of the Office of Management & Budget and Director Donald Devine of the Office of Personnel Management, found that overall salaries of white-collar government workers would have to be raised by an average of 15.1 percent to reach the same salary level as their counterparts in the private sector.

DESPITE THE finding by its own agent, the Administration is limiting salary increases for government employees this year to 4.8 percent. The increase is scheduled to take effect Oct. 1.

"Essentially, President Reagan is asking federal workers to bear the brunt of a bad economy while ignoring the fact that people who work for the government suffer from high inflation just as severely as people who work for private industry," Blaylock observed.

Blaylock, joined by the presidents of the unaffiliated National Treasury Employees Union and the National Federation of Federal Employees, said in a letter to the Pay Agent that the Administration's "curious logic" shows that "they know the price of everything but the value of nothing."

"It's no wonder that the best brains are being beaten out of government, and frustration is mounting for those who feel compelled to remain and continue performing services for the public," he said. Blaylock pledged that AFGE will continue its fight on Capitol Hill for congressional relief for federal workers.

The Pay Agent's salary increase recommendation is part of the pay-setting process involving federal white-collar workers. It is based on a survey taken in March of each year by the Bureau of Labor Statistics comparing private sector and government workers' pay and responsibilities. Pay comparability between the groups was mandated by the 1971 Federal Pay Comparability Act.

Minnesota Accord Won for 14,000

strike, but all of them are being dismissed as a result of the settlement.

ATTEMPTS BY state officials to require professional employees not in the bargaining units to do the work of striking employees led to a successful lawsuit by the Minnesota Association of Professional Employees and the State Residential Schools Education Association. They won a court order barring the state from reassigning professionals to do the work of strikers.

AFSCME Council 6 Director Bob Currie said state officials expressed surprise at the determination and solidarity of the strikers. "They didn't think so many of our members would go out on strike, or that we would be out this long," he said.

Radio Spots Air Concerns On Social Security Cuts

"Would you have voted for your senators or representative if they had said they were going to cut social security benefits? Because now that they are in office, they may be considering those proposals to cut social security payments, to cut aid to the disabled, to cut early retirement benefits. Things they wouldn't have dared speak about when they were running for office. Listen to what they are saying now and make them listen to you. Write them."

That's one of three 30-second "Save Social Security" radio commercials being sponsored by AFL-CIO central bodies and unions in cities throughout the nation.

In a letter to union groups enclosing cassettes of the messages and urging local sponsorship, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said the AFL-CIO is airing them in Washington, "but that's not enough. They must be heard throughout the nation . . . and the word gotten to Congress."

Special Fund to Aid PATCO Strikers' Families

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO has set up a special fund to help the families of striking Professional Air Traffic Controllers meet severe financial problems.

Announcement of the fund by Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue came as the American labor movement continued, by word and deed, to demonstrate its support for the PATCO strikers in the face of repressive government measures against them.

KIRKLAND AND Donahue, in a letter to AFL-CIO affiliates and central bodies, condemned the government's actions as "harsh and vindictive" and noted that many of the PATCO members and their families are now "beginning to confront individual financial burdens."

AFL-CIO News

LABOR'S CENTENNIAL AFL-CIO 1881-1981

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, August 22, 1981 No. 34

"We have, therefore, decided to establish an assistance fund for discharged Air Traffic Controllers and their families."

Checks for the fund should be made payable to the PATCO Family Fund. It will not be used to pay strike benefits, the letter said, but to assist in specific cases of pressing financial need. Trustee for the fund will be Msgr. George G. Higgins.

Kirkland and Donahue also stressed that the AFL-CIO continues to call on the Reagan Administration to resume bargaining in an effort to settle the dispute.

"Massive firings, federal indictments, and continued harassment will not provide America with the safe and adequate air transportation system it requires," they said. "What is needed is a return to the bargaining table and an equitable resolution of the problems.

"UNTIL SUCH a settlement is reached, the AFL-CIO calls upon its affiliated unions and their members to help provide aid to the families of the discharged air traffic controllers."

Creation of the special fund was announced following a special meeting of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. executive board at which Kirkland joined PED President Kenneth Blaylock, other department officials and union leaders from outside the department in a wide-ranging discussion of ways to deliver aid to PATCO strikers and their families.

Rule Changes Hit As Bid to Sabotage Wage Protections

By David L. Perlman

New regulations proposed by the Labor Dept. would sabotage the prevailing wage protections of the Davis-Bacon Act and the Service Contract Act, the AFL-CIO warned.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald challenged the claim by Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan that the department's "regulatory reform" proposals "could significantly reduce the cost of government construction and service contracts."

ANY SIGNIFICANT savings, Oswald said, would require flouting the intent of the two worker protection laws. He said the AFL-CIO will present its detailed objections during the 60-day period allowed for public comment before the Labor Dept. takes final action.

President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. said the proposed changes in Davis-Bacon in effect would "repeal by administrative fiat" the 50-year-old prevailing wage law.

"It will mean a return to exploitative, cut-throat competition that forces workers to work for substandard wages," he asserted.

PREVAILING WAGE rates on federally funded construction are now based on the rate received by the largest number of workers in the job classification being surveyed, provided they constitute at least 30 percent of all workers in that classification.

The Labor Dept. proposes to raise the 30 percent requirement to 50 percent. If no rate were received by at least 50 percent of the workers in the survey area, the average wage would be used.

Open-shop contractors have pressed for years for abolition of the 30 percent rule, contending that it tends to establish union wage scales as the prevailing standard.

ANOTHER PROPOSED change would encourage the use of semi-skilled "helpers" and allow contractors to use one "helper" for every five journeymen on a contract. The Labor Dept. also would allow contractors to submit a weekly compliance statement instead of actual payroll records to show they have followed the law.

"The overall result is to emasculate enforcement," Oswald protested.

Georgine charged that the "helper" provision would "destroy the long time policy of the government of encouraging apprenticeship by substituting cheap and untrained helpers, even where this is not the prevailing practice."

The Reagan Administration proposals are substantially more drastic than regulatory changes that had been recommended by the Carter Administration before it left office following extensive discussions with all concerned groups.

THOSE CHANGES included some that had been sought by contractors, but did not alter the 30 percent rule for determining the prevailing rate.

The new proposals go a long way to

$27.5 Billion Loss

Business Tax Giveaways Threaten State Revenues

States stand to lose as much as $27.5 billion in reduced income tax receipts over the next six years as a result of recently enacted changes in the way businesses are allowed to calculate depreciation write-offs for federal tax purposes, according to a study by Citizens for Tax Justice, a coalition of labor and public interest groups.

By 1986, the study shows, the annual cost to the states could reach $10.2 billion —including a 38 percent reduction in corporate tax collections. In later years, the costs are expected to continue to escalate.

THE ESTIMATED revenue losses reflect the total amount by which state income taxes would be cut if the 45 states with income taxes, plus the District of Columbia, choose to conform their laws to the Reagan Administration's so-called "Accelerated Cost Recovery System"—or "10-5-3" as it is commonly known. The 10-5-3 plan was part of the tax bill approved by Congress before the August recess.

Twenty-five states will automatically conform to the federal changes unless they take steps to amend their current tax statutes. Revenue losses in these states—which include such major industrial states as New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio and New Jersey—will exceed $15 billion between 1981 and 1986, the study found.

For 13 other states, conformity to the new federal depreciation law would require special legislation. These states could avoid the projected revenue losses by maintaining their current tax laws. But there is likely to be substantial corporate pressure for change.

SIX OTHER states and the District of Columbia have in the past generally conformed to prior federal depreciation rules by regulation. Since the statutes in these jurisdictions typically provide that depreciation deductions be "reasonable," adoption of the federal rules could be challenged as "an abuse of discretion," according to Dean Tipps, executive director of the tax justice coalition. He pointed out that the new federal depreciation laws are almost universally conceded to be unrelated to any reasonable concept of actual depreciation.

Tipps noted that the Reagan Administration's federal tax program "is designed to shift almost all of the tax burden onto

OSHA Studies Ways to Soften Key Standards

A series of options for the Occupational Safety & Health Administration to consider in dealing with lead and cotton dust exposure standards upheld by the Supreme Court in June are blueprinted in a memorandum prepared by the Solicitor's Office of the Labor Dept.

The memorandum evaluates—and assesses the potential impact on the Reagan Administration—of OSHA's seeking to soften the standards through new "rule making" and the possibility that it might "moderate" them administratively through enforcement methods and procedures.

THE FULL TEXT of the memorandum was published Aug. 3 in the Legal Times of Washington, a weekly newspaper for attorneys.

The memorandum expresses concern

Mexican Labor Denounces Reagan 'Guest Worker' Plan

Mexico City—Mexico's trade union federation wants no part of the Reagan Administration's proposal to bring up to 50,000 Mexican nationals into the United States each year for stays of from 9 to 12 months in designated work areas.

A "Manifesto to the People," signed by President Fidel Velasquez of the Mexican Federation of Labor, charged that the guest-worker plan would lead to further exploitation and second-class status for Mexican workers in the United States.

The manifesto, published in Mexican newspapers, said the Reagan proposal would convert Mexican workers "into the biggest strategic labor reserve in contemporary history, subject to super-exploitation and servitude."

Velasquez was a guest at the AFL-CIO Executive Council meeting in Chicago earlier this month, when the council expressed concern that a guest-worker influx would undermine U.S. wages and working conditions.

The Mexican labor federation manifesto also strongly criticized provisions of the Reagan proposal that would require guest workers to pay social security and other taxes, but leave them ineligible for unemployment benefits, food stamps and other forms of assistance.

SUPPORT FOR STRIKING Air Traffic Controllers was pressed at a meeting of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept.'s executive board in Washington. With leaders of unions outside the department also participating, the special meeting centered on ways to meet the financial needs of PATCO members. PED President Kenneth Blaylock, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, and PATCO President Robert Poli are at the head of the table. Those at the meeting unanimously called on the government to get back to the bargaining table and negotiate with the controllers.

Aid Pressed for Strikers' Families

Taking part were leaders of the nation's major federal, postal and state and local public employee unions, including PATCO President Robert Poli, and AFL-CIO field staff members.

Poli thanked the union leaders for their demonstrations of support, and reaffirmed that PATCO's 12,000 striking members are totally committed to a united stand.

"IF THEY EVER went after organized crime in this country the way that they went after the controllers," Poli said earlier on CBS-TV's Face the Nation broadcast, "it would be a lot safer place to live." PATCO members have been shackled, put in jail, and indicted on criminal charges in 21 cities for violating a law banning strikes by federal employees.

Meanwhile, a federal hearing officer recommended an order revoking PATCO's status as exclusive bargaining agent for the controllers, but refused to issue an order permanently barring PATCO from such status. Attorneys for the Federal Labor Relations Authority, which oversees labor-management relations in the federal government, had sought the order revoking the union's bargaining rights permanently, but FLRA Administrative Law Judge John H. Fenton said it would amount to "a death sentence—industrial capital punishment." Fenton's decision gives PATCO until Sept. 14 to file exceptions.

THE FLRA IS still investigating PATCO's complaint, filed with the agency on Aug. 10, that the government had committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain in good faith in the contract negotiations earlier this year. The controllers' agreement with the Federal Aviation Administration, which employs them, expired on Mar. 15, and they have been trying since January to negotiate a new pact reducing their work week, providing for earlier retirement and increased wages.

In his CBS-TV interview, Poli praised the American labor movement for giving PATCO "tremendous support." Numerous unions are urging members to refrain from taking flights and money is being contributed to a legal defense fund by many unions, he noted. PATCO's funds are frozen by a lawsuit in New York brought by the American Transport Association.

LABOR HAS rallied across the country to the cause of the striking controllers. Four hundred members of 31 different unions marched in picket lines at Kennedy International Airport on Long Island in one demonstration.

Labor support for the controllers has taken a variety of forms. Worker groups in Chicago are supplying food to PATCO members and their families. In Madison, Wis., they have set up a "rumor hotline" to advise the public and the media of the true situation in the dispute and the issues involved. In major urban centers, union members have joined PATCO pickets or spelled controllers on picket lines and acted as babysitters while parents marched on the lines.

IN ALBANY, N.Y., members of the New York State Public Employees Federation joined controllers on their picket line at the Albany County Airport. The organization represents some 48,000 professional, scientific, and technical state workers. PEF President John J. Kraemer said members of his organization regard the government's attack on PATCO as "an attack on all public employees and an attempt to deny public-sector professionals the semblance of collective bargaining it took so long to achieve."

As an expression of solidarity, the Fire Fighters postponed until Dec. 2 a Chicago workshop that would have brought in 300 delegates from all parts of the country.

RUBBER WORKERS President Peter Bommarito, urging a renewal of talks between the government and PATCO, warned that "no one can win in the situation as it stands. Collective bargaining is the answer to this very serious problem. PATCO must have some way to adjust its grievances."

Harris Poll Shows Support For Aims of Air Controllers

Sixty-three percent of the American people believe that the Air Traffic Controllers have "legitimate reasons" for striking, according to the findings of a Louis Harris poll.

A 58 to 35 percent majority of those surveyed said they believe that PATCO's claims that controllers suffer from the effects of extreme job stress are true and are justification for the union's demands for change.

THE POLL RESULTS, which appeared in the Washington Post and other newspapers, show that a substantial majority of Americans—71 to 26 percent—think that actions by foreign air controllers which have curtailed some flights in and out of the United States for safety reasons make it "more urgent than ever" that the government and the union negotiate a settlement.

Overall, the Harris poll found, only a 51 to 40 percent margin of the public sympathizes more with the Reagan Administration than with PATCO over the strike. About 69 percent felt that President Reagan's firing of the striking controllers was justified in the light of the no-strike oath government workers are required to sign.

But the public split evenly, 48 to 48 percent, over the question of whether all strikes by public employees should be banned.

THE POLL also found that a majority of union members, 52 to 39 percent, are more sympathetic to PATCO's position than to the Administration's. By a dramatic 73 to 17 percent, blacks said they sympathized with the controllers' plight.

Also favoring the controllers' position were 46 to 43 percent of women, 52 to 44 percent of white collar workers, 54 to 37 percent of Democrats, 49 to 45 percent of residents of the East and 47 to 42 percent of high school graduates.

The conclusions drawn by Harris are that the public has "a fairly widespread sympathy" with the health and safety claims of air traffic controllers. However, public concerns about the justification of the strike snag on the question of the no strike oath.

The public believes overall that the Administration should change its stand and return to the bargaining table, Harris said, and that the "proper way" to settle the strike is to correct the hazards. The results also indicate that the public would be more inclined to feel that "justice had been served" if the strike was settled by an agreement fair to PATCO members.

AFL-CIO Convention Slated to Open Nov. 16

The 14th Constitutional Convention of the AFL-CIO will take place in New York City, beginning Nov. 16, 1981.

The meetings of the convention will be in the Sheraton Centre Hotel.

States Facing Big Drop in Tax Revenue

working people." He pointed out that corporations will receive over $500 billion in federal tax benefits over the next ten years, "virtually eliminating the corporate income tax as a significant federal revenue raiser."

"MOREOVER," he noted, "other taxes on investment income are also being slashed under the Reagan program." He cautioned the states not to follow the federal lead, "which can only result in more and more resentment on the part of average taxpayers who will be asked to shoulder the entire tax burden. What the states may face if they conform to the federal rules is a serious tax revolt."

Public debate in the states over whether to conform with the new federal rules seems likely to focus on the alleged problem of taxpayer compliance with two different systems of depreciation.

Tipps suggested that this is "a bogus issue." He noted that the federal government will continue to use its prior depreciation rules for a number of tax purposes, including cases in which taxpayers prefer the old system and situations in which property is used outside the United States.

"THE STATES could just as easily retain the old rules for all property," Tipps said.

"Alternatively," he noted, "states could avoid all so-called complexities by requiring larger companies to use the same depreciation for tax purposes that they use on their books—the system followed in Japan and Germany. Since these books must be maintained anyway, this solution requires absolutely no additional calculations."

Tipps said that if this second alternative were adopted, "it might also be reasonable to adopt the new federal rule allowing up to $5,000 in investments in depreciable property to be written off immediately"—an approach designed to aid small businesses.

Cascade Pilots Vote For ALPA Affiliation

Cascade Airways pilots have voted to join the Air Line Pilots Association. The official certification of ALPA as their bargaining agent followed completion of a mail ballot election in which 70 percent of the voting pilots chose the AFL-CIO affiliate.

Cascade, a large regional passenger and cargo carrier based in Spokane, Wash., employs 93 pilots. The group is the second to join since ALPA launched an organizing campaign last November. The pilots of Pacific Southwest Airlines joined last month.

IAM's Albert J. Hayes Dies, Helped Shape Labor Unity

Brookfield, Wis.—Albert J. Hayes, retired president of the Machinists and an architect of the AFL-CIO merger, died here at 81 after a stroke.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue wrote warmly to Mrs. Hayes of her husband's contribution to the entire labor movement as well as to his own union.

"MILLIONS OF American trade unionists are better off because Al Hayes cared about them," they said.

Hayes began his long trade union leadership career in 1918, when he was picked by his fellow apprentices in the Milwaukee railroad shops to serve as chairman of the Apprentice Boys Committee.

He walked his first picket line in the 1922 railroad strike, just a few weeks after he was married. He held a series of local and national offices in the IAM, serving as president from 1949 until his retirement in 1965.

Hayes was a staunch believer in labor unity at a time when the AFL and CIO were rivals. Soon after he became president of the Machinists, he negotiated a no-raid agreement with the Auto Workers, which at the time was the IAM's chief competitor. Both represented large groups of aircraft workers.

THAT UAW-IAM agreement became a model for the no-raid pact that paved the way for the AFL-CIO merger in 1955. Hayes was a member of the joint AFL-CIO Unity Committee that worked out the merger. He was a vice president of the AFL-CIO from its founding to 1965, serving at various times as chairman of the Ethical Practices Committee and of the Internal Disputes Committee.

Hayes held numerous government and public service posts during his long career. Among his many public services was membership on the President's Commission on Health Needs, whose 1952 report launched the still-continuing debate on comprehensive and universal health care.

'Unity' Slate Wins

OCAW Delegates Elect Goss for Second Term

Denver—President Robert F. Goss of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and his "unity" slate won the four top elective offices of the union at the OCAW's 16th biennial convention.

Goss defeated Anthony Mazzocchi, director of the OCAW Health & Safety Dept., by a vote of 72,856 to 69,090. As vice presidents, the two had opposed each other for the presidency in 1979, with Goss winning by a narrow margin.

ELECTED secretary-treasurer was Michael Ricigliano, who had been director of the union's Collective Bargaining Dept. Calvin Moore, incumbent, and Joseph Misbrenner, Goss's executive assistant, were elected vice presidents.

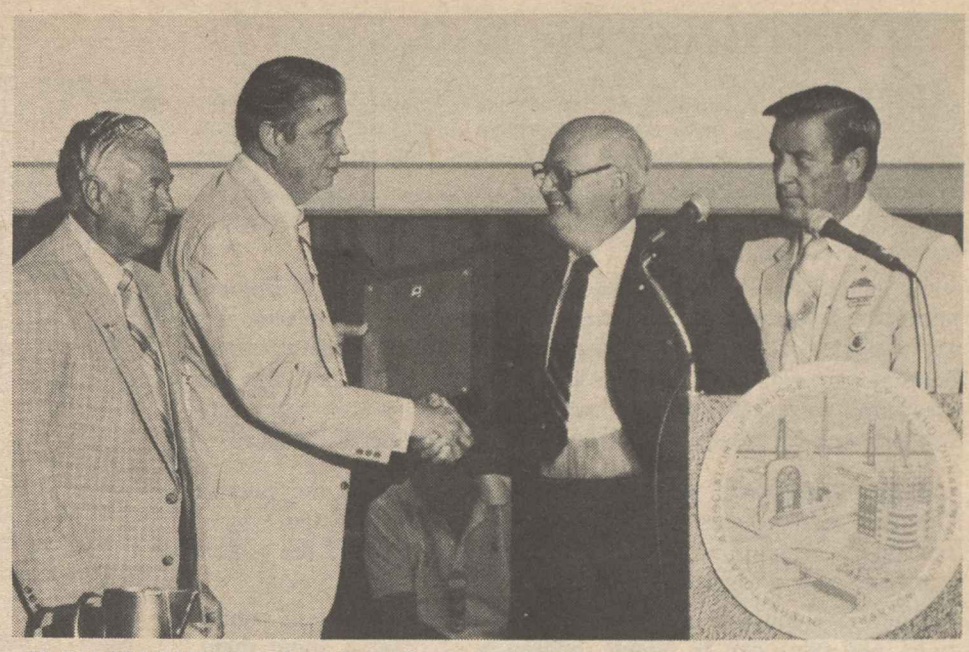
Ricigliano succeeds Robert V. Palmer, who had served one two-year term. Ernest Rousselle, also elected in 1979, was defeated in his bid for re-election as one of the two vice presidents.

In support of the air traffic controllers' strike, the 850 delegates and 150 staff members used alternative means of transportation to the convention.

NORMAN HILL, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, traveled by train and bus to address the delegates. He reviewed the work of APRI during the general elections and offered his assessment of the current political situation. The institute was successful in getting approximately one million black voters to the polls in 1980, Hill noted.

Commenting on the "more conservative and anti-labor government" that resulted from last November's election, Hill noted that some political observers contend that voters are opposed to increased government intervention in the economy as well as government efforts to redress social inequities.

BUT HE pointed out that many public opinion polls indicate the people want greater expenditures for such programs as health and education, even if this means more taxes.



"Blacks and labor lost a number of friends in the 1980 election, but the major factor was not a shift away from labor's point of view," he said. "There was no massive rejection of the role of government as a mechanism for greater social equality.

"The loss of a number of friends in the Congress had less to do with issues involving one's view of the proper role of government, and more to do with a general discontent with the economic state of affairs and with concern about America's military strength," he said.

CRITICIZING President Reagan's cutbacks in social services and the recently enacted tax program, Hill said: "Clearly the Administration is not so much interested in getting the government off the backs of people as it is in getting government off the backs of corporations and the rich."

In convention action, the delegates turned down propositions that would have provided for election of district directors, three-year conventions, a simple majority to change the constitution instead of the present two-thirds majority, and a reduction in the number of districts from eight to six.

Rank-and-file members of the international executive board were elected by their respective districts: Kenneth Lord of Long Beach, Calif., Rex Donohue of Bacchus, Utah, Ralph Ames of Hampton, Va., Roy Barnes of Pasadena, Tex., John Sullivan of St. Louis, Alexander Perry of St. Paul, Minn., David Young of Detroit, and Angelo Augustino of Niagara Falls, N.Y. All but Ames, who defeated Charles Baker of Oak Ridge, Tenn., were re-elected.

IRON WORKERS helped Las Vegas fire fighters open up exits in last December's Grand Hotel disaster and lead occupants to safety. Fire Fighters President John A. Iron Workers' Convention Votes Per Capita Increase

Hollywood, Fla.—Delegates to the Iron Workers quadrennial convention here re-elected a veteran slate of officers by acclamation, approved a two-step raise in the union's per capita payment and directed a study of portable pension credits.

John H. Lyons, who has headed the 182,000-member union since 1961, was elected to a new four-year term, as were Sec. Juel D. Drake, Treas. Charles Anding and nine general vice presidents.

THE 1,100 DELEGATES overwhelmingly approved a constitutional change raising the per capita for "outside" locals by $2, to $8.15 a month, with another $2 increase on Jan. 1, 1984. The $2.50 rate for shop locals and Navy Yard riggers will rise $1 now and again in 1984.

Another change eliminated all references to gender in the union's constitution. Delegates approved an increase in the union's death benefits plan and discussed the problem of pension credits for members who work in different localities under various locally-negotiated pension plans and union-management agreements.

The convention approved a resolution calling for establishment of a committee of full-time union representatives to consider the problems and "make an appropriate recommendation to the local union trustees of Iron Worker pension plans." It said the goal should be to make pension benefits among the various local and district council plans "as portable as legally feasible."

FIRE FIGHTERS President John A. Gannon came to the convention to present plaques to the Iron Workers and especially the union's Las Vegas local for a life-saving assist during the MGM Grand Hotel fire last December.

Las Vegas Iron Workers used their wrecking bars to pry open locked hotel doors and their spud wrenches to open sealed windows for the aerial rescue of hundreds of guests. Working alongside Fire Fighters, they carried some 200 guests out of the hotel.

A unanimous convention resolution called on the government to "call off its punitive measures" against air traffic controllers and their union. It urged negotiations instead of "repressive" government policies.

PRESIDENT ROBERT A. Georgine and Sec.-Treas. Joseph F. Maloney of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. warned of attacks on wage standards through administrative changes in Davis-Bacon regulations and in congressional threats for legislative repeal of the law.

Georgine said high interest rates have priced new homes beyond the reach of 96 percent of the population. Maloney, himself a member of the Iron Workers, warned of the new corporate efforts to "bust unions and promote the open shop."

Dr. Eula Bingham, who headed the Occupational Safety & Health Administration during the Carter Administration, expressed concern at the weakening of safety protections through regulatory retreats. She cited changes that she warned would erode an Iron Worker's right to refuse to climb high steel in freezing temperatures and high winds.

The weeklong convention was a family affair for the delegates, typified by a "three-tier" convention banquet. There was the traditional seated banquet for the adults in attendance, a steak and rock band affair for teens and a chuckwagon dinner and puppet show for the pre-teens.

Police Unions See Hazards From Impact of Budget Cuts

Chicago — Cuts in the federal budget and their effect on local communities and their police officers were a primary concern of delegates to the third convention of the International Union of Police Associations.

The delegates, representing some 30,000 law enforcement officers, passed a resolution expressing their opposition to the Administration's economic program and the deep cuts in social programs that had been funded by the federal government.

EXTENSIVE discussion centered on the effects these and other slashes in funds available to state and local governments will have on the economy as a whole, on government and on public employees.

The union, affiliated with the AFL-CIO since 1979, also held elections for executive vice presidents and area vice presidents from its 20 regions.

Mike Baker of Memphis, Tenn., was elected first vice president of the union over Jack Hawkins of Chicago.

Candidates for the majority of the seats for executive and area vice presidencies were elected without opposition. In the contested races for executive vice president, in Region 2, Mike Tracy of the union's Long Beach, Calif., association defeated Reno Rapagnani of San Francisco.

IN REGION 13, Wayne Jones of the Prince William County, Va., affiliate won over James Courtney of the U.S. Secret Service unit, headquartered in Washington. Bill LaVash of Boston defeated Jack Moriarty of the Connecticut association for the executive vice presidency in Region 16.

In the only contested race for an area vice presidency, Wendell Phillips of Sacramento defeated Rapagnani in Region 2.

George Rollins Dies, Led Insurance Union

Manchester, N.H.—George A. Rollins, president of the Insurance Workers from 1963 to 1965, died here at the age of 68. Rollins, who retired in 1978, died on Aug. 14. He made his home here.

Rollins began his union career in 1939 shortly after going to work for the John Hancock Life Insurance Co. in Boston. He served as office chairman and unit vice president.

When the former United Office & Professional Workers of America was ousted from the CIO in 1950 on charges of Communist domination, Rollins was named to the Insurance Workers Organizing Committee set up to replace the defunct union. He served as an organizer until 1959 when the committee was chartered as the present Insurance Workers International Union, and as a staff representative until his election as president in May 1963. After an unsuccessful bid for reelection in 1965, he returned to employment with John Hancock.

Funeral services were held Aug. 17 in Barrington, N.H. Besides his wife Alice, he leaves five daughters.

AFT Attorney Elected To Bar Association Post

Albany, N.Y.—Bernard F. Ashe, counsel for the New York State United Teachers here, will be the next chairman of the American Bar Association's Section on Labor & Employment Law. The 12,000-member section chose him as chairman-elect and he will become chairman automatically next year.

Maritime Union's Founder, Joseph Curran, Dies at 75

Boca Raton, Fla.—Joseph Curran, who went off to sea at the age of 16 and built a union, died of cancer at the age of 75.

He led a sitdown strike on the SS California that won a $5-a-month pay raise in 1936—when the average seaman earned $55 a month. When the company tried to blacklist Curran and other militants, seamen throughout the East Coast walked out. A later four-month strike transformed the Seaman's Defense Committee into the CIO-affiliated National Maritime Union that during World War II would grow to 100,000 members.

FROM THE DAY that the crew of the California chose him as their spokesman, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue wrote to Mrs. Curran, his "courageous example and high quality of leadership were assets of the American labor movement."

Curran served as president of the NMU from its founding until his retirement in 1973 and he was a vice president of the AFL-CIO from the 1955 merger until 1973. He had been a vice president of the CIO since 1940.

The NMU's strength was in the passenger liner trade, and the advent of the air age and the decline in American-flag shipping substantially reduced the NMU's seagoing membership.

Nevertheless, the conditions it established helped transform life at sea for those who followed in Curran's footsteps.

"He will be remembered not only in the history books and among the members of the National Maritime Union," Kirkland and Donahue wrote, "but everywhere trade union principles and traditions are held in honor."

Tilting the Rules

AFTER SEVEN months of the Reagan Administration, employer groups have come uncomfortably close to their goal of a pro-business "regulation-free environment." The changes proposed by the Secretary of Labor in the rules for administering the Davis-Bacon Act and the Service Contract Act would take a big step toward deregulation.

The secretary has announced a plan to save the government money by lowering the prevailing wages that the Davis-Bacon Act says must be paid on federally funded construction. This would be done by changing the long established formula for determining the prevailing wage rate in a manner long urged by non-union contractors, and by creating a new lower-paid job title of "helper."

HIS PROPOSAL for achieving "savings" under the Service Contract Act is even simpler. All that is necessary there is to rewrite the regulations so as to eliminate about half of the service contracts now governed by the prevailing wage requirement.

There are sometimes legitimate grounds for changes in regulations, and there can be honest differences of opinion about them. Pending, when the Reagan Administration took office, were the Labor Dept.'s carefully crafted proposals for modifications of prevailing wage regulations that had been developed after extensive discussions with all interested groups.

But the Reagan Administration discarded these proposals, with barely a glance.

The new Davis-Bacon regulations would be heavily tilted to the open-shop contractors, but the employer groups are already looking ahead to the next step. The U.S. Chamber of Commerce said it will redouble its efforts to achieve "outright repeal of this outdated, inflationary relic of the past."

After all, why settle for three-fourths of a loaf?

A Challenge to the 'Mandate'

SOLIDARITY DAY, on Sept. 19, takes on even more significance in the light of the Reagan Administration's continued erosion of worker protections.

Solidarity Day will demonstrate that a large body of Americans from all walks of life are deeply concerned at this Administration's radical shift away from the mainstream.

It will challenge the contention that the slim majority vote that Ronald Reagan received last November can be interpreted as a mandate to take from those with the least in order to give more to those with the most.

It will say that health and safety protections, jobs and training, affordable housing for those who can't afford mortgages carrying 17 percent interest rates and lunches for school kids have a higher claim on the nation's resources than still further tax cuts for profit-glutted oil companies to buy up competitors.

The First Amendment to the Constitution guarantees "the right of the people peacefully to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

On Sept. 19, that's just what labor and its allies intend to do.

Working in the Shadows

Vanishing Job-Seekers a Sign Of 'Hidden' Economy's Growth

By Gus Tyler

THERE'S THIS MYSTERY about those one million Americans who disappeared in the space of two months between May and July of 1981.

In May, there were about 107 million men and women who were in the "labor force," which means that they were either on a job or looking for a job. Two months later, in July, there were only 106 million.

This was not due to any shrinkage of our total population; that just kept on growing—as it generally does. The shrinkage was only in the "labor force."

WHEN THE figures first hit the headlines they were hailed as "good news." The New York Times reported on page one: "Unemployment Defies Forecast, Declining to 7%." That looked great: more people at work.

But, then, if you looked at the fine print, you found that there were not more people at work at all. Indeed, there were fewer people at work in July than in May by about 600,000.

If, you ask, the number of people at work went down, how could the unemployment rate also go down? The answer: there were fewer people looking for work.

TAKE NEW JERSEY, for example, where the jobless rate fell to a relatively low 6 percent. At first glance, that sounds like happy news, suggesting more people at work. But, no, the number at work did not rise. It's just that the number of people in the "labor force"—working or seeking work—in New Jersey shrunk by 118,000 from May to July.

Now what happened to those 118,000 folk in New Jersey who were in the labor force in May but disappeared in July? You can't say that they went to some other state, because what happened in New Jersey happened in the country as a whole. The mystery remains.

The experts who are in charge of finding names for strange things generally list these "missing persons" as "discouraged" job seekers. They have no job; they have stopped looking for jobs; they are statistical non-beings.

THEY DON'T EVEN collect unemployment insurance because to do that they must officially be "looking for work." Whether they are or not, they would be counted as part of the "force."

Some of the "missing" may just be hanging around waiting for times to get better.

But there is good reason to believe that there are many who are fully and gainfully occupied in a hidden economy that is growing in America. A big chunk of that subterranean business system operates on barter or in cash—payments for goods and services that go unreported.

AN EVEN larger portion of that shadow economy is outrightly criminal—mugging, burglary, hijacking, fencing, prostitution, dope, pilferage, paid-for arson, loft thefts, stolen vehicles and construction machinery. It's a multi-multi-billion-dollar piece of turf.

The ultimate threat to the American society is that this hidden economy will grow, as it has been growing, if the legitimate economy does not grow in line with our potential.

The great irony is that our official "unemployment" rate may actually decline although fewer people hold jobs, because there will be fewer people looking for legitimate jobs as more and more make their livelihood in the shadows. Crime may become—if it is not already—the nation's biggest business.

High Rates of Poverty, Joblessness

Administration Policies Fail To Address Needs of Blacks

By Norman Hill

IN THE SIX MONTHS he has been President, Ronald Reagan has failed to articulate anything approaching a coherent policy on matters of racial inequality and poverty. Aside from generalities concerning the need to combat discrimination and to bolster productivity, the Administration shows no sign of having given serious thought to the plight of what has come to be called the black underclass.

This underclass has been a persistent fact in the life of American society for many decades, and its ranks continue to swell.

The typical Reagan Administration response to the problem of black poverty and unemployment has been to assert that only the private sector can resolve the problems faced by blacks and others who are poor. Help business and industry, the Reagan argument goes, and you will help poor blacks and all poor Americans improve their lot. However, a glance at the recent history of black unemployment and impoverishment gives little indication that the Reagan approach will work.

SINCE WORLD WAR II, the rate of black unemployment has stood at roughly twice that of white unemployment. This ratio has remained constant in times of economic prosperity and through periods of economic decline, through periods of inflation and periods of price stability. No matter how the economy has been doing, blacks seem disproportionately to shoulder the burdens of unemployment.

What improvement has been made by blacks in the last 35 years can be attributed to increased education. Blacks who have received adequate training and education have made tremendous strides economically. Black women college graduates, for example, today earn slightly more than their white counterparts. But the Reagan Administration has implemented massive cuts in federal aid to education and has drastically cut funding for a number of training and employment programs which seek to prepare minorities and the poor for meaningful private sector employment—precisely the initiatives one would expect the President to support.

Of equal importance is the Reagan approach to "states' rights." The Administration is a vocal proponent of block grants and of giving increased power to the states. Yet it is precisely at the regional and state level that, for historical reasons, discrimination remains a significant problem. For example, due to a variety of complex factors, black workers in the South earn 78 percent of the income of white Southerners. Throughout the rest of the country, however, the earnings of black and white workers are nearly identical.

An approach that puts emphasis on "states' rights" will prove unable to diminish the discrepancy between the earnings of Southern whites and blacks. Federal action must be a component in diminishing these differences. And it is precisely such federal intervention that President Reagan appears to oppose.

Recently, the Gallup Organization conducted a poll of the views of the black population. The results are both interesting and ominous, for they indicate a deepening division between blacks and whites, in some measure as a direct consequence of the policies of the Reagan Administration.

The Gallup study found that while 55 percent of whites were optimistic about what 1981 would bring for them personally, only 18 percent of blacks expected a better year and 48 percent expected things would be worse.

SIMILARLY, in February a Newsweek magazine poll found that 52 percent of blacks expected things would get worse for them during Reagan's presidency and only 8 percent felt things would improve. In April, while President Reagan enjoyed a 74 percent approval rating among whites, only 25 percent of blacks approved of the President's performance.

In the late '60s and early '70s, when blacks were experiencing some social advancement, polls registered a significant sense of progress. In 1969, for example, 70 percent of blacks felt that the situation of blacks had improved during the previous five years. In 1981 only 30 percent feel this is true.

The Gallup survey reveals one very dangerous trend. Only the barest majority of blacks (51 percent) rejects violent protest as a means of accomplishing goals, and two-thirds of blacks agree that the only time the federal government really pays attention to blacks is when they resort to violence. This sense of frustration and rage must be confronted. Yet in the context of the Reagan Administration's retreat from necessary social programs and in the Administration's failure to confront the reality of racial inequality, there are the seeds of disaster.

BLACK AMERICANS have viewed the Administration with skepticism since Ronald Reagan took his oath of office. Yet the President has made no serious effort to diminish this skepticism by developing a policy which addresses the specific needs and problems faced by blacks. Glib generalizations and assertions that the private sector will resolve the plight of the black poor do not constitute a coherent policy on black inequality. They constitute a serious failure of leadership.

In defending his economic policies, Ronald Reagan frequently asserts that "a rising tide lifts all boats." He, however, appears to have forgotten that those who are without boats may very well drown.

'Dead in the Water'

Actions to Weaken Safety Law Called Tantamount to Repeal

PRESIDENT REAGAN has, in effect, reneged on his campaign pledge not to seek repeal of the Occupational Safety & Health Act by authorizing a series of administrative and legal attacks aimed at making the law inoperative, Director George H. R. Taylor of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health charged.

Attempts to kill, weaken or delay standards on cotton dust, lead, hearing conservation and other job-related hazards, and maneuvers to substantially water down enforcement by reducing personnel and exempting large numbers of workplaces, are clearly aimed at leaving the law "dead in the water," Taylor declared. He said that while the President hasn't yet pushed for outright repeal of OSHA, the moves he has authorized add up to the same thing.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Taylor warned that major gains in worker protection achieved over the past four years are in grave danger.

Noting that "some of OSHA's severest congressional critics" are now in leadership positions, especially in the Senate, Taylor acknowledged that even if the labor movement is able to blunt the administrative assault on OSHA, the law will still face the threat of legislation to accomplish the same ends. He said that Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee Chairman Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) has "apparently adopted a wait-and-see attitude . . . watching the methods, policies and programs that are put into play" by the agency.

SEN. HATCH "always has the option" of pushing OSHA amendments, if the attempts to wash out the law through administrative changes fail, Taylor observed.

Reporters questioning Taylor on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers and John Herzfeld of Occupational Safety & Health Reporter, a publication of the Bureau of National Affairs. Labor News Conference is broadcast weekly by the Mutual radio network.

TODAY'S WHOLESOME MEAT and poultry owes much to Upton Sinclair, whose exposé of filth in the Chicago stockyards led to the landmark Meat Inspection Act of 1906.

That law, plus several key amendments, have provided not only for cleanliness in meat and poultry operations but also for regulation of fat content, standardization of ingredients and accurate labeling.

Now, amidst celebrations of 75 years of progress, come signs that the nation may have started to move backward as the public price for easing cost burdens on government and business.

One pointed manifestation: filthy conditions in an estimated 18.4 percent of meat and poultry slaughtering plants, according to a recent General Accounting Office report. GAO attributed problems of sanitation to a scarcity of inspectors, whose ranks have been shrinking through a government policy of deliberate attrition, and to failure by plant managers to meet their responsibilities.

ALTHOUGH DEMOCRATS did a bit of cost-cutting when they were in power, conservative Republicans, in servitude to industry, are doing more, with accelerated backsliding. In fact, they are trying hard to reverse a number of protections consumers gained under the previous Administration.

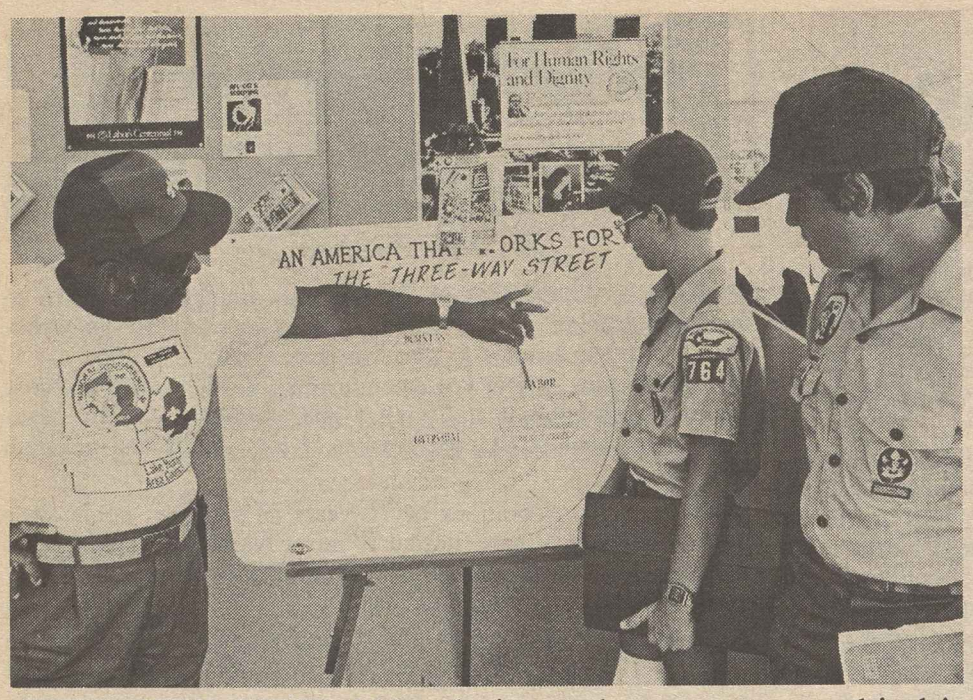
A pro-business philosophy so runs herd at the Agriculture Dept. these days that the person overseeing inspection and grading regulations is the assistant secretary for marketing, C. N. McMillan, a former lobbyist for the National Cattlemen's Association. Previously, inspection and grading fell under the jurisdiction of the assistant secretary for food and consumer services.

One of the public threats that particularly worries labor and consumer leaders is the movement in Congress to amend regulations that prohibit the use of suspected cancer-causing substances as food additives.

One such additive is sodium nitrite, a commonly used curing agent in bacon, bologna, franks and other processed meats. Research showed sodium nitrite produced tumors in laboratory animals. Health advocates sought to prohibit it by invoking the law that requires a ban when a substance causes cancer in laboratory animals.

So far, industry has thwarted those attempts and currently is striving to change the law. If that happens, "it will not be long before we return to a time of rampant health and economic risks," to use the words of Ellen Haas of the Community Nutrition Institute, a public interest group.

ALTERATIONS IN various inspection procedures also could put the meat and poultry supply at risk, according to federal inspectors.



One such new program, called Quality Control Inspection, applies to processing plants. It allows them, on a voluntary basis, to submit certain of their records to the federal inspectors who, in turn, verify the records by laboratory sampling techniques, thus reducing the inspectors' personal observations.

Concomitant with "quality control inspection," USDA is seeking an amendment to the Meat Inspection Act giving the Secretary of Agriculture discretion on how often an inspector must visit each plant. The existing mandate is for continuous inspection, which has been interpreted to mean a daily visit.

Agriculture officials say their schemes mean more efficient regulation for fewer dollars. However, cutting corners to save money can mean cutting corners on public health and safety. It may not be long before another Upton Sinclair will be needed.

AGENCY AND COURT attacks aimed at rendering OSHA inoperative and encouraged by the Administration in effect wash out President Reagan's campaign pledge not to seek repeal of the federal job health and safety law, Director George H. R. Taylor (center) of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health, charged on Labor News Conference. Taylor was questioned by John Herzfeld, left, of Occupational Safety & Health Reporter and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

Boy Scouts Learn About Unions at Jamboree

Fort A.P. Hill, Va. — In a 7,000-acre outdoor campsite and classroom, more than 30,000 Boy Scouts, leaders and visitors from every state and several foreign nations learned about the American labor movement at the 10th National Jamboree here.

The outdoor classroom was a Merit Badge Midway where more than 60 career and hobby displays were presented. Included were exhibits on the Scouts' "American Business" and "Surveying" merit badges staffed by representatives of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services and the Operating Engineers.

MEMBERS OF the AFL-CIO National Labor Advisory Committee, which works to strengthen ties between organized labor and the Scout movement, visited with Jamboree Scouts and officials during the eight-day event that takes place every four years.

Ted Reed, director of research for the Operating Engineers; J. Robert Miller, national liaison for AFL-CIO community services and director of labor relationships for the Boy Scouts; and Norm Osborne, retired community services representative from Saginaw, Mich., were on hand throughout the Jamboree to answer questions on labor's role and to help Scouts with labor-related badge requirements.

Many other AFL-CIO union members were involved as volunteer leaders for the Scouts, who camped in tents and cooked their own meals at this first Jamboree held south of the Mason-Dixon line.

Osborne explained that more than 22,000 Scouts have earned the "American Business" badge since it was first offered in 1968. Requirements include preparation of a central labor organizational chart and explanations of the terms union shop, open shop, collective bargaining, shop steward, business agent and union counselor. Scouts earning this badge also learn of the parts played by federal and state agencies in labor relations.

In addition, Scouts qualifying for the badge must show an understanding of money flow in business and industry, profits, insurance and stocks, and how capital is secured.

Featured for the first time at a National Jamboree was a display and demonstration on the "Surveying" merit badge by the Operating Engineers.

REED, AN Eagle Scout as a boy and a recipient of the George Meany Award for Scouting, noted that over 100,000 boys have qualified for this badge, one of the original badges offered in 1911. Larry Rick of IUOE Local 77 of Suitland, Md., assisted at the surveying demonstration. It featured a history of surveying, how to draw maps to scale, determining height, and plotting lots with errors of closure no more than 5 feet.

In keeping with the Jamboree's theme of "Scouting's Reunion with History," Reed, Rick and other AFL-CIO personnel noted that George Washington and Thomas Jefferson used an instrument known as a "semi-circumferentor" or "graphometer" which combined a peep-sight and a compass for establishing the direction of a line.

Scouts at the 1981 National Jamboree were reunited with history in many ways. They passed under gateways decorated with flags and images of individual states, soldiers, battles, and other historical scenes. A Heritage Trail allowed them to take part in such activities as pitching horseshoes, using branding irons and having log races. Opening and closing ceremonies highlighted important moments in American History, capped by the display of five tons of fireworks.

A. J. PHILLIPS, director of the National Joint Apprenticeship Training Committee for the Electrical Industry, observed after the last Jamboree in 1977 that the Scouts' merit badge program can be a boost to local apprenticeship programs. He noted, for example, that the New York City chapter of the National Electrical Contractors Association works with Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in sponsoring Scout troops for handicapped and disadvantaged children, using their Long Island training facility and encouraging the Scouts to continue into apprenticeship.

Reed notes that merit badge pamphlets explain the kinds of training programs available to youths interested in various careers. The electricity badge guide, for one, advises Scouts that one way "to get into the electrical field is by entering an apprentice training course." It points out that "an apprentice usually helps a skilled mechanic and thereby gradually becomes skilled himself."

Rule Changes Scored as Bid To Sabotage Pay Protection

giving the open-shop groups all they had asked for in regulatory change. But the Associated Builders & Contractors now says the regulatory changes should be considered "just the first step leading to outright repeal." It said the regulations should be further eased to allow a low-paid helper for each journeyman employed.

The changes proposed by the Labor Dept. in the Service Contract Act "would repeal the law's protections for large numbers of workers by administratively stripping contracts from coverage" of the law, Oswald charged.

UNDER PRESENT regulations, prevailing wage and benefit standards must be met on contracts providing services to the government—most often food services, janitorial work and other relatively low-paying occupations, but also including some high-skilled technical work. Until the law was enacted, workers who succeeded in organizing and improving their conditions faced the threat that the contract would be lost to a bidder paying substandard wages.

The proposed changes would exempt research and development contracts, exclude maintenance and repair of computers and other "high technology" equipment. It would also limit the law's coverage to contracts that are "principally for services."

That "innocent sounding phrase," Oswald pointed out, would repeal the law's protections for large numbers of workers.

"Without adequate protection, community prevailing wages will be undermined and workers will lose their jobs," he protested. "The promise of the Service Contract Act is that the government contracting process will not threaten job security. That promise should be maintained," Oswald declared.

Career Labor Dept. Aide Named to International Post

James F. Taylor of Alexandria, Va., a 40-year career civil servant, was named associate deputy under secretary for international affairs at the Labor Dept. by Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan.

Taylor, 62, succeeds Herbert N. Blackman, who is retiring.

More Funds Earmarked

Plumbers-Pipe Fitters Step Up Organizing

Las Vegas, Nev.—The 3,700 delegates to the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters 32nd convention heeded the strong recommendation of President Martin J. Ward that the union intensify its organizing efforts as they earmarked more funds for that purpose.

The convention voted to increase the per capita dues by $2 a month, with $1 of the boost going to the international union. This will permit an increase of ten cents for the organizing fund, providing a new total of 40 cents per member per month beginning next Jan. 1.

AN ADDITIONAL 70 cents is allocated to the general fund, making it $3.35 a month, and 20 cents to the burial expense fund, making it $1.70.

Ward told the delegates that the union is "losing millions of additional man-hours of work both at the local and national levels because of the competition of non-union contractors." He called for a major effort "to persuade our members to join actively in and support this drive to organize non-union contractors."

Ward, who was elected to a third consecutive five-year term, said many large companies that purchase construction projects now look with favor on non-union contractors, especially the large oil companies building synthetic fuel plants that will represent $200 billion worth of construction in the years immediately ahead.

"THIS FIGURE is more than the total annual construction outlay for all the United States and Canada," he said, "so it's a situation we can't run away from. We may have to face the difficult task of organizing the jobs on a site-by-site basis."

In other action, the delegates unanimously adopted a resolution introduced from the floor in support of the Air Traffic Controllers' strike and calling on President Reagan to engage in "serious negotiations" to settle the dispute.

The convention also went on record as supporting the Washington Building & Construction Trades Council in its efforts to persuade the Prudential Insurance Co. of America to use pension funds to foster union construction and to stop using a number of non-union contractors to develop income-producing properties for its own account in northern Virginia and the District of Columbia.

FORMER LABOR SEC. Ray Marshall told the convention that increasing competition would threaten American labor standards unless the standards of workers around the world are improved.

"Public opinion needs to be turned around with respect to the values of a free labor movement for a free society," Marshall said. Many people seem to be able to understand this principle better for Poland than they can understand it for the United States, he observed.

"With the internationalization of the American economy and the growing influence of multinational corporations, it is important for the American labor movement to continue to strengthen its ties with labor movements of other countries to promote the concept of international minimum labor standards and to minimize the impact of international trade and immigration on the working conditions of workers in the United States," Marshall continued.

MARSHALL SAID that organization and collective bargaining are becoming ever more complicated because most of the jobs created over the last decade were in plants with fewer than 50 employees and the decentralization of industries has been to locations where unions are not strong.

"The construction industry itself is being brought under the control of large multinational corporations who are opposed to unions, who have created a so-called committee for a union-free environment and who are boycotting unionized contractors," Marshall noted.

NEW SECRETARY-TREASURER of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept. is Rhonda Allgaier, who was elected at the department executive board's recent meeting in Chicago to fill the vacancy created by the retirement of Harry Poole. Here she joins FBTD President Robert F. Harbrant in a discussion with AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. She is a vice president of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees,

Unions Sponsor Ad Campaign on Social Security

"Social security is not a handout. It's a contract between the United States government and the American people—a contract we've earned through lifetimes of hard work."

That's part of an advertisement that appeared recently in many of the nation's leading newspapers. It was sponsored jointly by the State, County & Municipal Employees and the Auto Workers as part of labor's campaign to block Reagan Administration proposals to reduce social security protections.

"Don't Do It, Mr. President," is the headline over a drawing of a scissors about to cut a social security card.

The advertisement stresses that social security's funding problems, caused by abnormally high unemployment and inflation, can be solved "without breaking the government's promise to working Americans."

It asks letters to members of Congress, and urges: "Don't let them take away what we've earned. And don't settle for a compromise that merely pushes back the cuts to a later date."

Wholesale Rise Moderate Despite Jump in Food Costs

Wholesale prices rose at a moderate, seasonally adjusted rate of four-tenths of 1 percent in July—or at a 4.8 percent annual rate before compounding—despite a sharp jump in food costs, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The July increase in producers' finished goods followed rises of six-tenths of 1 percent in June and four-tenths of 1 percent in May. Changes in producer prices are viewed as a harbinger of consumer price changes.

WHOLESALE FOOD prices soared 1.5 percent over the month, led by a 10.1-percent surge in pork. Beef and veal prices went up 3.8 percent. Fresh fruits were up 2.5 percent and eggs 1.5 percent. These increases were partially offset by declines of 5.7 percent for poultry, 2.1 percent for fish and 1.1 percent for vegetables.

Energy prices fell a full percentage point, helped by the third straight month of declines for gasoline. Home heating oil and gasoline prices, measured by themselves, went down 2 percent at the wholesale level on a monthly basis.

Besides the expected food price surge, the 3.3-percent rise over the month in steel prices was the major source of concern.

However, durable goods — long-lasting products most likely to use steel in their manufacture—dropped in price for dealers by two-tenths of 1 percent, with large declines also for jewelry, platinum, gold, and costume jewelry.

THERE WERE also drops of over 1 percent in prices for cosmetics, electric lamps and bulbs, and tires and tubes. Passenger car prices, however, rose 1.1 percent, and household appliances were up 1.5 percent.

Over the past 12 months the government's producer price index for finished goods rose 8.8 percent. In July 1980, the index was 14.6 percent higher than 12 months earlier.

Pay Boosts Averaged 7.5% In 1980 State, City Accords

Major agreements between State and local governments and their employees last year provided first-year wage increases averaging 7.5 percent, up from 6.8 percent in 1979, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. Over the life of the agreements, the annual wage boost averaged 7.8 percent, compared with 6.5 percent in 1979.

The 1980 data cover 1,012,000 blue-collar and white-collar workers in 83 state and local bargaining units of 5,000 members or more. While the wage increases bettered the previous year's, they were far below last year's 12.4 percent inflation rate.

THE DATA relate to settlements reached and wage changes put into effect during the year, deferred increases stemming from earlier agreements, and cost-of-living adjustments paid. Forty settlements were reached in 1980. Deferred wage increases were made under 37 agreements negotiated prior to 1980, and COL adjustments were made under three contracts.

All but three of the 1980 settlements provided for specified wage boosts in the first contract year. Of the three that did not, one continued quarterly COL payments.

The settlement data do not include estimates of potential adjustments to wages under COL clauses. Five of the 40 settlements reached last year, covering 55,000 workers, continued COL clauses. No new COL clauses were introduced in last year's settlements, and two agreements dropped such clauses.

CONTRACTS without COL clauses tended to provide higher average wage boosts, 7.6 percent against 7.3 percent in the first year and 7.9 percent against 6.7 percent averaged over the life of the agreements. Pacts with COL clauses had an average duration of 26.6 months, while those without such provisions averaged 23.9 months.

NLRB Nominees Assume Posts During Recess

John R. Van de Water, President Reagan's choice to succeed John Fanning as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, was sworn into office Aug. 18 at the U.S. embassy in Cairo, Egypt.

Van de Water, who was in Africa to attend his daughter's wedding at the time of his "recess appointment," is 64, a Republican, and an attorney from California.

REAGAN ALSO granted a recess appointment to Robert Hunter, 40, who has served as a labor relations adviser to Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah), chairman of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee. Hunter was sworn in as a board member on Aug. 14.

Van de Water replaces Democrat John Pennello, who resigned Jan. 14. Fanning will stay on as a member of the five-man board. A new President has the privilege of designating the chairman.

Hunter, who takes the seat of John Truesdale, a Democrat who resigned in January after Reagan withdrew his nomination for another term, was designated acting chairman until Van de Water returns to the United States next week. The board has been functioning with only three members since Truesdale's resignation.

BOARD MEMBER Howard Jenkins, Jr., who recently was hospitalized for a heart attack, is expected to be discharged next week and work at home for about a month before undergoing minor surgery.

Although both Van de Water and Hunter were nominated to the board in June before the congressional recess, the subsequent appointments while Congress is in its August recess allowed both to assume office immediately, and not wait for Senate confirmation. The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee has scheduled a confirmation hearing to start Sept. 10.

Teachers Reject Shift to States of Federal Function

The American Federation of Teachers intends to take a close look at the options the Administration is considering for the future of the Dept. of Education. But it will "strongly oppose" any move to shift federal education functions to the states, AFT President Albert Shanker said.

Education Sec. Terrel Bell is reported to have submitted various options to President Reagan, including conversion to a non-Cabinet department, merger with another government department and conversion to a foundation with most functions and funds shifted to the states.

Shanker said the AFT will examine each Administration proposal from the viewpoint of whether or not it would be an improvement over the existing situation.

But consolidation of federal programs into grants for the states would merely "generate destructive battles on the state and local level over how a greatly reduced federal pie would be divided to meet the needs of the handicapped and disadvantaged," Shanker said.

Memo Outlines Options

OSHA Studies Ways To Soften Standards

that "flexible enforcement" would not "clearly show industry that OSHA is sensitive to their [sic] problems" and would not "clearly demonstrate regulatory reform initiatives."

The memorandum makes no mention of the hazards to workers in the textile and smelting industries that the standards were developed to eliminate.

IT MENTIONS organized labor only twice: once in an expression of concern that unions might challenge the Labor Dept. if it continues to delay action on one aspect of the lead standard, and again in a caution not to "enrage the unions who could feel that their legal victory [in the Supreme Court cases] is being undermined."

The Solicitor of Labor is the chief legal counsel to the Labor Dept. The incumbent, T. Timothy Ryan, also headed one of the Administration's so-called regulatory review groups.

The Supreme Court in a 5-3 decision in mid-June upheld the OSHA standard on worker exposure to cotton dust, rejecting industry groups' contentions that the required engineering controls would be too costly and the Reagan Administration's request to delay its ruling until OSHA could conduct a cost-benefit analysis of the standard, which was developed under the Carter Administration.

TWELVE DAYS later the high court rejected without comment challenges by the lead industry and the Reagan Administration to an OSHA standard designed to reduce the lead-poisoning hazard for more than 800,000 workers.

While the bulk of the Solicitor's Office memorandum deals with the lead standard, it points out that "essentially the same options are available" for softening the effect of the cotton dust standard: new rule making—immediately or later since "here, too, the industry has several years to comply"—or "enforcement flexibility and variances . . . for the primary textile industry."

In reviewing the court's cotton dust ruling, the memorandum notes that the court "limited its conclusions on 'cost-benefit' to toxic substance standards" and "did not preclude the use of 'cost-benefit' to set priorities for other OSHA regulatory actions."

IT ALSO NOTES that the court "did not discuss whether OSHA could do a cost-benefit analysis without relying on the analysis for purposes of deciding on levels of protection from toxic substances."

But, the memorandum cautions, OSHA's "preparation of a cost-benefit analysis, even though not used, may add to the difficulties in defending the standard and present disadvantages from a public relations point of view."

In the court's majority decision, Justice William J. Brennan wrote that "Congress itself defined the basic relationship between costs and benefits by placing the 'benefit' of worker health above all other considerations, save those making attainment of this 'benefit' unachievable." The key word in the job safety law, he said, is "feasible . . . capable of being done."

THE MEMORANDUM also notes that the court "did not deal with OSHA enforcement policy as a means of bringing flexibility to health standards," and it suggests that as employers submit their plans for complying with the standards "OSHA could . . . mitigate some of the engineering control burdens by allowing such additional time as is demonstrably necessary."

One of OSHA's options is to "commence new rule making" immediately for affected primary industries "where there is thought to be a feasibility problem," the memorandum suggests.

"Current evidence on economic and technological feasibility as well as cost effectiveness of the standards . . . could be considered," the memorandum says.

A PUBLIC STATEMENT soon that there will be a new rulemaking "would minimize the impression that the Supreme Court decisions seriously threaten the Administration's regulatory reform program," the memo says, pointing out, however, that "it may be too early to develop evidence demonstrating infeasibility . . . since industry has not yet done anything to comply with engineering control and related provisions."

At the same time, however, such a statement "may appear to reflect resistance to the Supreme Court decisions, which would harm the agency's [OSHA's] public image in general, and enrage the unions who could feel that their legal victory is being undermined," the memo says.

OSHA also could wait for the industry's compliance plans to be submitted "(6 months-1 year after the effective date)" and on the basis of the plans "and other new evidence decide whether to begin proceedings to amend the standard."

Such delay, however, "may be viewed as a lack of commitment to regulatory reform or difficulty in implementing regulatory reform after the Supreme Court decisions," the memo observes.

Fraser Calls for U.S. Policy To Spur Ailing Auto Industry

High unemployment, idle plants and depressed communities are part of the price the United States is paying for its lack of a "coherent" industrial policy, Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser testified.

Fraser told a House Judiciary subcommittee that he considers it "regrettable" that the Reagan Administration has not continued a tripartite committee established late in the Carter Administration to seek solutions to the auto industry crisis. The experiment in labor-management-government interchange had shown some promise, he said.

THE U.S. AUTOMOBILE industry's sales slump is now in its 28th month, Fraser noted, and more than 150,000 General Motors, Ford and Chrysler workers are still jobless. With related unemployment, he testified, the auto industry's sales slump has pushed the national unemployment rate up a full percent and over the past two years has cost an estimated $25 billion in lost government tax revenue and in expenditures for unemployment insurance and other forms of income support.

While auto industry management is not without fault, the severe sales slump is largely the result of "massive" vehicle imports from Japan and "ruinous" interest rates resulting from the Federal Reserve Board's tight-money policy.

THE SUBCOMMITTEE is exploring productivity along with other issues, and Fraser said the UAW is "well aware of its importance" in keeping the industry competitive and enabling union members "to attain an excellent level of wages and benefits of which we are proud." But "continuing labor support of technological innovations," he said, requires effective guarantees that new technology won't result in abrupt displacement of workers.

Fraser challenged the conception that the Japanese auto industry is substantially more productive than that of the United States.

Japanese auto workers are assured of employment without fear of periodic layoffs, he noted, and their management encourages their ideas on improving the workplace and their product.

Also, Fraser noted, "the Japanese government has played an active role in ensuring rapid investment in high productivity and technologically advanced industries. With import protection, subsidized research, low interest credit and other mechanisms, the government has carefully nurtured the development of most of the industries that export so successfully today."

IN AN AREA the United States should not emulate, Fraser said, the Japanese model is "flawed" by pay and hiring discrimination against women, by excessive hours of work and little vacation time. Further, "Japanese workers are required to retire from major companies by age 60 at the latest," and their severance pay does not compare with the lifetime pension benefits U.S. auto workers receive. "Overall, Japanese auto workers have not shared proportionately in the fruits of their remarkable productivity performance."

While the United States can learn from Japan's experience, Fraser suggested, "we cannot simply graft parts of the Japanese industrial relations system on to ours."

1.3 Million Elderly to Face Cut in Social Security Check

Unless Congress reverses itself before next March, about 1.3 million of the 3 million persons now receiving the minimum social security benefit of $122 a month will have less to live on.

The House has already had second thoughts about its approval of the Reagan Administration budget package and has voted to rescind the section eliminating the minimum benefit. The Senate put off a decision until after Congress returns from its August recess.

AFL-CIO SOCIAL SECURITY Director Bert Seidman noted in a memo on the impact of the cut that the projected budget savings could be at least partially illusionary.

An estimated 1.7 million persons will have cuts in the minimum benefit offset by higher payments under other portions of the Social Security Act. And the process of identifying and recomputing benefit payments to the 3 million current beneficiaries is likely to overtax the agency's already strained data processing facilities. Besides the added costs, Seidman said, normal social security operations could be disrupted for the next year.

Seidman said the "savings" to the government would be even lower if all of the persons who would become eligible for the income-related supplemental social insurance payments applied for them. But the Administration's own estimates, he noted, is that only about one out of four will actually do so.

The average benefit cut if the minimum is not restored is estimated at between $700 and $800 a year, Seidman said.

While there is no separate breakdown of the persons not eligible for offsetting benefits, the "profile" of the 3 million persons now receiving the minimum benefit shows that 85 to 90 percent are women and half are 70 or older.

About 500,000 are 80 or older and 80,000 are at least 90.

Network Broadcasts Set for Labor Day

AFL-CIO leaders will appear on the following radio and television programs over the Labor Day weekend, Sept. 6 and 7:

Vice President John H. Lyons on Mutual radio, Monday, Sept. 7, 12:15 p.m. EDT.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue on NBC radio, Monday, Sept. 7, 9:30 p.m. EDT.

President Lane Kirkland on CBS radio, Monday, Sept. 7, 7:45 p.m. EDT.

Kirkland also is scheduled to appear on the CBS television program "Face the Nation" Sunday, Sept. 6, at 11:30 a.m.

Local stations may alter program schedules and should be checked for exact broadcast time.

Mississippi Congressman Appoints Union Staff Aide

Rep. Wayne Dowdy (D-Miss.), who won a special election last month in a House district that had previously gone Republican, has appointed a black trade union leader as his administrative assistant.

Dowdy chose William Wright, a member of Local 605 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Jackson. Wright has been president of the Central Mississippi Chapter of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and vice president of the AFL-CIO central labor council in Jackson.

Unions Build Controllers Family Fund

Community, Financial Aid Shaping Up

The AFL-CIO enlisted its community services operation to assist, on the basis of need, families of air traffic controllers fired by the government for taking part in their union's strike.

Where financial aid is needed, help will come through the PATCO Family Fund established by the AFL-CIO. A telegraph poll of the AFL-CIO Executive Council brought quick concurrence in a $10,000 contribution to launch the fund, and donations from affiliates began coming in immediately.

The Communications Workers presented a $100,000 check to the family fund, and CWA President Glenn Watts said the union's executive board had authorized up to $1 million from CWA's defense fund to be used "in defense of unionism and the process of collective bargaining in the public sector."

OTHER MAJOR contributions received in the first days after the fund was set up included $15,000 from the State, County & Municipal Employees and $10,000 from the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers. A number of other unions announced contribution plans or were putting the issue to their governing bodies.

The government's retaliation against the PATCO strikers apparently extends beyond the dismissal notices sent out by the Federal Aviation Administration and the jail terms and fines that have been levied by judges in many parts of the nation.

The Dept. of Housing & Urban Development notified its regional offices that the fired controllers were not eligible for an HUD program designed to avoid foreclosure when a home buyer has missed mortgage payments because of unemployment or other temporary circumstances beyond control.

"If the mortgagor's default was caused by loss of employment related to the PATCO action, the application should be rejected," the HUD memo said.

MSGR. GEORGE G. Higgins is the trustee for the PATCO Family Fund and AFL-CIO Community Services Director Walter G. Davis directed his field staff to set up machinery for assistance on the basis of need in localities where air controllers live.

Some state and local central bodies had already launched community assistance programs, and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland notified them to coordinate their activities with the community services operation.

President Jesse M. Calhoon of the Marine Engineers, with which PATCO is affiliated, expressed his union's appreciation in a letter to Kirkland.

He cited "the outstanding aid and support that you, the Executive Council, and all of the departments of the AFL-CIO have rendered" to PATCO and its members. "It has been a real pleasure to watch the machinery of the AFL-CIO start up

Real Wages Drop 2.9%, Prices Shoot Up Again

THREE-STORY TALL sign calling attention to the AFL-CIO Solidarity Day demonstration is displayed outside the Machinists' headquarters in Washington. The IAM also posted a 50-foot Solidarity Day sign on an adjacent building.

Outlook Dim As Interest Rates Soar

Inflation jumped back into the double-digit column in July, sending the buying power of the average worker's paycheck tumbling.

The consumer price index rose 1.2 percent—which would amount to an annual rate of 15.2 percent if compounded. The rise was the largest month-to-month increase since the spring of 1980 and pushed the price index 10.7 percent above a year ago.

Real spendable earnings for the average worker—what was left after taxes and after inflation—dropped eight-tenths of 1 percent in July, despite a rise of four-tenths of 1 percent in the dollar amount of paychecks.

OVER THE PAST 12 months, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported real spendable earnings have declined by 2.9 percent.

The price-wage reports came on the heels of other economic findings that pointed to a continuing deterioration in the position of America's workers.

Some examples:

- The real income of American families dropped 5.5 percent last year, the steepest decline since the Census Bureau began compiling the data in 1947. (Story, Page 3.)

Kirkland Hits Weakening

Curb on Discrimination Eased for Contractors

New rules drastically weaken enforcement of anti-discrimination programs for federal contracts, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland charged.

Instead of strengthening enforcement, as the AFL-CIO had urged, the Labor Dept. is now proposing to exempt 75 percent of all companies doing business with the government from many of the requirements intended to encourage hiring of qualified women and minorities.

The AFL-CIO and 37 other civil rights, women's and labor organizations had appealed to the Reagan Administration to reconsider the "drastic changes" in contract compliance it was contemplating.

THE RULES CHANGE proposed by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs "confirms that the fears we expressed earlier this year were warranted," Kirkland said.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council, he stressed, had also warned that weakening of the anti-discrimination standards would amount to "backsliding" in 40 years of effort under both Democratic and Republican administrations to counter discrimination by government contractors.

The AFL-CIO will study the proposals, Kirkland said, and "in consultation with our colleagues in the civil rights and women's movements, we will take appropriate steps to maintain an effective federal contract compliance program."

Joyce Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, called the proposed rules "a disaster, a clear message to the enemies of equal opportunity for women and minorities that they can feel free to evade and avoid the law." Miller is also an AFL-CIO vice president and a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers.

STEELWORKERS Vice President Leon Lynch, chairman of the union's civil rights committee, attacked the plan as "an effort by the Administration to dismantle years of progress in human rights." Lynch

Two Postal Unions Ratify New Contracts for 500,000

Two unions representing half a million employees of the U.S. Postal Service have overwhelmingly ratified new three-year contracts that include an uncapped cost-of-living escalator on top of pay raises and bonuses totaling $2,100 over the contract term.

The vote by the Letter Carriers (NALC) was 124,316 to 20,316—a margin of better than 6-to-1 for ratification.

MEMBERS OF the Postal Workers (APWU) voted 149,595 for ratification to 36,595 opposed.

The two unions bargained together and members of both unions voted in a mammouth mail referendum, tallied by teams of counters and watchers in an around-the-clock operation.

The agreement, which had the endorsement of the leadership of both unions, calls for a $300 salary increase each year, plus an annual productivity bonus of $350. In addition, there is a one-time $150 bonus on ratification of the contracts. Postal salaries averaged $21,146 before the new increases.

Semi-annual cost-of-living increases, on a formula of 1 cent for each 0.4 increase in the consumer price index, will con-

Kirkland to Attend Solidarnosc Parley

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has accepted the invitation of Solidarnosc President Lech Walesa to attend the first National Congress of Poland's trade union federation.

Kirkland and Martin J. Ward, president of the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters and chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee on International Affairs, will represent the AFL-CIO at the Gdansk convention. The Solidarnosc movement rose from the 1980 shipyard strike in Gdansk that Walesa led.

Kirkland and Ward will be in Poland Sept. 26-29, during the second part of the Solidarnosc meeting. They will be accompanied by AFL-CIO European Rep. Irving Brown.

The AFL-CIO over the past year has raised more than $250,000 through its Polish Workers Aid Fund and provided office and printing equipment requested by Solidarnosc.

TELLERS COUNT ballots mailed in by Letter Carriers on the ratification of a new three-year agreement with the U.S. Postal Service. In an adjoining room, ballots from members of the Postal Workers were being tallied. Members of both unions overwhelmingly ratified the contract that provides pay raises, bonuses and an uncapped cost-of-living escalator.

Postal Unions Approve Pact For 500,000

tinue without a cap, which postal management had sought to impose. The previous three-year contract had brought union-represented workers $3,619 in cost-of-living adjustments.

THE POSTAL negotiations got off to a stormy start last spring, when Postmaster Gen. William F. Bolger sought unsuccessfully to get the National Labor Relations Board to hold a new representation vote before the start of bargaining.

After the NLRB rebuffed postal management, the parties faced each other across the bargaining table but progress was minimal until the July 20 contract expiration deadline neared.

The unions accused postal management of trying to provoke a strike and the postmaster general sent every employee a paycheck message that any striker would be fired.

But with federal mediators on the scene as the deadline neared, the parties moved together sufficiently to "stop the clock" to allow continued negotiations. Sixteen hours later, an agreement was reached, subject to ratification.

TWO OTHER unions that bargain nationally for smaller groups of postal employees, negotiated separately with the U.S. Postal Service.

The unaffiliated Rural Letter Carriers has sent a tentative agreement to its state units for ratification. The Mail Handlers division of the Laborers chose to invoke the fact-finding procedure of the Postal Reorganization Act for resolving a bargaining impasse.

A three-member panel was convened with a member named by the union and a member named by management, who together chose a third member—Arvid Anderson, head of the New York City Office of Collective Bargaining.

If the fact-finding procedure does not lead to a settlement, the law provides that a separate arbitration board be named to render a binding decision.

The collective bargaining provisions for the U.S. Postal Service, which is a semi-autonomous government operation, stem from a reorganization law that was enacted in 1970 after long delays in getting pay raise legislation through Congress erupted into postal walkouts in major cities that reduced mail service to a trickle.

Top level negotiations, in which both the AFL-CIO and Cabinet heads in the Nixon Administration were directly involved, brought agreement on collective bargaining for the postal service.

Cutbacks in Social Security Protection Protested as Not Needed, Not Justified

New York—Cutbacks in social security protections being urged by the Reagan Administration are neither justified nor necessary for the system's financial health, former Social Security Commissioner Robert M. Ball testified.

Ball spoke for the 90 organizations in the labor-endorsed Save Our Security coalition at hearings held here by Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.) to spotlight issues in the social security battle being waged in Congress.

When the Senate returns after Labor Day, one of its early showdowns will be a decision on whether to restore the minimum social security benefit that Congress liminated in its budget reconciliation bill.

The house had some quick second thoughts on the issue, voting overwhelmingly to restore the $122-a-month minimum benefit. But the Senate put off action until after the recess.

Ball noted that the massive cuts that the Administration proposed last spring were "so horrendous" that Congress isn't about to enact them all. They would add up to an overall 25 percent cutback in social security protection, including more than a 40 percent reduction in benefits for persons choosing retirement at age 62.

"Perhaps the greatest danger to social security in the proposals," Ball suggested, "is that recommending such drastic cuts may accustom the American people and their representatives in Congress to the idea of accepting additional cuts in social security protection, even though short of what the Administration recommends."

BALL PRESENTED a detailed refutation of the scare talk of approaching "social security bankruptcy, and outlined relatively simple proposals involving reallocation of contribution rates among the various social security funds and standby authority for borrowing from the general treasury.

He questioned whether Congress should accept projections of economic conditions, demographics and workforce size in the next century as a firm basis for revamping the system.

"It is difficult to escape the conclusion that the Administration, in proposing these cuts, has more in mind than social security," Ball said. "Slashing social security benefits would make a major contribution to the Administration's goal of balancing the general budget," he noted, and to the objective "of reducing the size and scope of federal programs."

As to the minimum benefit, Ball termed its continuation by Congress "a matter of major principle."

He noted that the persons now receiving the $122-a-month payment "have met all the requirements in present law. They have submitted their proofs; their claims have been adjudicated; they have received a notice bearing the signature of a high official of the United States government, the Commissioner of Social Security, telling them what they are entitled to."

It would be "a clear breach of faith," he charged, for the government "to change the rules retroactively."

Quarterly Drop in Output Greater Than First Estimate

The nation's economy was weaker than previously thought in the second quarter, declining at an annual rate of 2.4 percent —a dramatic turn downward from the way the year started.

In a preliminary estimate last month, the Commerce Dept. had pegged the second-quarter decline in "real" gross national product at a 1.9 percent annual rate. That followed a sharp gain of 8.6 percent in the first three months of 1981. Real GNP is the value of the nation's total output of goods and services after squeezing out inflation.

THE GOVERNMENT reported that GNP reached $2.9 trillion—$2,881.6 billion—during the April-June period at a seasonally adjusted annual rate. Before adjusting for inflation, GNP was up 4.1 percent at an annual rate.

Senior Commerce Dept. Economist Theodore Torda said that "it's too early to say whether we'll have a plus or minus GNP" in the current July through September quarter. "I think it will be very close," he said.

The Commerce Dept. said that the major weakness in the economy was in final sales, which dropped 5.1 percent in the April-June quarter after rising 6.9 percent in the first quarter.

Unsold autos and the construction slump were major factors in the economic downturn. Automakers overproduced in the second quarter, and dealers now have a three-month supply on hand. The second quarter did see the automakers post their first profits in almost two years, but "it's somewhat of an artificial number," Torda said, because among the cars Detroit counted as sold were those sold to dealers.

The revised figures also showed that prices, as measured by a broad GNP-based gauge which economists consider the most reliable measure of inflation, rose at a 6.6 percent annual rate in the second quarter. The figure is a marked slowdown from the 9.8 percent pace of the first period.

Veterans Alerted on Cutoff Of Educational Benefits

Time is running out for eligible veterans to use educational benefits of the GI Bill, the Veterans Administration reports.

Under the law, a veteran is entitled to such benefits within 10 years after his discharge from the military service, or by Dec. 31, 1989, whichever is earlier. This year the eligibility of 900,000 of the 4.3 million vets now entitled to benefits will run out.

Anti-Discrimination Rule Weakened

termed Administration claims that the weakened regulations only eliminate paperwork a "cosmetic cover-up" for the signal to employers that it is all right to resume discriminatory practices.

The proposed new rules have not won universal favor within the government. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has disagreed publicly with OFCCP over major issues including the sharply increased threshold for compliance and asked for further study before the final rule takes effect.

An earlier set of rule changes, drafted by the Carter Administration, would have tightened many affirmative action obligations for companies doing business with the federal government and expanded the role of unions in compliance programs.

THOSE REGULATIONS were to have taken effect Jan. 29, but were "frozen" for review by the Reagan Administration. The new rules, issued Aug. 25, sharply scale back affirmative action planning, reporting, documentation and other compliance standards.

Smaller contractors are primarily exempted, but the relaxation of anti-discrimination programs will also apply to many larger employers.

The new rules are open for public comment for 60 days with final action a month after that.

Among the changes proposed is a rule that will raise the threshold on who is required to file a written, detailed affirmative action plan. Currently, the rule applies to all contractors with at least 50 employees and having $50,000 in annual federal contracts. Under the Reagan Administration proposals, only employers with at least 250 employees and $1 million worth of contracts will be required to file.

Pre-award reviews of a contractor's hiring patterns will be discontinued completely.

Other changes include:

- Permitting larger employers to file "abbreviated" affirmative action plans.
- Requiring only one plan to be filed covering companies under "the same chain of command."
- Exempting construction firms from filing affirmative action plans covering non-construction employees.
- Narrowing the requirements for the appropriate number of women and minorities who should be employed by federal contractors in different parts of the country.
- Eliminating many requirements for recordkeeping and documentation, and lengthening the compliance review period.

In addition, the new OFCCP plan drops the Carter Administration's proposal that would have required notice to bargaining agents that the employer was to undergo a compliance review and expanded union participation in the review process where conditions covered under bargaining agreements were involved.

THE NEW RULES only permit unions to "present their views" to OFCCP's director "prior to any resolution between OFCCP and the contractor" on compliance efforts that would effect collective bargaining agreements.

Regulations which would have improved access by women and minorities to training and recruitment programs are also scaled back sharply.

Pushed Into Poverty

Index of Family Income Takes a Record Plunge

A combination of sharp consumer price increases and the 1980 economic downturn depressed the real income of American families 5.5 percent last year—the largest drop since 1947 when the government began compiling the records, the Census Bureau reported.

As a result of the plunge in real income, another 3.2 million persons were driven below the poverty line last year, bringing the total to 29.3 million, according to the bureau. Over the year, the proportion of the population below the poverty level rose from 11.7 percent to 13 percent.

While the median family income increased 7.3 percent, to $21,020, the 13.7 percent jump in the consumer price index between 1979 and 1980 resulted in a net decline of 5.5 percent in terms of buying power.

INFLATION ALSO raised the annual income used by the government for the poverty level to $8,414 from $7,412 in 1979 for a family of four.

The bureau's report is based on a nationwide survey of 68,500 families in March 1981. The sharp drop in real median family income was the first statistically significant annual decline since 1974-75 period and the largest since the post World War II period.

The report also noted that the increase of 3.2 million below the poverty level was one of the largest increases since 1959, the earliest year for which poverty statistics have been kept. The last largest increase came in 1974-75 when the combined impact of inflation and unemployment added 2.5 million people to the poverty rolls.

THE DECLINE in real family income was spread widely across geographic, racial and ethnic lines. However, farm families were hardest-hit with their incomes dropping 14.8 percent to $15,760, compared with a decline of 5.3 percent to $21,150 for urban families.

While the rates of decline were about the same for all families last year, whites remained in the higher income brackets—$21,900, compared with $12,670 for blacks and $14,720 for Hispanics.

The bureau reported that families living on fixed incomes, largely retirees, showed no significant change from 1979 largely because of inflation indexing of social security and other benefits.

THE REPORT also noted that the increase in poverty affected most segments of the population:

- In 1980, there were 19.7 million whites, 8.6 million blacks and 3.5 million Hispanics below the poverty level—an increase in each category from 1979.
- The number of poor children under 18 rose from 10.2 million in 1979 to 11.4 million in 1980, and the proportion of children below the poverty line increased from 16.2 percent to 18.1 percent.
- Of the four major geographic sectors of the country, only the Northeast did not experience a significant increase in the number of poor people last year.
- The incidence of poverty rose among families headed by a woman with no husband present as well as by married-couple families.

Median income means that half of the nation's families had an actual income over $21,020, and the other half below that level.

Steel Union Elects 12 Directors in District Contests

Pittsburgh—Winners of 12 of 13 elections for district directors of the Steelworkers have been announced by the union's tellers. The 13th contest will be rerun.

The union's national officers, headed by President Lloyd McBride, as well as directors of 11 other districts, were unopposed and were declared elected when the nominations deadline closed last May.

WINNERS IN the contested races are Mitchel F. Mazuca, District 4; Dave Patterson, District 6; James N. McGeehan, District 7; David Wilson, District 8; Paul E. Lewis, District 15; James M. Coyne, District 19; Walter Bachowski, District 20; Harry E. Mayfield, District 27; Harry E. Lester, District 29; Jack Parton, District 31; Obert J. Vattendahl, District 32; and Eldon D. Kirsch, District 33.

In the election in District 30, Edward O. Zeuch outpolled Donald G. Kerns by 216 votes, but both candidates filed protests. The district covers all of Indiana except the four northwest counties as well as parts of northern Kentucky and southwestern Ohio.

The union's five elected tellers, who oversee the election and hold hearings on protests, found evidence of technical misuse of union facilities by both sides and called for a new election between the same candidates.

The 30 officers, who make up the steelworkers' executive board, will be installed in ceremonies on Sept. 1 at the union's Linden Hall education facility in Dawson, Pa.

REAL MONUMENTS to past leaders of the Seafarers can be found in the better lives of today's union members, SIU President Frank Drozak declared at the dedication of new facilities at the union's training center in Piney Point, Md. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, shown here, and New York Gov. Hugh Carey, were among the speakers.

Seafarers Honor Leaders In Dedicating New Facilities

Piney Point, Md.—Paul Hall, George Meany and A. Philip Randolph left an indelible stamp on the modern American labor movement as educators, agitators and organizers, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said at a Seafarers dedication ceremony here.

Kirkland and a host of notables including the governor of New York and the commandant of the Coast Guard took part in the formal opening of new facilities at the Harry Lundeberg School of Seamanship, the SIU's unique training facility on the Chesapeake Bay.

THE BUILDINGS and facilities, including the new Paul Hall Library, were named in honor of SIU leaders of the recent past.

Hall, who headed the Seafarers for 23 years, served on the AFL-CIO Executive Council with Meany and Randolph, and Kirkland spoke of the similarities and differences of the three men who died within a 13-month span in 1979-80.

When Hall was born in Alabama in 1915, Randolph, at the age of 26, was already championing the cause of black workers in New York's Harlem, an intellectual and magazine editor who was to build a small union of sleeping car porters into the base for a civil rights revolution. And Meany, just becoming a journeyman plumber in the Bronx, was still seven years away from his first local union office.

"IT WAS A long way from Harlem and the Bronx to rural Alabama," Kirkland noted, and the three men were "as different in manner and personality as they were in origin."

But "together they were unbeatable," Kirkland said of the era when they served together on the AFL-CIO Executive Council. "No one could teach better than George Meany," he said. "Phil Randolph agitated without rest for 60 years" and "no one ever out-organized Paul Hall."

In addition to the Paul Hall Library and Maritime Museum, the SIU dedicated an administration building named after Al Kerr, the union's secretary-treasurer until he died at age 52 in 1972, and vocational buildings named after Paul Drozak, an SIU vice president who died of cancer at age 50 in 1977, and Charles Logan, labor educator and NLRB regional director who founded a boys' home in New Orleans where several SIU leaders were educated.

SIU PRESIDENT Frank Drozak, who succeeded Hall and is the brother of Paul Drozak, told the hundreds of invited guests that the "real monuments" to the past leaders being honored can be found in "the many thousands of seafarers and boatmen whose lives are richer and whose families are more secure" because of their contributions.

He spoke of the SIU's commitment to education and training of its members. And from the vantage of one who "grew up in the Depression and had to go to sea when I was 16," he stressed the value of education and the importance of the Piney Point school.

New York Gov. Hugh Carey came to the Maryland SIU dedication to voice his admiration for Paul Hall, whom he described as "fierce" in his opposition to injustice, racism and poverty. America is better because of Hall and his generation of SIU leaders, Carey said.

Admiral Robert Scarborough, the Coast Guard commandant, and Andrew Gibson, former head of the Maritime Administration and now head of Delta Steamship Lines and the National Maritime Council, also spoke at the dedication ceremonies.

Scarborough read messages from both President Reagan and Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis voicing support for a strong U.S. merchant fleet. Gibson expressed the belief that after years of decline, a new era of merchant fleet growth is starting.

New Reports Dim Outlook for Economy

- The drop in the GNP, the nation's output of goods and services, during the second quarter of this year was greater than the Commerce Dept. had originally estimated. (Story, Page 2.)
- Income from dividends, interest and rent rose faster than wages and salaries over a five-year period. (Story, Page 7.)

Housing, food, transportation, medical costs and utility bills were the chief ingredients in the July price rise.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald termed the sharp increase further evidence that "tight money and high interest rates aggravate inflation rather than cure it."

HIGH INTEREST rates "continue to drive up the cost of home ownership as well as auto finance charges," Oswald stressed.

The cost of buying a home climbed at a double-digit annual rate for the third consecutive month, going up 1.6 percent in July after rises of 1.1 percent in June and 1.3 percent in May.

Food costs, which had held relatively steady earlier in the year, moved up eight-tenths of 1 percent in July on a seasonally adjusted basis. There were substantial increases in beef, pork, poultry and fresh produce.

Medical care costs advanced 1.3 percent for the month, paced by a 1.7 percent increase in fees charged by doctors and dentists. While the price of gasoline declined, the cost of public transportation and used cars more than offset the drop. The public transportation component shot up 14.7 percent.

Despite the sharp July rise, the Administration said it is continuing to stick to its prediction that the price rise for the year will be a shade under 10 percent.

Deputy Press Sec. Larry Speakes told reporters that the Reagan economic program should "begin taking effect in the next several months."

IN THE PRIVATE sector, the spendable average weekly earnings of a married worker with three dependents was $221.43 in July, measured in current dollars. That's $1.35 more than the previous month and $15.57 more than July of 1980.

But in "constant dollars," keyed to the 1977 buying power, the same worker's real spendable earnings last month came to $146.35, down from $147.21 in June and $150.70 in constant buying power a year ago.

British Jobless Rate Hits Depression Era Level

Britain's unemployment rate rose to 12.2 percent, the highest since the height of the Great Depression of the 1930s.

The increase from 11.8 percent marked the 15th consecutive month of mounting unemployment. Joblessness has more than doubled since the Conservative Party government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher came to power in 1979.

The Thatcher government has advocated the same economic doctrines that the Reagan Administration has espoused in the United States.

The 1970 Solution

MORE THAN 11 YEARS ago, in March of 1970, the pent-up frustrations of postal workers around the country had erupted into a strike that then, as now, was illegal.

President Nixon brought in the military to try to move the mail, as President Reagan was to bring in military air controllers to replace striking civilians.

George Meany, then the president of the AFL-CIO, issued a statement that carries the same tone as the resolution that the AFL-CIO Executive Council adopted during the first days of the PATCO strike.

IN GEORGE MEANY'S words of Mar. 23, 1970:

"The AFL-CIO deplores the use of military personnel to perform the work of civilian employees of the post office in New York or any other city.

"This action will not restore mail services nor contribute to an early resolution of the problems and circumstances which caused the stoppage of those services. It raises a specter of the misuse of military power that is foreign to this nation's traditions and principles.

"The postal workers have genuine, deep-seated problems and grievances that merit the sympathetic concern of all Americans.

"THEY HAVE petitioned their government for the redress of those grievances, so far in vain. They are loyal, patriotic citizens who have devoted their lives to the service of the public. Their reward, so far, has been neglect by their government and public indifference. They have been made the victims of partisan political maneuvering, false economy and budgetary sleight-of-hand.

"The best and surest way to bring about the restoration of full, efficient postal service, which we all desire, is not punitive sanctions, but prompt action to meet the basic needs of those workers and to resolve their genuine grievances on the basis of simple, obvious justice.

"Partisan politics and empty posturing for the sake of public image should be set aside. . . ."

THE POSTAL workers were not fired. They returned to work and high-level negotiations led to an agreement which was ratified by Congress.

The most recent contract with the U.S. Postal Service, covering half a million workers, is the direct result of the decision by a different Republican Administration to seek a resolution of a dispute rather than retribution.

As the AFL-CIO Executive Council said 11 years later of the current dispute, punishment and retribution are no substitute "for joint and constructive efforts to work out a settlement that will be fair to the controllers, the government and the flying public."

Monetarists vs. Supply-Siders

Conflicting Economic Policies Lead to Worst Choice Result

By Gus Tyler

WHETHER HE KNOWS it or not, President Reagan is pursuing two separate and contradictory policies to "get the economy moving." By opting for both at once, he must end up with the worst of choices.

On the one hand, he goes along with the monetarist policies of the Federal Reserve Board that believes the way to battle inflation is to restrain economic growth. At the same time, Reagan goes along with the "supply-side" policies of some of his advisers who believe that the way to battle inflation is to stimulate economic growth.

If inflation is caused by too much money chasing too few goods, the monetarists say, "cut demand," while the supply-siders say, "increase supply."

Although these are obviously contradictory ways to go, it is possible in a curious way to ride both horses at the same time. This is done—as it is by Reagan—by increasing the specific immediate measures proposed by both sides in furtherance of their policies. To wit:

THE MONETARISTS seek to accomplish their ultimate goals by raising interest rates. High rates, they say, will discourage both consumers and producers from borrowing. That will cut demand, "cool" the economy, and thereby hold down inflation rates.

That policy has been in operation since 1969. Now, 12 years later, the rate of inflation is triple what it was when we entered the '70s. High rates have proven to be inflationary and recessionary as well.

But, no matter. The Administration rides that horse.

THE SUPPLY-SIDERS have their own strategy: to write tax laws that will put a greater share of the nation's income in the hands of the investing class. The theory is that making the rich richer will provide the funds for investment in a greater "supply," in making more goods and more work.

The policy is really not quite as new or original as its proponents claim. Corporations that used to carry 25 percent of the tax load in 1955 now only carry 11 percent. The investing class is loaded. But instead of putting its money into expanding facilities that now run at only 60 or 70 percent of capacity, it is pouring its funds into mergers, into gambling with commodities, into land speculation, into cornering the silver market, etc. Speculation—not production—is the name of the game.

There is no evidence that making the rich richer makes for more jobs, especially since the rest of the country has less with which to buy what the producers are supposed to produce. But there is no doubt that the Washington Post is right when it wrote: "Democrats and Republicans may argue about which party wins . . . but there can be no argument about the real winners: the well-to-do in America."

The "supply-side" tax bill is, of course, the other horse that Reagan rides.

NOW, IF YOU put both policies together, where do we end up?

The monetarist strategy gives us a tight economy in which jobs and income are scarcer and prices are higher. That's bad;

The supply-side strategy redistributes the limited income from the bottom and the middle to the top. That's worse.

The end result is a nation divided, with a few living very well at the expense of the many living poorly. That's the worst.

Labor's Struggle for Justice and Dignity

There are those in our society who would like to turn back the clock on our progress toward justice and human dignity, and they are enjoying a moment of power. They believe they can use that power to dismantle the social programs that have cushioned all Americans against economic disadvantage.

For the labor movement, and for all the American people, there can be no turning back. We have struggled too long to achieve a degree of equality and justice to let those gains be taken away.

On Sept. 19, Solidarity Day, we will demonstrate that we stand united in our dedication to a fair and humane social and economic policy.

—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue in a message to the convention of the Allied Industrial Workers convention, Aug. 26, 1981, Dearborn, Mich.

Revival of Faulty Bracero Scheme

Reagan's 'Guest' Worker Plan Ignores Plight of U.S. Jobless

The following is from an article by former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall in the current issue of the American Federationist magazine.

DESPITE ITS OWN FORECAST of the longest sustained period of high unemployment since the 1930s, the Reagan Administration has sent Congress an overhaul of the nation's immigration law which includes a "guest" worker program. The program, opposed by the AFL-CIO and most Hispanic organizations as a throwback to the failed "bracero" program of 1942-1964, would permit 50,000 Mexican nationals into the United States as temporary workers.

The ostensible purposes of a guest worker program would be to meet the U.S. demand for labor that will be content with low wages and hard work, help stem the flow of illegal immigrants and at the same time provide a continuing "safety-valve" for the exploding population of Mexico and other countries, especially those located in the Caribbean basin.

A guest worker program has natural appeal to some employers and politicians, but experiences in the United States and other countries leave considerable skepticism about the wisdom of either launching another such effort or enlarging our present small and controversial temporary worker programs.

Because workers are not commodities, it is very difficult to have a temporary flow that can be turned on and off or reversed to suit national economic needs.

THE MAIN American experience with an extensive temporary worker program was between 1942 and 1964 when the United States entered into the so-called "bracero" agreement with Mexico to import males without their families to work mainly in agriculture. At its peak in 1956, more than 445,000 braceros worked in the United States.

Braceros were deported if they displeased employers, and invited back as "specials" if they did not; this program also depressed American employment and working conditions, led to charge of bribery and corruption by those who controlled access to the program in Mexico, and strained relations between the United States and Mexico over both the treatment of braceros and the terms of the agreement establishing this program.

The bracero program did not halt illegal immigration. On the contrary, many former braceros became undocumented workers.

ADVOCATES OF a new and enlarged foreign worker program contend that such a system is an essential component of any effort to control illegal immigration, both as a way to meet the labor needs of employers who rely on the undocumented workers and to continue the "safety-valve" for Mexico and other labor-exporting countries.

Since it's absurd to say more help is needed at a time when more than 8 million Americans are out of work, proponents usually fall back on the argument that U.S. nationals "won't do certain types of work."

The employment of aliens does not prove that domestic workers will not do certain kinds of work. Aliens may be preferred by employers because they are willing to work "hard and scared" at low wages and under adverse conditions. Despite this competition from aliens, it is hard to find an occupation that Americans will not take; legal residents dominate the work forces of every industry and occupation in the United States, proving that Americans are willing to take "alien jobs."

WORKERS WITH American standards and aspirations may be less satisfied with many menial low-wage jobs than their Third World competitors, who will, at least for a time, compare these jobs favorably with those available in their homelands. But this is a temporary satisfaction because the longer they stay here the more likely foreign workers are to adopt American standards. American employers will have little motive to improve these jobs if they have a ready supply of foreign workers.

The proponents of a large-scale guest worker program are correct in arguing that the flow of people into the United States should be legalized, but this should not be done by creating an easily exploited underclass that would raise serious human rights issues and threaten the conditions of American workers.

High priority should be given to legalizing the flow of undocumented immigrants into the United States, and any program to control illegal immigration should contain provisions to grant permanent amnesty or resident alien status, to people who have worked in the United States for some time and who have not committed serious crimes.

AMNESTY IS justified by the fact that we have, in effect, sanctioned the flow of illegal immigrants into the United States by refusing to adopt an effective immigration control over its borders than any major industrial country. At any given time, for example, the INS has no more than 450 border patrol guarding 6,000 miles of border and shoreline. Those 450 border patrol guards on each shift have to be responsible for about 13 miles of border each. To put it in another perspective, there are more guards on the National Capitol and public buildings in Washington, and the INS budget is smaller than that of the police departments of most large American cities.

The Border Patrol needs to be strengthened, but employer sanctions, a fair, effective and uniform work authorization system and the other recommendations of the Select Commission on Immigration and Refugee Policy also are needed to reduce illegal immigration.

The Squeeze Tightens

Tight Money Policy, Tax Cuts To Keep Interest Rates Sky-High

THE COMBINATION of the Federal Reserve Board's tight money policy and the Reagan Administration's big tax cuts that give away future government revenues will hold interest rates in the 20 percent range for the near future, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald warned.

Noting that the prime rate is holding at an unprecedented 10 points above the rate of inflation, Oswald saw little hope that it will return to "the normal 2 to 3 percent real rate of return" in the next three years.

He said the "very high budget deficits that are projected to result from the tax cuts will be a major factor in holding interest rates at economy-stifling levels.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Oswald pointed out that the recently enacted business tax cuts will cause a "tremendous shift" of the total tax burden away from business and industry and onto individual taxpayers. He said that the corporate share will be cut by one-half by 1985, with no assurance that those savings will be spent or invested in the United States.

"CONGRESS MAY have unwittingly encouraged the export of more American jobs," Oswald said. He said that Congress should take another look at that risk and "limit those tax benefits to domestic investments," which "theoretically was promised" when the measure was under consideration.

Oswald warned that many corporations may choose to use the tax windfalls to finance mergers, such as the recent link-up of DuPont and Conoco, that produce "big increases of profits and capital gains for the stockholders," but do little or nothing to "help struggling companies expand and create jobs."

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

MOST OF THE NATION'S civilian air traffic controllers—nearly 13,000 highly trained and experienced professionals—have been fired from their jobs and told that they never will be rehired. Many of them face criminal prosecution, fines and jail terms.

Their crime? Going on strike.

Their employer? The federal government. And there's the rub.

Hours after the walkout began on Aug. 3, President Reagan went before TV cameras and ordered the controllers to return to work within 48 hours or else. The strikers were "in violation of the law," he stressed.

Reagan said the controllers had broken the no-strike pledge they signed when they were first hired. Saying that he respected "the right of workers in the private sector to strike," he added that "we cannot compare labor-management relations in the private sector with the government."

Reagan and Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis have continually played on the theme of legality to justify their harsh measures against the controllers and their union, the Air Traffic Controllers (PATCO).

As Teachers President Albert Shanker noted: "It's strange that the United States, which got rid of King George III over 200 years ago, is about the only democracy still saddled with this notion from the old monarchial days that any public 'servant' who strikes is really engaged in a rebellion against the sovereign and therefore must be severely punished."

IS IT FAIR, one may ask, that a strike by airline pilots, which could shut down all air traffic, is legal while a strike by traffic controllers, which has disrupted but not halted air traffic, is illegal? Should the deciding factor be that the pilots work for private airlines while the controllers work for the Federal Aviation Administration?

It wasn't until 1962, in an Executive Order signed by President John F. Kennedy at the urging of Labor Sec. Arthur J. Goldberg, that federal workers won protection of their right to organize and engage in collective bargaining. This right was codified in the 1978 Civil Service Reform Act.

Yet federal workers still face dismissal and legal penalties if they withhold their labor, regardless of the circumstances or the provocation. Only eight states allow any kind of job action by public employees.

The controllers, after more than a decade of dealing with an unresponsive management over issues vital to their job performance and air safety, felt they had no other recourse than to strike.

While the Administration has portrayed the strike as a dispute over pay, PATCO members emphasize that what they wanted most was better conditions in their highly stressful occupation.

THIS INCLUDES a shorter workweek, earlier retirement, a say in the equipment they use, and better training for new controllers. Most foreign air controllers have won such demands, often by strikes and other job actions.

PATCO members often compare themselves to the workers of Poland who struck "illegally" against the government. They wonder how a President and others who have praised the Polish workers can be so adamant in denying American workers the right to strike.

The no-strike clause in government contracts often is compared to the old "yellow dog" contracts, widespread in the 1920s, under which workers promised their private employers not to join a union. Members of PATCO have made comparisons with the civil disobedience movement against segregation laws in the South in the 1950s and '60s. They also draw parallels with the "illegal" sit-down strikes by auto workers in the 1930s.

TIGHT MONEY policy and tax cuts that give away future government receipts will hold interest rates in the 20 percent range for the near future, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Lloyd Schwartz, left, of the Fairchild Publications and Merrill Brown of the Washington Post. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

CENTENNIAL CONVENTION of the Boilermakers is opened by President Harold J. Buoy. The 1,000 delegates met in Chicago, where a group of railroad shop workers created the union 100 years ago.

Looking to the Future

Boilermakers Open Centennial Convention

Chicago—The Boilermakers launched their second century as a trade union in the city where the union was founded 100 years ago.

A commemorative film traced the highlights of the union's past, but President Harold J. Buoy stressed the present and future in his keynote address to the centennial year convention.

LABOR MUST resist a growing "conservative and anti-union" attitude in the nation, Buoy urged. He prescribed more effective communication as necessary to keep the trade union movement strong.

"We must communicate with ourselves, with employers, with Congress and with our fellow trade unionists," he urged, to turn back attempts "to lower prevailing wage rates, repeal OSHA, repress picketing rights and court foreign competition."

Buoy called for "organizing the unorganized" as the counter to non-union contractors and corporations. "Organizing is the key to the preservation of the labor movement for many years to come."

Sec.-Treas. Charles F. Moran's address to the delegates hit hard at the Administration's "trickle-down" economics.

HIGH INTEREST rates make it harder for working people to buy homes and cars, he said. "The rich are being given a host of incentives to invest and to fatten already-large corporate coffers."

The union's commemorative film, "A Century of Service," was shown for the first time at the convention. It pictured the railroad shop boilermakers who were the mainstay of the union in its early years and the evolution to cover a variety of trades including blacksmiths and iron shipbuilders. Today's union represents nearly 150,000 workers in manufacturing, shipbuilding, construction, railroads and forging.

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan brought a defense of the Administration's program and approach to the convention. He said the recently enacted tax cuts "will provide the needed incentive to work harder and smarter, and to save."

Donovan told the delegates the Administration has had to "fight hard to hold the line" against groups seeking outright repeal of the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law. The Labor Dept.'s regulatory review, he insisted, was aimed at revising only regulations "that are useless, counter-productive, confusing or punitive."

NLRB Modifies Its Policy On Union Solicitation Rights

The National Labor Relations Board struck down a 1974 board decision on union solicitation and distribution of literature during "working hours," and held that employer rules that prohibit them—without further clarification—are presumptively invalid.

The decision by Chairman John Fanning and Members Howard Jenkins, Jr., and Don A. Zimmerman overturned the board's 1974 decision in Essex International, Inc., that such prohibitions during "worktime" or "working time" are presumptively valid.

THE MAJORITY VIEW in the Essex case held that a bar against solicitation and distribution of literature during "working time" connotes only the period of time that is spent in the performance of actual job duties and does not include meal periods or breaks—times in which employees are free to engage in solicitation or distribution.

The current case involved a rule promulgated by TRW, Inc. at its Flowery Branch, Ga., facility. The employer maintained that it met the test in Essex by making clear to employees, through distribution of an employee manual seven months before issuance of the rule, that its March 1979 "working hours" prohibition did not preclude them from solicitation and distribution when not actually engaged in work. This policy, the employer continued, was reiterated in October 1979 in a posted notice to employees.

THE BOARD AGREED with the conclusion of the administrative law judge who originally heard the case that the rule violated the Taft-Hartley Act—but not on the ground taken by the judge that TRW failed to rebut the presumptive invalidity of the rule.

Instead, the board flatly rejected the principle enunciated in Essex that prohibitions against solicitation and distribution during "working time" are presumptively valid. It said it could see "no inherent meaningful distinction" between the terms "working hours" and "working time" when used in no-solicitation rules.

Clay Chosen for Sheet Metal Post

Honolulu—Cecil Clay of Charleston, S.C., has been elected secretary-treasurer of the Sheet Metal Workers by the union's executive council meeting here.

Clay, a vice president of the union since 1972, succeeds David S. Turner who is retiring after having served as secretary-treasurer for 22 years.

Prior to his election as a vice president, Clay had been business agent of Local 399 in Charleston, a post he held since 1959.

He also served as president of both the South Carolina and the Greater Charleston Building Trades Councils. Clay is an officer of the AFL-CIO central body in Charleston and of the South Carolina AFL-CIO. He is also a director of the Southern States Apprenticeship Conference.

IUE Suit Charges Sex Bias In Benefits for Male Workers

St. Louis—Charges of sex discrimination against its male employees have been leveled at Emerson Electric Co. by the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

In a joint suit filed in federal district court here, the union and the agency said the company is violating equal pay laws because its health care plans provide wider coverage to husbands of female employees than to wives of male workers.

THE IUE AND its Local 1102 have charged that Emerson's three health plans each cover hospital and medical expenses for dependent spouses of female workers regardless of the condition being treated, but they limit coverage related to pregnancies of dependent spouses of male employees.

This is sex-related bias in compensation in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act, the IUE asserts, since male workers must cover more medical expenses out-of-pocket than female employees regardless of the size of the medical or hospital bill.

IUE President David J. Fitzmaurice in announcing the lawsuit said the union and Local 1102 have been trying to settle the issue with the electrical and electronic products maker since 1979.

"We sought to correct this situation at the collective bargaining table," Fitzmaurice emphasized, "but the company insisted that in this respect no change in maternity provisions is required by law. Accordingly we filed a charge against Emerson with the EEOC, and this lawsuit, after our attempts to resolve this matter through negotiation failed."

FITZMAURICE praised the EEOC for supporting the union's longstanding efforts to fight race and sex discrimination in the workplace.

Local 1102 President Richard C. Goewert also stressed that the union would have preferred to resolve the benefits issue at the bargaining table.

"However, when Emerson refused to change its position," he said, "we had no choice but to take legal action to protect the rights of male employees to equal employment opportunity under our collective bargaining agreement and the Civil Rights Act."

Move Towards Merger Adopted By Screen Actors

Hollywood, Calif.—Members of the Screen Actors Guild have voted strong approval of the first step of a plan to merge with the Radio & Television Artists.

By a vote of 12,893 to 788, SAG members endorsed the initial phase of the merger program that will permit joint bargaining and ratification for national contracts covering work such as commercials and prime time television programs.

AFTRA members approved the first phase at the union's convention in July.

THE PLAN creates joint SAG/AFTRA wage and working condition committees, joint negotiating committees and a joint board of directors to handle negotiations.

Both unions are expected to begin work on the second phase of the merger plan which deals with governance and structure.

SAG Executive Secretary Chester L. Migden called the vote evidence of "membership support for greater cooperation with AFTRA" and approval of "full-scale efforts to resolve the remaining problems in Phase II."

In addition to the merger issue, the SAG ballot included two constitutional changes, both approved by the members.

ONE MEASURE will change the union's bylaws to permit a merger if it is approved by 60 percent of the members voting as a substitute for the previous requirement of approval by 51 percent of the entire membership. The second amendment permits the SAG board of directors to approve certain limited or interim contracts without a full membership referendum.

September Schedule Listed By Labor Studies Center

Two institutes, Organizing Techniques and the Union Administrator & Business Agent, highlight the September schedule at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. Three AFL-CIO unions plan to use the center's facilities for their own training programs. Several programs were cancelled or postponed last month because of the PATCO strike and the September program is also subject to changes. The schedule:

Organizing Techniques, Sept. 13-18—An institute on the essentials of successful organizing campaigns: making the survey, picking in-plant committees, developing winning issues, making house calls and responding to employer attacks. National Labor Relations Board procedures will be reviewed.

Union Administrator & Business Agent, Sept. 20-25—A program for business agents and full-time officers to sharpen administrative skills. Classes deal with contract enforcement, working with executive boards, leadership development, involving members in union activities, office procedures and bookkeeping.

Unions using the campus for their own leadership training during September are: Communications Workers, Sept. 1-2, Sept. 13-Oct. 2; Railway & Airline Clerks, Sept. 15-18; Printing & Graphic Communications Union, Sept. 20-25.

Information about these or other labor studies programs is available from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone: 301/431-6400.

UAW Pushes Challenge on Trade Act Aid

The Auto Workers are seeking trade adjustment assistance payments for UAW members and other workers who lost their jobs because of imports, but were denied benefits under an "unfair and illegal" Labor Dept. policy.

In a suit filed in federal district court in Washington, the UAW is challenging the Labor Dept.'s interpretation of a provision in the 1974 Trade Act that requires a worker to have been employed by a single firm for 26 of the 52 weeks immediately preceding layoff to be eligible for trade adjustment benefits.

The Labor Dept. has interpreted this to rule out payments to workers who did not receive regular wages for 26- weeks. It has refused to count compensation from such sources as sickness and accident pay, vacation and holiday pay, disability pay and workers' compensation, military duty pay and back pay coming from a grievance or arbitration settlement.

THIS POLICY, the UAW suit asserts, is inconsistent with both the purpose and intent of the federal law. It estimates that up to 15,000 UAW members have been denied trade adjustment assistance because of the Labor Dept.'s restrictive interpretation of the law.

The UAW also accused the Labor Dept. of heavy-handed attempts to intimidate states that have given a less stringent interpretation of the earnings requirement by threatening to cut off federal funds to the states.

Eleven individual workers have joined the UAW as plaintiffs in the case. One is a worker denied TRA for nonwage payments related to medical leave because his finger was amputated after an accident; another is a women who was denied eligibility because of maternity leave.

CHECK FOR $100,000 from the Communications Workers for the AFL-CIO's special fund to aid families of striking Air Traffic Controllers is presented to Federation Lane Kirkland by CWA Sec.-Treas. Louis B. Knecht, second from right. Joining in the presentation were CWA Executive Vice Presidents John C. Carroll, M. E. Nichols and James Booe.

Public Sector Strike Upheld As First Amendment Right

A West Virginia Supreme Court decision dismissing a damage suit arising out of a public employee strike has been getting renewed attention for its sharp contrast to punitive federal court actions against striking air traffic controllers and their union.

The link has been made despite the fact that the legal issues are not analogous. West Virginia has no state law dealing with strikes by public workers and the damage suit brought by the City of Fairmont against a union representing striking nurses at a municipal hospital was based on the common law.

WHAT HAS attracted interest to the case, however, was the refusal of West Virginia's highest court to reflect the view that a peaceful strike in the public sector is a form of outlawed conduct that must be put down with all the powers of government.

"Where public employees, who have no employment contracts with their employer, engage in a work stoppage which is peaceful and directed only against the employer" with no attempt to bar entrance to the struck facility, "there is no common law right to damages on the part of the public employer," Justice Thomas Miller declared on behalf of all but one of the five Supreme Court justices.

A concurring opinion by Justice Darrell McGraw, joined by Justice Sam Harshbarger, took a still broader stand for the rights of public workers.

"A peaceful strike by public employees is legal in West Virginia," McGraw declared without equivocation.

HE REJECTED strongly the view that public employers do not have to bargain with their workers and that public employees have "somehow limited" First Amendment protections.

In fact, McGraw wrote, public employees have the same First Amendment rights as private sector workers and their right to collective bargaining was not created by federal labor legislation but stems from the Constitution itself.

"In West Virginia," he insisted, "the right to protest against the policies of government and the right to seek redress from the government without fear of reprisal are as fundamental to our law and good sense as cornbread and beans are to our diet."

Union Donations Launch Fund for Striker Families

and function like a 21-jewel watch, and we want to express a very heartfelt 'thank you.' "

AS DETERMINED controllers continued to walk the picket lines, public pressure mounted for reinstatement of the fired strikers and a return to collective bargaining.

The International Federation of Air Traffic Controllers, whose affiliates throughout the world have expressed concern at safety hazards from the loss of some 12,000 trained controllers, has sought to play a mediator role.

Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis said he and Federal Aviation Administrator Lynn Helms had no objection to talking to representatives of the international group, but reiterated that "we will not negotiate."

PATCO President Robert E. Poli welcomed the mediation effort and said the union was prepared to negotiate with Administration officials "this afternoon, tomorrow morning or at any time they are willing to sit down with us."

IN ANNOUNCING the CWA's major commitment of funds for PATCO family relief and to defend collective bargaining in the public sector, Watts said the government's firing of the controllers and the attempt to decertify PATCO as bargaining representative "sets an alarming precedent which can only be viewed as an attack on public sector unionism at all levels."

He said the CWA will work both nationally and locally "to help the air traffic controllers tell their full story."

Service Field Jobs Expected To Pace Workforce Gains

The growth of the nation's labor force will slow in the 1980s but service jobs will be the fastest growing segment of occupations, according to latest projections by the Labor Dept.

The department's Bureau of Labor Statistics projects significant gains for women and blacks, a decline of young people in the labor force and a climb in white-collar employment to more than half the workforce.

THE PROJECTIONS by BLS indicate that blue-collar employment will stabilize at about 31 percent and the sharp growth in service jobs will bring that segment to 16 percent.

Employment projections show gains over the first half of the decade from 2.4 to 2.7 million jobs, depending on differing economic assumptions. In the 1970s the average gain was 2 million jobs.

The labor force studies indicate that state and local government employment will fall behind the overall growth rate because of a drop in education jobs; that the sharp rise in service jobs will be paced by the growth in health industry employment.

MANUFACTURING jobs will grow by possibly as much as 1.6 percent in the decade with durables leading the way, resulting from defense spending and consumer demand. Non-durable manufacturing is expected to show declines in employment growth.

The BLS projections indicate that the fastest-growing industries will be computers, communications and coal mining while the slowest are expected to be petroleum refining, copper ore mining and nonferrous metal ores mining.

Depending on the projections, white-collar jobs will increase from 48.6 million currently to 60.7 million in the low-growth projections and to 64.7 million in the high-growth projection.

Service jobs are expected to rise from the present 14.4 million to a range of 18.9 to 20.1 million in 1990. In blue-collar jobs, the employment gains vary widely according to the range of economic projections.

Furniture Union Wins 4-Year Fight for Pact

Putney, Vt.—The Furniture Workers capped a four-year struggle with Staco management here by negotiating a first-time contract providing solid wage and fringe-benefit improvements.

The three-year pact gives Staco's 120 workers wage boosts totaling $1 an hour over the life of the agreement, an additional paid holiday and coverage under the union's insurance program. Also, seniority becomes the determining factor in layoffs, recalls, job transfers, and overtime.

Staco used stalling tactics and other maneuvers to try to thwart the UFWA organizing campaign but failed each time.

The company finally exhausted its legal appeals to the courts and the National Labor Relations Board, and got down to good-faith bargaining under a federal court order.

Dystrophy Association Awards Meany Fellowship

New York—The Muscular Dystrophy Association announced award of its George Meany Postdoctoral Fellowship in neuromuscular disease to Dr. Nobutaka Hirokawa of the Washington University School of Medicine in St. Louis.

The $20,500 award honoring the founding president of the AFL-CIO goes to Hirokawa for a second year. The fellowship was established in 1968 as a tribute to Meany, who served as an MDA corporate member for many years.

Rise in Investment Income Tops Increases in Paychecks

Investment income rose at a faster rate than wages and salaries over a five-year period, the Commerce Dept.'s Bureau of Economic Analysis reported.

Between 1974 and 1979, the government reported, income from dividends, interest and rent increased 74.9 percent. Earnings from employment rose only 65 percent over the same period.

THE AGENCY also traced the rate of income growth in eight geographical regions, with the Southwest, Far West and Rocky Mountain states showing the largest percentage rise and the Great Lakes, New England and the Mideast at the bottom.

In terms of per capita income, however, the more industrialized areas continued to rank above the national average. At the start of the five-year period, the Mideast stood first in per capita income, followed by the Far West and the Great Lakes region. By 1979, the Far West had moved into first place with a per capita income of $9,884. The Great Lakes area moved up to second with a $9,126 per capita income, and the Mideast dropped to third with a $9,110 average.

The Southeast, with an average income growth, remained last in per capita income, at $7,621.

$242 Million Spent On Congressional Races

Senate and House candidates spent a record $242 million on last year's congressional elections, or 23 percent more than in the 1978 contests, the Federal Election Committee reported.

Political action committees contributed $55.3 million, or about 22 percent of the total amount, to the 1980 congressional candidates, the FEC reported.

Democrats raised $129 million and spent $124 million. Republicans raised $122 million and spent $117 million, and independent or third-party candidates raised and spent $1 million.

Carter Rules Modified

OSHA Weakens Policy On Workplace Noise

The Reagan Administration has come up with a stripped down noise exposure standard that gives employers wide latitude in meeting the requirements of a "hearing conservation" program.

The hearing conservation program is a weakened version of the workplace noise regulations announced by the Carter Administration on Jan. 16 that had been scheduled to take effect in April. With the change of Administration, OSHA delayed implementation of the program, first until June 1 and then to Aug. 1, before coming out with the watered down version on Aug. 22.

The revised OSHA noise abatement policy, an AFL-CIO preliminary analysis suggests, relies on the use of ear plugs and ear muffs, rather than more effective engineering controls that unions had been calling for since the early 1970s.

Industry groups had attacked the January provisions—issued as an amendment to OSHA's 1974 noise exposure standard—as being too burdensome and expensive.

The AFL-CIO challenged the repeated delays last July in a suit still pending in a federal appeals court.

THE NEW program, which OSHA described as employing the "performance approach" in giving employers more flexibility in complying with regulations, won the strong endorsement of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The Chamber was one of several employer groups that challenged the Carter Administration's version of the hearing conservation program.

OSHA said the new program covers all workers, except those in construction and agriculture, who are exposed to noise levels of 85 decibels over an eight-hour shift on a time weighted average. It estimated that about 5.1 million workers at some 300,000 workplaces are exposed to this level of noise.

The 1974 OSHA noise standard set a limit of 90 decibels for workers during an eight-hour shift. But workers in such places as textile mills, canneries, lumber mills and printing plants are often exposed to noise levels above 90 decibels.

THE REAGAN plan in no way lowers the noise exposure limit from 90 decibels. Like the Carter program, it sets a trigger level for monitoring and audiometric testing of workers at 85 decibels.

The 5-decibel difference in the industrial noise range is far greater than the number indicates. Noise recorded at 90 decibels is considered to be almost twice as loud as that at 85 decibels. Some experts compare 90 decibels to the roar of a 20-ton truck at close range, and 85 decibels to the noise of a busy city street corner. Normal conversation level is about 65 decibels.

A study by the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health shows that 15 percent of the population risks hearing impairment at exposure to 85 decibels over a long period of time and 29 percent of the population could develop material hearing impairment at 90 decibels during a working lifetime.

WHILE EMPLOYERS will still be required to monitor noise levels regularly and provide annual hearing tests for workers, OSHA has dropped many specific requirements governing monitoring and hearing tests.

One significant change in the regulation is the relaxation of record keeping and hearing equipment requirements. In the January version of the program, for example, a "qualified physician" was required to perform audiometric tests. Under the new version, the tests can be conducted by a "trained technician."

According to the preliminary analysis by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health, the new OSHA program will sharply restrict worker rights to information and training.

Although workers will still be allowed to observe noise monitoring of workplaces, the analysis notes, "the employer is no longer obligated to explain the monitoring or to allow the worker to record the results."

THE STUDY also points out that all requirements for the posting of warning signs alerting workers of hazards in noisy areas and of the need for hearing protection in those areas have been stayed.

Another prime concern of labor safety experts is the stay of the definition of a "significant threshold shift." This means that each employer may define what constitutes significant changes in the hearing ability of his workers, the analysis noted.

OSHA said it will accept comments on the revised provisions and stayed regulations until Sept. 22. One of the questions on which it invited comment was "whether the provisions going into effect are a cost-effective alternative to the Jan. 16 rule."

Fraser Charges Destruction Of Safety Law Enforcement

The new management of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration is planning a wall-to-wall overhaul of the agency that would effectively cut federal protections for American workers, President Douglas A. Fraser of the Auto Workers charged.

Appearing on a network television program, Fraser warned that draft proposals laid out at an OSHA field managers' conference last month "that are now under consideration, would emasculate enforcement of OSHA."

FRASER ACCUSED Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter of attempting to abrogate a worker's right to calling in OSHA without the employer being alerted in an effort to correct hazardous workplace conditions.

Under previous administrations, Fraser observed, "the individual worker could lodge a complaint and there'd be an inspection. Under Mr. Auchter's proposal, you would have to go to the employer first, and the employer would have to be notified before an on-site inspection could take place."

Auchter, appearing on the same program—ABC's Good Morning, America—conceded that OSHA officials are considering a number of administrative and policy changes, but he insisted that a proposal to give employers advance notice on inspection had been ruled out.

AUCHTER CONTENDED that the changes the agency is contemplating are aimed at better protecting workers.

But Fraser, citing draft documents emanating from the July 21-23 OSHA conference in Colorado Springs, said that employers would be able to head-off inspections by providing a report that the incidence of accidents at the plant is below a magic number.

Fraser also charged that OSHA is proposing to eliminate penalties on violations providing that the employer eventually complies with federal standards.

A review of the draft documents by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health concludes that the OSHA proposals include numerous provisions of a 1980 bill authored by then Sen. Richard S. Schweiker (R-Pa.), which unions strenuously opposed. The measure never reached the Senate floor.

George H. R. Taylor, the federation's job safety director, warned in a memorandum that some directives being considered by Auchter could be more destructive to OSHA enforcement than the provisions of the Schweiker bill.

According to Taylor, among the changes under consideration that OSHA may put into effect as early as Oct. 1 are:

- No automatic inspections in response to valid worker complaints.
- Advance notice to employers on complaint inspections.
- Exemption of so-called safe manufacturing workplaces and small businesses from general schedule inspections.
- Elimination of penalties for serious and other violations for employers who abate hazards.
- Virtual elimination of repeating citations in the construction industry.
- Elimination of on-site federal monitoring of state plans.

TAYLOR SAID the proposals also call for the formation of labor-management STAR committees (Sharing the Accountability for Regulation) as a substitute for OSHA enforcement.

Fraser, commenting on OSHA's role in the STAR program, noted in the TV interview that the UAW has copies of correspondence showing General Motors Corp. is already involved in consultations with the federal safety agency.

But the problem with the program, Fraser said, is that the UAW has yet to be consulted on the OSHA-GM activities.

22,000-Strong Retail Union Votes to Join with UFCW

Chicago—The 22,000-member United Retail Workers Union, which represents supermarket and retail outlet employees in Illinois and Indiana, voted by a 3-to-1 margin to affiliate with the Food & Commercial Workers.

Balloting was conducted over a two-week period after the proposal won unanimous endorsement of the URW's leadership. It was approved by a 6,823 to 2,344 vote, and the merger will take place on Nov. 1.

UFCW PRESIDENT William H. Wynn described the United Retail Workers as a sound and progressive trade union, "and we are very proud to welcome it to the UFCW and the AFL-CIO families."

He hailed the "very positive" 74.4 percent vote for affiliation and termed the turnout of nearly 50 percent "extremely high for a mail referendum."

In stressing the need for stepped-up labor unity, Wynn said that with revolutionary changes taking place in the food industry, "we can mutually profit from each other's guidance and counsel. Together, we can do even better than we were able to do separately."

Fred Burki, executive director of the URW, said the affiliation will provide the URW the ability to deal directly with multinational corporations and aid the union in its national organizing efforts.

A majority of the 22,000 URW members is employed at Jewel food stores in Illinois and Indiana. The union also represents workers at Eisner food stores, Osco drug stores, Venture discount stores, Republic Lumber outlets and A&P food stores.

Network Broadcasts Set for Labor Day

AFL-CIO leaders will appear on the following radio and television programs over the Labor Day weekend, Sept. 6 and 7:

Vice President John H. Lyons on Mutual radio, Monday, Sept. 7, 12:15 p.m. EDT.

Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue on NBC radio, Monday, Sept. 7, 9:30 p.m. EDT.

President Lane Kirkland on CBS radio, Monday, Sept. 7, 7:45 p.m. EDT.

Kirkland also is scheduled to appear on the CBS television program "Face the Nation" Sunday, Sept. 6, at 11:30 a.m.

Local stations may alter program schedules and should be checked for exact broadcast time.

Reagan Slashes Federal Employees Pay Raise

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan slashed a scheduled 15.1 percent comparability pay raise for government workers to 4.8 percent and asked Congress to rewrite the law so that federal salaries will be held permanently below the private sector.

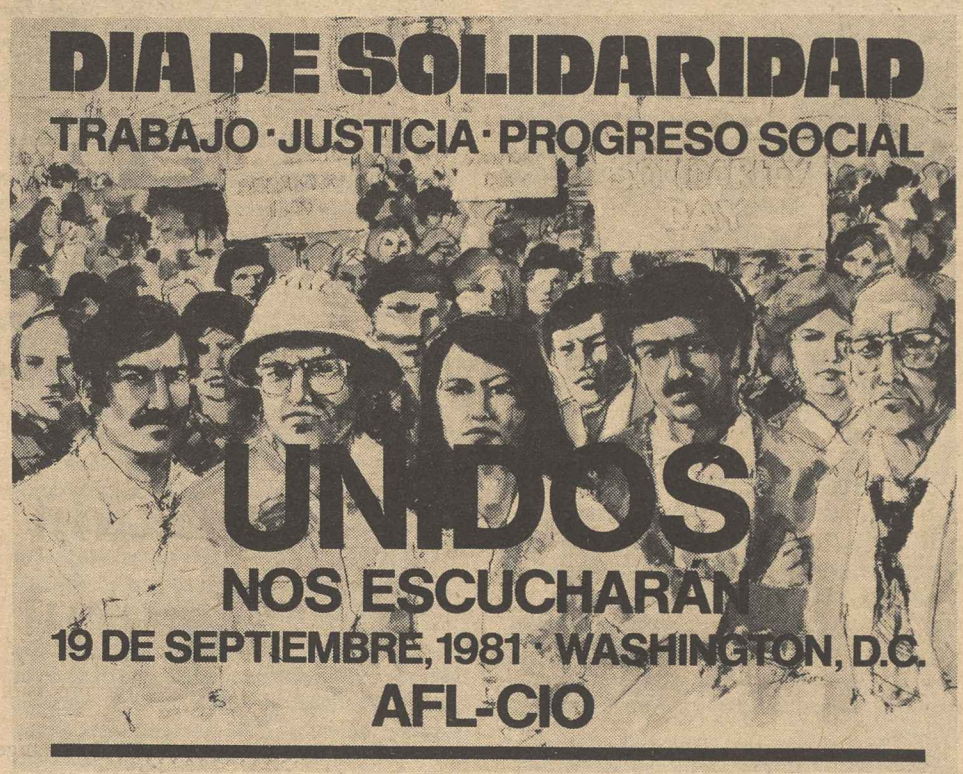
Reagan's substitute pay plan, which takes effect Oct. 1 unless Congress disapproves it, is based on the budget he drew up last winter and ignores the government's own finding that the accumulated lag in government salaries justifies a catch-up raise of over 15 percent.

Kenneth T. Blaylock, president of both the American Federation of Government Employees and AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., charged that Reagan has shown himself "totally insensitive to government workers, who suffer from inflation like everybody else."

AFL-CIO News

LABOR'S CENTENNIAL AFL-CIO 1881-1981

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, September 5, 1981 No. 36



Other Presidents have trimmed back the supposedly automatic annual salary adjustments provided by the 1970 pay comparability law, Blaylock noted, but none so drastically as Reagan has proposed.

Congress has already approved a budget reconciliation bill incorporating the 4.8 percent pay raise ceiling, virtually ruling out a resolution of disapproval that would reinstate the full comparability amount. The last time Congress rebuffed a president seeking to hold down federal pay was in the Nixon Administration.

Last year, when the government's pay comparability formula showed that a 13.5 percent catch-up raise would be needed to regain parity with private sector jobs, President Carter's original budget had projected a 6.2 percent raise. But he raised the amount to 9.1 percent, to keep federal employees from slipping farther behind, after the AFGE and the AFL-CIO argued that anything less would breach the Administration's commitment to fair treatment for federal workers.

THE 4.8 PERCENT raise for the government's 1.4 million salaried employees also will serve as the ceiling for nearly 500,000 hourly paid blue-collar workers, whose pay scales are supposed to be adjusted annually on the basis of local prevailing wages. Congress, in its budget reconciliation bill, imposed the same limit

Kirkland Protests 'Brutal Force' Used To Punish Strikers

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called on President Reagan to set aside the "brutal force" the government has used against its striking air traffic controllers and open the door to a settlement of the dispute.

"It is not too late," Kirkland urged, for the President to "instruct his representatives to sit down with those workers and address their genuine grievances."

IN SPEECHES to Seafarers and Steelworkers, in television interviews and in public statements, Kirkland hammered away at the Administration's overkill.

He cited the words of Dwight D. Eisenhower, at the time a five-star general, that "much worse than strikes . . . is the loss of freedom. . . . Only a handful of unreconstructed reactionaries harbor the ugly thought of breaking unions"

Yet today, Kirkland said, "we see the Reagan Administration, as employer, using the power of the police, the courts and the military to punish and break a small union."

THE ADMINISTRATION seeks to deny controllers the right to choose their own union, Kirkland charged. "It has jailed union leaders for responding to the wishes of the membership."

Kirkland recalled the letter that Reagan wrote to PATCO last October, on which the union relied when it endorsed his candidacy for President. "Too few people working unreasonable hours with obsolete equipment has placed the nation's air travelers in unwarranted danger."

But now, Kirkland noted, the Administration insists "that the air traffic system is safe and adequate with less than half a crew of less-skilled strikebreakers."

On the Public Broadcasting Service's MacNeil/Lehrer Report, Kirkland said the AFL-CIO has from the start of the strike urged a mediation role for "impartial third parties" to break the impasse.

HE FOUND "troubling and very dangerous" the use of military air controllers to replace strikers.

"The trade union movement has historically strongly supported the national defense of this country," Kirkland stressed. "We're concerned when we see the sons of working people, who serve in the army for the purpose of defending this country against foreign adversaries, breaking strikes"

As for the strike being over because the government fired the strikers, Kirkland retorted that "the 12,000 controllers are still standing firm, their problems still exist."

Further, he reminded the interviewer, "employers do not declare the end of a strike. The organization and its members declare the end of a strike."

Labor Day Themes Cite Renewal of Commitment

America's trade union movement approached Labor Day with a fierce determination to defend a century of achievement and a renewed commitment "to those among us for whom life is still a struggle for survival."

Labor Day statements by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue acknowledged the strength of labor's foes in today's political climate but insisted that the links of union solidarity will prove still stronger. (Texts on Pages 6 and 7.)

KIRKLAND POINTED to Poland's trade union federation, born a year ago this month, as evidence that the natural solidarity of workers "can be repressed but never extinguished."

Poland's workers, he said, "have shown the world that the fight for workers' rights is the fight for human rights."

Kirkland said American labor's pride in its accomplishments is tempered by the knowledge that not all have shared in the progress. There are still too many, he stressed, who do not have safe and healthful workplaces, decent homes, access to good schools and good medical care.

LABOR'S PRIDE, he cautioned, "should leave no room for complacency, because all victories are only temporary. What we have gained at the bargaining table and in the legislative halls down through the years can, in an instant, be swept away."

Donahue expanded on that theme, warning:

"There is a movement afoot in the country to erect new barriers, to establish an economic caste system alien to America," with "a permanently entrenched, tiny elite of the wealthy" at the top and "a permanent underclass of the unfortunate and the disadvantaged" at the bottom.

"We cannot allow this to happen," he insisted.

DONAHUE SAID the blame for destruction of labor-supported programs must fall "on a Congress which knuckled down to pressure" as well as on the Reagan Administration. "Congress surrendered to the few who stand to gain the most," Donahue said, "and agreed to the abandonment of programs and policies which have served our people and their nation well."

President Reagan and Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan used their Labor Day statements to voice optimism about the impact of Administration policies.

Reagan asserted that his "economic revitalization program will create more jobs and more work in an expanding economy." Donovan said the Reagan program will lower inflation and generate jobs.

Reagan's Quotes On Strike Policy 'Misread History'

President Reagan "misread history" when he sought to link the early leaders of labor to his view that a strike by government workers cannot be tolerated, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

Kirkland quoted from union leaders from Samuel Gompers, the early president of the American Federation of Labor, to George Meany, the first president of the AFL-CIO, to answer statements made by Reagan in an address to the Carpenters convention in Chicago.

Reagan told the convention delegates that from the time of Gompers, union

Bus Caravans to Head for Washington

By Susan Dunlop

All roads lead to Washington for labor's Solidarity Day demonstration on Sept. 19.

State and local central bodies, as well as international unions and their locals, have organized bus, car and van caravans to bring their delegations to Washington, many after cancelling air reservations in support of the striking Air Traffic Controllers.

TRAVEL TO and from the National Mall will be eased by free access to the Metro subway system all day, including trips from huge fringe parking areas near subway stops.

Parking on the Mall itself is being assigned to demonstrators with special transportation problems, particularly senior citizens and the handicapped, Solidarity Day Coordinator John Perkins said.

The Minnesota AFL-CIO, which cancelled its charter flights because of the strike, has arranged for at least eight buses. The delegation of some 400 unionists is scheduled to leave Minneapolis at 7 a.m., Sept. 18 for a 26-hour trip to Washington. After participating in the march, the Minnesotan will board their buses at 6 p.m. for the same long trip home.

AMONG THE Minnesota marchers will be a delegation from PATCO's Local 305. State Federation President David Roe said the local's check for $350 to cover its expenses for the trip would be returned and the state federation will pick up the tab to bring the strikers to Washington.

Trade unionists from Washington State, a labor and community delegation being organized by the state AFL-CIO, will make a three-hour trip overland to Vancouver, British Columbia on Friday to catch a Canadian air carrier to Toronto.

From there the demonstrators are scheduling land transportation to Washington, "by Conestoga wagon, if necessary," according to state Solidarity Day coordinator Ross Reider.

REBUILDING OF America's merchant marine is essential to national and economic security, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the Seafarers convention in Washington. Kirkland is flanked by SIU President Frank Drozak, left, and Sec.-Treas. Joseph DiGiorgio.

In Convention Action

Seafarers Offer Plan To Revive Cargo Fleet

The Seafarers convention called for long-overdue government action to reverse the steady decline of the American merchant marine.

Stressing that the United States suffers from an "appalling lack of a unified, coherent, well planned and enforced maritime policy," the 350 convention delegates adopted a five-point program that spells out the need for:

- Revitalizing the nearly scuttled dry bulk U.S.-flag fleet to carry fair shares of U.S. coal exports and strategic material imports needed for the nation's defense.
- Utilizing the merchant fleet as an auxiliary to the Navy during national emergencies for shipping supplies to free naval personnel to staff strategic vessels.
- Restructuring tax laws to encourage U.S. ship owners to build and to operate modern fleets efficiently.
- Stripping away unnecessary restrictions that put U.S. shippers at a disadvantage in the world market.
- Negotiating bilateral agreements with U.S. allies and developing countries to reserve an equitable portion of American international cargoes for U.S.-flag vessels.

SIU PRESIDENT Frank Drozak noted in his keynote address to the triennial convention that union members face difficult times as a result of Reagan Administration budgetary cutbacks. He cited in his report the urgent need to restore funding for U.S. Public Health Service hospitals vital to merchant seamen and federal construction subsidies to spur American shipbuilding.

However, Drozak said he was optimistic that President Reagan would live up to his repeated pledges to rejuvenate the merchant marine and the maritime industry.

Drozak called for maritime union unity and stepped-up cooperation from all sectors of the industry at a post-convention press conference.

"UNLESS GOVERNMENT, management and labor cooperate—map maritime strategy together and chart the same course—we will have succeeded in demolishing our U.S. fleet without even firing a single shot," he warned.

In an address to delegates, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland stressed that the rebuilding of the U.S. merchant marine is absolutely essential to national and economic security.

"We should have learned that lesson from the 1973 war in the Middle East and from the Arab oil embargo," Kirkland declared. "We saw runaway fleets owned by American companies giving foreign powers a veto over U.S. policy.

"Instead of learning the lesson," he observed, "our government in 1977 rejected even a limited version of cargo preference. Today we are down to a 5 percent share of our nation's import-export trade. That is a loss of 100,000 seafaring jobs, with a ripple effect on other industries and other workers."

The convention elected Drozak by acclamation to his first full three-year term. The SIU executive board choose Drozak to head the union last year following the death of Paul Hall, who was memorialized in a resolution that recognized his progressive leadership for more than two decades.

DELEGATES ALSO re-elected Sec.-Treas. Joseph DiGiorgio and 12 vice presidents. Six new vice presidents elected to the SIU executive board are George McCartney of San Francisco, Jack Caffey and John Fay of Brooklyn, N.Y., Mike Orlando of Gloucester, Mass., Mike Sacco of St. Louis and Joe Abatta of Chicago.

Drozak also had been elected president of the SIU-affiliated United Industrial Workers, which met earlier at Piney Point, Md. Steve Edney, an SIU vice president, was elected national director of the UIW.

The SIU convention approved a 50-cent increase in monthly per capita payments which will rise to $2.25 effective Oct. 1.

Other key resolutions adopted at the three-day convention called for repeal of waivers to the Jones Act, which reserves shipping between U.S. ports to American-flag vessels and manned by U.S. seamen; protection for U.S. fishing fleets from seizures by other countries; opposition to proposals for the export of Alaska oil; and government recognition of the threat to national security by U.S.-owned runaway-flag vessels.

DELEGATES GAVE strong endorsement of the AFL-CIO Solidarity Day rally in Washington on Sept. 19, urging maximum participation by SIU affiliates and members.

Convention speakers included Rep. Walter B. Jones (D-N.C.), chairman of the House Merchant Marine Committee; President J. C. Turner of the Operating Engineers; President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers; President Robert Lowen of the Masters, Mates & Pilots; Executive Sec.-Treas. Jean Ingrao of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. and Robert Bonitati, special assistant to Reagan.

Keep U.S. Shipyards Open, Boilermakers Delegates Urge

Chicago—Delegates to the Boilermakers convention adopted a centennial year program keyed to strengthening their union and the shipbuilding industry where about one-fourth of its members work.

The convention also expressed its concern at attacks on labor, moves to weaken prevailing wage and job safety laws, and the Reagan Administration's effort to cut back social security protections.

A RESOLUTION, strongly urged by President Harold J. Buoy, endorsed the AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day demonstration and called on union members to turn out for the march and rally.

Buoy, Sec.-Treas. Charles F. Moran and all incumbent vice presidents were re-elected without opposition. Their terms will be for five years, in line with the adoption of a resolution to increase the interval between conventions from four years to five.

Also adopted by the 1,000 delegates, representing nearly 150,000 members, was a per capita rise of $1 to take effect next January, with additional increases of 50 cents a year for the next five years.

Strike benefits were raised in two steps from $45 to $55 a week.

THE CONVENTION strongly urged continuation of the federal construction differential subsidy to encourage the building of merchant vessels in American shipyards.

AFL-CIO Metal Trades Dept. President Paul Burnsky urged a letter-writing campaign to members of Congress in support of the ship construction differential.

Building & Construction Trades Dept. President Robert Georgine underscored the threat to the Davis-Bacon Act, which he termed "one of the most progressive labor laws we have." The convention also adopted a resolution opposing efforts to transform the Hobbs Act into a weapon that could be used against unions by transforming a picket line scuffle into a felony.

In a concluding speech, Buoy told the delegates to the union's 100th anniversary convention that they had adopted a program for the Eighties that reflects a "determination to strengthen the trade union movement against attack."

All Roads Lead To Washington Solidarity Day

Council, announced that arrangements have been set with the city's transportation authority for the Metro subway system to be free from 8 a.m. to midnight on Solidarity Day.

COST FOR the free Metrorail rides will be picked up by the AFL-CIO and its affiliates, Petersen said.

With priority given to assigning the limited parking spaces on the Mall to those with special needs, Petersen urged demonstrators driving into Washington to use the fringe parking areas near each subway terminus and ride the train to downtown. Maps showing locations of the lots are available from local and national Solidarity Day offices. Bus and caravan parking is also being assigned by the national coordinators.

In other developments, Perkins announced that two hours of Solidarity Day coverage will be telecast live from Washington via satellite beginning at 3 p.m. Eastern Daylight Time. The coverage, produced by the Public Interest Video Network, will be on stations of the Public Broadcasting System.

An hour of Solidarity Day highlights will also be available to PBS stations at Solidarity Day offices. Bus and caravan 5 p.m. EDT on Sunday, Sept. 20.

Typical of many individuals shunning the air routes but determined to march are eight members of International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers Local 960 in El Paso. They will make the 4,000-mile round trip, "not to set records, but to set the record straight."

Sheet Metal Union Launches Mail Campaign

Honolulu—A proposal to blunt the current anti-union attack in Congress with an outpouring of mail from union members received strong support from some 500 local officials attending the annual Sheet Metal Workers business agents conference here.

President Edward J. Carlough outlined the union's plans to mobilize support for the defense of the Davis-Bacon Act, which provides prevailing wages on federally financed construction, and opposition to right-wing proposals to rewrite the Hobbs Act so that any picket line scuffle might become a federal felony case.

"THE 'CRAZIES' are mobilizing against us, and we can't just sit still and take it," Carlough told the union business agents. "The only things this Administration understands are power and response. Let's give it to them."

Sen. Henry Jackson (D-Wash.) told the conference that "Republicans seem to have the idea that Davis-Bacon was some sort of New Deal 'socialist' idea. This idea is retroactive nonsense."

Jackson noted that Davis-Bacon was sponsored by a Republican senator—James J. Davis—who had been Secretary of Labor in the cabinets of Presidents Harding, Coolidge and Hoover—and Robert L. Bacon, a Republican congressman from upstate New York. "You know how radical they are," he said.

But the move to attack Davis-Bacon on a piecemeal basis is part of an "unraveling process" aimed at various laws that aid working people, Jackson charged.

The Washington senator, who has become a prime target for defeat by right-wing political groups, called for allocation of credit resources to stimulate the housing industry.

THE REPUBLICAN budget-cutters, he added, are trying to "make people believe social security is going broke." It isn't, Jackson said, but the Administration would like to use the scare tactics to convert social security from an insurance program to a welfare program. We can't let them do it."

David Wagner, head of the sheet metal and air conditioners employer group, warned of the continuing threat of inroads in the construction industry by non-union companies. He called for cooperation in the search for "sensible solutions to our common problems."

W. L. Fillippini, administrator of the joint union-employer National Training Fund, said the group is placing increased emphasis on offering advanced training to skilled journeymen. "It's time to turn to new programs for a new decade, and new technologies require new skills."

THE CONFERENCE was told that its pension fund has increased average monthly payments by 100 percent in eight years while strengthening its fiscal base. The union-management underemployment benefits program has paid out a total of $62 million in four different categories, and 60 locals are now covered.

The Sheet Metal Workers received praise for pushing programs for solar heating and for energy conservation through retrofitting from Omi Walden, former assistant secretary of energy and now a consultant on energy matters to the union.

She decried the elimination of the Energy Dept.'s funds for state and local grants and for energy education, and commented that it is "hard to tell what our national energy program really is."

While conservation and better utilization of domestic energy supplies has brought a cu tin foreign oil imports compared to 1973, Walden said, "today we're just as vulnerable as in 1973 from a national security standpoint."

Denver Vote Victory For Fire Fighters

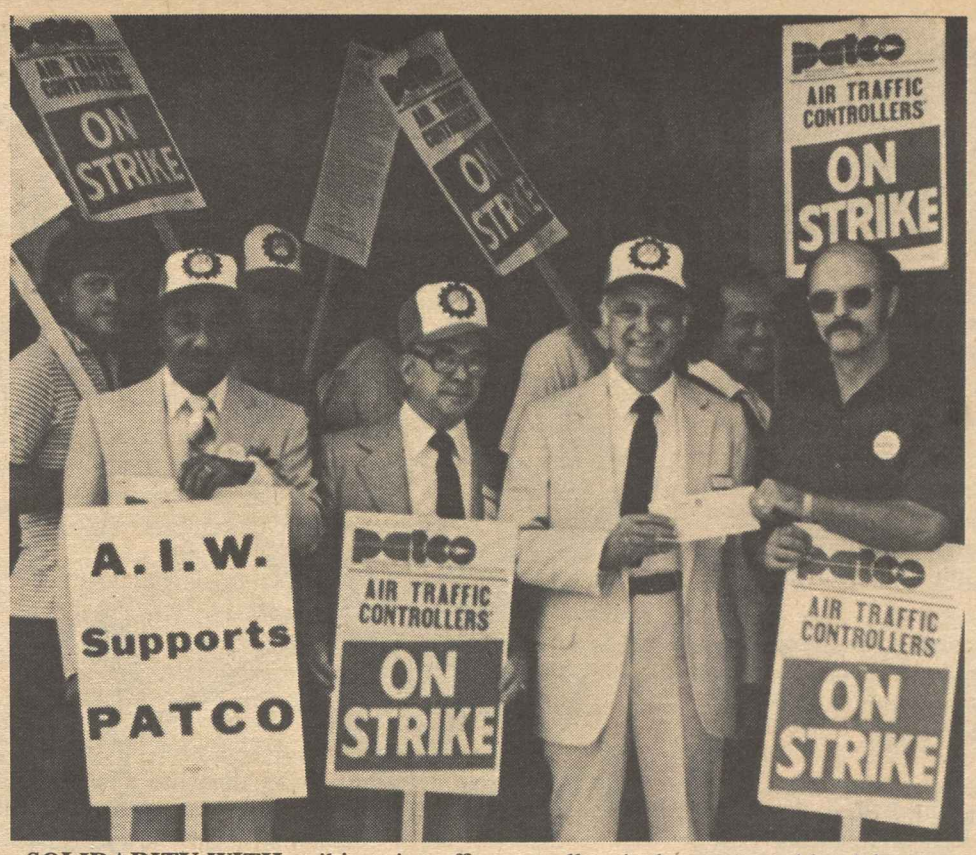
Denver—City voters sided with their fire fighters in a special referendum and approved a new one-year contract for IAFF Local 858 that retains a 48-hour workweek which has been in effect since 1974.

The contract, reached under a unique provision of the city charter, includes a 12.3 percent pay raise. The city's salary proposal was similar, although more restricted. The big difference was the city's demand that the 850 fire fighters work a 54-hour week in exchange.

A RECOUNT confirmed the razor-thin victory margin. The union's contract proposal was adopted by a margin of 118 votes out nearly 45,000 cast.

Local 858 President Ron F. Moeder said the union waged a positive campaign to convince Denver's citizens of the need to maintain a higher standard of municipal fire service. Moeder praised the efforts of the Denver AFL-CIO, the Colorado AFL-CIO and locals of many international unions that helped the campaign.

An impasse developed in negotiations several months ago over the workweek issue, as well as how the pay package would be applied. The city's proposal, unlike the IAFF's, provided no pay increases for top grade linemen and lieutenants.



THE DISPUTE went through a fact-finding process, and an arbitrator ruled in favor of the city administration's proposal.

But under Denver's city charter, which was revised in 1979, the Fire Fighters had the right to call for a citywide referendum —if the union agreed to pay for the cost of the election.

IN AN EFFORT to put additional pressure on the Fire Fighters, Moeder noted, the city demanded that the local place $160,000 in escrow to cover the election costs.

The local raised the funds through loans, coming mainly from the IAFF headquarters in Washington and Communications Workers Local 8412 in Denver. Moeder said the loans will be repaid through an assessment of $15 a month per member over a one-year period.

The new contract goes into effect next Jan. 1.

Allied Industrial Workers Press for Jobs Programs

Dearborn, Mich. — Delegates to the Allied Industrial Workers convention here adopted a fight-back program designed to strengthen a union that has been hard-hit by layoffs and plant closings in the recession-battered midwestern industrial states.

To recoup membership and revenue losses, the convention approved a $2 rise in minimum dues, to $11 a month. AIW locals, regional councils and the international union will share in the added revenues.

TO REVERSE the decline in jobs, the convention called for government policies keyed to full employment.

The Reagan Administration's program "is deepening a recession that has hit us right in our own shops, in our own union," President Dominick D'Ambrosio declared.

AIW membership is concentrated in Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana and Ohio, where unemployment has been high. Its members have been heavily employed in the auto parts industries, plastics, truck parts and bodies, all hard-hit by recession cutbacks and imports.

As a result, D'Ambrosio and Sec.-Treas. William J. Salamone reported, membership dropped from a 1979 average of 94,000 to under 72,000 this year, with a corresponding decline in per capita income.

DELEGATES ADOPTED a resolution of support for the AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day march on Sept. 19, endorsed reindustrialization goals and voted to raise strike benefits by $5 a week, to $40.

On the convention floor, delegates discussed the problems arising out of plant closings and adopted a resolution to set in motion an AIW program of technical information and assistance to locals in plant closing situations, including assistance in community services. Locals were urged to bargain protective provisions in their contracts.

Melva Meachem, who heads an Illinois State AFL-CIO program to assist worker victims of plant closings, urged delegates to initiate similar programs in their areas. She is a member of the Distillery Workers and was herself a victim of a plant closing in Peoria, Ill.

D'AMBROSIO reported to the convention on merger talks the AIW has held with the Molders Union and said the two groups had not been able to agree on terms. Before adjourning, the convention adopted a resolution calling on AIW officers "to look into the possibility of merging with a large industrial union" and "to first seek out the United Auto Workers" for discussions.

UAW President Douglas Fraser, who addressed the convention earlier, noted that the once sharp rivalry between the two unions had been transformed into a pattern of cooperation on mutual problems.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, unable to appear in person because of the air controllers strike, sent a message stressing the labor movement's insistence that "there can be no turning back" from the progress America has made towards equality and justice.

The Solidarity Day rally, he said, "will demonstrate to the Administration, to Congress and to the nation that we stand united."

Federal Workers Pay Raise Slashed Back to 4.8 Percent

on their pay raises during the fiscal year that starts Oct. 1.

Even with the raise held to 4.8 percent, the government's top executives won't get any more money in their paychecks. They are up against a salary ceiling set by Congress of $50,112 a year.

The Salary Comparability Act provides for military pay to rise by the same percentage as the civilian increase. But both this year and last, Congress and the Administration have supported higher levels of military pay raises.

Last year, the military pay hike was 11.7 percent, and legislation awaiting final action by Congress would provide an additional 14.3 percent raise in October.

The Administration has proposed a permanent change in the comparability formula that would hold the federal salary level to 94 percent of the rate for comparable private sector jobs.

ACCORDING TO an Office of Management & Budget "fact sheet," the subpar level is in recognition of "aspects of federal employment that make it more attractive than many non-federal jobs."

The original intent of the comparability law was to provide a fair and automatic adjustment of government salary scales, without the political battles that used to occur regularly when salaries could be increased only through legislation.

Blue-collar wages had always been set on the basis of prevailing wages and the 1970 law was to apply a similar principal to white-collar employment.

AN ESCAPE clause, at first used only rarely but in recent years becoming the rule rather than the exception, allowed the President to reject the comparability formula and propose an alternative pay plan. But if either the House or Senate within 30 days passed a resolution disapproving the President's alternative, the original comparability increase would take effect.

Reagan told Congress the lower pay raise he proposed was "in accordance with our economic recovery program."

Federation Officers Bypass Air Travel

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue have been driving or taking the train to speaking engagements during the PATCO strike, and cancelling appearances where this can't be done.

Kirkland and AFL-CIO Vice President Martin J. Ward will take the Canadian route to travel to Poland to attend the first National Congress of the Solidarity trade union federation. They will go to Montreal by train to begin their flight, unless the U.S. air controllers are back at work before their scheduled departure.

ITU Assails 'Take-Aways' By Reagan

Montreal—Condemning the economic policies of the Reagan Administration and its efforts to dismantle "worker protections that took generations to achieve," delegates to the Typographical Union's 123rd convention here endorsed the AFL-CIO's call to the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day demonstration and urged locals and members to participate "to the maximum possible extent."

Budget cuts and harsh monetary restraints are imposing economic hardship on workers while cuts in personal and business income taxes are "further enriching the wealthy," the convention declared.

DELEGATES LABELED "unconscionable" the reductions in social security benefits proposed by the Administration and urged a campaign to ensure that "social security does not become another Reagan . . . take-away program."

Beginning in 1984, ITU conventions would be held twice every three years rather than annually — as they have throughout most of the union's 129-year history—under a constitutional amendment approved by this year's convention.

That amendment, which like all changes in the union's constitution must be submitted to membership referendum, calls for the convention to meet during the first and third years of each three-year term of international officers.

Delegates also endorsed a constitutional amendment that would provide for nomination of candidates for international office by convention delegates, replacing a nominating procedure requiring a minimum number of local union endorsements for declared candidates.

AS UNDER the current procedure, contested offices would be decided by a vote of the membership, but convention delegates would pare the field to two nominees for each office by roll-call balloting.

Another constitutional amendment would raise the maximum benefit paid striking members by $100, to $250 a week, and would trigger a membership assessment for the strike fund whenever the fund's balance fell below $5 million, replacing current $3 million strike fund floor.

In other actions, the ITU convention:

- Voted its support for striking air traffic controllers and called for the appointment of a panel of arbitrators to help resolve the dispute.
- Urged locals to seek greater membership contributions to COPE through voluntary political-action checkoffs.
- Called for the defeat of legislative proposals that would amend the Hobbs Act to make violence in a labor dispute a crime under federal extortion laws.

The convention also said that the termination of merger talks between the ITU and the Newspaper Guild last spring "should not deter us from making another effort," and declared that merger of the two unions would not only produce "a stronger union," but also improve "prospects of merger with other unions in the graphic arts field."

Fred Pieper Dies at 72, Retired Field Director

Acworth, Ga.—Fred C. Pieper, an early leader of the Auto Workers who retired in 1971 as director of the AFL-CIO Rocky Mountain region, died Aug. 27 at the age of 72.

He began his trade union career in the 1930s, helped to establish the UAW in Atlanta and served on the union's executive board. After military service in World War II, Pieper became director of the CIO Louisiana-Mississippi region and later served as field assistant to the CIO's executive vice president. He was named director of the Rocky Mountain region after merger of the AFL and CIO in 1955.

Survivors include his wife Dorothy and two sons. Services were held in Kennesaw, Ga., and burial in Acworth.

When Less Is Not Best

ONE OF THE MORE pixilated ideas being promoted by the Reagan Administration is something called "health competition" as the secret of holding down health care costs.

It assumes that "less is best" and that workers should be discouraged from negotiating comprehensive health insurance coverage.

The reasoning, if such it can be called, is that making medical and hospital services available to workers and their families at low or no cost sends them flocking to expensive specialists for treatment of cuts and bruises or lolling about in $200-a-day hospital beds.

THE LEGISLATIVE proposal being talked up by the Dept. of Health & Human Services would require workers to pay taxes on the value of employer-paid health insurance premiums above a specified amount. One variant being considered would allow workers to choose a less costly health plan than the employer provided and pocket the difference.

This "carrot-and-stick" approach is supposed to promote competition among health insurance plans to hold down premium costs. In turn, the insurance companies presumably would pressure doctors and hospitals to hold down their costs.

The reasoning boggles the imagination.

Have the framers of the plan never spent half a day in a doctor's office that they assume that the lure of free care is irresistible? Have they never spent a night in a hospital or otherwise become aware that it is hardly a substitute for a weekend at the beach?

THIS IS NOT the first time such a "health competition" plan has surfaced, and a new pamphlet by the Committee for National Health Insurance points up some of the fallacies.

For example, making buyers of health insurance cost conscious has little to do with the eventual cost of health services because doctors and not patients decide what medical tests are needed and when hospitalization is required. The medical care market is controlled by those who provide the services, not those who purchase them.

There has been strong evidence over the years that comprehensive medical care, stressing preventive medicine and early treatment, keeps people out of hospitals and shortens hospital stays. But that is just the type of program that is most likely to be penalized as too generous in its benefits.

A CASE COULD be made, in fact, that the "health choice" plan would actually drive up costs in the long run. So-called "cheap" policies often don't provide alternatives to expensive hospitalization. And any "savings" in health insurance premium costs achieved through higher deductibles merely means that people who got sick will have bigger medical bills to pay out of their own pockets.

Surely this warmed-over proposal isn't a serious Administration answer to the problem of making quality health care available to all Americans.

'Lazy Worker' Myth Dispelled

Study Shows Productivity Rate Rises and Falls with Economy

By Gus Tyler

THE MOST RECENT report on productivity in American industry, issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, makes hash out of the popular notion that output per worker in the United States is falling because the employees of our land are getting lazier all the time.

The report, covering all of 1980, does show that productivity (output per worker) did show an absolute decline in the year, a drop of about one-half of one percentage point. But the same report also shows that the drop was not due to a shift toward sloth on the part of the workers, and was not even due to any decline in production technology in this country.

THE PROOF is not explicit: it is implicit, contained in the facts and figures on the differences in productivity trends in different sectors of the economy. For instance:

Steel showed a decline of 3.7 percent; copper fell by 9.2 percent; sawmills by 2.3 percent; and so on. In short, in certain industries productivity fell.

But in other industries, productivity rose. Coal mining jumped by a stupendous 13.8 percent; railroads by 6.4 percent; electric and gas utilities by 2.2 percent. Thus, while productivity was falling in some industries, it was rising in others.

If worker "attitude" were determinative, then we would have to conclude that workers in steel were increasingly lazy while workers in coal mining were increasingly industrious.

NOR CAN WE attribute the variances from industry to industry and from month to month to changes in technology. They just do not take place that rapidly nor that variedly from sector to sector.

There is a hidden element in productivity that generally goes unnoticed. That additional element is the level of output for the sector as a whole. When the sector picks up, productivity picks up. For instance:

"The coal mining industry posted a very large productivity increase of 13.8 percent. Coal output grew 7.8 percent."

In other words, the demand for coal, spurring increased total output per worker. Why? Because in busy times, everybody gets busy; there are fewer idle hands hanging around waiting to do something while the time clock ticks on. This is especially true for the supervisory, managerial and maintenance crews who must be kept on if things go slow.

Similarly, "productivity in railroads increased 6.4 percent as large shipments of coal and grain raised output."

THERE ARE exceptions to this rule, as in the petroleum industry, where output (total production) fell by 6.4 percent while productivity (output per person) rose by 4.5 percent.

What happened in this industry is that, instead of running all refineries at—let's say—70 percent of capacity, the industry decided to run refineries at fuller capacity while simply shutting down other refineries. As a result, many workers were totally idled but fewer workers on the job were idle during work hours.

The exception proves the rule. The rule says that when a plant is run at top capacity it is bound to be much more productive—per person—than a plant that is being run at partial capacity with idle human overhead.

Pay Safeguards Face Repeal by Regulations

For a half-century, the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law has served as the bedrock of our philosophy that American taxpayers' money will not be used to promote the exploitation of labor.

President Reagan has promised on numerous occasions that he would not support the repeal of the Davis-Bacon Act. Yet the changes now being proposed by his Dept. of Labor in the regulations that permit the law to function will effectively repeal the Act.

The protections of the law, which two generations of working Americans have depended upon will vanish.

If the Davis-Bacon Act is destroyed, what will be the next target of the Reagan Administration? Social security? The Fair Labor Standards Act? The National Labor Relations Act?

—From a statement by Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner, Aug. 26, 1981.

Professor Knows Best

Elitist Critics of Unions Show Basic Disdain for Democracy

By Msgr. George G. Higgins

THE LABOR MOVEMENT has more than its share of avowed enemies. But while contending with them as best it can, it will also have to reassess its own internal strengths and weaknesses. Like all of our major institutions, it is faced with a crisis of identity and credibility which can only be resolved by the painful process of self-criticism and self-renewal.

I happen to think that the labor movement is fully capable of carrying out this process of renewal on its own initiative, but some of its more disdainful academic critics contend that this is absolutely impossible. They seem to think that the labor movement is in such desperate straits that, sooner or later, it will have to turn to them as objective outsiders for the solution to its problems. Many of these people, incidentally, seem to have little or no confidence in the democratic process.

THE LABOR movement, in their opinion, simply cannot be renewed from within by its own members but, putting aside its democratic procedures, must call upon the superior wisdom of complete outsiders like themselves.

A recent article by Douglas McCabe, assistant professor of industrial and labor relations at Georgetown University's School of Business Administration, is an extreme example of this all too familiar line of thought. Some weeks ago, in an op-ed column in the now-defunct Washington Star, Prof. McCabe argued that "it is useless for the rank-and-file to hope that its present leadership will become statesmen of unionism."

It is necessary, he said, for the labor movement to go back to square one and start all over again. Two steps must be taken immediately.

The first is "the drafting of a Declaration of American Labor Philosophy, just as the Declaration of Independence codified the American political philosophy."

The second step, the professor continued, is "to draft proper union constitutions adequate for implementing the principles in the Declaration of American Labor Philosophy, just as the Constitution implements the political philosophy of the Declaration of Independence."

NOW FOR THE $64 question. Who is to draft these two off-the-wall charters? The dues-paying members of the labor movement acting democratically through their duly elected leaders? No way, says Prof. McCabe, for "unlike colonial America, unionism today has no founding fathers in its ranks—willing and able to do the job; the rank-and-file can't do it in a bootstrap operation."

So what next? According to Prof. McCabe, we need "an Institute of Labor Philosophy staffed by three types of individuals: Union officials, appointees of the Secretary of Labor, and academic experts." During the past 40-odd years academia has produced dozens of similar articles. Typically, articles of this type are terribly elitist and condescending.

With all due respect, I must say that Prof. McCabe's piece takes the prize in this respect. His contempt for labor leaders as a group and for the intelligence of the rank-and-file sticks out like a sore thumb, and his lack of confidence in the democratic process is almost beyond belief. Moreover, his touching confidence in the superior wisdom of "academic experts" (as opposed to "power-hungry union leaders") is too self-serving and much too silly to be taken seriously.

IN FACT, I suspect that many of the professor's academic peers will smile indulgently at his naivete. There must be men and women in academia who know better than to believe that academicians are as smart and labor leaders as stupid as he has made them out to be.

I have cited Prof. McCabe's ivory tower article in this Labor Day column not to start a fight with him, but simply to suggest—using his article as a case in point—that criticism of the labor movement by academicians who cannot conceal their contempt for the movement and its leaders and who clearly betray a lack of confidence in the democratic process is counterproductive.

Both the rank-and-file and their elected leaders will scornfully reject this kind of intemperate criticism as just another exercise in academic snobbery. They know perfectly well that the labor movement has problems and also know that they need the help of objective outside experts to cope with these problems. But they are not about to subvert their own democratic procedures by permitting any group of outside experts, including the so-called "best and the brightest" from academia to take control of the movement from the outside and rewrite its basic philosophy.

THE MORAL of all this is that academicians who sincerely want to be of assistance to the labor movement will have to learn to mind their manners, and, above all, will have to understand that representative democracy is of the very essence of a free labor movement.

With all its limitations, the American movement still fits into this category. Though its democratic procedures are admittedly imperfect and unfortunately are sometimes violated, it is still the most democratic of all our major institutions, including, of course, our educational institutions.

This is something for academicians to think about with diffidence and humility on labor's national holiday.

End of this year's Labor Day sermon.

Close Watch on Congress

Battle to Save Vital Programs Still Faces Legislative Test

ADOPTION OF the Reagan budget isn't the end of the effort to save vital people programs, AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard and NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks declared on Labor News Conference.

"The fight is not over," Pollard and Hooks stressed, pointing out that Congress still has to shape legislation within the framework of the budget. They warned also that as a result of the misdirected tax changes and the failure to curb unemployment, inflation and high interest rates, the Administration faces a deficit far above its original forecast and is expected to try for even deeper program cuts in the months ahead.

"We don't intend to stand by and let them cut out all of the programs," Hooks declared. He said that a major goal of the Solidarity Day protest march on Sept. 19 is to remind Congress that it must not approach the upcoming legislation and the Administration's push for more cuts with "the haste" in which the budget bill was passed.

POLLARD SAID that the "devastating effects" of the Reagan budget on children, adults, workers, professionals, minorities and women, and on civil rights laws, the Voting Rights Act, affirmative action programs and EEOC, has brought together a broad-ranging coalition in the Solidarity Day demonstration.

Pollard and Hooks were questioned by Marc Gibson of the Sheridan Broadcasting Network, June Cross of the McNeil/Lehner Report and Claude Matthews of NBC News. The AFL-CIO-produced public affairs program is aired weekly on the Mutual radio network.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

MOST STATES and localities—like the majority of the nation's middle- and lower-income people—will be victims rather than beneficiaries of the Reagan Administration's tax and budget cuts.

Most state governments will be collecting less revenue from corporate and individual taxpayers and will be receiving less federal aid.

The result is likely to be large-scale layoffs of public employees, including teachers; reduced local government services; and an increase in regressive sales taxes and users' fees.

Under the tax legislation enacted by Congress, 40 states will lose revenues because their corporate and/or personal tax rates are based on the federal rate.

Meeting in Atlantic City in August, the National Governors' Association took a worried look at what is about to happen.

"The Administration's tax bill," the governors said in a report, "will cost states $2.3 billion in lost corporate tax revenues and higher borrowing costs" in the fiscal year beginning Oct. 1.

AT THE SAME time, "state and local governments will absorb about one-third of the $35 billion in federal aid cuts" in the budget legislation enacted by Congress, the governors said.

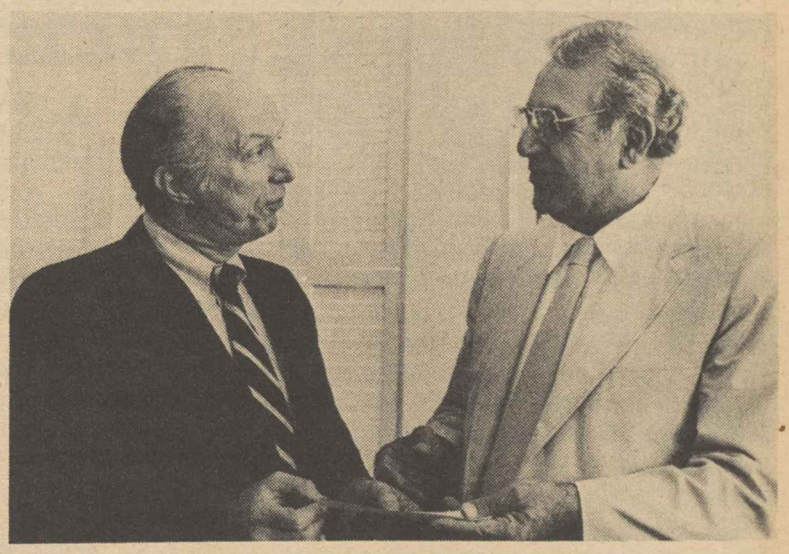
By far the biggest revenue losses to the states will result from changes in the way businesses are allowed to calculate depreciation write-offs, according to a recent study by Citizens for Tax Justice, a coalition of labor and public interest groups.

By 1986, the study shows, states whose tax schedules conform to the new federal depreciation rules would sustain tax losses totaling over $10 billion a year. Their corporate tax collections would have dropped by 38 percent.

Currently, 25 states will automatically conform to the federal changes unless they amend their tax laws, the study points out. These states, which "couple" their corporate tax rates to the federal rates, include major industrial states which can least afford such large revenue losses.

FOR 13 OTHER states, conformity to the new "accelerated cost recovery system" would require them to change their current tax laws. These states could avoid the corporate revenue losses by keeping their tax rates as they are.

In these 13 states, however, there is likely to be substantial pressure from business interest to change depreciation schedules to conform to the federal writeoff on plant and equipment.



Thus the next battle over taxes will shift to the state legislatures.

The governors' report was not sanguine about the outcome of the tax fight. "States will face a choice," it said, "between a major loss of corporate tax revenues or raising their tax rates to offset losses from new depreciation schedules.

ORGANIZED LABOR, especially the public employee unions which will be most directly affected, is gearing up to oppose the depreciation ripoff.

The American Federation of Teachers predicts that 44,000 teachers across the country will be laid off this fall mainly because of state fiscal problems.

The State, County & Municipal Employees policy analyst Tim Wilson said, "We think it's unfair that corporate taxes so drastically reduced at the federal level are also reduced at the state level. The Administration rhetoric was that reduced federal taxes would allow states to increase taxes."

EDUCATION FUND in memory of slain unionist Michael P. Hammer grows by $3,000, a gift from Domei, the Japanese labor confederation, which asked the AFL-CIO to transmit its contribution. Hammer, a representative of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, was murdered in El Salvador while working on a land reform program to help small farmers. The fund, now over $15,000, will aid the education of Hammer's son as well as Latin American farm workers. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue presents Domei's check to Sam Haddad, AIFLD deputy director and trustee of the fund.

Kirkland on Labor Day

Defending 'What We Helped Build'

By Lane Kirkland

TODAY, AS IN EACH of the 87 years since Labor Day became a national holiday, we pause to honor America's working men and women.

Labor Day 1981 holds special significance for American trade unionists. This is our centennial year.

One hundred years ago this November a handful of trade unionists gathered in Pittsburgh and laid the cornerstone on which we have built the national trade union center which has evolved into today's AFL-CIO.

Their reasoning was simple: if workers needed unions to achieve collectively what they could not hope to achieve as individuals in the workplace, then it logically followed that unions should come together in a cohesive labor federation.

THE NEW FEDERATION did not supplant the individual unions or deprive them of their autonomy. They continued to concentrate on winning justice in their separate crafts and workplaces, while the federation carried that battle into the halls of our state and national legislatures.

But even to the unions of 1881 political action was nothing new. In earlier generations they had struggled to achieve the 10-hour day and to abolish child labor and the debtors' prison.

They had led the fight for free public education equally available to the children of the poor as to the children of the rich. But as these issues were resolved, the union amalgamations they sparked dissolved, and the unions went their separate ways—until 1881.

The instrument forged in Pittsburgh that year has survived a hundred years of testing. We have known good times and bad, administrations friendly and hostile, and changing climates of public opinion. We have tasted victory and defeat. Through it all we have made solid progress for the working people of America.

THE TRADE UNION movement gives expression to a fundamental human need and value—solidarity. Human beings who share common interests have a natural urge to join together to defend their interests against those who oppose them.

That need can be repressed but never extinguished, as the workers of Poland have reminded us. Against awesome odds, they have created and sustained the first free and independent trade union movement in a Communist country, and that movement—appropriately named Solidarity—has become the vehicle of a whole people's struggle for democratic rights.

They have shown the world that the fight for workers' rights is the fight for human rights.

We of the AFL-CIO are proud of our Polish brothers and sisters. As we celebrate our one hundredth anniversary, we congratulate them on their first.

In countries ruled by dictatorship, whether of the left or the right, workers are valiantly trying to form their own free trade unions and to protect them from government suppression. Sometimes their efforts are well publicized; sometimes the blanket of censorship is so thick, we hear of their unions only after they have been broken and their leaders imprisoned in psychiatric hospitals and labor camps.

But they keep trying. Solidarity runs deep in the human spirit.

OUR PLURALIST democracy is based on the assumption that people have conflicting interests and will band together for self-help and self-protection. Employers have their own associations. So do lawyers, doctors, scientists—and, yes, politicians. Because human beings play different roles in society, we sometimes band together under more than one organization —as consumers, sportsmen, veterans, or ethnics.

Americans have never been comfortable with the notion of a monolithic society in which all elements of the population are subordinated to a central authority or to a single definition of what is good for us. We prefer the conflict of ideas, the competition of interests—all within a democratic framework of fair rules.

So the trade union movement does not object to being called an interest group. We object only to being called a "narrow" interest group. The interests we represent are those of Americans in their role as workers—and they are not a narrow group. With their skills, their industry, and their productivity, they are the backbone of our economic society.

The American trade union movement has come a long way. Born in the twilight of the 19th Century, we stand now but two decades away from the dawn of the 21st Century.

In the lobby of the AFL-CIO headquarters in our nation's capital there is a mural which depicts the progress which American workers and their industries have made. In that mural is a quotation from the great Scottish essayist and historian, Thomas Carlyle, which says, "Labor is life."

WHEN CARLYLE wrote those words near the end of the last century, they were literally true. For most people life was consumed by work—hard, back-breaking, life-shortening work.

Today, thanks to the determination of American trade unions and the courage and genius of American workers, things have changed. We still respect work, but we have leavened it with leisure, alleviated sheer toil, and, in the process, enriched the lives of working people, both on the job and when the day's work is done.

Yet there are those among us for whom life is still a struggle for survival, barren of even the simplest pleasures to relieve the drudgery of their existence. There are still others for whom gainful employment and full participation in our society are beyond reach.

We have come far toward better wages, shorter hours, and safer working conditions in factories and offices, on farms and in workshops. Yet there are those among us who still do not receive the full fruits of their labor, and others for whom the workplace remains a threat to their health and safety.

There is a quality in this land of ours that we do not wish to see despoiled or pillaged. There is a dignity about the working people of this land, and we do not wish to see them demeaned or degraded. There is inspiration in our political institutions, aspiring to justice, and we do not wish to see them eroded by cynicism and despair.

We have come far toward decent schools for all of our children, decent homes for our families, decent hospitals to care for us in time of sickness, decent retirement that provides dighity and security as an earned right.

YET THERE ARE those among us to whom equal educational opportunity is still a myth and for whom rat-infested, disease-ridden slums remain the only place they can call home. There are those for whom medical care is priced beyond reach and for whom the inevitable process of aging brings anxiety and uncertainty as they face the prospect of spending their sunset years in a twilight world of abject poverty.

We have come a long way toward expanding access to the ballot box, where the promise of "government by the people" most ultimately be redeemed.

Yet for many among us, the color of their skin, or the accent of their mother tongue, or some other arbitrary and capricious measurement is used to deny them full and free access to the political process.

American workers can take pride in the progress we have made. Certainly our national economy would not be as productive nor our cultural life as enriched, nor our social and political institutions as compassionate, were it not for the determined efforts of working men and women to pull themselves up by their bootstraps, aad their country with them.

BUT THAT PRIDE should leave no room for complacency, because all victories are only temporary, and what we have gained at the bargaining table and in the legislative halls down through the years can, in an instant, be swept away.

And that instant could be upon us now. We observe Labor Day 1981 in a mood of deep concern for these are difficult and uncertain times, and we in the labor movement are troubled about the direction in which our country appears headed.

Nor are we alone. Our concern is shared by thousands of people in scores of organizations—those who believe with us in civil rights and civil liberties, in equal rights for women, in safeguarding the environment we hold in trust for generations to come, in social security and health security, in tax justice and pension protection, in a safer workplace and safer products, in quality education for all, and in equal access to the polling booth, to jobs, and to opportunity without regard to race, creed, color, national origin or gender.

We intend to dramatize the depth of our concern with a demonstration in our nation's capital on Sept. 19. We call it aptly, Solidarity Day.

We will be joined by our allies in the civil rights and women's movements, in the environmental and consumer movements. We will march with senior citizens, religious groups, and dozens of other organizations, large and small, representing people of serious purpose from every corner of the nation.

SEPT. 19 will be a day of hope, a day of rededication to the fullfillment of the American promise of a better quality of life for all of us. We shall stand together in defense of the American spirit.

There is a quality in this land of ours that we do not wish to see despoiled or pillaged. There is a dignity about the working people of this land, and we do not wish to see them demeaned or degraded. There is inspiration in our political institutions, aspiring to justice, and we do not wish to see them eroded by cynicism and despair.

The labor movement has been a part of the quality, the dignity, and the inspiration of America. What we have helped to build, we shall fight to defend.

On this Labor Day 1981, we can almost reach out and touch the 21st Century. When the year 2001 dawns, many of us will still be alive to see it. But it will be our children and their children who will inherit and inhabit that new century.

It is our duty—as trade unionists, as workers, as citizens—building on our past, to give to future generations of Americans a century free from fear and bright with promise.

Trickle-Down Theory Supreme

From a Labor Day statement by Howard D. Samuel, president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.

A YEAR AGO the Industrial Union Dept. viewed with alarm the potential consequences of a Reagan Administration. We feared that regulatory protection for American communities and workers—such as OSHA and environmental, prevailing wage and civil rights laws—would be undermined. We predicted that unemployment would be used as a tool to keep wages down, and that the trickle-down theory would once again reign supreme.

We could see no recognition of the need to revitalize the declining U.S. industrial base, impacted by unfair competition from abroard and corporate manipulation at home. We knew that the voice of America's working men and women would no longer be listened to at the highest levels of government, and that business would have a freer hand to push back the hard-won achievements of organized labor.

The Reagan Administration now is claiming it has established a new agenda, and has done so in response to a national mandate.

ON BOTH COUNTS the Administration is wrong. The Reagan agenda is not new; it is old. It represents not a bold and creative effort to meet our problems, but instead a retreat to old blueprints which past events have long since discredited.

Despite the support of many moderate Republicans and conservative Democrats in Congress, this Administration has no legitimate claim to a national mandate. There is no question that last November a slim majority of the American people no longer felt that the Carter Administration had the answers to our problems. They were looking for an alternative.

But there is no evidence from that election, from continuing opinion polls, and from the recent special elections in a few states, that a majority of the American people wants to water down civil rights or environmental or safety laws, or turn over a larger proportion of our resources to the rich, or reduce the role of the federal government in assuring a prosperous society, with equal opportunity for all.

THERE IS NO alternative but for workers and for our allies to do everything in our power to move the Administration away from its present direction, to awaken friends in Congress to their responsibilities, to inform the American people of the peril that confronts our nation.

Our fundamental goals have not changed: to strengthen the nation's economic and political foundation so that all Americans can reap the fruits of our democratic heritage of freedom, security and equal opportunity. On this Labor Day, the Industrial Union Dept. is committed to this course.

Donahue on Labor Day

'We Find Ourselves Embattled...'

By Thomas R. Donahue

ON LABOR DAY, the nation pays respects to those who toil for a living—white-collar workers and blue, skilled and unskilled, those who work with their hands and those who work with their minds—because the enduring strength of America lies in its workers. They are the ones who have given their best efforts to build better lives for themselves, for their families and for future generations and, in the process, they have built a far better nation as well.

America was conceived as a classless nation—the Declaration of Independence proclaimed that principle when it said that "all men are created equal." Yet workers have struggled for two centuries and more to obtain some measure of that equality that was supposed to be the hallmark of our society and the birthright of its people—and that struggle continues to this day. For two centuries and more, we have struggled to tear down some of the barriers which insulated the wealthy and isolated the workers, depriving us of our right to share more fully in the wealth we have helped to produce—and that struggle continues to this day.

DESPITE OUR BEST efforts, we find ourselves, on this Labor Day 1981, embattled and in danger. What little social and economic equality we have managed to attain are in danger of being swept away.

There is a movement afoot in the country to erect new barriers, to establish an economic caste system alien to America—to create a permanently entrenched, tiny elite of the wealthy and the privileged; to press down new and onerous economic burdens upon workers and their families—the ones already carrying a disproportionately large share of the cost of government; to set in place a permanent underclass of the unfortunate and the disadvantaged; and, inevitably to set one economic class against the other.

We cannot allow this to happen.

Over the first century and a half of this country's history, we took only tiny, tentative steps toward creating a social order rooted in equity and compassion. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution delineated our hopes, but workers had to fight tooth and nail to give them substance.

OUR PROGRESS accelerated in the past half century, from the days of Franklin Roosevelt forward. But if the pace of progress accelerated, the programs put in place from the New Deal through the Great Society were enacted neither overnight nor in haste. Far from it. They were born out of long and arduous effort, out of extensive public hearings in which the views of all parties were aired and weighed, out of lengthy and often acrimonious debate, and most of the time out of compromise between what was desirable and what was achievable.

Throughout the Administrations of eight Presidents and through 24 consecutive Congresses, these programs were opposed by those who believed in neither equality nor compassion—but they survived. Under eight Presidents and 24 Congresses, these programs were refined and enlarged to make them more effective, amended and modified to make them more efficient—and they survived.

Now we are witnessing efforts to wrench that intricate structure of social legislation from the statute books. The blame falls squarely on the shoulders of an Administration which has distorted the results of the last election into what it claims was a "mandate" for a wholesale and mindless retreat from our solemn obligations.

The blame falls, as well, on a Congress which knuckled under to pressure, not from the general public but from the wealthy and the profit-heavy corporations. Congress surrendered to the few who stand to gain the most—the people of little faith, less hope and absolutely no charity—and agreed to the abandonment of programs and policies which have served our people and their nation well.

To see basically sound and socially desirable programs tossed onto the scrap heap is bad enough; to see this happen without even the semblance of public hearings to gauge the true national temper or to debate these programs' social merits is unthinkable. Not once did the budget-cutters ask, "Are these programs useful?" All they wanted to know was, "How much do they cost?" And when they supplied their own answer, "They cost too much," the programs were thrown out the window, and the people to the wolves.

IN THE PIOUS name of a "balanced budget"—that last refuge of those who care nothing about the poor, the young, the old, the weak and the helpless, or indeed, about workers—these programs are being dismantled. We in the AFL-CIO know it's desirable to balance the government's income and outgo. But we object, and strenuously, to having, not the general welfare but the almighty dollar, be the scale on which we weigh the decision to wipe out a half century of progress.

We have been taught that politics is the art of give and take—but that speaks to the notion of compromise. There is no compromise in the great give-away-take-away game being played in Washington—the takeaway from the employed and the unemployed, from the elderly, the children, the sick, the poor; the giveaway to the wealthy, the oil barons, the stock speculators, the multinational corporations.

To our regret, the Congress acquiesced in this scheme. In the debate over economic policy, no clear battlelines were ever drawn between the two political parties. Both engaged in a gigantic bidding war—not over principles, only over imagined votes. The concept of fair play was dispensed with, tax cuts were placed on the block, and only the fat-cat bidders were allowed into the auction.

And what happened?

Social security, Medicare and Medicaid, unemployment insurance and trade adjustment assistance, public service jobs, aid to schools and students, food stamps, school lunches, benefits to the working poor, urban and rural redevelopment—local transit subsidies and aid to our cities—all were put to the ax by the political executioners.

THE $214 BILLION being withdrawn from these programs won't go to balance the federal budget—it will help underwrite $286 billion in tax breaks, most of which will be handed over to the wealthiest of individuals and the most profitable of corporations. To a mere six percent of all taxpayers—the ones earning over $50,000 a year—will go one-third of the tax cuts. To the biggest corporations—particularly the electric and gas utilities and the profit-glutted oil companies—will go another third. The rest will be dribbled out to workers and their families—pennies at a time.

Take the average American family—a worker, a spouse, and two children. If that family earns $15,000 a year, it will find the sum of $1.34 cents more in the weekly pay envelope this October, and $2.54 more next July. If the family income is $20,000 a year, October's tax cut will amount to $2.42 and in July 1982 it will go all the way up to $4.59. At the $25,000 level, the tax cut will be worth $3.59 in October and $7.01 next July.

And what does this Administration say to workers and their families? "Now don't throw this money around," the President says. "Invest it." What nonsense! The increased transit fares in most cities, higher health care costs or a gallon or two of milk for the kids, or a few cans of soup and a loaf of bread, will eat up those extra pennies each week.

THE ADMINISTRATION insists it is being fair because, it says, taxes are being cut equally across the board. The $100,000-a-year executive earns five times as much as the $20,000-a-year worker—but the executive's tax cut is going to be twelve times as large.

In the face of these gross inequities, we in the trade union movement are told not to worry. We are urged to be patient, to endure inflation and unemployment, to put up with poverty and misery, because things will somehow turn out right in the end. We are told that if the government subsidizes the rich, they, in turn, will help middle-income workers and the poor. They call it "supply-side" economics, but that's just the old, discredited "trickle-down" theory dolled up in a new dress—lavishing money on those at the top of the economic heap in the hope that some of the money will seep down, someday, to the rest of society. It's an idea which never held water in the past, and it's just as porous today.

We in the trade union movement are urged to give the Administration's economic theories a chance. These are the same theories which the incumbent Vice President ridiculed, just a little over a year ago, as "voodoo economics." These are the same theories which the President's own Majority Leader in the Senate conceded, as recently as last month, were little more than a "riverboat gamble." We agree with what the Vice President said then, and with what the Republican Majority Leader says now. We think the Administration is recklessly shooting craps with the economic destiny of America, and the dice are loaded against us.

WE IN THE TRADE UNION movement are told to stifle our dissent, but this we will not do. We would not wish to have the absence of protest be misinterpreted—we are not silent partners in the Administration's high-stakes gamble with the security of the American people and the welfare of their nation.

We are told there are political benefits to be reaped. "This is the President's program," we are told, "and when it fails, we'll pick up the pieces the next time around." We reject that counsel. Unless we undo the mischief that is being wrought, there may be no next time, nor any pieces left to pick up.

We are told to be good losers. That may be fine in games; it has no place in the grim struggle for economic survival. There is no virtue in adopting a "sportsmanlike" posture, not while our system is caving in around our ears.

We are told that, because Ronald Reagan won last November, we should just roll over and play dead. But that has never been our way, nor will it be. That would imply that ours is a lost cause—and we do not believe that to be true.

SO ON THIS Labor Day 1981, we in the AFL-CIO stand straight and proud and tall, and we proclaim our message loud and clear: We do not intend to abandon our struggle for jobs, justice and social progress. We do not intend to abandon our struggle for a more equitable distribution of the wealth of this nation.

In the hundred years of the American trade union movement, we have learned that the battle is never over. As long as we remain united in spirit and commitment, as long as we have breath in our bodies and blood in our veins, there will be no final defeat on any battleground.

We have lost a round—and we may lose another, and another. But we will always be back—again, and again. And we are going to win, because we are not going to quit. Not today, and not tomorrow.

'Only Counter-Force Is Labor'

From a Labor Day statement by Robert A. Georgine, president of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

ON A NATIONAL holiday established expressly to honor their performance, the working people of the United States, particularly the organized, find themselves battling against heavy odds merely to retain protections acquired over a century.

Many of those in power on Labor Day 1981—the politically and financially dominant—are attempting to take away those rights so hard won. Contractors and business interests and their supporters in government, openly seek to destroy the prevailing wage system. They would subvert the minimum wage by reducing it for young workers. They would scuttle the three principal laws guaranteeing the payment of that specific community's prevailing wages by contractors awarded federal government contracts—Davis-Bacon, Walsh-Healey and the Service Contract Acts.

THE ONLY counter-force capable of resisting this deadly assault is organized labor. The working people have no other champion, no other advocate, no other defender.

The gains unions have won for workers throughout the world and especially in the United States are not part of our consciousness. We don't think very often, if at all, about our advantages and how organized labor had to struggle to get them.

IF A PERSON belongs to a union his or her wages are pretty good when they work. Even if they work for a contractor who is not covered by a collective bargaining agreement, the non-union wages are almost as good because unions exist. The non-union contractor has to stay pretty close to the rate and working conditions of the unions in order to get manpower with reasonably good skills.

But keep this in mind. If the system were reversed and there were no unions, the employer could let the marketplace decide what wage rates would be, on a day-to-day basis, and what working conditions would be, too. We then would have workers competing with each other, struggling to make a living by working cheaper than a co-worker.

A union is nothing more than a fitting which joins two pieces together. Organized labor unions are joined workers who have the combined power to withstand oppressive employers and obtain that to which they are legitimately entitled.

Kirkland Voices Outrage

Dissident Soviet Worker Faces New Persecution

The AFL-CIO is "outraged" over the brutal treatment of Soviet worker Anatoli Marchenko by Soviet authorities in retaliation for his trade union and human rights activities, Federation President Lane Kirkland asserted.

In a statement condemning the arrest and trial of Marchenko for alleged "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda," Kirkland stressed that charges against the dissident worker include his writings, public support of the Polish trade union movement, and a letter he wrote to George Meany in response to an invitation to attend the 1977 AFL-CIO convention.

KIRKLAND POINTED out that Marchenko, facing a 15-year sentence on the new charges, has already spent 11 years in prisons and labor camps and four years in exile.

He "has been subjected to unusually cruel treatment since his arrest," Kirkland said, emphasizing that Marchenko has been denied a hearing aid, in violation of Soviet law, as well as personal items such as toothbrush, soap or underwear.

"On May 19," Kirkland said, "after having learned of his situation, I sent a package to Mr. Marchenko in Vladimir prison. The package contained underwear, socks, soap, a toothbrush, and a shirt and pants for exercising."

"The package has been returned. The Soviet authorities would not allow Mr. Marchenko even these minimal hygenic necessities. The return of this package speaks volumes about the character of Mr. Marchenko's jailers and indeed of the Soviet rulers," Kirkland declared.

The federation president called on the U.S. government to intercede for Marchenko, "through whatever channels are deemed appropriate and effective."

"HIS BARBAROUS treatment," Kirkland asserted, "is not an internal affair of the Soviet Union. It is clear violation of the Helsinki Agreement."

Kirkland pressed other free labor movements to speak out on Marchenko's behalf "through every available means."

Among the evidence expected to be held against Marchenko is a letter addressed to delegates to the 1977 AFL-CIO convention to which he and five other Soviet dissidents were invited to attend by former AFL-CIO President Meany.

IN THE LETTER dated Dec. 1, 1977, but not received by the AFL-CIO until February 1978, Marchenko said he had heard about his invitation to the convention "by listening to foreign radio."

Marchenko's communication detailed low pay and oppressive working conditions as well as food shortages, inadequate housing, lack of winter heating, clothing and sanitary facilities endured by Soviet workers in Siberia.

Outlining the lack of rights and state control of all institutions and organizations in the USSR, Marchenko chided foreign visitors for favorable reports of conditions in the Soviet Union.

"When I read the estatic reports of your compatriots about my country," Marchenko said, "I would like to address them with the words of our contemporary song: 'If you envy this, you can come and sit next to me.' Yes, next by my stove, next to me on a bed without sheets, next to me in the communal outhouse, preferable in the winter time."

Lovell Nominated Under Secretary

Malcolm R. Lovell, Jr., has been nominated as Under Secretary of Labor, the No. 2 post at the Labor Dept. which has remained vacant since the Reagan Administration took office.

President Reagan also announced his intention to name Leonara Cole-Alexander as director of the Women's Bureau, another key department position that has been unfilled. Both posts require Senate confirmation.

Lovell, who served as assistant secretary of labor for manpower during the Nixon Administration, has headed a rubber industry employers association since 1973.

Cole-Alexander has been vice president for student affairs at the University of the District of Columbia since 1978 and held a similar post with American University from 1973 to 1977.

Screen Actors Tell Reagan Union Supports Controllers

Los Angeles—The Screen Actors Guild's board of directors voted to back the AFL-CIO position condemning the firing of the PATCO strikers and refusal to bargain with their union, and wrote President Reagan telling him so.

SAG rejected formal requests, however, to strip Reagan of his lifetime membership in the union in response to his actions against the controllers.

AT SEPARATE meetings of SAG's Hollywood and New York boards, motions were approved 27 to 2 and 17 to 4 to notify the President of the union's support of the PATCO strike, its concerns over air safety, and over the absence of any fair dispute resolution mechanism that would also give federal workers "proper redress of grievances."

Board members voted 21 to 1 at both meetings not to revoke the President's membership or to press formal charges of "conduct unbecoming a member."

Reagan, a former movie and television actor, was president of SAG from 1947 to 1952 and in 1960.

IN A LETTER to the President drafted by SAG Executive Secretary Chester L. Migden at the board's direction, the union said it "overwhelmingly supports" PATCO and the AFL-CIO position urging resolution of the strike.

SAG is "deeply concerned" over the government's role in the dispute, Migden said. Air traffic controllers, as citizens, should have the right "to redress grievances." Federal workers' unions without the right to strike need an acceptable dispute resolution procedure "for the collective bargaining process to work" in the public sector, he stressed.

The union told the President that requests for disciplinary action against him filed under the union's constitution were rejected because they were "inappropriate."

"The basic right to viewpoint," Migden said, "applies to all citizens including the President of the United States."

Steelworkers Bolster Fund With $100,000 Contribution

A $100,000 contribution from the Steelworkers pushed the AFL-CIO's PATCO Family Fund near the $300,000 mark, with the total climbing with each mail delivery.

The USWA's check matched the donation the Communications Workers had made to help launch the fund, which is being administered by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services. Msgr. George G. Higgins is the trustee, and money contributed will be used to assist families of discharged air traffic controllers who encounter severe financial problems.

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride said the contribution was voted unanimously by the union's executive board.

CONTRIBUTIONS to date have come from both large and small unions, from shop and office collections, and from individuals who have mailed personal contributions to the AFL-CIO.

The Food & Commercial Workers sent in a $25,000 contribution for the family assistance fund. A $5,000 contribution from the Teachers, $3,000 from the Operating Engineers and $2,500 from the New York City Central Labor Council have been received.

Other contributions of $1,000 or over, not previously announced, have come from the Aluminum Workers, the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and the Longshoremen.

Community Services Director Walter G. Davis said interview procedures have been set up to evaluate requests for assistance on the basis of need involving:

- Avoidance of mortgage foreclosure.
- Rental payments necessary to avoid eviction.
- Medical emergency costs.
- Payments to avoid repossession of essential household goods.
- Essential clothing for family members and funds for food when not available from other sources.
- Home fuel needs.

'A Tiny Check' to Aid PATCO Families

A retired couple from Maine made one of the first contributions to the PATCO Family Fund, a check for $10 enclosed in a letter to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland.

Howard and Blanche Browning were outraged at the jailing of strikers, the heavy fines against their union and other tactics they had associated with totalitarian regimes.

"We enclose a tiny check, all we can afford now," they wrote, asking Kirkland to have it cashed and used to help the union controllers. And they followed through with letters to Reagan and Maine's congressional delegation protesting the "vindictive" punishment of strikers.

Reagan's Quotes On Strike Policy 'Misread History'

leaders had supported organization of government workers only on the condition that "public employees could never be allowed to strike."

IT HAS ONLY been "in recent years," Reagan contended, that "some leaders of organized labor have retreated from labor's earlier stand against public employee strikes."

Kirkland, who had addressed the Carpenters convention banquet the previous night, made these points in a later statement responding to Reagan:

- When Massachusetts Gov. Calvin Coolidge, later to become President, fired Boston policemen who struck when their leaders were suspended for affiliating with the AFL, Gompers termed the firings "an autocratic abuse of power." The 1920 AFL convention lauded the strikers in a resolution.
- In 1935, Meany himself led a successful strike against the federal government to maintain prevailing wage rates on WPA jobs.
- In 1975, while Meany was president, the AFL-CIO convention adopted a resolution calling for federal legislation covering collective bargaining in the public sector and recognizing the right to strike in public employment.

"That remains the AFL-CIO position," Kirkland said.

Kirkland stressed, however, that the real question "is not one of history, but of resolving a current dispute—the air traffic controllers strike. The issues of that dispute can only be resolved through the resumption of negotiations."

History's lesson, Kirkland said, "is that problems don't go away. They need to be faced and resolved."

Renewed Spirit Marks Labor Day

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI | Saturday, September 12, 1981 | No. 37

FROM REVIEWING STAND, in front of the New York Public Library, union leaders and dignitaries wave and applaud the six-hour Labor Day parade up Fifth Ave. There were bands, balloons, placards, banners and more than 150,000 union members participating, including striking air controllers and high-stepping Rockettes.

Observances Stress Issues For Workers

By David L. Perlman

Labor Day 1981 was a proud and joyful parade by 150,000 union members up New York's Fifth Ave., led by a 105-piece band. And it was most of the 8,987 residents of Covington, Va., turning out to watch or march with members of Local 675 of the Paperworkers.

It was a Labor Day Mass in a Washington, D.C., church, and it was a march to Detroit's Kennedy Square that was billed as "a warm-up" for union members who are coming by bus to Washington on Sept. 19 to take part in Solidarity Day.

LABOR DAY was celebrated from coast to coast with family outings and games for the kids. But under the double spur of the labor federation's centennial year and trade union outrage at the firing and jailing of air traffic controllers, union members marched and demonstrated in record numbers.

A United Press International (UPI) news item from Boise, Ida., gives some of the special flavor of this Labor Day.

In Boise, UPI reported, "unions representing just about every worker in the state carried placards in support of Idaho's air traffic controllers."

The Labor Day weekend is when the Sunday television interview programs focus on the trade union movement, and this year was no exception.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland tried to make questioners on the CBS Face the Nation program understand that the labor movement isn't about to wither away because it is at odds with the President's economic program and doesn't have many victories in a conservative-controlled Congress.

"We're concerned," Kirkland readily agreed, at such things as weakening of job safety regulations, severe cuts in a host of programs that labor supports and the nation needs, and the continuing threat to a half-century of progress.

"We intend to fight," he said. "We state our case to Congress as effectively as we can. We call upon our allies to do the same."

FURTHER, "the nice thing about a democracy is that there's always a second chance. It isn't that the people always do the right thing, but they always have a chance to correct their errors, and there will be other elections."

Nor does the labor movement "exist solely to seek the enactment of legislation. The labor movement exists and was founded to advance the interests of working people through a variety of means . . .

Complaint Filed with ILO

Air Controllers' Strike Triggers ICFTU Charges

The AFL CIO lent its strong endorsement to a complaint of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions against the U.S. government over its handling of the air traffic controllers' strike.

The complaint, filed with the International Labor Organization's Freedom of Association Committee in Geneva, charges the U.S. government with "infringement of basic trade union rights," specifically those principles contained in ILO Conventions 87, 98, and 151 guaranteeing workers the right to strike and bargain collectively.

AFL CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a letter to ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard that the Reagan Administration "has, we believe, violated important conventions of the ILO in its intemperate treatment" of PATCO (the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organizaiton) before and after the union's Aug. 3 strike against the Federal Aviation Administration, the controllers' employer.

The ICFTU complaint, drawn up at its Brussels headquarters, calls upon the ILO's Freedom of Association Committee to examine "these serious violations of basic trade union rights" by the U.S. government, and forcefully call that government's attention to its obligations and duties as a member state of the ILO.

"It is our hope that prompt action on the part of the ILO will encourage a speedy and just resolution to this dispute between the U.S. government and its employees," the ICFTU declared.

IT NOTED "with concern" that the U.S. government's rededication to the principles of human dignity and freedom as stated in a special message to Blanchard from President Reagan last June appears to have been "mislaid when dealing with workers in its own employ."

The ICFTU complaint detailed specific violations by the Reagan Administration in its intractable position toward PATCO. The U.S. government has refused to meet with the union since the strike and has refused repeated requests for mediation and conciliation, it noted. It further charged that the Administration's move to decertify the union "could be considered as being tantamount to the dissolution of the union by administrative action."

In addition, the government's refusal to bargain on safety issues raised by the union, together with its refusal to bargain at all after Aug. 3 "is a clear violation of the requirement to negotiate and obtain collective agreements," the ICFTU charged.

Other evidence of anti-union discrimination and interference in PATCO's

Black Workers Struck by Surge In Jobless Rate

By James M. Shevis

Joblessness among black workers jumped to a record 15 percent in August, pushing the overall unemployment rate for the nation to 7.2 percent, an increase of two-tenths of 1 percent over the month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

For black and other minority teenagers, aged 16-19, the jobless rate last month rose to a record 45.7 percent, eclipsing the previous high of 40.9 percent registered in August 1977. The category includes Indian, Eskimo, Asian and Pacific and some Hispanic youths. For black teenagers alone, BLS said, the jobless rate for the month was 50.7 percent, an increase of 10.7 percent over the previous month.

BLS COMMISSIONER Janet L. Norwood said in a statement that there was no clear explanation why unemployment among black teenagers soared in August. They accounted for about 400,000 of the

Unions Pressing Big Turnout for Solidarity Day

All stops are out in the drive to bring thousands of trade union members to Washington for Solidarity Day.

More than 35 national and international unions have prepared mailings to members' homes, concentrating on those within at least a 300-mile driving radius of Washington and urging them to turn out with their families for the Sept. 19 rally.

OTHER PROJECTS include distribution of leaflets in offices and job sites, ads in union publications, bulletin board postings, pledge card drives and phone banks.

The effort to draw union members who can provide their own transportation to Washington has been supplemented by scores of central labor bodies, local unions, labor support groups, and allied organizations that have mounted their own information campaigns. Many organizations have set up car caravan information

Kirkland Hits CBS Refusal To Air Labor Day Broadcast

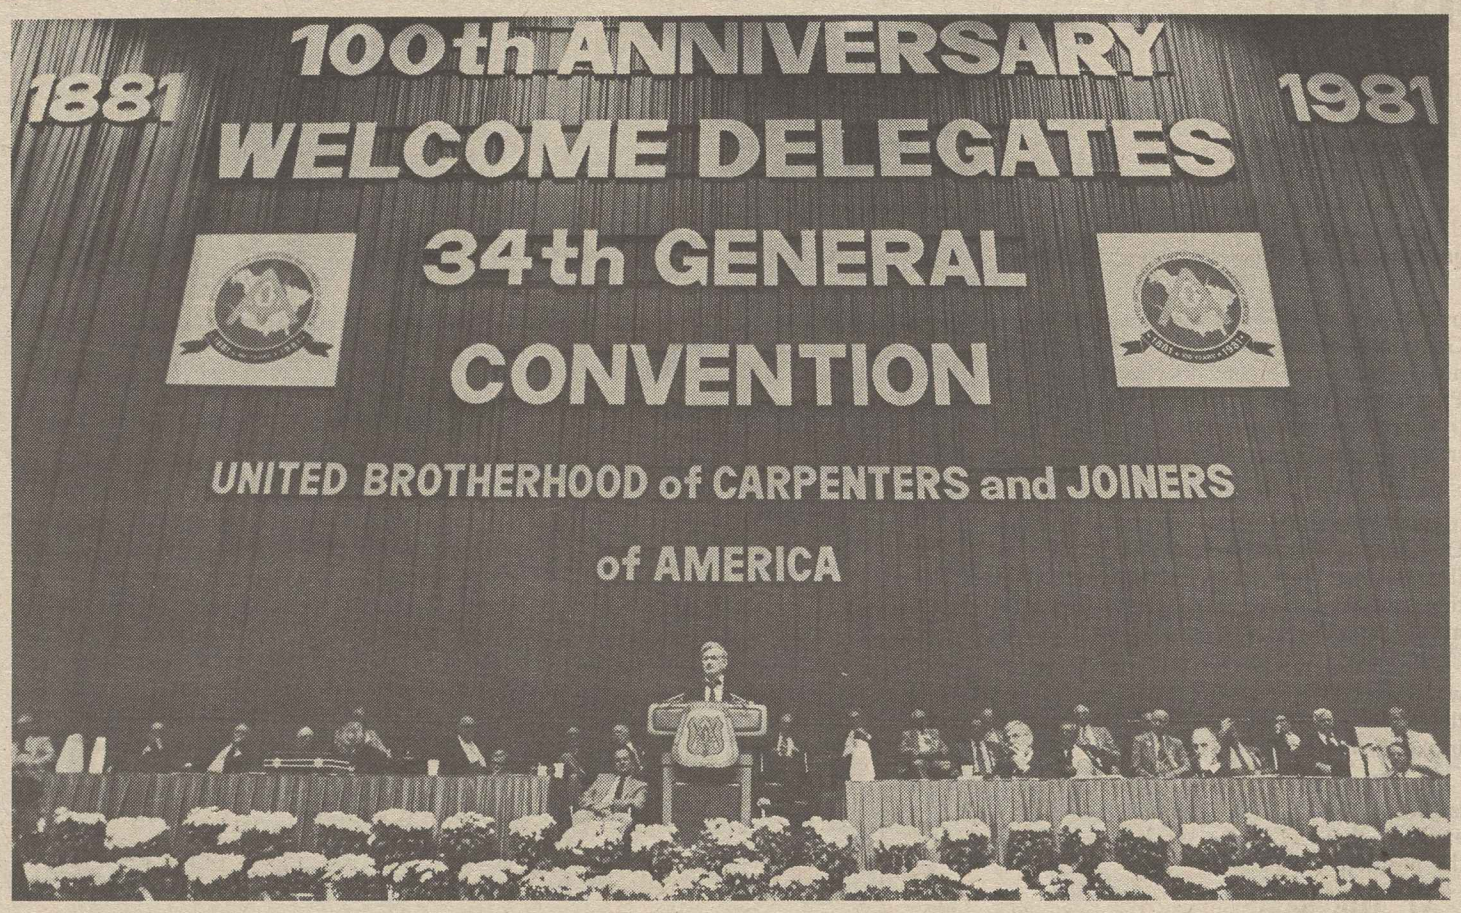
By Susan Dunlop

CBS Radio refused to broadcast a Labor Day message taped by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland over its national network, breaking a 35-year tradition and drawing a charge of censorship from the federation's president.

The network withdrew its commitment to air the broadcast on Friday before Labor Day, claiming that the text dealt with "controversial issues of a political nature."

SINCE 1946, the nation's major radio networks have carried Labor Day addresses by federation officers. The 1981 messages by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Vice President John H. Lyons were aired as scheduled on the NBC and Mutual radio networks.

The Kirkland message was carried in the west on the Intermountain Network and on a number of local radio stations affiliated with CBS which had requested tapes directly from the AFL-CIO.



Kirkland observed in a statement that the network's act "does not serve the cause of full and open discussion of public affairs and the free flow of ideas." He compared the incident to the "current dispute in Poland between the Solidarity union and the government-controlled media."

HIS MESSAGE, he asserted, was no more controversial or political "than the statements broadcast daily by Administration and congressional leaders."

In the text of the broadcast, Kirkland said the fundamental issue confronting the

Carpenters Celebrate First 100 Years

CENTENNIAL CONVENTION of the Carpenters was held in Chicago, and this striking backdrop tells the story. President William Konyha welcomes the delegates to the challenges of the union's second century.

By Rex Hardesty

Chicago—The second century of the Carpenters opens with the union facing the need to expand its organizing in the Sun Belt states while protecting the interests of members in the older areas of the North and Northeast, President William H. Konyha told the union's centennial convention.

That task must be started, Konyha noted, in a repressive political and economic climate that is stifling construction employment while encouraging attacks on Davis-Bacon prevailing wage laws, OSHA protections and social security.

THE CARPENTERS returned to the site of the union's August 1881 founding —the city of Chicago—for the centennial celebration. The 2,434 delegates voted to return the convention to its regular schedule with 1986 the next date. Delegates also re-elected the union's five general officers without opposition: Konyha, Vice Presidents Pat Campbell and Sigurd Lucassen, Sec. John S. Rogers and Treas. Charles E. Nichols. Ten district board members were also unanimously re-elected.

Otherwise, the convention was largely a centennial celebration, which Rogers described as lasting for the coming year and featuring four major parts: a stage show, "Knock on Wood," which was also videotaped at the convention; a popular history, "The Road to Dignity," by labor historian Thomas R. Brooks, distributed at the convention; a scholarly history by Walter Galenson of Cornell; and a series of local events arranged through state humanities councils.

Rogers also described a comprehensive radio and television advertising campaign on the centennial. The ads close with an organizing appeal, "Why don't you join us?" They provide a toll-free 800 number to contact Carpenter offices.

PRESIDENT REAGAN, who had previously agreed to serve as honorary centennial co-chairman, spoke to the convention on its fourth day and made his first public remarks on the striking Air Traffic Controllers after his Aug. 3 directive that they return to work or be fired.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland spoke briefly to the convention banquet the night before Reagan's appearance. Kirkland reminded the banquet that the Carpenters union was "illegal" when it was founded, considered a conspiracy by court interpretations of that era.

Kirkland also pointed out that his predecessor, George Meany, had led a 1935 strike against the federal government in New York in which WPA workers and their instructors, members of building trades unions, struck together to protect prevailing wage laws on the WPA projects. Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan also appeared at the convention banquet.

AFTER REAGAN'S speech the next day, Kirkland issued a point-by-point refutation of the President's "misreading" of history, primarily the contentions that all public employee unions had no-strike clauses in their founding constitutions and that the federations of that era would only charter them if they had such no-strike clauses. Neither contention is true, Kirkland's statement noted.

Reagan has consistently used the no-strike pledge that federal employees are forced to sign to get a job as his excuse for his actions against the Air Traffic Controllers.

THE RESPECT shown Reagan in his office as President did not temper the economic complaints or Solidarity Day support of Konyha, however. He characterized Reagan's newly won tax-cut package as one that "distributes nickels and dimes in the zones where the working folks live while it showers big bucks up there on the hills where the rich people live and admire the scenery."

Konyha drew resounding approval from the convention when he welcomed former members of the Lathers, which merged into the Carpenters in 1978, and when he pledged to continue close surveillance on how and where some $3.5 billion in UBC pension funds are invested.

Konyha said prudence and "correct and stringent standards" on the handling of pension funds are compatible with "saying to Mr. Banker or Mr. Money Manager, 'If you want to manage our members' money, you're going to have to make it serve our members' needs or, mister, we're going to get somebody else to manage it.' "

KONYHA TOLD the convention that Carpenters always have been and always will be "working stiffs—not labor statesmen or phony philosophers." And, Konyha said, "Solidarity Day is the day when the working people together with the senior citizens of this country will be able to have our say, and let's hope the politicians hear our message Sept. 19.

"On issue after issue, since this Administration and this Congress took office, the decisions have in a large degree been tilted toward the corporations, the banks, the rich and the very affluent sectors of our population," Konyha said.

"But on Sept. 19, we feel confident that the Carpenters, along with thousands of trade union men and women, together with our friends from many public organizations, will make their voices heard in a tremendous display of the people's solidarity."

Konyha's report focused heavily on the Carpenter's industrial division, which has been hurt by plant closings and transfers of jobs across either state or national boundaries.

HE REPORTED that the union had initiated almost 250,000 workers since the 1978 convention, yet had recorded a net loss of 19,079 members. There is a 16 percent unemployment rate in construction, Konyha said, but that sector has stayed relatively stable, as has the union's Canadian membership.

"Our losses, over and above the normal turnover caused by death, retirement and leaving the jurisdiction, have been heaviest among our industrial members. Foreign imports of wood products don't get as much publicity as Datsuns and Toyotas, but the result is the same—American unemployment."

Konyha recited the political losses from House seats lost in the Northeast and gained in the South and Southwest, describing plant closings and quick transfer from union to non-union status via opening a new plant in another state.

"AND IF ANY of you think that organizing in Texas or Florida is the same as organizing in some of our older strongholds, think again," Konyha said.

But in tracing the Carpenters' history through the American Plan of 60 years ago to the "right-to-work" movement of today, Konyha pledged the weapons of more flexible work-rules, affirmative action and modern communication methods —such as those displayed in the centennial celebration—will be used in the organizing effort that is essential to the union's future.

Musical Play Dramatizes Union's Story

Chicago—"God made the forests, but Big Bill Hutcheson claims jurisdiction over them."

That description of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters is one of the musical choruses from the play, "Knock on Wood," with which the Carpenters celebrated their centennial at their 34th convention.

THE PLAY, written by Arnold Sungaard and using the "living newspaper," format, ran for a week at Chicago's Aries Crown Theatre, part of the McCormick Place complex where the convention was held.

With the admission held to $3 and a vigorous promotion by the Carpenters and the Chicago Federation of Labor to attract trade unionists, the play had several sellouts in its public showing as well as in the preview showings for the convention delegates.

The cast of eight was headed by E. G. Marshall, a leader in the actors' unions who played both union founder Peter J. McGuire and Hutcheson. The format uses slides and movies on a giant screen between the actors' appearances.

The difficulty of presenting a lively story with song and dance and still telling some of the relatively complicated stories of trade unionism was exemplified in the account of the Carpenters' long fight to stop court injunctions against union members for refusing to install non-union products.

THROUGH THE device of a courtroom witness, a non-union Wisconsin millwright who was making 12 cents an hour for the 12-hour day, the play unfolds the story of a seven-year wait for the 1917 Supreme Court verdict ending the injunctions, which were reinstated by the Taft-Hartley Act 30 years later.

The section on jurisdiction is part of a profile of William H. Hutcheson, president of the Carpenters from 1915 to 1951. The union has had three presidents since: Maurice Hutcheson, William Sidell and William Konyha.

The play describes how John L. Lewis took a swing at Hutcheson at the 1935 AFL convention in the founding days of the CIO, but remained such a fast friend that Lewis later entrusted $1 million in Mine Worker funds to Hutcheson for safekeeping.

THE PLAY ran 72 minutes in all and included a thorough description of the founding days of the union featuring Marshall as McGuire. Young McGuire was with Sam Gompers at the 1881 Pittsburgh convention of the Federation of the Organized Trades & Labor Unions, from which the AFL-CIO stemmed, and is also credited with the idea of Labor Day as a national holiday. McGuire was the union's secretary-general from 1881 to 1901 and was succeeded by Frank Duffy, who served until 1948.

McGuire's attempts to build a permanent Carpenters' union found fruit in St. Louis, where the union's first significant strike won $2.50 a day in wages and led to the bargaining goal of a national fixed rate—enforced by a national union—because of the hopping from city to city by carpenters seeking higher wages. McGuire's quest for the eight-hour day is also featured.

McGuire's nine rules on a strike are dramatically portrayed in a discussion between McGuire and Duffy. The rules range from formation of a seven-member strike committee to greeting potential scabs at the railway depot and assigning pickets at jobsites other than their own.

ONE OF THE most memorable songs in the play recurs throughout, depicting the "golden harvest" from unity and better wages, which will provide "a little slice for each, and a little slice for all, when we all sit down together in the great harvest hall."

History Project Funded For Baltimore Steelworkers

Baltimore—The Baltimore Steelworkers History Project has been awarded a grant by the National Endowment for the Humanities to prepare an exhibition on the history of the union and its role in the growth of the city.

The $200,000 grant will go to Essex Community College which will work with Steelworkers Locals 2609 and 2610 to put together the exhibition of photographs, artifacts, memorabilia and text.

An additional $130,000 will be provided by the college for production and travel. The exhibition will open in Baltimore on Labor Day 1982 and travel for two years to some eight cities in the East and Midwest, including the AFL-CIO's George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

Rallies Focus on Issues

Renewed Spirit Marks Labor Day Observance through collective bargaining, through organization, agitation, education."

Kirkland, Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan on ABC's Issues and Answers, and Government Employees President Kenneth T. Blaylock on NBC's Meet the Press were questioned about the Administration's handling of the air traffic controllers' strike.

DONOVAN WAS asked whether it might have been appropriate on Labor Day for the President to offer amnesty to the strikers, "make some gesture so that the skilled employees at this important job might find their way back to the job."

Donovan's reply was that the strikers weren't "fired." By going out on strike they had in effect "quit" because "they broke the law," he contended.

The President's position, Donovan said, is "there will be no amnesty . . . and I applaud the President for having taken the position."

AT THE SAME time, over another network, Blaylock sought to put the strike in a different perspective—as the desperation move by a group of workers whose problems had been ignored by this and previous administrations.

Without better methods of resolving differences, he warned, public sector work stoppages will occur despite punitive laws.

Kirkland said in response to a question that President Reagan has shown that "the federal government in all its might and power, with the assistance of the military and the courts, is capable of crushing a very small union."

REAGAN HAS "established the fact that he is hard-fisted," Kirkland said. "What remains to be established is where's the rest of him? Where's the heart? And where's the understanding of these people's problems that will make it possible to have a decent resolution . . . to serve the public interest best, restore these qualified people to their jobs and get the airlines running normally again."

Kirkland was grand marshal of the New York City Labor Day parade, marching the route with AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, New York City Central Labor Council President Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., and other organizers of the parade.

Then, from the reviewing stand, they greeted the union contingents as they marched amid seas of baloons, banners and flags. Cheers from the tens of thousands who lined the streets signalled the arrival of ranks of air traffic controllers. A continuous ripple of applause greeted the high-stepping Rockettes, union members all.

In the nation's capital, AFL-CIO Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler was the speaker at the traditional Labor Day Mass, and Msgr. George G. Higgins received the Greater Washington Central Labor Council's Cardinal Gibbons Award for "dedication to workers' rights."

A WREATH was placed by the statue of James Cardinal Gibbons, as the previous day a wreath had been put by the statue of Samuel Gompers, on a downtown square. All these were traditional.

But Labor Day in the nation's capital also included a march organized by the Central Labor Council in support of PATCO strikers. And with Council President Bob Peterson holding one end of a huge banner and Kistler holding the other end, PATCO strikers and their supporters in the community marched along 16th Street to Meridian Hill Park for a strike support rally.

A TRADITION in Washington is the laying of a wreath during the Labor Day weekend at the statue of Samuel Gompers, the early president of the American Federation of Labor. Greater Washington Central Labor Council President Bob Peterson did the honors this year.

Unions Spur Big Turnout For Solidarity Day Protest

centers to bring together drivers, vehicles and passengers.

In Connecticut, as an example, the State, County & Municipal Employees encouraged participation in the protest with the flyers outlining how the Reagan Administration's budget cuts will cause the layoff of thousands of public employees, many in that state. Machinists members throughout the state also received leaflets urging them to join the protest. An International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers local voted to offset part of the travel expenses of every member who participated in the demonstration.

In the federal sector, the Government Employees, with a heavy concentration of members in the Washington-Baltimore metropolitan area plan to contact every metropolitan area, plan to contact every

Members of the Postal Workers have received a letter from the union's president, Moe Biller, praising them for their show of "Postal Solidarity" in the 1981 contract negotiations and urging them to bring the same enthusiasm to the Solidarity Day demonstration.

NATIONAL AND international union efforts include mailings of more than 25,000 information packets by the Steelworkers, over 10,000 by the Service Employees, and 25,000 by the Communications Workers, along with similar promotions by more than 30 unions and many of their locals.

A mailing by the Newspaper Guild to some 3,700 of its members within driving distance of Washington includes an appeal to march from the union's president, Charles A. Perlik, Jr.

Perlik's letter received a personal reply from the wife of a retired janitor who had worked for 17 years for the Baltimore Sun. The letter explained that the retiree would not be able to attend the rally since he was blind, paralyzed and confined to a hospital. But, his wife told Perlik, "if I were younger (I am now 81) and in better health myself, I would come to Washington to march in his place because I know my husband would want with all his heart to be there."

Estimates released by the AFL-CIO Solidarity Day office indicate that participation in the march could hit 100,000.

UNION MEMBERS in the Washington metropolitan area, and along the East Coast and in the Midwest, also were urged to turn out for the Sept. 19 rally by support organizations including the Coalition of Labor Union Women, the A. Philip Randolph Institute. and Frontlash.

The high turnout of union members within driving range of the Capital will bring thousands of cars into Washington, along with caravans of buses. Other demonstrators are planning to arrive by train.

The AFL-CIO Solidarity Day office has information available on special parking areas for both car caravans and buses. Parking is also available at the large satellite lots adjacent to the city's suburban Metrorail subway stops which all individuals are being encouraged to use.

RIDES ON Metrorail will be free from 8 a.m. to midnight on Sept. 19. However, riders on the city bus system will pay the regular 60 cents fare.

Washington AFL-CIO President Robert Petersen announced that the free rail trips will be paid for by the AFL-CIO which will give the Metropolitan Transit Authority $45,000 for the day's service and $20,000 to cover the overload.

The decision to pick up the tab for the subways was made, Petersen said, to make it easier for marchers to get downtown for the rally and to ease the impact of the demonstration on Washington's residents.

Kirkland Hits CBS Refusal To Air Labor Day Broadcast

American people is the debate over the purpose of government and its relationship to the people.

"The Administration projects a picture of government as an alien force, sitting on the backs of people, holding them down, repressing their productive energies," Kirkland said.

The labor movement's view, he noted, is of a government "by, for and of the people." In a democracy, he emphasized, "the people have the right to shape their government into an instrument that meets their needs."

THIS IS WHAT the American people have done in the past 50 years when they have used government in "a more active role in promoting the general welfare," Kirkland said.

He charged that the Administration's economic policies are a gamble in which Americans are asked "to risk our jobs, our mortgage, our children's education, our social security and even our national defense."

The labor movement is not prepared to accept such a gamble, Kirkland said, stressing that the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day demonstration will give trade unionists and their allies an opportunity to come to Washington to express "our deep concern over the direction in which the nation is headed."

IN HIS NBC radio broadcast, Donahue traced the history of the trade union movement and the gains it has helped win for all American workers, not only in wages and working conditions, but also in a better standard of living.

The labor movement can take pride in its role in the nation's "progress in the past century toward meeting the economic, and equally important, the spiritual needs of working people," Donahue said.

Throughout its history, he stressed, the labor movement's concerns have gone far beyond the "tangible gains" in the workplace, including wages and conditions, although these remain labor's first job.

"American trade unionists," Donahue said, "have always been deeply concerned with human rights, human dignity and social justice . . . as interested in improving the quality of life as in improving the quality of the workplace."

NOTING THE first anniversary of the founding of the independent Solidarity Union in Poland, Donahue emphasized that the trade union movement has "been a vehicle for the expression, in the United States and around the world, of the basic human need for solidarity."

The union in Poland, he pointed out, "has become the instrument for the Polish people's struggle for freedom and democratic rights."

Lyons, who is president of the Iron Workers, in his broadcast over the Mutual network, rapped the Administration's "supply-side economics" as simply a new name for an old idea, the "redistribution of the nation's wealth" in favor of those already well-off.

These economic programs are likely to worsen rather than help the problems of inflation, unemployment, social instability and high interest rates, Lyons warned.

THE ISSUE of high interest rates is one clear example of the gravity of the economic problems, Lyons said, using the housing industry as an example. With home prices and interest rates "prohibitive, contractors have been driven out of business and the craftsmen who worked for them "have been driven to the unemployment line."

Under the Reagan Administration's program, these conditions are likely to grow worse, Lyons charged. He emphasized that elsewhere in construction, "the bridges that were built by members of our union, the great federal highways and public facilities of all kinds are deteriorating faster than they are being repaired. The public investment that is needed simply to keep America from falling apart has been chopped mercilessly from the budget."

Industrial Unions Hit Hardest by Membership Drop

Union membership in the United States slipped by 385,000 in the recession-hit 1978-80 period, to 22,353,000, according to preliminary estimates by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. But the total was up more than a million over the 1970-80 decade.

The two-year loss was largely in basic industries, many of which were battered by increased imports as well as recession cutbacks.

OVER THE SAME period, union membership continued to grow in the trade, communications, construction and service industries, and in the public sector. But the net membership loss also brought the percentage of non-farm workers carrying a union card from 25 percent in 1978 to 24.7 percent in 1980.

The BLS report showed the largest two-year membership losses reported by the Auto Workers, followed by the Paperworkers, Rubber Workers, Steelworkers and Clothing & Textile Workers.

Gains of over 25,000 members during the same period were listed for the Food & Commercial Workers, Carpenters, Communications Workers, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Machinists and Service Employees.

Year-to-year union membership tallies have fluctuated over the decade, responding to economic cycles as well as to more lasting changes in the nature of the workforce.

For All Americans

ALL AMERICANS have benefitted from organized labor's uphill struggle to improve the standard of living for all workers.

It was the unswerving efforts of trade unions that won the basic eight-hour day most Americans now enjoy.

Unions fought for and won a decent minimum wage, and that is something we still defend in spite of the fact that virtually no union member earns so little.

UNIONS BROUGHT an end to child labor and they fought and they continue to fight, indeed, the sweatshops that exploit the desperately poor.

America's trade unions led the fight to establish both the private pension system and social security to insure working people a decent and a dignified old age.

We fought tirelessly—against very stiff opposition—for protections such as unemployment insurance and workers' compensation.

Because of the perseverance of unions, all American workers today enjoy greater safety and freedom from health hazards on the job.

The labor movement's concerns go far beyond the workplace and the size of the pay envelope.

AMERICAN TRADE unionists have always been deeply concerned with human rights, human dignity and social justice.

We will continue to defend the rights of all Americans to vote, to have the job of their choice, to live in the neighborhoods they choose, to educate their children to the best of their ability.

Our fight against tyranny in the workplace and in the domestic affairs of our nation translates easily into opposition to tyranny anywhere in the world.

The trade union movement has been a vehicle for the expression—in the United States and around the world—of the basic human need for solidarity. People who share common goals, have a natural interest in banding together to achieve them.

WE IN THE labor movement plan to write another chapter in the history of that labor movement on Sept. 19 in Washington, D.C.

We are calling it Solidarity Day, and on that day, the labor movement will be joined by our allies in the civil rights movement, the women's movement, by environmentalists and consumers, by senior citizens, the religious community and many more people all united by the common bond of a dedication to human rights.

We are going to march together, to reaffirm our belief in the future of America and the promise of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness it holds out to all. We are going to march to reaffirm, in our centennial year, the labor movement's historic commitment to social and economic justice for everyone in America.

Fed Policy Backfiring

'Cure' of High Interest Rates Sends Inflation Fever Soaring

By Gus Tyler

IN PURSUIT OF his policy of high and ever higher interest rates, Paul Volcker, chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, has shown remarkable consistency. Replying to his critics on ABC's "Issues and Answers," Volcker said: "No question. Yes, we intend to stick with it." He was talking about high interest rates as a way to check inflation.

If nothing else, Volcker has proven that he is not the kind of man who retreats under fire. Attacks have come from many sides. Small businessmen groan as high interest rates force them into bankruptcy. Wall Street grumbles as stocks decline. Treasury Sec. Donald T. Regan states publicly that the Fed policy is making economic recovery impossible and is adding to the government's debt. Economists point out that high interest rates have, in fact, not deterred inflation at all.

SOME EVEN ARGUE that the high interest rates are indeed inflationary, not deflationary. They list eight reasons:

First, high interest rates raise the price of money, thereby lifting the cost of everything in the economy involving money. Second, the higher rates bankrupt small business and hasten monopoly pricing. Third, high interest rates slow down production and reduce supply, thereby forcing up prices. Fourth, less capital is available to small and medium business for research and development, thereby retarding increases in productivity that could help hold down prices.

Fifth, higher interest rates idle factories, thereby increasing overhead costs and forcing up prices once again. Sixth, higher interest rates increase the borrowing costs of Uncle Sam (also, states, counties and municipalities) to inflate both the taxes and deficits. Seventh, higher interest rates that are intended to curb the money supply do just the opposite, because our higher interest rates attract money from other countries to swell our money supply.

PETER CANELO, an investment analyst for Merrill, Lynch, says that the Feds have lost all credibility, especially in view of the fact that the key indicator—the money supply—has grown by 16 percent in the last six months.

But none of these arguments is changing Volcker's course. He remains consistent.

Which fact has given rise to an eighth reason why the Fed policy is inflationary. Its very consistency adds to inflation.

It is now predictable that if prices rise, interest rates will rise. In these times of inflationary expectations, it is reasonable for any would-be borrower of funds to conclude that interest rates will go up—as they have consistently been doing.

IF THAT is the case, it is prudent to borrow now even if the rate is—let's say—20 percent. Why not? If you delay, the rate will soon be 22 percent. Indeed, it pays to borrow now and to lend out the money later.

Hence, the consistent way in which the Feds apply their policy becomes, in itself, an inflationary factor—expanding the money supply.

A Troubling Course For National Policy

We are deeply troubled by the direction in which our country appears to be heading.

The Reagan program . . . will worsen inflation, unemployment and social instability.

America is building no more than one-third of the housing that is absolutely necessary to meet the needs of the American people. Matters are no better in other parts of the construction field.

The bridges that were built by members of our union, the great federal highways and public facilities of all kinds are deteriorating faster than they are being repaired.

The public investment that is needed simply to keep America from falling apart has been chopped mercilessly from the budget.

And so have investments in public education, public health, public transit and other programs that millions of people depend on.

On Solidarity Day, we intend to demonstrate our concern.

AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons, president of the Iron Workers, in a Labor Day broadcast.

Preservation of Progress at Stake

Labor's 'Century of Struggle' Yielded Gains for All Society

The following is excerpted from a Labor Day broadcast by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland prepared for presentation over the CBS radio network. Although the network refused to air the message, a number of stations affiliated with CBS carried the broadcast.

"WE WANT MORE of the opportunities to cultivate our better natures."

This was part of Samuel Gompers answer to the question, "what does labor want?"

That was in 1893, twelve years after the founding of the national labor center that became the AFL-CIO, whose 100th anniversary we celebrate this year.

"More of the opportunities to cultivate our better natures." This is still what labor wants on Labor Day 1981.

Looking back on our century of struggle and sacrifice, we take pride in the gains American workers have made through their unions. Those gains have not been restricted to a narrow interest group in our society. In fact, all Americans have benefitted from the higher wages, expanded consumer purchasing power, and improved working conditions that unions have fought for.

Our entire society is better off because of labor's victories in the struggle for free public education, social security, unemployment insurance, civil rights laws, voting rights, and many other milestones in our progress toward a more humane and just society.

SOME PEOPLE don't agree and never have. They think our better natures are best cultivated in the economic jungle. They believe in the survival of the fittest. Unfortunately, people who share that view have captured the White House and have cowed a compliant Congress.

They are suspicious of government programs to feed the hungry, educate the young, secure dignity for the elderly, care for the sick, safeguard the rights of minorities, protect consumers, and defend the environment from plunder.

Their philosophy has been summed up by their budget director, David Stockman: "No one is entitled to anything from the government."

This breathtaking statement is remarkable for its candor. It joins the issue—the fundamental issue confronting the American people. What is the purpose of government? What is the relationship between the government and the people?

The Administration projects a picture of government as an alien force sitting on the backs of the people, holding them down, repressing their productive energies.

At the AFL-CIO, we believe government is, in Abe Lincoln's words, "by, for, and of the people." In a democracy the people have the right to shape their government into an instrument that meets their needs.

Now we are told by the Administration that the people's government is the people's enemy.

We are also told that the way to get the government off the backs of the people is to slash the people's programs and give a high tax cut to big corporations and wealthy individuals.

We are told that our government will become more responsive to the people's needs by transferring the people's resources to the rich and powerful. They, in turn, will invest these resources wisely, without government interference, and thereby create new jobs, improve productivity, and ultimately return more tax dollars to the federal treasury.

Presumably, these wealthy and wise men bear no responsibility for our nation's economic problems, and therefore can be trusted to make the right economic decisions for the rest of us—if only we leave them alone and allow the free market to work its magic.

THIS DOCTRINE has a new name—"supply-side economics." We have always known it by another name—the "trickle-down theory." But while the theory is not really new, this is the first time we have been asked to gamble so much on it. We are asked to risk our jobs, our mortgages, our children's education, our social security, and even our national defense.

This is not a gamble the AFL-CIO is prepared to take. We have too great a stake in the American way of life—which we have helped to build—to put it in jeopardy.

We intend to make ourselves heard. On Sept. 19—which we call Solidarity Day—tens of thousands of trade unionists and our allies will go to Washington to express our deep concern over the direction in which our nation is headed.

We will protest the Administration's efforts to dismantle the social programs that reflect humane and compassionate government. We will exercise our constitutional right of petition to assert our demands for jobs and justice. We will march in the spirit of the great abolitionist Frederick Douglass, who said:

"If there is no struggle, there is no progress. Those who profess to favor freedom, and yet deprecate agitation, are men who want crops without plowing up the ground. They want the ocean without the awful roar of its many waves."

THIS LABOR DAY 1981 is a time for all Americans to reflect on the contributions of working people to the nation's progress. It is also a time to reflect on the stake all of us have in preserving that progress.

Despite the grave challenges we face, we are not discouraged. Looking back on our first one hundred years of achievement, we realize that we have faced harder problems than we face today. We have faced worse odds. But we have survived, and we have overcome.

Today, we have a challenge not only to the nation's achievement since the New Deal, but to the trade union movement itself. We intend to meet that challenge, confident that, in their fundamental decency, the American people will not consent to the destruction of one of their fundamental institutions.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

NOW THAT A compliant Congress, moving with unaccustomed speed, has enacted President Reagan's tax and budget "program for economic recovery," what can Americans expect in coming years?

Leaving aside the equity of the tax cuts and the adverse effects of the budget cutbacks on the lives of working and low-income people, is it reasonable to believe that the Reagan program will fulfill its promise of restoring health to the economy?

The President's tax cuts, an unprecedented bonanza for business and upper-income individuals, was sold as a program to unleash a wave of business investment and economic growth.

This growth, as the scenario goes, will create jobs, swell Treasury revenues and, combined with drastic cuts in social spending, lead to a balanced budget by 1984.

Fiscal restraint, along with a tight money policy by the Federal Reserve Board, is supposed to dampen "inflationary expectations" of investors as well as cause workers to expect lower wage increases.

WHILE IT IS too early to pass judgment on "Reaganomics," early warnings point to a grim prognosis.

The ink had scarcely dried on the President's signature on his tax and budget legislation when Wall Street—which had waxed euphoric over Reagan's election—reacted with dismay and confusion.

While a White House spokesman dismissed the financial community's jitters as "a temporary state of mind," investors had sound reasons for their pessimism.

In contrast to the Administration's rosy predictions about a balanced budget, private analysts, including a senior economist at the conservative American Enterprise Institute, predicted that the federal deficit by 1984 could reach $100 billion.

With the exception of the doctrinaire "monetarists" running the Reagan Treasury Dept., economists see obvious contradictions in trying to slow down the economy by restricting the supply of money and credit and spur economic expansion through enormous tax cuts for business.

THIS COMBINATION, in the words of House Budget Committee Chairman James R. Jones (D-Okla.), "is the equivalent of stepping hard on the gas at the same time you slam on the brakes." It portends continuing high interest rates, further showing of the economy and perhaps another recession. The already depressed housing and auto industries will be hardest hit.

Further, corporation executives interviewed recently by the Wall Street Journal didn't show the kind of enthusiasm in their investment plans for the coming year that the Administration's highly touted "supply-side" tax breaks were supposed to arouse.

One reason for the corporations' low-expectation investment plans rests in a major flaw in supply-side economic theory—it doesn't account for the "demand side" of the equation. Whatever the tax incentive, businesses aren't going to invest to produce items people can't afford to buy. The new tax bill does little for the buying power of the average consumer.

ALREADY THE Administration is being forced back to the drawing board by the failure of events to follow its game plan. The non-partisan Congressional Budget Office and private economists predict that the deficit for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1 is likely to more than double the Administration forecast.

From all appearances, about all that Americans can expect from Reaganomics is open-ended budget cuts in vital social programs and an open-ended raid on the U.S. Treasury by corporations and the rich.

PATCO Reprisals, 4.8% Pay Cap

Reagan Labor Relations Policy Ruffles Government Workers

PUBLIC SECTOR workers view with growing apprehension the labor relations policies and actions of the Reagan Administration, Executive Director John Leyden of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. said on Labor News Conference.

But public employees are not intimidated by the Administration's positions, Leyden asserted, and may in fact turn in greater numbers to the "solid, cohesive voice" of unions. He said that the President's hard-line handling of the PATCO dispute and his 4.8 percent cap on the pay increase due federal employees—despite the recommendation of his own pay agent for a 15.1 percent increase—have produced a strong resolve that will be made clear in the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington.

Leyden, a former air traffic controller, said that "contrary to the announced end of the strike by Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis and by various Administration officials, the PATCO strike is not over." He said that "there is no way that the system can function normally, as it did prior to the strike" without the 12,000 trained and experienced professional controllers the President fired.

ALTHOUGH ABOUT 75 percent of commercial flights are operating, Leyden pointed out that "general aviation, which carries more passengers than commercial aviation, has been removed from the system."

Leyden said that he is hopeful that the Administration will "come to its senses, sit down at the bargaining table with those workers, and let the system run as it should."

GROWING APPREHENSION over the policies and actions of the Reagan Administration and their implications for labor-management relations in the public sector will be clear in the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington, Executive Director John Leyden, center, of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. said on Labor News Conference. Leyden was questioned by Michael Arian, left, of Government Employee Relations Report and Lance Gay of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Blacks Suffer New Surge in Jobless Rate

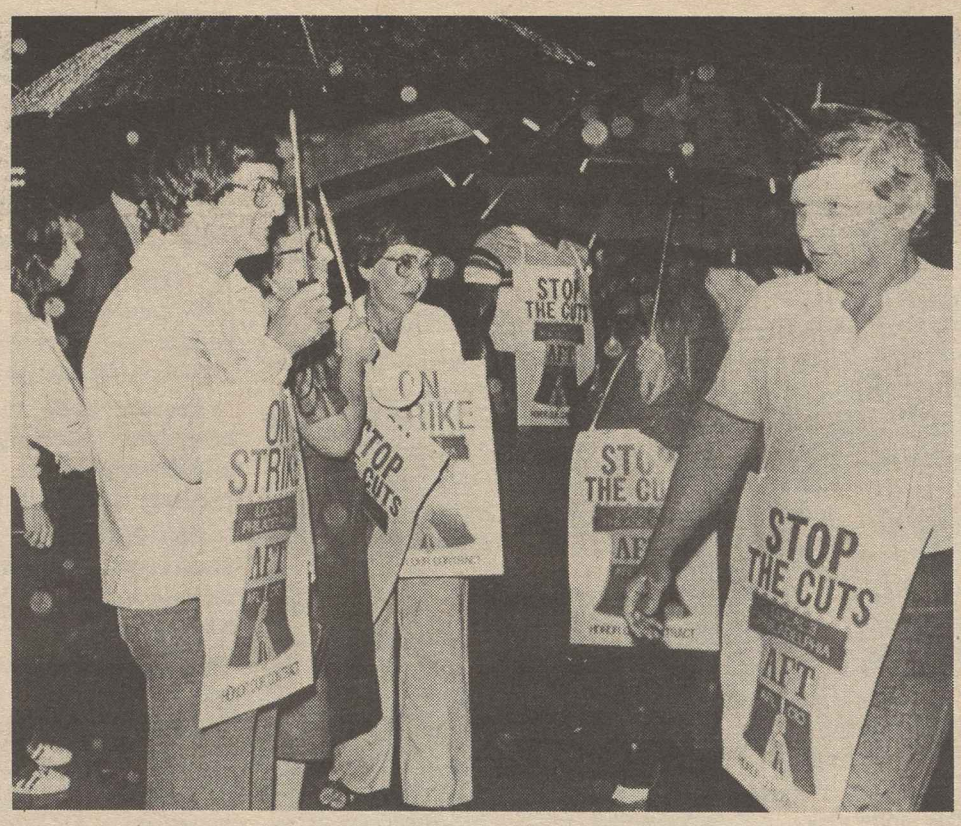
7.7 million workers who were unemployed in August. The jobless rate for black teenagers was about three times the rate for white teenagers, 15.6 percent. The unemployment rate for whites of all ages was 6.1 percent, little changed from the July level.

Norwood cautioned that the labor market experience of the category group is "especially difficult to measure with precision." But she said "the data do confirm that unemployment for black teenagers is a continuing problem." The jobless rate for black teenagers has been between 30 and 40 percent for some time.

Overall joblessness has remained in the 7 to 7.3 percent range since June, after being at about the 7.3 percent level since the beginning of the year.



Total employment in August held fairly steady at 98.9 million, down only slightly from July. Meanwhile, the labor force grew by 138,000 to 106.6 million.

Norwood said the labor market picture last month was "substantially improved" over July a year ago, when the 1980 recession ended. The jobless rate then was 7.8 percent.

"BUT, EXCEPT for the over-the-month improvement we reported last month, the labor market has been somewhat sluggish in recent months," she added.

The BLS report indicated that employment in manufacturing industries, which had been at depressed levels earlier this year, leveled off last month after the July improvement. The only noteworthy over-the-month movements in manufacturing were declines in lumber products and food processing and an increase in the number of machinery jobs.

Employment in mining continued to show strength in August, especially in oil, gas and coal extraction. There was also a job gain in retail trade.

RAIN DIDN'T DAMPEN the determination of these Philadelphia teachers striking to protest the School Board's breach of a no-layoff clause and its unilateral cancellation of a scheduled pay raise. More than 200 AFT members were arrested on the picket line.

Teachers' Strike Protests Layoffs in Philadelphia

Philadelphia—Police here arrested more than 200 striking school teachers protesting widespread layoffs and cancellation of a scheduled pay increase as Mayor William Green called an emergency City Council meeting to deal with the crisis.

The city's 21,000 teachers represented by the Philadelphia Federation of Teachers went on strike Sept. 8. The walkout was prompted by a school board decision to fire 3,700 school employees to meet a $223-million deficit and to balance the city's budget for the 1981-82 academic year.

The school board, which took the action despite a no-layoff clause in a contract reached with the Teachers after a long strike last year, also said it would be unable to pay a 10-percent salary increase provided for this year in the 1980 agreement. The PFT is an affiliate of the American Federation of Teachers.

Elsewhere in Pennsylvania and in five other states, thousands of other teachers were on strike. In the latest walkout, 240 teachers in North Providence, R.I., stayed away from their classrooms. The major issues in the walkouts and contract disputes are pay and hours, with most of the problems stemming from an upsurge in fiscal cuts leading to layoffs.

A random survey by AFT showed that school systems in Massachusetts are the hardest hit with an estimated 7,500 teachers being laid off this fall. The Boston school system alone plans to lay off 1,000 teachers. The 5,000-member Boston Teachers Union voted this week to authorize a strike Sept. 21 if no agreement over the layoffs is reached.

OTHER STATES reporting major teaching layoffs include Illinois, 2,700; Indiana, 1,000; Louisiana, 2,500; Michigan, 2,000; Pennsylvania, 4,000; Wisconsin, 2,500; New York, 1,100, and Ohio, 300.

The Philadelphia arrests were for alleged violation of a court order issued Sept. 8 limiting the striking teachers to four pickets at an entrance to the Philadelphia School District's administration building.

PFT President John Murray predicted that the strike would be "a long one, very bitter," that likely would not be settled until the city came up with more funds.

Labor Mourns Roy Wilkins, Ally in Struggle for Justice

The labor movement joined in mourning the death of Roy Wilkins, a strong ally in the ongoing struggle for racial and economic justice.

Wilkins, who had served as executive director of the NAACP and chairman of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, died Sept. 8 of kidney failure at the age of 80.

"FEW MEN have touched so many lives or opened so many channels of human understanding and cooperation," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a message to Wilkins's widow, Aminda.

Kirkland and Donahue credited Wilkins as the chief architect and leading strategist of the Leadership Conference, which, they said, "welded together the labor movement and the civil rights movement into the most successful legislative coalition of all time."

They said Wilkins has earned an honored place in history books: "The Civil Rights Act, the Voting Rights Act and the other legislative achievements that have forever changed the conditions of life in America are his legacy as much as any man's, just as the LCCR is his monument.

"Roy was much more than a strategist," Kirkland and Donahue said. "He was a man of limitless faith and courage, a leader who inspired others by his example even more than by his eloquence.

"Those of us who had the good fortune to work closely with Roy and count ourselves among his friends will always cherish the memory of his kind and hopeful spirit."

Thousands of trade unionists are better men and women for having known Wilkins and millions of others are better off because of his life and work, Kirkland and Donahue stressed.

WILKINS, WHO was born in St. Louis in 1901, worked as a redcap, as a Pullman-car waiter and in a slaughterhouse while going through the University of Minnesota. He later was a reporter and editor before joining the NAACP staff in 1931. He went on to become executive director of the organization in 1965 and retired in 1977.

The Leadership Conference was founded in 1950 by Wilkins, President A. Philip Randolph of the Sleeping Car Porters, and Arnold Aronson of the National Jewish Relations Advisory Committee. It began as a coalition of some 50 civil rights, labor, religious and civic organizations, and grew over the years to embrace 150 affiliates. Wilkins served as chairman from 1950 until his retirement in 1977. The AFL-CIO and many of its affiliates are part of the conference.

Donahue headed the AFL-CIO delegation attending funeral services at the Community Church in New York. The delegation included Federation Vice Presidents Frederick O'Neal, Albert Shanker, Alvin E. Heaps, and John J. Sweeney, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers; Kenneth Young, executive assistant to Kirkland, and AFL-CIO Civil Rights Director William E. Pollard.

Mark Cowan Named To No. 2 Post at OSHA

Mark D. Cowan has been appointed deputy assistant secretary of labor for occupational safety and health, the second-ranking position at the Occupational Safety & Health Administration. Cowan, 31, joined OSHA earlier this year, serving as the agency's special assistant for regulatory affairs as well as director for policy, regulatory analysis, legislation and interagency programs.

Dystrophy Group Elects Unionists to Key Posts

Scottsdale, Ariz.—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue were re-elected as corporate members of the Muscular Dystrophy Association at the organization's annual meeting here.

Donahue and Actors & Artistes President Frederick O'Neal were re-elected to MDA's board of directors. Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon was named to his first term on the board and as a corporate member.

Also re-elected to the health research association's corporate membership were Letter Carriers President Vincent R. Sombrotto and William H. McClennan, president emeritus of the Fire Fighters. Food & Commercial Workers President William H. Wynn was named a national vice president.

McBride Asks Reactivation Of Steel Panel

Dawson, Pa. — Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride urged the Reagan Administration to reactivate a high-level committee of labor, industry and government representatives to shape a national steel policy keyed to orderly markets and steady jobs.

Such a committee was launched in the Carter Administration, and McBride said a tripartite approach is essential "if we are to restore the steel industry to its once strong, competitive position in domestic and foreign markets."

McBRIDE AND AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland spoke at installation ceremonies for the union's officers and district directors, held at the USWA educational center here. McBride and the four other national officers were elected without opposition to new four-year terms.

Kirkland and McBride scored the Reagan Administration's overall direction. The President's declared intent to "get the government off our backs," Kirkland said, requires wiping out "40 years of economic and social justice."

He called on the President to lift the "full vindictive weight of the government" from the nation's air traffic controllers and let the dispute be settled at the bargaining table. He told the union gathering that labor's Solidarity Day demonstration will be a "lesson in freedom" to the Administration and Congress.

McBRIDE NOTED that the USWA and the steel employers will begin talks in October on whether to renew the no-strike, binding-arbitration agreement for the 1983 negotiations. McBride said the experiment "served both sides well" in the 1974, 1977 and 1980 negotiations, but any decision on its future "has to pass the approval of our union's membership."

He said the union will continue to press for a shorter workweek, "especially in the face of increased use of robots and other automated technologies."

Montana Labor Elects Driscoll New President

Billings, Mont.—Delegates to the 25th annual Montana AFL-CIO convention elected Jerry Driscoll of the Laborers to a two-year term as president. Driscoll, assistant business agent of LIU Local 98 in Billings, succeeds Robert Kokoruda who did not seek re-election to a third term.

The 122 delegates also voted unanimously for a three-step increase in per capita payments, which will rise 4 cents next Jan. 1 to 60 cents a month, followed by 2-cent increments in 1983 and 1984.

DRISCOLL WAS elected by acclamation after Maurice Mulcahy of State, County & Municipal Employees Local 2033 in Butte pulled out of the contest shortly before the rollcall vote.

In another contest, R. Nadiean Jensen, executive director of AFSCME Council 9 in Helena, was elected vice president over Marilyn Kuder of the Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees.

James W. Murry was re-elected without opposition to his seventh term as executive secretary-treasurer of the state labor federation. The convention also elected Ted Tracy of Machinists Local 88 to the executive board and re-elected five incumbent board members.

IN KEY resolutions adopted at the three-day convention, delegates reiterated their opposition to a state sales tax proposal and attempts to repeal state and federal prevailing wage laws, and renewed support for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment.

Convention speakers included Gov. Ted Schwinden, Senators John Melcher and Max Baucus and Rep. Pat Williams, all Democrats.

Back from Recess

Congress Faces Votes On Davis-Bacon, Budget

Congress returned from a month-long vacation to face a bruising new budget battle, key decisions on the future of social security and the first skirmishes over the Davis-Bacon Act.

The Davis-Bacon issue will come to a head this month when the Senate takes up the military construction authorization bill. The heavily conservative Senate Armed Forces Committee amended a House-passed bill by adding a section excluding all military construction from the prevailing wage requirements of the Davis-Bacon Act. Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) was the author of the exemption.

ITS ENACTMENT would touch off a renewed attempt to repeal all prevailing wage laws, as the U.S. Chamber of Commerce has urged. The AFL-CIO and the Building & Construction Trades Dept. are calling on senators to support an amendment by Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) to eliminate the Thurmond rider and restore Davis-Bacon protection.

The Senate also faces a decision on a bill passed by the House shortly before the August recess to restore the $122 minimum social security benefit for the 3 million persons now receiving it. The Administration first insisted on eliminating the minimum benefit entirely and now wants it maintained only for the most "truly needy" of recipients.

Meanwhile, the Administration is prodding Congress to make permanent reductions in social security entitlements in order to keep revenues above outlays.

Both the House and Senate face key votes on whether to disapprove President Reagan's proposed sale of a highly sophisticated airborne radar system (AWACS) to Saudi Arabia. The AFL-CIO Executive Council said sale of the AWACS aircraft, which can be used as a battle control station, "would be an act of irresponsibility and high potential risk to peace."

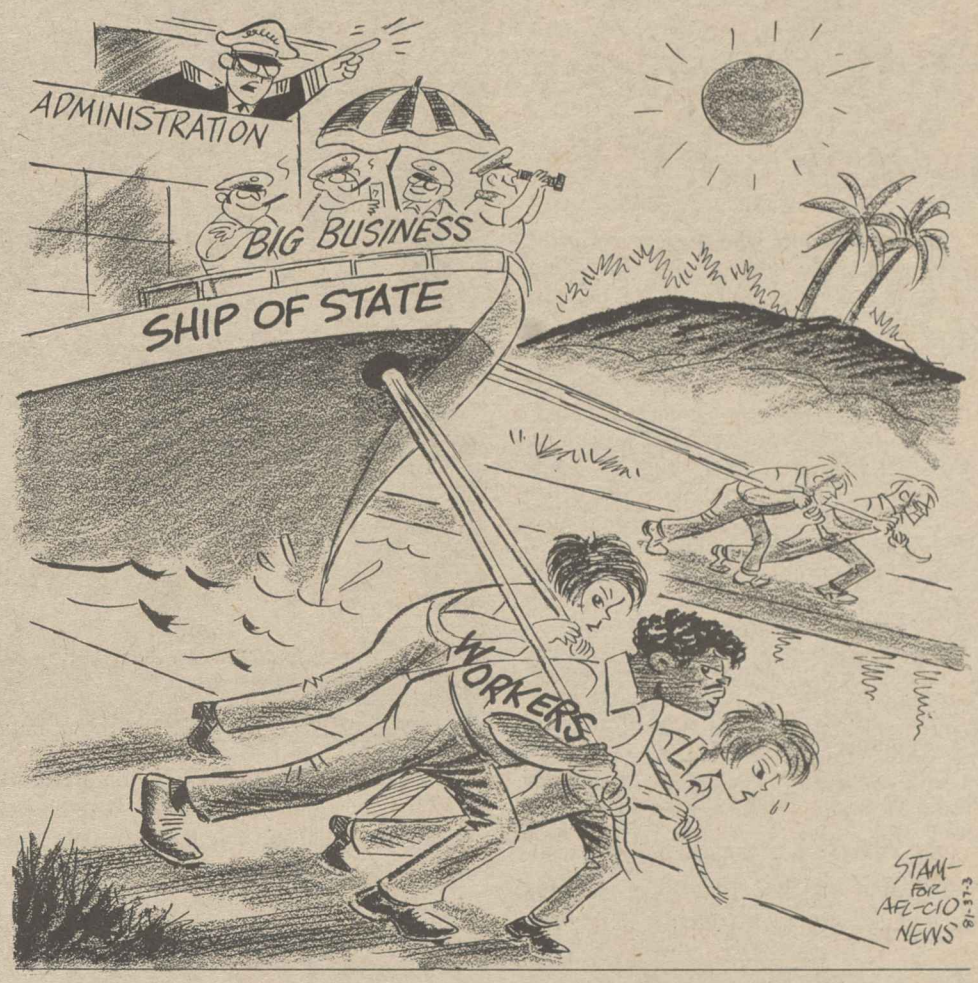
CONGRESS GAVE President Reagan virtually everything he asked for in the way of spending cuts, budget ceilings and tax reductions during his first six months in office.

But it came back to find the White House preparing a new list of heavy spending and program cuts, which it insists are necessary to avoid budget deficits many billions of dollars more than the Administration's earlier estimates.

The tight-money policy which the Administration has relied on as an anti-inflation weapon has sent interest rates sky high. Housing starts have dwindled to a trickle, businesses have been squeezed and the "savings" the government was to achieve through spending cuts are being cancelled out by additional billions of dollars in interest payments on the national debt.

The Congressional Budget Office has projected an $80 billion federal deficit in the next fiscal year, nearly twice the amount the Reagan Administration had originally estimated.

THE ADMINISTRATION is studying proposals to ask Congress to cut back the increase in defense spending originally budgeted and to make additional cuts in already decimated social programs.



Republican leaders have told reporters that the Administration may ask Congress to partially restore the President's right to impound—or not spend—funds voted by Congress.

Congress enacted the anti-impoundment law after President Nixon had repeatedly thwarted congressional intent by refusing to allocate funds voted for specific programs. Its repeal would be seen as a further surrender of legislative powers to the White House.

Also on the congressional agenda are:

- A Senate showdown on stringent anti-busing amendments, including one that would curtail the authority of federal courts to order remedies for school segregation.
- Action on a military pay raise expected to average 14.3 percent.
- Senate action on the nomination of Judge Sandra Day O'Connor to the Supreme Court. Her confirmation is anticipated despite a campaign against her by some anti-abortion groups.

'Tote That Barge!'

Kirkland Assails Soviet Sentence For Morchenk

The AFL-CIO is "outraged" but not surprised by the stiff sentence given Soviet dissident Anatoli Marchenko as punishment for his trade union and human rights activities, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a statement following Marchenko's trial.

Marchenko, who was tried Sept. 2-3 in the Soviet city of Vladimir, had been charged with "anti-Soviet" activities including his support for the Polish trade union, Solidarity, and his correspondence with former AFL-CIO President George Meany. He was sentenced Sept. 4 to ten years in a "strict regime" labor camp to be followed by five years of internal exile. The 43-year-old activist has already served some 15 years in Soviet prisons, labor camps and exile.

"THIS SENTENCE is harsh," Kirkland said, "but it comes as no surprise considering the brutal treatment already accorded to Marchenko by his jailers and by Soviet authorities."

That treatment "during his latest imprisonment includes refusal to let him accept parcels of clothing and hygienic items and the withholding of proper medical and sanitary care," Kirkland noted.

In a statement before the trial, Kirkland said that a package of clothing, soap and toothbrush he had personally sent to Marchenko in Vladimir prison in May had been returned by Soviet authorities.

MARCHENKO and five other Soviet dissidents had been invited to attend the 1977 AFL-CIO convention. In a letter to Meany, Marchenko said he had heard of the invitation on foreign radio stations but had not received the letter. Soviet postal authorities had returned a signed receipt indicating that the letter was delivered.

In the message to Meany and the AFL-CIO convention, Marchenko described harsh working conditions for the average Soviet worker.

Kirkland urged the U.S. government, "the free trade union community and all those who believe in the struggle for human rights to intercede with the Soviet government on Mr. Marchenko's behalf."

Glass Union Delegates Hit Retreat on Job Safety Rules

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Delegates to the Glass Bottle Blowers 67th convention challenged the Administration's weakening of occupational safety and health regulations, voiced concern over new attacks on labor and approved a per capita increase intended to strengthen their union during the decade of the Eighties.

The 866 delegates, representing 70,000 members, voted active support for the AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day march on Sept. 19 and hailed the Polish free trade union federation, Solidarnosc, on its first anniversary. Delegates reinforced adoption of the resolutions with a rousing chorus of Solidarity Forever, led by GBBA President James E. Hatfield.

HATFIELD WAS re-elected to a four-year term by acclamation, as were Sec.-Treas. Frank W. Carter and all other officers and board members. Hatfield has headed the union since 1977 after having previously served as secretary-treasurer.

The convention approved a four-step rise in per capita payments to $11 a month on Oct. 1, with annual 50-cent increases to bring the rate to $12.50 by Oct. 1, 1984. Previous differences in dues categories were eliminated so that the new per capita rate will be the same for all GBBA members. The convention also authorized, but did not require, a $2 increase in local dues.

In terms of the union's special concerns, Hatfield said it succeeded in negotiating "outstanding contracts" over the past four years and he saw a healthy future for employment in glass, plastics and fiberglass industries.

HE REITERATED the GBBA's determination to resist job-destroying anti-bottle legislation at the local, state and national levels.

Hatfield and other convention speakers were sharply critical of Reagan Administration policies and the President's retaliation against striking air traffic controllers. A convention resolution urged that the dispute be resolved through negotiations.

In his keynote address, Hatfield said the Reagan Administration's "trickle-down" economic policy has been used before.

"It brought on the Depression," he told the delegates. "We must convince the Administration that the policies of Calvin Coolidge and Herbert Hoover are no more workable today than they were over 50 years ago."

THE CONVENTION raised $11,000 for the GBBA Political Education League, and it contributed close to $4,000 to the Olympics for Retarded Children—with the international union matching proceeds of a collection from delegates.

In a message to the convention, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said Solidarity Day will demonstrate to the Administration, Congress and the nation labor's commitment to social and economic justice.

There are those, "enjoying a moment of power, who would like to turn the clock back," Donahue said. But "there can be no turning back."

ROBERT HARBRANT, president of the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept., took sharp issue with those who praise the courage of Polish union leaders but "turn around and smash trade unionism here at home."

Howard Chester, executive secretary of the Stone, Glass & Clay Coordinating Committee urged delegates to join with the Citizen-Labor Energy Coalition to fight decontrol of natural gas prices, which he said could cost the nation over 3 million jobs as well as higher prices.

Other convention speakers included AFL-CIO International Affairs Director Ernest Lee, Pottery Workers President Lester H. Null, President Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and two past presidents of the union, Lee W. Minton and Harry A. Tulley.

Dean K. Clowes Dies at 58, International Labor Specialist

Dean K. Clowes, former deputy under secretary of labor for international affairs and a veteran trade unionist, died Sept. 3 after a heart attack in Washington. Before accepting the government post in 1979, Clowes, 58, had been on the Washington staff of the Steelworkers, heading the union's political action, international affairs and older and retired workers departments.

He had recently become labor liaison representative with the Democratic National Committee.

From 1964 to 1968, he was deputy director of the AFL-CIO African-American Labor Center in New York.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland, in a letter to Clowes's widow, Gladys, praised his service to his country and the labor movement, describing him as "a man of kindness, honor and sincerity."

"Those qualities," Kirkland continued, "made him a great trade unionist . . . more important, they also made him a dear friend whose memory will be cherished."

Clowes began his labor career as a representative with the national CIO in Atlanta in 1948. He became labor adviser to the Marshall Plan in Europe and joined the Steelworkers as a staff representative in 1953.

HE WAS a labor adviser in the 1960 presidential campaign of John Kennedy and served as a staff labor coordinator for Vice President Hubert H. Humphrey in the 1964 and 1968 campaigns.

In addition to his wife, he is survived by two daughters, Joan and Kathleen, and a son, Philip, all of Silver Spring, Md.

The family has requested that memorials be in the form of contributions to the American Heart Association.

Air Controller Strike Spurs Letter to ILO

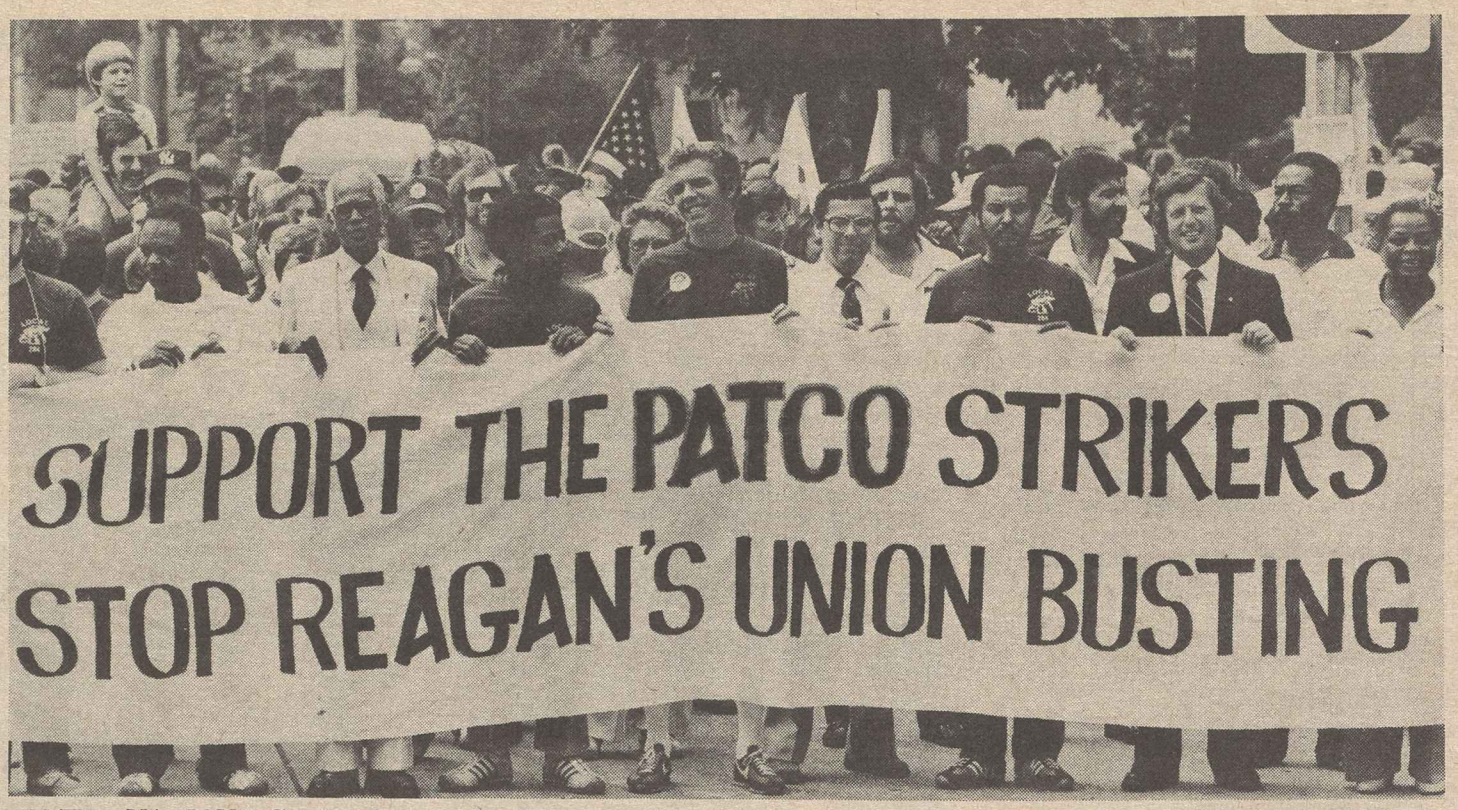
affairs were cited in the complaint. These include excessive government fines against the union, imprisonment of union members who failed to return to work or to order others to return to work, and attempts to prohibit non-violent picketing.

In addition, the complaint charged that FAA supervisers are telephoning union members who have received termination notices and advising them to dissociate themselves from PATCO by appealing the terminations without union representation.



Also, "government personnel are telling union members that they can avoid being terminated only if they cooperate with the government and testify against the union," and "threatening physical violence against union members if they report intimidating communications to their union."

THE COMPLAINT also focused on the Administration's over-zealousness in pursuing legal actions against the union and its members. Rather than consolidate the litigation in one court, the complaint noted, the government prosecuted cases against the union in approximately 70 courts, "attempting to overpower the legal capabilities of the union." The Administration also is pursuing some 75 criminal indictments aganst individual union members for their participation in the strike, the ICFTU observed.

On the issue of the right to strike, which is denied air traffic controllers, the ICFTU pointed out that the absence of this right was not offset by adequate guarantees to safeguard workers' interests. The government's dismissal of PATCO members, its refusal to bargain, and its refusal of offers of mediation were cited.

"In the U.S. air traffic system, airline pilots and other organized groups have the right to strike while the controllers do not enjoy this right," the ICFTU said.

"Since the effect of job actions by these different groups would be the same, the limitation of rights for controllers is clearly discriminatory, and shows that there is no demonstrable need to treat all governmental employees alike with regard to limitations of rights."

IN THE NATION'S CAPITAL, the AFL-CIO Central Labor Council drew on strong community support for this Labor Day march to a rally of solidarity with striking Air Traffic Controllers. The sign tells the story. Aid to the striking controllers continued to pour in from unions and individuals across the country, with the AFL-CIO's PATCO Family Fund approaching the $300,000 mark. The fund was set up to provide food and clothing, medical emergency care and rental and mortgage money to prevent eviction and foreclosure.

Guest Worker Plan Scored As Union-Busting Scheme

Fresno, Calif.—The Reagan Administration's proposed "guest worker" program was roundly denounced as a "union busting" move aimed at destroying the United Farm Workers and fostering discriminatory actions against both Mexican and U.S. citizens in a resolution adopted by delegates to the UFW's fifth constitutional convention here.

The delegates also approved plans for the UFW to be represented at the Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington Sept. 19.

CALIFORNIA GOV. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., who signed the 1975 state law extending collective bargaining rights to farm workers, emphasized that unions, business and government must cooperate to compete economically with foreign countries but sharply attacked actions by the Reagan Administration to undermine unions and the rights of all U.S. workers.

The governor predicted that U.S. workers would soon sour on the Administration because of "Reagan's anti-union philosophy."

UFW President Cesar Chavez warned the delegates that "malignant forces" both inside and out of the union are "jointly struggling to destroy our union" and called for unity during the difficult days ahead when some 95 union contracts with growers come up for negotiations.

HE ALSO announced that the UFW had just received word that the Federal Communications Commission has finally approved the license for Farm Workers Communications, Inc., to operate a non-profit educational radio station in the San Joaquin Valley.

The station, which will reach an area covering more than 12,000 square miles, will have the power equivalent to a 50,000-watt station because it would be situated high on a mountain, Ken Doyle, the union's radio specialist, said.

The station is expected to be operational early next year, well before the Mar. 31 20th anniversary of the union.

AMONG OTHER actions, the delegates approved a resolution to set up a legal corporation to provide paralegal services for UFW members.

Chavez was re-elected as president of the union without opposition. Other key officers elected at the convention were Dolores Huerta, first vice president; Frank Ortiz, second vice president; Richard Chavez, third vice president; and Peter Velasco, secretary-treasurer.

Economic Index Continues Slide For Third Month

The Commerce Dept. reported that its index of leading economic indicators declined 0.1 percent in July, signaling continued sluggishness in the economy.

The third consecutive monthly drop in the index, which is designed to forecast economic trends, followed a revised 1-percent decline in June and a 1.6-percent drop in May. The June performance initially was estimated as a 1.3-percent drop.

Most of the recent weakness in the economy has resulted from high interest rates resulting from the Federal Reserve Board's tight money policy, which the Administration has supported as the price of curbing inflation.

THE ECONOMY boomed in the first quarter of the year, growing at an 8.6-percent seasonally adjusted annual rate. But during the second quarter, the real gross national product (GNP) shrank at a 2.4-percent annual rate.

In July, six of the 10 indicators that make up the index of leading indicators registered declines. The biggest falls came in the money supply and in new orders for manufactured consumer goods and materials. The other indicators contributing to the overall drop were the average workweek, vendor performance, building permits and stock prices.

Three of the indicators rose, partly offsetting the decline. These were the layoff rate, contracts and orders for plant and equipment, and change of total liquid assets. One indicator was unchanged—the change in sensitive crude materials prices, which averages movements over four months.

Chamber Asks Deeper Slash In Davis-Bacon Protections

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce urged the Administration to do a more thorough hatchet job on the Davis-Bacon Act than the Labor Dept. has proposed.

It praised the Labor Dept. for moving "in the right direction" with its plan to rewrite prevailing wage regulations so as to push down construction worker pay scales. But the Chamber complained that the Administration wasn't moving far enough and suggested more drastic regulatory changes that it claims would "save" the government $1.3 billion a year on construction contracts.

THE "SAVINGS" would come from giving open-shop contractors a clear preference for bidding on government contracts by assuring that the prevailing wage is set so low that union contractors couldn't compete.

The Labor Dept. proposal, which the AFL-CIO and the Building & Construction Trades Dept. charge would flout the intent of the Davis-Bacon Act, would change the rules for determining the prevailing wage so as to lower the rate in most localities. It would also set up a new low-paying category of "helper."

To achieve substantially deeper pay cuts, the Chamber proposed that the Labor Dept. adopt one of the following two plans:

- Survey wage rates in a locality for the various crafts and allow contractors to pay wages anywhere within the range. In other words, the lowest rate paid by any contractor in a locality would be the allowable wage on a federal construction contract.
- As an alternative, the prevailing wage rate would be set "by computing the average rate paid in the lower 50 percent of wages paid to a craft within the locality or survey area."

In defending its proposals, the Chamber contended that the Davis-Bacon Act wasn't intended to guarantee prevailing wages, but merely to establish a minimum wage that contractors might pay.

The Chamber also urged further liberalization of the allowable use of lower-paid helpers.

U.S.-Israeli Ties Stressed On Histadrut Anniversary

The trade union movements of the United States and Israel are linked by democratic values and a common commitment to freedom, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said in a message to the 60th anniversary convention of Histadrut.

"The values we share must be defended, as must the progress we have made on behalf of working people in our two countries," Kirkland wrote Histadrut Sec.-Gen. Yerucham Meshel.

Despite temporary setbacks, "the struggle to achieve liberty, justice and security for all cannot falter," Kirkland declared. Because the values are universal, he said, "they will sooner or later prevail."

Kirkland voiced pride in U.S. labor's steadfast support for the creation of an independent Jewish national homeland, dating back to an AFL convention resolution in 1917, and in the fact that the creation of the state was largely achieved "by ordinary working men and women" with a "solid foundation of trade union principles."

Workers, Allies Across Nation Head for Solidarity Day March

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, September 19, 1981 No. 38

IN PHILADELPHIA, area labor leaders and several thousand other supporters joined striking teachers in a City Hall rally to protest conditions that led to the walkout. The Philadelphia Federation of Teachers called the strike after the school board laid off some 3,500 workers and rescinded a pay increase agreed to in a contract signed last year. The walkout involves some 22,000 teachers and other school employees.

Rank-and-File to Protest Reagan Rollback of Gains

By bus, train, car pool and camper, Americans who want to send a message to the Reagan Administration and to Congress headed for Washington to join in the Solidarity Day demonstration called by the AFL-CIO and endorsed by some 200 national organizations.

Groups marching down Constitution Ave., from the vicinity of the Washington Monument to the West Front of the U.S. Capitol, will include major senior citizen, civil rights, religious, consumer and women's organizations as well as unions not affiliated with the AFL-CIO—all joining to protest Reagan's attempt to reverse four decades of social progress.

More than a day before the Sept. 19 demonstration, the more distant caravans began rolling. In Minnesota, union members were up before dawn on Sept. 18, to board buses in Minneapolis and St. Paul for a 7 a.m. departure—and a 26-hour drive to Washington. Iowa and Oklahoma buses were among other early starters.

THE NIGHT BEFORE, car pools from Seattle began moving union members across the Canadian border to Vancouver —to board a plane to Toronto over a route staffed by union air controllers, and then to begin a 10-hour bus trip to Washington.

Most of the participants will be coming from lesser distances, within a 300-mile radius of the nation's capital.

With a substantial turnout assured, the emphasis in the final round of interviews and speeches by AFL CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue has been on the goals of the demonstration.

IT'S A TAKEOFF point, not the finish line, they stressed, of a continuing campaign to defend social and economic progress from the Reagan Administration and a me-too Congress.

Kirkland told reporters that the impact of Solidarity Day will be felt long after the last demonstrator has left Washington, and will be reflected in closer ties that have been forged between the trade union movement and its Solidarity Day allies.

"It will strengthen us for today and tomorrow," Kirkland said. "It strengthens people to look around and see they're not alone. It encourages them."

KIRKLAND TRACED the genesis of Solidarity Day to President Reagan's assertion, early in his Administration, that labor's criticism of his budget and tax policies reflected only the views of union leaders, not of rank-and-file members.

"There's only one real adequate response to that kind of position," Kirkland said, "and that is to bring the rank-and-file to town and give them an opportunity to present their views."

Kirkland noted that at the series of

Preparations For Rally Hit Fever Pitch

On Solidarity Day Minus Three, the phones in the AFL-CIO's command post never stop ringing, logistics problems mount—and Solidarity Day coordinator John Perkins and his staff couldn't be happier.

The 26 satellite parking areas for buses and cars that will bring demonstrators to Washington were barely adequate for yesterday's estimates. Now, NAACP coordinator Ina Boon puts down a telephone to pass the word that her organization will have at least 51 more buses coming to Washington than the start-of-the-week tally indicated. That latest call was from North Carolina, where NAACP branches have lined up 14 chartered buses instead of the nine previously scheduled.

No sweat. They'll get parking spaces assigned somewhere.

SOLIDARITY DAY headquarters is a large conference room that has been transformed into a warren of makeshift cubbyholes just big enough to squeeze in a desk and phone for each of the people responsible for the myriad details.

Posters and placards lean against the walls. A new box of signed Solidarity Day petitions is set down precariously on top of an earlier stack. Secretaries, unfaillingly polite and cheerful, give intricate driving directions to callers between bites of lunch at their desks.

100,000 Face Sharp Cut In Trade Adjustment Aid

One hundred thousand unemployed workers drawing trade adjustment assistance because their jobs were wiped out by imports will have their benefits cut by an average of more than $100 a week after Oct. 1.

That's the start of the new fiscal year, when the budget cuts sought by President Reagan and enacted by Congress start to take effect.

UNTIL OCT. 1, workers certified for trade adjustment benefits are entitled to 70 percent of lost wages up to a ceiling equal to the average factory wage in the United States—currently $289 a week.

After Oct. 1, the amount of their benefit will be determined by their state's unemployment insurance program. In some cases, that will be less than half their current payments.

While every section of the nation has its import victims, the Labor Dept. says the largest group is made up of displaced auto workers, with a heavy concentration in Michigan and other Great Lakes states.

EVEN IN Michigan, where a recent increase in state unemployment insurance benefits brought the ceiling to $182 a week, the drop in payments will exceed $100.

Most state benefit ceilings are lower than that. In neighboring Indiana, for example, the displaced worker who had been getting $289 in trade adjustment benefits will drop to a state maximum of $141 a week for a person with dependents or $84 for a jobless worker without dependents.

Another provision written into the budget bill will achieve further "savings" by cutting back on the number of workers entitled to even the reduced level of trade adjustment benefits. That change takes effect next Dec. 13, six months after President Reagan signed the budget reconciliation bill.

Workers seeking certification for payments after that date must demonstrate that foreign import competition was a "substantial cause" for their unemployment, a definition the Administration regards as more stringent than the present requirement that imports "contributed substantially" to the job losses.

A section of the budget reconciliation bill that is already in effect has knocked Rhode Island out of the small list of high-unemployment states still providing a 13-

Convention Call Cites Critical Issues

The AFL-CIO issued the official call for its 14th Constitutional Convention, noting that the federation will meet in its centennial year "when workers and trade unionists are deeply disturbed" by the direction the country is headed.

The convention will be held at New York's Sheraton Centre Hotel, starting Nov. 16, at 10 a.m.

In issuing the call, Federation President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue observed that "radical changes in America's social and economic structures are being pressed by a business-oriented Administration and embraced by a compliant Congress."

KIRKLAND AND DONAHUE said that the Reagan White House is following four main avenues in efforts to roll back a half-century of labor's gains.

They cited "tax cuts that favor the rich; cuts in federal spending that injure the public interest; termination of federal regulatory programs that protect workers, consumers and the environment; and monetary policies that destroy jobs, feed inflation and bankrupt companies and industries that depend upon borrowed money.

"As the strongest, best-organized force defending the interests of workers and the plain people of the United States, the labor movement must provide nationwide leadership in opposition to this destructive process," Kirkland and Donahue stressed.

"Delegates to the AFL CIO convention face the task of establishing programs and policies around which workers and all Americans who believe in freedom, democracy and the public interest can rally in the hard struggle that lies ahead."

The notice to affiliates includes a replica of the call to the 1881 founding convention of the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions, which became the American Federation of Labor five years later.

"The time has now arrived for a more perfect combination of Labor—one that will concentrate our forces so as to more successfully cope with concentrated capital," the 1881 call observed.

IT NOTED THAT there were numerous local, national and international unions already in existence. "But, great as has been the work done by these bodies, there is vastly more that can be done by a combination of all these organizations in a federation of trades. . . .

"Only in such a body can proper action be taken to promote the general welfare of the industrial classes. There we can discuss and examine all questions affecting the national interests of each and every trade, and by a combination of forces secure that justice which isolated and separated trade and labor unions can never fully command," the 1881 call declared.

Pope Declares Unions 'Indispensable'

By James M. Shevis

Pope John Paul II declared in a major statement to the Roman Catholic Church that labor unions are "an indispensable element" of modern industrialized society, serving as "advocates for the struggle for social justice (and) for the just rights of working people."

In the third encyclical of his pontificate, John Paul defended workers' rights to form unions and engage in strikes and to have adequate salaries, health care, employment, and vacations. He stressed that unions should guard their independence and autonomy, warning that "they should not be subjected to the decision of political parties or have too close links with them."

THE ENCYCLICAL, or circular letter, to Roman Catholic bishops was written to commemorate the 90th anniversary of Pope Leo XIII's "Rerum Novarum" ("Of New Things"), the church's first social encyclical, which also dealt with work.

The latest papal letter touches on many specific worker issues, including jobs and unemployment, wages and social benefits, the role of multinational corporations in society, agricultural labor, and the problems of women workers, migrant workers, and the handicapped.

In a section of the 24,000-word encyclical on "social benefits," the Pope said that wages should be high enough so that a man can support a family and so a mother will not have to work to help the family survive.

"IT WILL redound to the credit of society to make it possible for a mother—without inhibiting her freedom, without psychological or practical discrimination and without penalizing her as compared with other women—to devote herself to taking care of her children and educating them in accordance with their needs," the official English version of the encyclical states.

"Having to abandon these tasks in order to take up paid work outside the home is wrong from the point of view of the good of society and of the family when it contradicts or hinders these primary goals of the mission of a mother."

The Pope recognized, however, that "in many societies women work in nearly every sector" and he called for their fair treatment on the job. Working women should be allowed to "fulfill their tasks in accordance with their own nature, without being discriminated against and without being excluded from jobs for which they are capable," the Pontiff said.

On a more general level, John Paul said, work for all human beings "must be organized and adapted in such a way as to respect the requirements of the person and his or her forms of life, above all life in the home."

"LABOREM EXERCENS"—the Latin title for the encyclical, meaning "through the exercise of work"—is John Paul's most sweeping socio-political statement since he was elected Pope nearly three years ago. He said he had intended to issue the document on May 15, but the attempt on his life two days earlier delayed its publication. Encyclicals have traditionally been used by popes to address the world's 600 million Roman Catholics on major doctrinal, moral and disciplinary issues, and to apply church teaching on social matters.

A central theme of the document is the Pope's strong opposition—vigorously expounded on his trips abroad—to the "dehumanizing excesses" of modern economic systems. He blamed both "rigid" capitalism and the "collectivist system" for subordinating the worker to economic goals.

"We must emphasize and give prominence to the primacy of man in the production process, the primacy of man over things," the Pope said. "We must first of all recall a principle that has always been taught by the church, the principle of the priority of labor over capital."

THE POPE SAID Catholic social teaching supports "proposals for joint ownership of the means of work, sharing by the workers in the management and/or profits of businesses, so-called shareholding by labor, etc.

"Whether these various proposals can or cannot be applied concretely, it is clear that recognition of the proper position of labor and the worker in the production process demands various adaptations in the sphere of the right to ownership of the means of production."

An unabashed admirer of Poland's year-old Solidarity, the independent labor federation, John Paul uses the word "solidarity" frequently in the letter as in the following defense of independent trade unions:

"IN ORDER TO achieve social justice in the various parts of the world, in the various countries and in the relationships between them, there is a need for ever new movements of solidarity of the workers and with the workers. This solidarity must be present whenever it is called for by the social degrading of the subject of work, by exploitation of the workers, and by the growing areas of poverty and even hunger. The church is firmly committed to this cause. . . ."

In an introduction to the letter, the Pope stresses the theological aspect of work, giving it a spiritual dimension that sets man apart from other forms of life.

"From the beginning, (man) is called to work. Work is one of the characteristics that distinguish man from the rest of creatures, whose activity for sustaining their lives cannot be called work. Only man is capable of work and only man works, at the same time by work occupying his existence on earth. Thus work bears a particular mark of man and of humanity, the mark of a person operating within a community of persons."

TV Campaign Hits Reagan Attack on Social Security

The State, County & Municipal Employees is challenging the Reagan Administration's attack on the social security system with a 13-city television advertising campaign that urges viewers to write members of Congress.

AFSCME President Jerry Wurf said the union has committed $400,000 to the TV advertising campaign, on top of earlier newspaper ads, because "we won't let the Reagan Administration take away what working Americans have earned."

The union's message, he stressed, is that "social security is not a handout. It's a contract between the United States government and the American people" and its promised benefits have been earned "through lifetimes of hard work."

A SIMILAR theme was stressed earlier this year in a newspaper advertisement sponsored jointly with the Auto Workers and in AFSCME ads detailing the impact of the Reagan Administration's budget and tax cuts.

AFSCME Sec.-Treas. William Lucy told a news conference that 37 television stations in the 13 target cities are running the union's 60-second commercial. But another 24 stations, he said, refused to sell time to the union, generally on the excuse that they do not carry "advocacy advertising."

The "contract, not a handout" commercial began a weeklong run on television stations in the following cities: Washington, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Dallas, Hartford, Atlanta, Miami, San Francisco, St. Louis, Cleveland, Detroit and Pittsburgh.

Rubber Workers Win Oklahoma Plant Vote

Oklahoma City—Workers at Firestone's Dayton Tire plant here voted in the Rubber Workers in the union's seventh organizing attempt at the facility.

In a National Labor Relations Board election Sept. 11, plant workers voted for URW representation 564-513. There were 1,215 workers eligible to vote.

URW President Peter Bommarito called the win a major victory for the union that reflects an upsurge in union organizing in the South and Southwest.

AMBASSADOR PHILIP HABIB

American Histadrut Council Focuses on Mid-East Outlook

Unity House, Pa.—Ambassador Philip Habib, special Middle East negotiator for the United States and personal representative of President Reagan, told a trade union parley here that the next few weeks will determine whether a comprehensive peace settlement in the Middle East will be possible.

In an address before 300 trade unionists at the biennial conference of the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut, Habib said the recent meetings between Reagan and Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin made decisions critical during this period of calm in the Middle East.

HABIB MADE ONE of his rare public appearances at the Labor Day weekend conference of ATUC at this center of the Ladies' Garment Workers. He was invited to address the session by Matthew Schoenwald, chairman of the council and vice president of the ILGWU.

Schoenwald informed the delegates that in appreciation of the ambassador's participation in the conference and in recognition of the service of his brother, the late Fred Habib, as an officer of Local 62 of the ILGWU, the council was dedicating an annual scholarship to the vocational high schools of the Histadrut in Israel in the name of Fred Habib.

HABIB DEVOTED most of his talk to a discussion of the potential of the Camp David Agreements which, he said, can't be described "in anything except highly laudatory terms."

He cautioned, however, that the principals in the agreements—Egypt, Israel and the United States—must take advantage of the calm now existing in the area to get the most out of the Camp David accords.

Habib warned that "the problems are long-term, but the near future must produce movement or the confrontation will arise that will threaten everything."

The theme of the two-day conference was "Prospects of Peace in the Middle East." The ATUC maintains active support for and liaison with Histadrut, the General Federation of Labor in Israel.

Congress Urged to Reject Funds for Shift of NIOSH

The AFL-CIO has urged the House Appropriations Committee to deny the Reagan Administration funds for shifting the headquarters of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health from the Washington area to Atlanta.

A House appropriations subcommittee in a 5-to-2 vote has already rejected the use of nearly $2 million to cover the cost of the move.

THE TRANSFER of the NIOSH headquarters from Rockville, Md., to the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta is being pressed by Sec. Richard S. Schweiker of the Dept. of Health & Human Services.

Schweiker announced plans for the shift earlier this year after firing Dr. Anthony W. Robbins as NIOSH director and appointing Dr. J. Donald Millar to the post. Millar had been director of the Center for Environmental Health, a part of the federal disease control centers in Atlanta.

The proposed move, which unions assailed as an attempt to dismantle the agency, involves the shift of the director's office and about 110 key staff positions to Atlanta, as well as splitting off 50 technical experts from the headquarters operation and moving them to Cincinnati.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland expressed concern that the role of NIOSH may be diminished and subordinated by the move and that many of the agency's highly qualified staff members who are unable to make the transfer will be lost.

"In addition, important liaison work with OSHA, EPA and representatives of workers will be unnecessarily constrained by the geographic distance created by the move," Kirkland stressed.

KIRKLAND ALSO pointed out that the agency neglected to consult with Government Employees Local 41, which represents the NIOSH staff, before announcing the move.

In a letter to Chairman Jamie W. Whitten of the House of Appropriations Committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison warned that the shift would seriously impair the ability of NIOSH to carry out the directives of Congress under the federal job safety law to protect workers.

Strong opposition to the shifting of NIOSH also was expressed at a Capitol Hill press conference by union, public interest and congressional representatives, including the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, AFGE, Mine Workers and Rep. Michael D. Barnes (D-Md.).

Miners to 'Convene' On Solidarity Day

The United Mine Workers has announced a "special convention" to coincide with Solidarity Day to assure that mine operators won't be able to keep UMW members from coming to Washington.

Union contracts allow workers to take off without pay for "official union business," but some mine owners said they didn't consider the Solidarity Day demonstration an occasion for excused absences.

The union then proclaimed a "special convention" and UMW President Sam M. Church, Jr., said any member who took part in Solidarity Day would be considered a convention delegate. The business of the convention will be to march with the UMW's contingent.

Industry Negotiations

Job Guarantees Key Goal Of Auto Workers in '82

Detroit — Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser alerted the industry that negotiation of some form of job guarantee will be a major priority of the union in next year's round of auto bargaining.

"I believe the UAW will seek a guaranteed right of employment in the 1982 contract," Fraser said in an address to the Economic Club of Detroit.

HE POINTED OUT that the union's collective bargaining proposals have always grown out of the experiences and problems of the membership.

"The local union delegates to our collective bargaining convention will decide what direction we take," Fraser said. "But I think the experiences of the workers in the current auto depression argue that job security will be a priority issue in 1982 bargaining.

"The agony and horror of the layoffs experienced in the last two years must never again be allowed to occur," the UAW president said.

Fraser acknowledged the wage differential between U.S. and Japanese auto workers, a good portion of which, he said, exists today because of currency fluctuations.

"BUT OVERALL," he said, "Japanese auto workers have not shared proportionately in the fruits of their productivity."

In addition, he said, simply looking at the differential in wages ignores the progressive elements of Japan's employment system—such as job security, transportation allowances, subsidized housing, and many more.

"I believe that the proper solution to the Japanese wage differential lies in raising Japanese wages to a level commensurate with their productivity," Fraser observed. "The answer is not to roll back American workers' wages to the levels paid in Japan or Brazil or Korea."

FRASER UNDERSCORED the UAW's commitment to responsible, realistic bargaining. But he stressed that this means more than just intelligent restraint at the bargaining table.

"Bargaining responsibly also means that both the union and management do everything possible to wipe out waste and inefficiency in the delivery of negotiated benefits, thereby saving money for everyone—the worker, the consumer and the company," Fraser said. "We at the UAW are committed to doing that."

Fraser listed a number of steps that he said must be taken to lift the auto industry out of its current depression, singling out especially the need for lowering interest rates.

"President Reagan fails to take the steps necessary to deal with the problem of high interest rates," he said. "The 20-percent prime rate is choking the lifeblood not only from the auto industry, but from housing and other crucial sectors of the economy."

FRASER AGAIN CALLED for a U.S. auto policy designed to bring the industry back to health, saying that policy should include local content legislation. Such legislation, he said, is needed to limit the ability of GM and Ford "to pull down the American flag and raise the colors of Korea or Brazil or other countries which pay workers so little they can't afford to buy the products they build."

Even more important, he said, would be the impact on the Japanese automakers.

"They've got an $11 billion market in the United States, and we believe they should put some capital here and create some jobs here," the UAW president said.

UNION MILLINERY workers demonstrate their hat-making skills at the annual Labor Day street fair in New York sponsored by District 1199, the health care affiliate of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. A number of other unions and the Coalition of Labor Union Women joined in this year's program.

Michigan Unions Back Riegle To Counter Far-Right Attack

Dearborn, Mich.—Michigan labor isn't waiting until 1982 to begin the drive to re-elect Sen. Donald Riegle (D). Delegates to the 13th convention of the Michigan AFL-CIO gave Riegle an early endorsement for what is shaping up as a tough re-election campaign.

Riegle has been targeted for defeat by the Moral Majority, which has placed him number two on its "hit list," right behind Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.).

THE ENDORSEMENT resolution was adopted after Riegle told the delegates that the Moral Majority was out to get him primarily because of his pro-labor voting record.

"I come here today with one of the best COPE voting records, and I'm proud of it," Riegle said. "When the far right targeted me for defeat in 1982, they also targeted the labor movement."

He vowed to continue his fight against the Administration's efforts to gut the social security system, charging that President Reagan and congressional Republicans "will proceed with the dismantling of social security piece by piece because they don't believe in it."

When the 1982 election campaign goes into high gear next year, there may be a fully united labor movement in Michigan backing Riegle and other pro-labor candidates.

IN HIS KEYNOTE speech to the convention, Michigan AFL-CIO President William C. Marshall welcomed the national reaffiliation of the UAW with the AFL-CIO and urged immediate steps to carry out the reaffiliation process at the state and local levels.

Delegates then adopted a resolution calling for the establishment of a State AFL-CIO committee to meet with the Michigan UAW leadership "in the hopes of securing their early return to the Michigan AFL-CIO and every local central body in Michigan."

In his speech, Marshall lashed out at the Reagan Administration and its allies who "seem intent on destroying all of the progress working people made in the last 50 years."

HE SINGLED out Reagan's treatment of the air controllers, comparing it to the "yellow dog" contracts of the past when workers had to sign away their right to union representation if they wanted to keep their jobs.

"Yellow dog contracts are one form of tyranny, whether they're put in by government regulation or private power. We've fought 'yellow dog' contracts for 100 years in the private sector—and we'll fight them for the next 100 years in the public sector if necessary," Marshall said.

Michigan Gov. William Milliken (R) told the convention that he will propose major changes in workers' and unemployment compensation benefits in order to improve the state's "business climate."

Big business leaders have been pushing for reduction in benefit payments and restrictions in the coverage of those programs. While Milliken did not detail his proposals, he did indicate they would lean toward the business arguments.

MARSHALL WAS re-elected without opposition to a new term as president, a post he has held since 1971. He served as executive vice president from 1960 to 1969 and as secretary-treasurer in 1969-71.

Walter Oliver, State, County & Municipal Employees staff member, defeated incumbent George B. Watts, former Steelworkers representative, to become the federation's secretary-treasurer.

Other convention speakers included NAACP Executive Director Benjamin Hooks, UAW President Douglas Fraser, Sen. Carl Levin (D-Mich.), A. Philip Randolph Institute President Norman Hill, UAW Vice President Don Ephlin, and COPE Director Al Barkan.

100,000 Jobless Face Sharp Cut In Trade Act Aid

week period of extended benefits for workers still jobless after having used up their maximum 26 weeks of regular state benefits.

Rhode Island "triggered-off" the extended benefits program because a new method of calculating the insured jobless ratio was written into law as part of the budget process.

UNDER THE NEW system, persons who use up their state benefits and start drawing extended unemployment benefits are no longer counted as unemployed. Thus, the longer people are without jobs, the lower the insured unemployment rate.

Rhode Island is a small state, and only 2,500 workers were cut off from benefits as a result of the change. But bigger states are currently threatened by the change. The director of the Michigan Employment Security Commission said nearly 50,000 long-unemployed workers in Michigan stand to lose benefits under the change in the trigger formula. Only a new round of auto layoffs that pushed up the number of new unemployment compensation claims prevented a triggering-off of the state's extended benefits program in mid-September.

Chaikin Links U.S., British Labor Goals

Blackpool, England—The AFL-CIO and the British Trades Union Congress, partners for decades in the struggle to strengthen the international labor movement, were urged to join together anew to raise the living standards of free world workers.

"There is extraordinary value in our independence—and in our mutual caring and sharing for bread and freedom, dignity and human rights for all," President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers observed at the TUC's 113th annual convention in this English coastal city.

"YET MUCH remains to be done where our cooperation can be meaningful—in Africa, Asia, Europe and Latin America.

"None of us who values human rights and decency can be neutral in the struggle between the forces of freedom and the legions of tyranny. Let us join with our free brothers and sisters to bring about the changes that are needed."

Chaikin, addressing the TUC as the federation's fraternal delegate to its convention this year, noted that the American and British labor movements have enjoyed friendly relations and delegate exchange visits since 1895. In the years since then, culminating in the immediate post-World War II era, the two movements worked closely together to advance free trade unionism.

IN 1945, with the defeat of Hitler, the TUC and the AFL played leading roles in creating closer and more fruitful relations between national trade union centers, and provided the bulk of support for the formation of the International Conference of Free Trade Unions in 1949, Chaikin pointed out. The two also joined in helping to establish the DGB (Deutscher Gewerkschaftsbund) labor federation in occupied Germany after the war, he recalled.

In the past year, the TUC and the AFL-CIO have given practical aid and moral support to "those courageous workers in Poland who have challenged a totalitarian government to create their own free trade union movement, Solidarity," Chaikin added.

"Let us continue in these efforts," he urged. "Where there is now oppression, poverty and disease, tears and travail, let there be peace and plenty," he said. "The only war we seek is that against hunger, disease, racism, totalitarian government, and the denial of the human spirit."

CHAIKIN NOTED that the AFL-CIO and the TUC today have much in common. In the United States, "Thatcherism has finally caught up with us in the name of Reaganism," he observed.

The effects of President Reagan's budgets and tax reductions—similar to those of British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher—will be to "tear down the social and economic infrastructure of the United States which the trade-union movement, together with its liberal cooperators, laboriously built up in the last four decades," he warned.

Labor's answer to Reagan's deep slashes in social welfare programs such as food stamps and aid to education funds has been to marshal its resources and join with its traditional allies to advance workers' interests, Chaikin said. Solidarity Day on Sept. 19 will mark the opening shot in the campaign to complete the AFL-CIO's "unfinished agenda" for American workers, he said.

Kits Offered Students On College Debate Topic

College debaters will compete this year on the topic of whether the government should significantly curtail the power of unions, and the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education has compiled kits of background information for students arguing the proposal.

The college debate kit is available without charge from the AFL-CIO Pamphlets Division, 815 16th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20006.

'The Right of the People...'

THE FIRST AMENDMENT to the Constitution of the United States guarantees "the right of the people peacefully to assemble, and to petition the government for a redress of grievances."

Welcome to Solidarity Day!

Lessons in Reaganomics

WITH INNOCENT astonishment, the Administration is learning that heavy tax cuts that are supposed to fuel a new wave of investment by corporations and the wealthy reduce the government's revenue and increase deficits.

The President and his advisers also are discovering another elementary fact of economic life—that a deliberate tight-money policy pushes up interest rates, and since a large share of the federal budget goes into interest payments, this invariably pushes up the deficit.

And what is the Administration's response to these lessons? Why, to propose still deeper cuts in government programs, of course, and still bigger holes in the "safety net" promised for the "truly needy" who are not getting four-digit tax cuts.

Good News?

A CASUAL READER of newspaper headlines might easily conclude that President Reagan has abandoned his attack on social security and that working Americans can rest easy in the assurance that earned and promised benefits will in fact be paid when they come due.

"Reagan Rules Out Social Security Cut to Reduce Deficit" read the Page One headline in the Sept. 16 Washington Post. Other newspapers had similar headlines.

The hard news on which the headlines were based was this simple one-sentence statement issued by the White House press office: "The President has announced that he has no plans to propose additional cuts in social security beyond those he has already submitted to Congress."

And what of the cuts the President has already submitted to Congress?

Well, just as a reminder, he would drastically slash the benefit formula for people who retire at age 62 and make further changes that would hold down benefits for persons retiring at 65. He would also postpone cost-of-living adjustments for persons already retired and further curtail the already repeatedly reduced disability insurance program.

Beyond those, the White House assures, President Reagan will not now seek further cutbacks. Not for this year, that is.

But wait until next year.

Passing the Buck

Reagan Plays Same Old Game On Role of Federal Reserve

By Gus Tyler

THERE'S A GAME that Presidents of the United States play with the chairmen of the Federal Reserve Board. It's called Passing the Buck.

The way it has been played throughout the 1970s and now into the 1980s, the President appoints the chairman of the Fed. The President announces that his appointee is "independent." The appointee then proceeds to raise interest rates, causing much pain in many places. People protest to the President who, presumably has a big say in the making of economic policy in this country. The President passes the buck by reminding us that the Fed is beyond his or anyone else's control.

PRESIDENT REAGAN continues this tradition followed persistently by both his Republican and Democratic predecessors. Speaking to a California audience, Reagan said: "The Fed is independent, and they are hurting us, and what we're trying to do, as much as they're hurting everyone else."

So, as the game goes, the President dumped on the Fed.

But does Reagan really disapprove of the policies of the Fed? You would hardly guess so from the behavior of people high in his Administration. Murray Weidenbaum, the chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, announced on "Meet the Press" that the Fed was "on target" and that its policies of monetary restraint (high interest rates) "needs to be continued."

IF ANYTHING, the Administration wants the Fed to get tougher: to tighten credit, to cut money supply. "Right now," reports the Wall Street Journal, "the Administration strongly supports the Fed's efforts to slow money-supply growth. In fact, Administration officials are trying to apply pressure to prevent backsliding. Reagan is the first President to appoint outspoken monetarists, such as Beryl Sprinkel (Treasury undersecretary) and Jerry Jordan of the Council of Economic Advisers to high policy-making positions."

So while the President attacks the Fed for its high interest rates, he uses his appointees—Weidenbaum, Sprinkel, Jordan—to praise tight money and to push for even tighter money. He is also preparing to replace the present chairman and vice chairman of the Fed, when their terms expire, with "monetarists" who will continue doing what the Fed has been doing up to now—but more severely.

This game of blaming the Fed was not invented by Reagan, of course. The tactic was standard with Nixon, Ford and Carter, whenever the political circumstances so required.

Actually, the Fed is not truly "independent." The chairman is appointed by Presidents who, if they have a policy, owe it to their conscience and their country to name someone whose policies are congenial to the Administration. Ironically, each President has made an appointment and then found it fit to dump on the appointee at chosen moments.

THE FEDERAL Reserve Board, moreover, is not embedded in the Constitution. It was created by Congress, it can be abolished, enlarged, altered, reorganized by act of Congress.

So, why, if the Fed is running the country, doesn't the President do something? Is it that Reagan, like the other Presidents before him, wants a fall guy, a fellow he can denounce in California while backing him in Washington?

Programs and Policies To Rally Americans

The centennial convention of our federation meets at a time when workers and trade unionists are deeply disturbed by the direction their country appears to be taking. Radical changes in America's social and economic structures are being pressed by a business-oriented Administration and embraced by a compliant Congress.

The labor movement must provide nationwide leadership in opposition to this destructive process. Delegates to the AFL-CIO convention face the task of establishing programs and policies around which workers and all Americans can rally.

Lasting Contribution

Roy Wilkins Provided Strength During Critical Civil Rights Era

By Bayard Rustin

ROY WILKINS was a gentle man with a strong will. He was a man of keen judgement and open-mindedness, a man who was willing to change his mind. In a very real sense he was the statesman of the civil rights movement.

He was not a man of charisma. He was not a speaker who could electrify crowds with his rhetoric. His strength and his lasting contribution to the civil rights movement rested in his thoroughness, his quiet determination, and his organizational talents.

It was under Roy Wilkins' aegis that the true black Declaration of Independence was written. It was not a single document such as the one drafted by America's founding fathers. Rather, it was the immense project of legal proceedings and test cases which were initiated by the NAACP, which included the Brown v. Board of Education decision, and which continued far beyond it.

THESE DECISIONS won rights for blacks in enclave after enclave of American society.

I first directly collaborated with Roy Wilkins during the planning stages of the 1963 March on Washington, which was initiated by A. Philip Randolph, the great black labor leader.

At first, relations between us were somewhat strained because Wilkins, a cautious man by nature, was troubled by my personal history of involvement in socialist and other radical causes. Yet despite initial misunderstandings, once we had begun working together and had come to understand that our goals for the black community were similar, we formed a close bond of friendship.

Despite his initial coolness to the idea of a March on Washington for civil rights and economic justice, once Roy Wilkins was convinced of the project's merits, he and the NAACP were to give the endeavour the strongest financial and organizational support it was to receive.

THAT THE MARCH was a great success was in large measure due to the organizational network Wilkins had established. And it was at Wilkins's insistence that Martin Luther King, Jr. was chosen to be the final speaker at that march and there delivered his historic "I Have a Dream" speech.

Because Roy Wilkins had a keen sense of what blacks wanted and because of his effectiveness in expressing the needs and desires of black Americans, he was frequently vilified by a minority of black extremists who sought to arrogate for themselves the right to speak in the name of all blacks.

Wilkins played a central role in leading black community opposition to the black power and separation movements which did so much to weaken black political power and to heighten racial tensions. He was a committed integrationist and he battled all the way with such extremists as Stokeley Carmichael and H. Rap Brown, who today are mere footnotes in the history of black political life.

Wilkins's contributions were great and lasting. They have survived him, above all, in the form of the NAACP, the organization which he helped build into a network with over 400,000 members. His stewardship of the NAACP encompassed the period of the 1950s and early '60s in which the civil rights movement made its greatest progress. He, likewise, led his organization in the more difficult and frequently disappointing period which was to follow.

THE DEATH of Roy Wilkins marks the final chapter of a great era in the history of the civil rights movement. It was an era of great visionaries and leaders—Martin Luther King, Jr., A. Philip Randolph, Whitney Young, and Roy Wilkins.

We are now, without question, firmly entrenched in a new era, an era whose outlines are not yet easy to perceive. The civil rights movement stands at the crossroads. Today, its influence is lower than at any point since its inception. It confronts the dangerous problems of a hereditary and ever-growing underclass of black poor, of economic inequality, and of an administration which is indifferent to the plight of the poor and working poor.

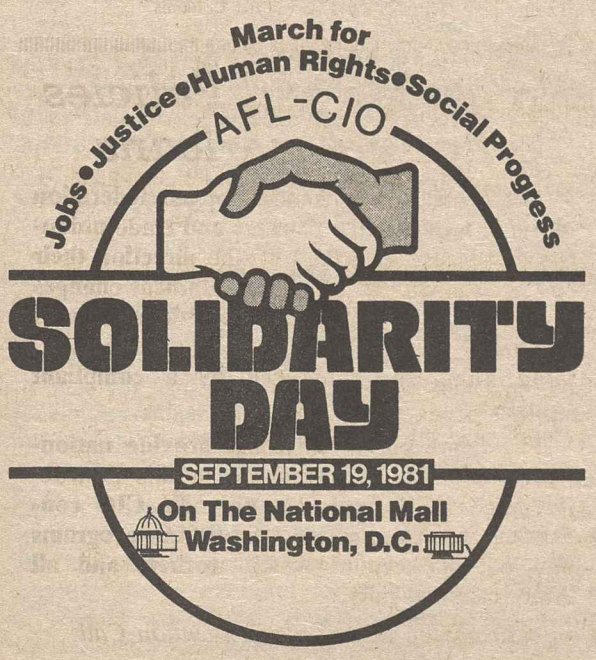
The civil rights movement is at a crossroads. One can only hope that new Roy Wilkinses will emerge to lead that movement down the proper path.

As Economy Flounders

Growing Public Concern Noted On Impact of Deep Reagan Cuts

A PERCEPTION is growing across the country of the tremendous costs the Reagan Administration budget and tax cuts will inflict on millions of Americans and on the economy itself, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said.

Translated into legislative impact, Denison said this perception means the Administration "will not have as easy a time as it has had to this point" in enacting further cuts in people-helping programs already in the discussion stage.



Denison pointed out on Labor News Conference that the financial community also has had widespread second thoughts concerning the Reagan economic program. Wall Street and the banking community, he said—which have been "the closest supporters of the President"—have "indicated that what is happening is not going to work."

There has been no evidence "in terms of the economic situation improving," he said. "Interest rates are still high. The housing market is in collapse. Cost of food is still rising. Unemployment is increasing."

Denison said these conditions will create "a stiffening in the Congress" to the Administration's proposed second round of budget cuts. He refuted contentions that labor and its allies are in "disarray," pointing out that legislative events have flowed from the fact that "the numbers are there" in Congress for the conservatives—that they hold absolute numerical control in the Senate and ideological control in the House.

HE PREDICTED, however, moderate Republican House members from the Northeast and Midwest who were pressured to support the Administration's first round of budget cuts of needed social programs would "return to the ranks" in support of these programs when the Administration seeks further slashes.

Reporters questioning Denison on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Dale McFeatters of Scripps-Howard Newspapers and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

AMERICA'S PARENTS and schoolchildren are about to get a lesson that's not in the schoolbooks.

When President Reagan and the conservative 97th Congress cut the federal budget by some $35 billion, they were credited with a great political victory.

The budget cuts had to come from somewhere, however, and the nation's 26 million schoolchildren will be among the first to find out when they line up for lunch. If the Reagan Administration's pending proposals are adopted, the school lunches will be smaller and the prices higher.

WHEN CONGRESS complied with Reagan's budget cuts and reduced child nutrition programs from nearly $4.5 billion to $3 billion for fiscal 1982, it gave the Agriculture Dept. three months to find ways to economize, "without impairing the nutritional value of meals." The department made some administrative savings and then turned its budget ax to the school meal itself.

To eliminate waste or thrown away food, serving portions would be reduced in all categories—meat or meat alternate, bread, vegetable/fruit and milk—for almost all age groups. For example, fourth, fifth and sixth graders would receive 1.5 ounces of meat instead of the two ounces they now receive. Pre-schoolers now receiving six ounces of milk would receive four ounces. Secondary school children receiving three-fourths of a cup of vegetables or fruit would receive one-half cup.

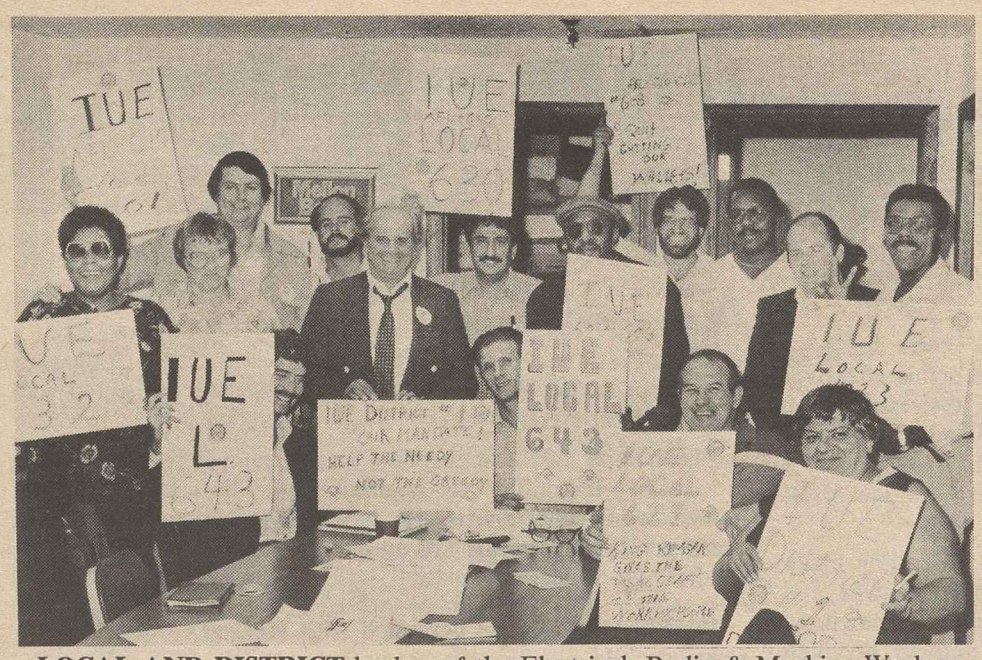
"Crediting," or the determination of what food counts toward meal requirements, also would be loosened. For example, tofu, or soybean curd, cottage cheese, nuts, seeds and nut butters may count as meat. Yogurt may count as milk or meat. The amounts of dry beans and eggs needed to meet the meat alternate requirements have been dropped from one to one-half cup and two cups to one cup, respectively. Pickle relishes and ketchup may count as vegetables. Cake may fulfill the bread requirement.

ON TOP OF the portion reductions and substitutions, school lunch prices will go up by an average of 35 to 40 cents nationally, according to the Food Research & Action Center (FRAC), a public interest group.

Congress also tightened the eligibility requirements for free and subsidized lunches. A child from a family of four will be eligible to receive a free lunch if the parents' income is $10,990 or less. If the family income is between $10,990 and $15,630, a child may receive reduced-price lunches. Above that income, a child is expected to pay full price. The previous income cutoffs were $11,520 and $17,560, respectively.

Arnold Mayer, vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers, which supports the coalition, said the cuts in the school lunch program, coupled with cuts in the food stamp program, would effectively end the nation's anti-hunger efforts and could result in "the return of mass hunger in the United States."

FRAC Director Nancy Amidei said: "We feel this is compromising children's health. The proposed new standards will not provide one-third of the daily nutritional requirements of children. On top of this, in many instances, some poor children receive up to half of their daily food from the school lunch program."



Undernourishment in children has been shown to cause growth and behavior abnormalities, anemia, chronic illness, impaired learning ability and, in severe cases, mental retardation.

As the Administration and the conservative Congress see it, out of a total budget of about $700 billion they can save $1.5 billion by reducing child nutrition programs. As we now see it, those alleged savings will come by literally taking food out of the mouths of children and risking the health of many kids at a time of critical physical and mental growth.

The parents of 26 million schoolchildren and other responsible citizens must wonder if this is what they voted for.

PUBLIC AWARENESS is growing of the cost impact the Reagan Administration's budget and tax cuts will have on the nation, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Dale McFeatters of Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The program is produced by the AFL-CIO as a public service and aired weekly on Mutual radio.

House Ignores Veto Threat, Approves Housing Funds

In a rare setback for the Reagan Administration, the House ignored a veto threat and approved a compromise appropriations bill to fund housing programs, veterans' services and an assortment of other programs for the fiscal year starting Oct. 1.

The vote was 209-197, and the conference agreement now goes to the Senate for final approval. There were indications, however, that the Senate Republican leadership might try to sidetrack the measure to avoid a confrontation and deal with appropriations for the new fiscal year through a temporary funding resolution.

DEMOCRATIC managers of the housing and veterans' bill pointed out that the totals were within the budget ceilings previously imposed by Congress and even below the budget request that President Reagan submitted last March.

Reagan complained of "budget-busting bills" in his veto threat, but the principal expenditure in the $56.3 billion appropriation that exceeded his budget request was for veterans' medical care. The President had sought to cut 5,181 staff posts and reduce outlays for 172 VA hospitals.

While a number of southern conservative Democrats—the self-styled "boll weevils"—voted with the Republican leadership, there were enough GOP defections to deny the President his accustomed victory.

THE BILL provides funding for 147,000 subsidized housing units in fiscal 1982, down from 210,000 in the current fiscal year.

In other congressional developments:

- A House-Senate conference will seek to reconcile bills providing a 14.3 percent pay raise for military personnel. The House version would apply the raise across-the-board; the Senate bill would give the bigger percentage increases to experienced officers and enlisted personnel with needed skills. Civilian federal employees are due a 4.8 percent raise on Oct. 1.

- Prospects for a labor-supported extension of the Voting Rights Act were enhanced by a strongly favorable recommendation from the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. The commission, which is an independent, bipartisan agency serving a fact-finding role, said the law should be strengthened rather than weakened.

DESPITE increased political participation in states covered by the law's special provisions, the commission said, "minorities continue to face a variety of problems which the act was designed to overcome."

- The House Ways & Means Committee sidetracked a tariff relief bill that would have resulted in greater imports of ethyl alcohol and set back the development of a domestic fuel alcohol industry.

The Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers and the Distillery Workers had warned that the tariff cuts would put U.S. workers out of jobs, and the AFL-CIO urged that the bill be rejected. Its sponsors withdrew the bill from consideration at a committee mark-up session Sept. 16 after it was evident that it did not have the votes to pass.

Labor Opposes Attempt to Relax Anti-Bribery Law

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to reject legislation that would weaken the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, which was enacted in 1977 after a series of scandals involving bribery of foreign officials by U.S. firms in order to obtain lucrative contracts.

An Administration-supported bill being considered by the Senate Banking Committee "allows rather than prohibits bribery" and should be rejected, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote committee members.

Denison disputed the assertion that the strict anti-bribery law hurts U.S. trade. "The facts show that U.S. exports increased in each of the years following the passage of this act," he noted.

"BY CHANGING the current law's requirement that corporations keep accurate records in reasonable detail of payments of corporate funds, the bill would make it difficult to trace the use of slush funds to pay bribes," Denison said. Without proof of violations, he warned, effective prosecution would not be possible and bribery would continue.

Denison also sharply challenged the proposal to exempt certain types of bribes "such as 'grease' payments and payments that are customary in the country where they are made." Such exemptions would amount to legalizing bribery, he protested.

As for the argument that existing penalties are too harsh, Denison noted that foreign bribery scandals have been reduced since the law's enactment.

Matthew Lynch Dies, Led Tennessee Labor

Nashville, Tenn.—Matthew Lynch, president emeritus of the Tennessee AFL-CIO, died Sept. 15 of respiratory failure at St. Thomas Hospital here.

Lynch, who was 69, was president of the state labor council from 1963 until his retirement two years ago. He also had served as executive secretary of the state CIO for 10 years and as secretary of the merged AFL-CIO state body for six years.

Lynch had been a member of the Clothing & Textile Workers since 1929. He served the union as an organizer during the 1930s and '40s.

Survivors include his wife, Maude, and five children.

Sex-Segregated Jobs

Panel Finds Wide Gap In Pay of Men, Women

A federal advisory panel reported that "widespread" disparity in wages paid men and women for performing comparable work persists in the United States and said the concept of comparable worth—equal pay for jobs of equal value—"merits consideration" as one possible solution to the problem.

Job segregation is more pronounced by sex than by race or ethnicity in today's labor market and is "an important source of wage differentials," the National Research Council said in a three-year study conducted for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. The EEOC had sought its advice on how to handle a growing number of complaints by women who were paid less for comparably valued jobs.

THE NATIONAL Research Council, an arm of the National Academy of Sciences, attributed much of the earnings gap between men and women workers to the persistent placement of women in certain occupational classifications that provide little or no room for advancement. The problem is highly complex, fraught with social and economic implications, the panel stressed, and not capable of quick solution by any specific remedy.

Despite a heavy influx of women into the job market over the past 20 years, "the work women do is paid less, and the more an occupation is dominated by women the less it pays," the council found. Gus Tyler, assistant president of the Ladies' Garment Workers Union, served on the study committee.

Ann Miller, a University of Pennsylvania sociology professor and head of the committee, observed that women in the early 1960s who worked the whole year at full-time jobs earned less than 60 percent of what men did, "and that is still true today."

THE REPORT emphasized that although some women balance family demands by choosing typically low-paying jobs that allow easy movement in and out of the labor market, the predominance of women in low-paying jobs "also results from the exclusionary practices of employers and from the systematic underpayment of jobs held mainly by women." The study backed up its charge that women are systematically underpaid when compared to men with three types of evidence:

- When jobs held mainly by women are compared with those held mainly by men and factors such as education, experience and skill are equal, differences in average pay persist.

- Past discriminatory practices, such as paying women and minorities less for doing the same job as white men, have been incorporated into wage structures and continue to operate even in the face of conscious attempts to avoid discrimination.

- Within firms that use job evaluation as an aid in setting wages, women's jobs are paid less on the average than men's jobs with the same rating.

THE STUDY GROUP pointed out that the discrimination may not be intentional on the part of employers. Discrimination, as the term is used in the report, does not imply intent but refers only to outcome, it said.

The ILG's Tyler, in a supplementary statement endorsed by San Francisco attorney Mary C. Dunlap, said that he backed the major thrust of the report but noted that it "does not offer an adequate strategy to cope with a continuing inequity."

DESCRIBING THE situation as "the ghettoization of women in the economy," Tyler suggested that the minimum wage be indexed at around 60 percent of the average manufacturing wage as one means of pursuing greater wage equity.

"Such a minimum wage should apply to all workers, regardless of race, sex, or age," he said. "If certain workers deserve more because they perform better, they should be paid more by lifting them above the minimum and not by paying others less by depressing the minimum for the weakest categories of workers."

Other ways of achieving greater equity, he suggested, include stricter regulation of imports and the introduction of a "social wage" to supplement the traditional wage for items such as rent, food stamps, and health care.

The AFL-CIO has long stressed that a good union contract is not only the most effective guarantee against exploitation but also the basis upon which true equality can be built in the labor market. Union women working under collective bargaining contracts generally earn up to 25 percent more than non-union women, government statistics show.

Washington State Bias Cited On Women's Pay Inequities

The State, County & Municipal Employees filed sex discrimination charges against the state of Washington, accusing it of systematically underpaying its female workers.

The union, which represents thousands of women employed by the state, filed the charges with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission on behalf of nine individual female plaintiffs. The charges were filed under Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act forbidding discrimination in compensation on the basis of sex.

IN 1974, AFSCME's Washington affiliate pressed the state to commission an independent job evaluation study on the wage gap between state employees in predominantly female and predominantly male job classifications. Results of the study showed that male employees received an average 22-35 percent more pay than women in job classes requiring the same levels of skill, effort, and responsibility.

Similar studies in 1976, 1978, and 1980 produced almost identical findings. The Washington pay discrepancies were cited in a recently published National Academy of Sciences report prepared for the EEOC showing widespread wage discrimination based on sex in many parts of the United States.

"All the job evaluation studies done by the state since 1974 have shown the same results—that the state of Washington is an equal opportunity offender," AFSCME General Counsel Winn Newman asserted. Newman said the union is seeking both equity and equality for women represented by AFSCME who work in job classifications traditionally undervalued and underpaid.

AFSCME President Jerry Wurf said the state has admitted to its discriminatory practices, "yet successive administrations have chosen to do nothing to remedy this blatant situation. AFSCME members have waited long enough—now we're seeking legal relief."

BESIDES ITS EEOC complaint against Washington State, the union recently filed sex discrimination charges on the basis of pay equity against the cities of San Jose and Los Angeles and against the state of Connecticut. Wurf said the union intends to file additional charges and lawsuits on similar grounds in other states and cities.

Last July, AFSCME members in San Jose successfully struck over the pay equity issue and won a $1.4-million pay adjustment for hundreds of city workers in predominantly female job classes, in addition to an overall wage increase for all 2,000 city employees.

Kirkland Scores Irresponsible Policies

The following is excerpted from an interview conducted with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland in his office Sept. 9, 1981. Reporters present were Gisela Bolte, Time; Howard Fineman, Newsweek; Jeffrey L. Sheler, U. S. News & World Report; Peter Gall, Business Week; Sid Levy, Kiplinger; Irving R. Levine, NBC-TV News; Kathleen McCleery, WETA-TV; Deborah Potter, CBS-TV News, and Barry Serafin, ABC-TV News.

REPORTER: The budget's already been cut once for fiscal year '82; now, there's talk of finding another $10 to $15 billion and more to cut. A lot of that might come further out of the social programs. Are you ready at this point to say, "Let's make some more specific cuts here on the military side of the equation?"

KIRKLAND: I think that the defense statement we adopted at the Chicago meeting answers your question. We said in February that we had always been proponents of a strong defense, that a strong defense was necessary for the protection of the values that we cherish. We noted that the Constitution imposes upon the government the responsibility to provide for the general welfare and for the common defense, and that we did not believe there ought to be trade-offs.

We don't oppose increased expenditures, but we think that the plan should come before the money. All we've seen thus far is talk about the money, but where's the plan? There are large areas of critical defense expenditures where no decisions have been made—the MX, the B-1, the size of the Navy, the configuration of ships—and no decision has been made in these critical areas. But they're making budget commitments on how much money the Defense Dept. gets.

I think that's absurd, and it's particularly absurd and very harmful when accompanied by a tax bill that, I believe, represents the most irresponsible fiscal act in our times.

REPORTER: Do you expect that the AFL-CIO will get into the trenches, so to speak, lobbying for or against particular defense items once you look at whatever plan comes up to the Hill?

KIRKLAND: I want to see the plan before I make that judgment. There's nothing that goes up on the Hill that we disavow any interest in.

REPORTER: What kind of position do you take on the second round of budget cuts in the social areas?

KIRKLAND: Well, we didn't like the first round. I assure you we won't like the second round.

REPORTER: When do you think you'll have a better chance of getting Congress on your side?

KIRKLAND: I think we would have a better chance because I think there are beginning to be strong misgivings in the country about the prudence of the President's entire economic package. There are conflicts of philosophy even among the Administration's supporters, the advocates of the so-called Kemp-Roth and Laffer Curve approach, who always argue that it wasn't necessary to cut the budget at all, but these tax cuts would release so much energy and dynamism that you would produce the revenues needed to pay for all these things.

Then there are the fiscal purists who believe that the balanced budget is the cure for all ills in society.

Then there's a third group, the monetary cranks that believe it's all a matter of M-1 and M-2.

They're at war with each other, whether they acknowledge it or not. They seem to have glossed over the fact that all of these doctrines are internally inconsistent and pretend they are parts of a well thought-out whole. Well, it's like putting north and south pole magnets together: They can't be made to fit.

Secondly, the Democrats in the Congress have had their little experiment in me-tooism. They've tried to find a market for their souls, unsuccessfully, and tried to compete with the Republicans in who could cut the budget the most, the best, or cut taxes the most, the best. They lost their souls and they lost the vote as well.

Those who tried to find holding ground and fighting ground on hopeless amendments like the Obey-Udall alternative on taxes got only 40 or 50 fewer votes, and I think when they come back, they might have decided it's about time they began to present a responsible opposition to the kind of madness that's afoot in this town.

REPORTER: How would you describe your feeling about the Reagan Administration? If antagonistic is not the word, what word would you use?

KIRKLAND: I have met with a great many of the people in the Reagan Administration over practical questions and practical issues, and I have no feeling of venom.

I long since stopped either falling in love or acquiring hate or vindictiveness about people in political life. If you fall in love, they'll break your heart every time. I try to look at it as dispassionately as possible, and I think I do.

I'm concerned about substance, not about style, and our cold appraisal of the substance is that it's damaging to the interests of the country, that it represents a diversion of the energy and resources of the country from the path that is going to take it on to future progress and strength, and it's going to be a terrible waste of time and a terrible waste of energy and resources that we're going to have to make up.

The farther we fall back, the more we're going to have to make up. There's a terrible need in this country for an affirmative, benign use of the instrument of government in all sorts of ways. It can never be adequately left to private initiative. Our transportation system in this country, aside from the airlines, is in horrible shape. It's not going to be restored by private initiative; it's going to take public support. Hell, it's only there because of public support. The whole infrastructure of this country is eroding—rotting away—and there has to be a role, a benign role, for government.

We do not accept, and we think it's a terribly harmful idea to base a philosophy of government on and to appeal to the people on the premise that government is a malignant and destructive force. It can be, but there are benign uses of it that we cannot afford to dismantle in a modern, industrial country.

REPORTER: Do you think that the Reagan Administration's professed goal of balancing the budget in 1984 is a futile exercise, per se?

KIRKLAND: The way they're going about it, yes. The downside risk that you will have the biggest deficit in the history of this country by then is far more likely than the upside possibility of a balanced budget.

I think the budget will be balanced when you return this country to something approaching full employment. You cannot balance a budget on the basis of heavy unemployment. That philosophy was not particularly a product of liberal or radical thinking; it was first put forward, as I recall, by George Shultz with a so-called full-employment budget. His concept was that the budget should be balanced at full employment, the budget would show a surplus, and that's the only way it's ever going to be balanced in this country.

The source of the imbalance is the 7.2 percent unemployment. For every 1 percent unemployment, there's a $25 to $30 billion swing, as far as the budget's concerned, and as long as you follow the doctrine of monetarism, which really means you cause further unemployment, you reduce economic activity. That's the whole purpose of monetarism. The bottom line of that theory is that the country has to go through a wringer in order to lower economic activity in the hope of finding some base where everything is so bad that the CPI is zero, because there's no market.

I think that's going to be ruinuous, and it's going to cause deeper and deeper deficits as long as it's rigidly pursued.

My only hope—and we'd like to play a role in a constructive approach to the problems of this country—my only hope is that in a year or two, they'll begin to see that this plan won't work, and they'll start looking around for alternatives. Then we'd be available for advice and counsel and cooperation.

REPORTER: What are the odds you give to the possibility of the Congress being less conservative after 1982?

KIRKLAND: I have great faith in the ultimate wisdom of the American people. I think they'll do the right thing. I think there will be a turnover in the Congress. I believe the normal resurgence during a mid-term election will take place.

A lot of things depend on events. There isn't an administration in the history of this country, despite all of its plans and strategems, that hasn't ultimately been overtaken by events and forced to deal with events that weren't on the planning boards. It happened to Carter; it happened to Lyndon Johnson; it happened to Nixon.

REPORTER: There could be a possibility that this Administration is just lucky. In 1982, with the economy being in a very sluggish state now, it may take off just before the election.

KIRKLAND: Not only might it be lucky, it might even become wise. The path to wisdom is not very murky, it seems to me. I believe that this country is, inherently, exceedingly strong; that it's being held back; it's being repressed; it's being disabled by a policy that's deeply harmful and deeply misguided. I believe that if you could cut interest rates, for example, this country would boom, and I also believe that in that process, inflation would go down.

Consider what this policy has done. In allegedly building a base for future advances, monetary policies have destroyed more houses than we did in Hiroshima and Nagasaki combined, not to mention Dresden and Tokyo, during the war. And if that's a wise, prudent and sound policy, then I'm crazy.

They talk about the supply of money being the crucial thing: at all costs, you've got to get it down, even if you destroy every unbuilt house in this country, every job in this country, all production in this country.

Even if you accept the old classical theory, I always thought that the equation, even in monetary terms, was one of achieving a balance between the supply of money and the supply of goods. If, in the process of curtailing the supply of money, you destroy the goods, I think the only answer is ruin. And they're killing the goods. They're killing housing. They're killing the automotive industry. On those two industries, I think one out of every three jobs ultimately depends. I can't see the sanity of it.

REPORTER: Do you think that there is any chance that the Federal Reserve would come around and, you know, undo its own policy?

KIRKLAND: I would hate to bet the future of this country on the future course of the Federal Reserve Board. I think the fact that it exists in its present form is a great mistake and is a built-in weakness. And I think if you elect the right kind of Congress, it ought to be possible to re-examine the whole structure of the Federal Reserve System and the idea of putting such vast power over the future of this country and the present of this country in the hands of a group of monomaniacs who are not responsible to anybody. Then to say, do we look to this little group for hope. The only thing I could look to is the dismantling of that little group and making it more responsive to a sound national policy.

Preparations For Rally Hit Fever Pitch

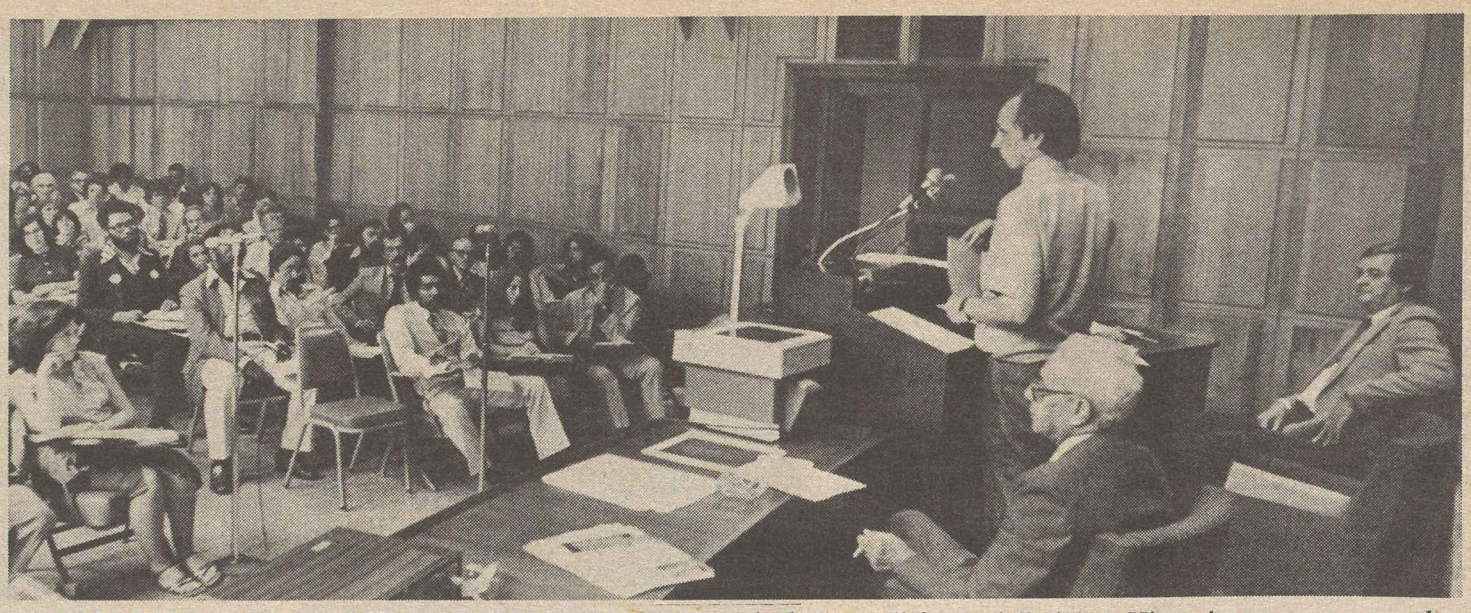
The Communications Workers have purple CWA blazers for their members who are serving as Solidarity Day marshals. Some of them will be at the Washington railroad station at 6:20 a.m. when a Florida contingent is scheduled to arrive.

The first special train is due in from Boston at 7:25 a.m., carrying mostly members of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the Machinists.



OTHER SPECIAL trains will be arriving throughout the morning, including four from Philadelphia. The railroad station is on the subway route to the rally area, and the AFL-CIO has in effect bought the subway system for the day. All rides will be free.

Every so often, a caller to the Solidarity Day office wants to know what the plans are in the event of rain.

The answer is invariably the same.

"The Solidarity Day rain date," followed by a pause, "is Sept. 19."

And then a chuckle.

SOLIDARITY DAY COORDINATORS from organizations joining with labor in the Sept. 19 demonstration are briefed on transportation details for the day of the rally by AFL-CIO Representative Dick Wilson. With Wilson are, foreground, Arnold Aronson, secretary of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, and John Perkins, AFL-CIO Solidarity Day coordinator.

Rockwell Aerospace Contract Ratified by 4 UAW Locals

Los Angeles—Auto Workers at four Rockwell International aerospace plants have approved a new three-year agreement providing substantial wage, pension and fringe benefit improvements.

The contract, ratified by an 83 percent favorable vote, covers some 10,000 UAW members here and 3,000 more at Rockwell's aerospace facilities in Tulsa, Okla.; Columbus, Ohio, and Santa Susana, Calif.

WORKERS WILL get a 7 percent wage hike, retroactive to July 4, with increases of 3 percent in the second and third years. Quarterly cost-of-living adjustment formulas will be maintained with no diversion of COLA to pay for other benefits.

Improvements were scored in shift premium pay and the minimum amounts of promotion increases. Skilled workers will receive additional increases of from 15 to 25 cents an hour, and the wage progression system will be accelerated so that workers can reach the top of their pay grades more rapidly.

UAW Sec.-Treas. Raymond Majerus, who is also director of the aerospace division, said the union is "particularly proud" of the pension provisions. That part of the agreement will run for four years and increase pension benefits by 33 percent by the final year.

Workers covered by the new contract who retired after July 1, 1981, or during the term of the pension agreement, will see their basic benefits rise from a previous $12 per month per year of credited service to $16 per month in the final year of the pact.

BENEFITS FOR those already retired will increase by $1.50 per month per year by the end of the agreement, and the supplemental allowance for workers who retire between 60 and 62 with at least 20 years of service was stepped up from $325 to $375 per month, payable in addition to basic benefits.

Health care improvements include increased major medical coverage, upgraded dental care coverage, including orthodonture, vision care, hearing aid coverage and increased payments for diagnostic tests and hospital care.

Other improvements are two additional paid holidays and strengthening of the layoff benefit plan.

Majerus also pointed to the establishment of a joint union-management committee to develop a child care plan for all shifts and a written commitment from Rockwell to provide "a workplace free from sexual harassment."

Controllers Ask Bargaining, Challenge Decertification Bid

The Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization pressed the Administration to return to the bargaining table as attorneys for the union appealed a government recommendation that it be decertified as the controllers' representative.

The union's request to resume negotiations came during a hearing on its appeal to the Federal Labor Relations Authority to reverse an FLRA administrative law judge's recommendation for decertification.

PATCO LAWYER Richard Leighton asked the three-member authority to issue an interim order requiring the union and the Federal Aviation Administration to resume talks by Sept. 23, with any unresolved issues sent to arbitration if no agreement is reached by Oct. 23. The decertification action would be deferred until after an arbitrator's decision, at which time the entire matter would be re-examined by the authority.

Lawyers for both the FAA and the authority opposed the union proposal to require a new round of talks. The authority has functions similar to those of the National Labor Relations Board in the private sector.

President Kenneth Blaylock of the Government Employees, who also heads the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept., appeared on PATCO's behalf, along with AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold.

BLAYLOCK, urging flexibility and discretion in the case, told authority members that "it is necessary whatever you do to make the collective bargaining process work." Both he and Gold asked the authority to find suitable alternatives to revoking PATCO's certification as bargaining agent for the air traffic controllers.

Blaylock called decertification a "temporary" solution, and warned that unrest is growing among other federal workers. He said the FAA, in seeking decertification, wants "a gallon of blood and punitive action" against the union, but warned that eliminating one side will not resolve the labor dispute.

"I don't think PATCO is on trial," Blaylock declared. "The whole federal labor relations system is on trial."

MEANWHILE, another large contribution to the AFL-CIO's PATCO Family Fund—a $100,000 check from the Auto Workers—pushed the total over the $400,000 mark, and checks drawn on the fund to aid families of striking air traffic controllers who are in pressing financial need began going out in the mail this week.

UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said the union's executive board voted to make the contribution at a meeting in Detroit. The money will come from the UAW strike fund.

The Steelworkers, Communications Workers, and other affiliates already have made large contributions to the Family Fund, which is administered by Msgr. George G. Higgins, former director of the U.S. Catholic Conference's Social Action Dept.

Workers, Allies Swell Ranks for Solidarity Day

AFL-CIO regional meetings held last spring, a "strong recurring theme" was the desire of local union participants for a means of "venting their feelings in as dramatic a way as possible."

Mass demonstrations are part of labor's history, Kirkland noted, although the custom has "gotten a little rusty in recent years and it seems to me wholesome to revive that facility."

AT THE SAME time, he continued, "we all recognize that the day after Solidarity Day, the budget will still have been cut, these programs will still be on their way to being dismantled. Perhaps we will have slowed down that process a bit, but we won't change the balance and the Congress profoundly until at least the next election."

Addressing the Washington Press Club on Sept. 15, Donahue said the issues that are the focus of labor's Solidarity Day protest represent "a social program that the vast majority of Americans have accepted" and don't want discarded.

Donahue stressed the importance of Solidarity Day in launching the grass-roots campaign that labor and its allies agree is the essential follow-up.

It's "more than a one-shot protest," he insisted. And while many of the non-labor organizations have worked with the AFL CIO in the past on specific issues, the extent of involvement has gone beyond national headquarters cooperation, involving local and state groups as never before.

The AFL-CIO's Solidarity Day newsletter reflected this theme in its Sept. 16 issue: "When the sun goes down on Solidarity Day, the serious business will just be getting started."

Massive Solidarity Day Protest Gives Clear Message to Reagan

400,000 Hit Cutbacks in Programs

By David L. Perlman

Solidarity Day brought hundreds of thousands of union members to Washington for a demonstration that destroyed the myth of a Reagan Administration mandate, sent a powerful message to Congress, and left an indelible impression on a city that normally takes rallies and demonstrations in easy stride.

By mid-afternoon on Sept. 19, the official count from the mayor's office had passed the 400,000 mark, including tens of thousands of participants from the coalition of organizations that responded to the AFL-CIO's call.

FROM THE SPEAKERS' platform at the Capitol, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland called out to the vast assemblage that stretched to the shadow of the Washington Monument:

"Look around you. You are not alone. Behold your numbers, as far as the eye can see."

They looked with pride and awe, these men and women who had risen before dawn, for the most part, to come to their nation's capital in thousands of chartered buses, in special trains, and in tens of thousands of car pools and van pools.

From the platform, the leaders of their organizations spoke with fervor of the grievances that had summoned such a huge cross-section of mainstream America.

THEY SPOKE of the erosion of occupational health standards and of cuts in job safety enforcement. They spoke of the abandonment of compassion for the needy and the aged.

They protested the undermining of prevailing wage laws and cuts in school lunches. They challenged the wisdom of ending employment and training programs, slashing funds for libraries and starving public services in order to give new tax incentives to an already hugely profitable oil industry.

"For shame," National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman rebuked an Administration that wants Congress to break the social security compact made with America's workers and those already retired. "For shame," his voice rang out with sternness.

BLACK AND WHITE speakers alike assailed the turning away from equal opportunity goals, and the cadence and songs of the historic 1963 civil rights march rang out again in the nation's capital.

In capsule form, the issues that had spurred the demonstration were reflected in the banners and placards carried along the Solidarity Day parade route, down historic Constitution Ave. toward the Capitol.

There were slogans on T-shirts and jackets as well, and even on some of the balloons that floated over the Washington Monument grounds as markers for organization assembly points.

THE CENTRAL theme was symbolized by the posters carried by the leaders of the participating groups as they marched side by side. "We Are One," they proclaimed.

And the Food & Commercial Workers adopted as their dominant slogan an affirmation that goes to the genesis of Solidarity Day. "My Union Speaks for Me," it proclaimed.

That's what President Reagan questioned last February when the AFL-CIO Executive Council greeted his economic program as unfair and unworkable and put forth an alternative program—as Reagan had challenged everyone to do.

Labor's leaders didn't really represent their membership on such issues, the President suggested to a gathering of editors and publishers at the time. The Administration, he insisted, was closer attuned to labor's rank-and-file.

SO LABOR'S rank-and-file came to Washington, to speak for themselves.

They came from steel mills and textile mills, from food markets and post offices, construction sites and government offices, schools and auto assembly lines, railroad yards and wharfs, everywhere.

They were the builders of America and the people who make it run. They collect its garbage and build its roads, teach its children and care for its sick.

They came in all shades of colors and ethnic background, and they spoke with Hispanic lilt, with southern softness, New England twang and the vowels of the New York waterfront.

IN THE LINE of march were the proud elderly, students concerned with their country's future, an array of women's groups carrying ERA posters, and the veterans of a generation of civil rights marches from the NAACP, Urban League and a multitude of others.

"If you do not embrace the proposition that this President has a mandate to destroy the programs that feed the roots of a decent society." Lane Kirkland told them, "look about you. You are not alone."

It was a miracle of organization, if miracle can be defined in terms of painstaking preparation and execution.

And it was a joyous occasion.

THE AFL-CIO had bought up the subway system for the day, eliminating the fare cards so confusing to newcomers, and had lined up a ring of parking facilities accessible to Washington's new subway system.

Transportation marshals, mostly from the Communications Workers, were out early, directing traffic. At some locations, local church groups had coffee urns on hand.

Follow Dave Winckel of Local 405 of the Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers, who brought five others with him in his van on the long trip from Cedar Rapids, Ia.

Along with other Solidarity Day groups that board at each stop, the Iowans are greeted with applause and people come over to introduce themselves. At the subway stop serving Washington's railroad station, a special train from Philadelphia has unloaded more than 1,000 AFSCME members, and the subway cars are quickly filled to standing room capacity. Someone

Historic Rally Makes Its Mark on Washington

By Susan Dunlop

By dawn on Solidarity Day, the people had already started to gather quietly on the long, green slopes that stretch out from the Washington Monument. Organizers and marshals from their unions had been there before them, putting up banners and balloons in the staging area, getting box lunches, signs, buttons and badges ready for their members.

On the highways around Washington, buses and cars were converging on the huge fringe parking areas around the city, many of them with banners proclaiming Solidarity Day.

"WE DROVE ALL night in two cars and a bus to get here," Furniture Workers from Sumter, S.C., said. That was the story everywhere as union members and their allies, whose numbers pushed toward half a million, filled the city.

By most estimates, Solidarity Day was the largest exercise of the First Amendment right of the people to peaceably assemble and petition their government for redress of grievances the nation's capital has ever seen.

"I think this is history," a New Haven construction worker told a friend. Both members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, they had come on one of the extra trains that Amtrak added to handle the demand created by the demonstrators. They agreed, as they watched more IBEW members filling the park near the White House that was their assembly area, that most of the people around them, like themselves, had never been to a demonstration before. "But this is different. Reagan's out to bust the unions."

THE GROUNDS and parks around the Washington Monument, one of the city's most famous sites, stretch west to the Lincoln Memorial, east to the Capitol, south to the Jefferson Memorial, and north to the White House.

By 8 a.m., the crowds that were gathering at the base of the monument began to spread. It was clear that even the early arrivals equaled in number some entire demonstrations of the past.

In the crisp, bright morning, the 50 flags that surround the Washington Monument snapped briskly in the wind. Overhead, red, white, yellow and blue balloons and blimps signalled to marchers where to find their unions.

UNION BANNERS, signs and slogans began to appear everywhere. The green of the parklands was turning every color of the rainbow, as thousands of marchers found their staging areas.

Service Employees' members unloaded hundreds of boxes of plastic trash bags, donated by their union, for the massive clean-up to follow. They dubbed them, affectionately, "Sweeneybags" in honor of their president, John Sweeney.

Machinists, Auto Workers, Service Employees and most other unions began arriving in matching jackets, caps, T-shirts, some supplied by their unions, but most purchased by the members themselves to show their solidarity as a delegation.

The Lynchburg, Va., NAACP wore blue sashes, UFCW members had grocers' aprons and a good supply of stickers that announced, "My Union Speaks for Me." A big demand for the stickers developed among other demonstrators, and they were shared.

A MOLDERS' member from Cincinnati had covered an entire shirt with "I'm Proud to Be Union" buttons. Exchanging buttons, stickers and souvenirs quickly turned into a major sport. It was also a way to get acquainted.

Baseball caps were the headgear of the day, nylon coaches' jackets and union T-shirts were almost the uniform of the day. The women of a Ladies' Garment Workers retirees club from New York had sewn

'Unity' Sets Speakers' Central Theme

Coalition Leaders Stress Accord on Critical Issues

By James M. Shevis

The massive Solidarity Day turnout of Americans of all descriptions protesting the Administration's economic policies and cutbacks in social programs spoke for itself, really: "In unity there is strength and since we must be strong, we must also be one."

Repeatedly, this was the message that reverberated across the National Mall from the speakers' stand near the West Front of the U.S. Capitol.

"BEHOLD YOUR numbers, as far as the eye can see," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged in the keynote of a speaking program televised to the nation by the Public Broadcasting System. "Look at your brothers still marching—in solidarity—down the historic ways of their capital city.

"If you believe that governments are raised by the people, not as their enemies but as their instruments, to promote the general welfare, look about you. You are not alone."

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride, as overwhelmed as anyone else by the sheer size of the 400,000-plus crowd, raised his hands from the platform and said:

"I wish that you could see what I see. There are people wall to wall from here to the Monument. When we go back home and carry out the necessary work to undo what's being done to us, we will have completed the job."

WHAT WAS CLEAR in all the Solidarity Day speeches was that workers and their traditional allies were united as perhaps never before in post-World War II times in fighting to preserve the gains built over the past 50 years by organized labor, civil rights, consumer and other groups.

Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, the master of ceremonies, recalled the words of A. Philip Randolph at the 1963 civil rights March on Washington: "We here today are only the first wave."

"He was right," Donahue said. "The second wave has now arrived. We are here today, and our voice shall be heard. Today is our day—Solidarity Day. Let the nation know that that coalition of religious, environmental, civil rights, consumer, women's, labor, and other like-minded groups—a coalition that has achieved tremendous social and economic gains for all Americans—has joined together again."

SOME 200 NATIONAL organizations banded together to make Solidarity Day a success. Their leaders approved 14 critical domestic issues that Donahue said "unite us all and are the focus of this demonstration." The issues embrace civil rights, education, energy, the environment, fair trade, health and safety in the workplace, housing, jobs, justice, social security, fair taxes, lower interest rates, voting rights, and women's rights.

The speakers touched on a variety of themes, but the central message was that the time had come for the people to mount an offensive against additional government takeways from the workers, consumers, the elderly, the handicapped and the needy while making the rich even wealthier. On this point, there was unanimity and commitment from leaders of both union and non-union groups. Joyce Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women and an AFL-CIO vice president, put it in unmistakable terms:

"We're working people. We built this country, and, damn it, we'll not let anyone tear it apart."

CORETTA SCOTT KING, whose husband, Martin Luther King, Jr., shook the nation's conscience with his stirring "I Have a Dream" speech before the crowd Randolph assembled 18 years ago, warned that Americans "will not stand idly by while tight-money policies destroy the dream of home ownership in America. We refuse to accept massive unemployment, now at record levels for our young people, while a privileged few reap the shameful harvest of tax breaks only for the wealthy."

Women, who make up the majority of the nation's poor and feel the impact of the Administration's policies in many ways, played a prominent role in Solidarity Day.

Eleanor Smeal, president of the National Organization for Women, observed that polls show women turning against President Reagan and the Republican Party because "they have turned their backs on us." She vowed that women would not give up their gains of the past 15 years, but would go on to new victories starting with ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment in 1982.

SMEAL POINTED out that it is "no coincidence" that the states that have yet to ratify the ERA are for the most part the same ones that have so-called right-to-work laws banning union shop agreements.

"Some profit from denying women their rights just as they profit from denying trade unionists, blacks, and ethnic minorities their rights," she said. "Remember, if there were no profit to be gained, you can bet the ERA would already be the law of the land."

Absent from the speakers' platform were elected officials and politicians. They were invited to listen to the voices of the workers and their leaders, as Sec.-Treas. Donahue put it, because Solidarity Day was "conceived as a day for the people to speak." A number of senators and congressmen were in the crowd, and others issued statements of support.

Favored treatment of the rich at the expense of those in need was a recurring theme of the speakers. NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks drew resounding cheers as he lashed at those in the Administration "who wear $1,000 cowboy boots while our children don't have any shoes at all" and "$1,000 plates in the White House while they're cutting back on school lunches."

National Urban League President Vernon E. Jordan, Jr., declared that under Reaganomics "the rich get tax cuts, the poor get program cuts. Just look at some of them—social security minimum benefit, food stamps, CETA jobs and training, Medicaid, legal services, welfare, education aid, and more. . . . There's something missing in Washington today—and that is compassion."

MOST AMERICANS know the economy is in trouble, and that the times call for sacrifice and new ideas, "but we also know sacrifice has to be proportionate to resources," Jordan said.

"Congress and the Administration say to poor people: 'Give up the little you

Reagan's Policies Assailed from All Sides

"President Reagan calls for the people to join him in a national renaissance. Renaissance cannot be a reversion to the past. The true renaissance is for you and me and for all the people that we represent and symbolize to come together in solidarity and through our collective voice and strength elect those men and women to public office and leadership who will lead this nation not backward but forward."

—Reese Robrahn, Director, American Coalition of Citizens with Disabilities, Inc.

"The opposition to the labor movement in this country says that the movement is dead. Do you believe it? What we have proven here today is contrary to what our opposition says. They say that what the movement has been fighting for all these years does not reflect the views of the rank-and-file membership. You have proven today that the rank-and-file membership of the labor movement is supportive of the leadership."

—William H. Wynn, president, Food & Commercial Workers.

"Ronald Reagan and his millionaire Cabinet are stretching and tearing the social fabric of our nation by denying the poor basic subsistence; by taking jobs, training and opportunity from working people; by denying the elderly the hope of financial security; by retreating on equal rights for women and minorities.

"Four past great Presidents have offered Americans a New Deal, a Fair Deal, a New Frontier, and a Great Society. What about 1981? In the first nine months of the Reagan Administration, we have a misdeal, a bad deal, a return to the old, lawless frontier and the development of a damaged society. It is a damaged society in which Ronald Reagan has shrewdly but maliciously pitted young against old, business against labor, and black against white. He has unveiled a strategy in which there are no victors, save for the most affluent."

—Tony Bonilla, president, League of United Latin American Citizens.

"We did not choose this battle. It was thrust upon us—thrust upon us by President Reagan, a President who claims to have a mandate from the people.

"Well, we are the people. And I proclaim today that if the battle must be, let it be. We will not sacrifice the laws and gains that our forefathers died for.

"I am disappointed—but not surprised—that President Reagan cleverly arranged to be out of town so he would not have to face this show of solidarity and strength. He may be out of town today, but he is going to have to eventually face up to the damage he is doing to the men, women, and children of this country who will bear the burdens of his economic programs while the rich reap its rewards."

—Sam Church Jr., president, United Mine Workers.

"President Reagan claims he has a mandate for his program. Does he have a mandate to cut social security? Does he have a mandate to cut occupational health and safety? Does he have a mandate to cut back the school lunches for children? The answer that we want to tell him is that he has no mandate to cut back on social programs of the past half century."

—Arnold Aronson, secretary, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

"Some 18 years ago, the first president of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference, Dr. Martin Luther King, stood near these hallowed grounds and proclaimed to the world that he had a dream that this nation would eliminate poverty, that this nation would institute brotherhood, and that justice would roll down like the waters. You and I have come here today from North, South, East, and West—black, brown, red, and white—to say that we are building a new movement, a new coalition to fulfill the dream that Martin Luther King had 18 years ago."

—Rev. Joseph Lowery, president, Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

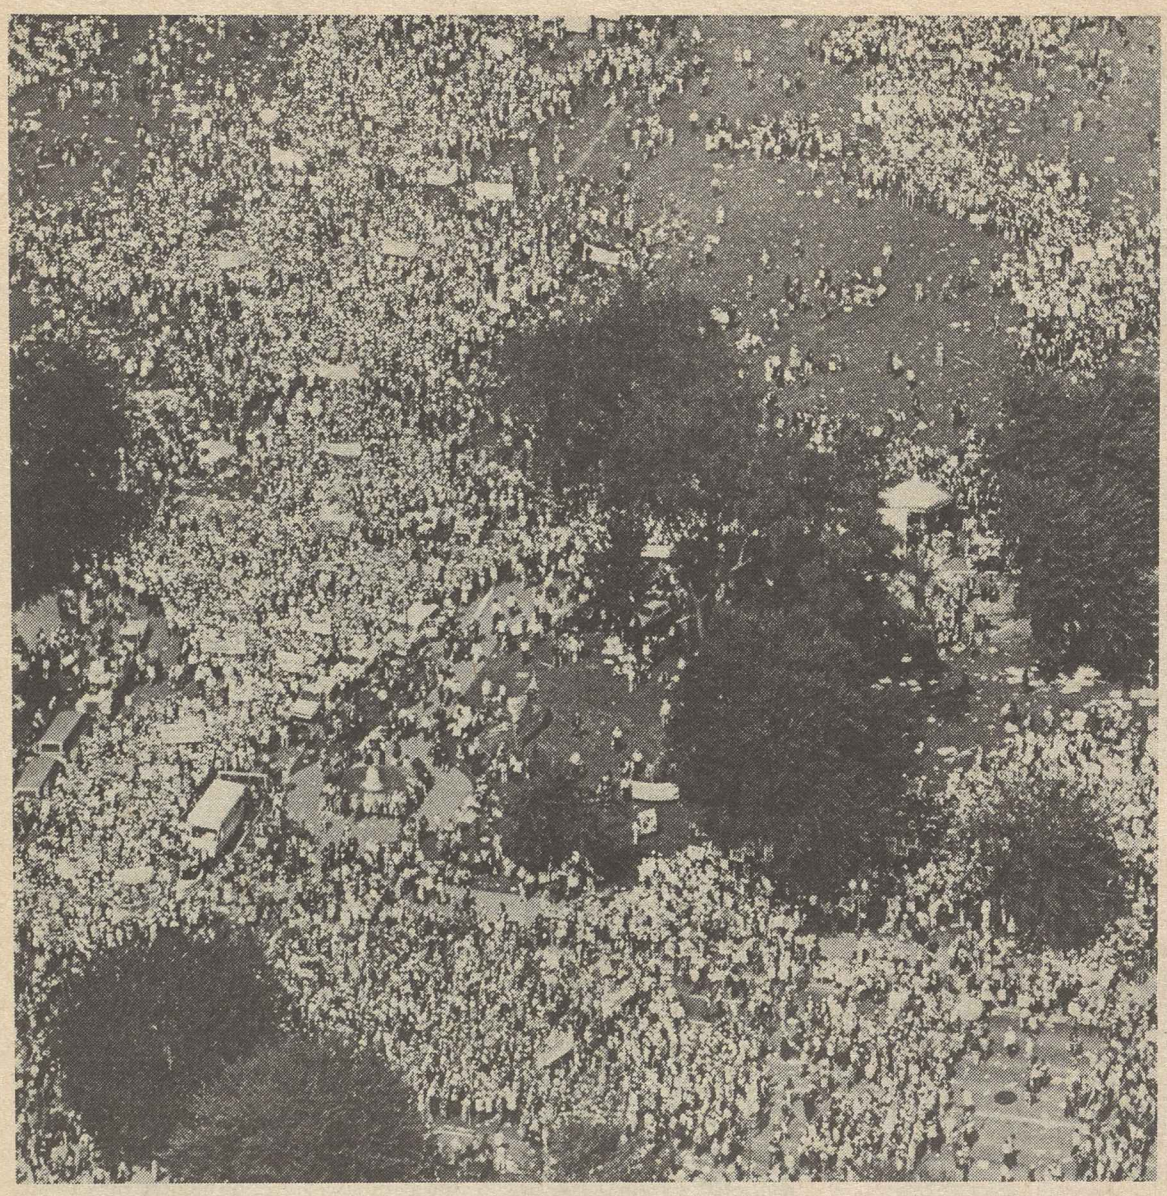
"You know the gentleman who resides in the White House saw fit not to be here today. He's up at Camp David. Let's have one more loud yell . . . one more reminder that we're here."



—Charles Pillard, president, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers.

"By marching today, students demonstrate that they will not roll over and play dead while student loans are slashed and job training programs are eliminated. By marching today, young people demonstrate that they support equal pay for equal work and they are opposed—unconditionally—to subminimum wages.

"Today, young people march side by side with trade unionists, senior citizens, minorities, environmentalists, farmers, and many others. Tomorrow, young people will register to vote—and we will vote."

—Jessica Smith, executive director, Frontlash.

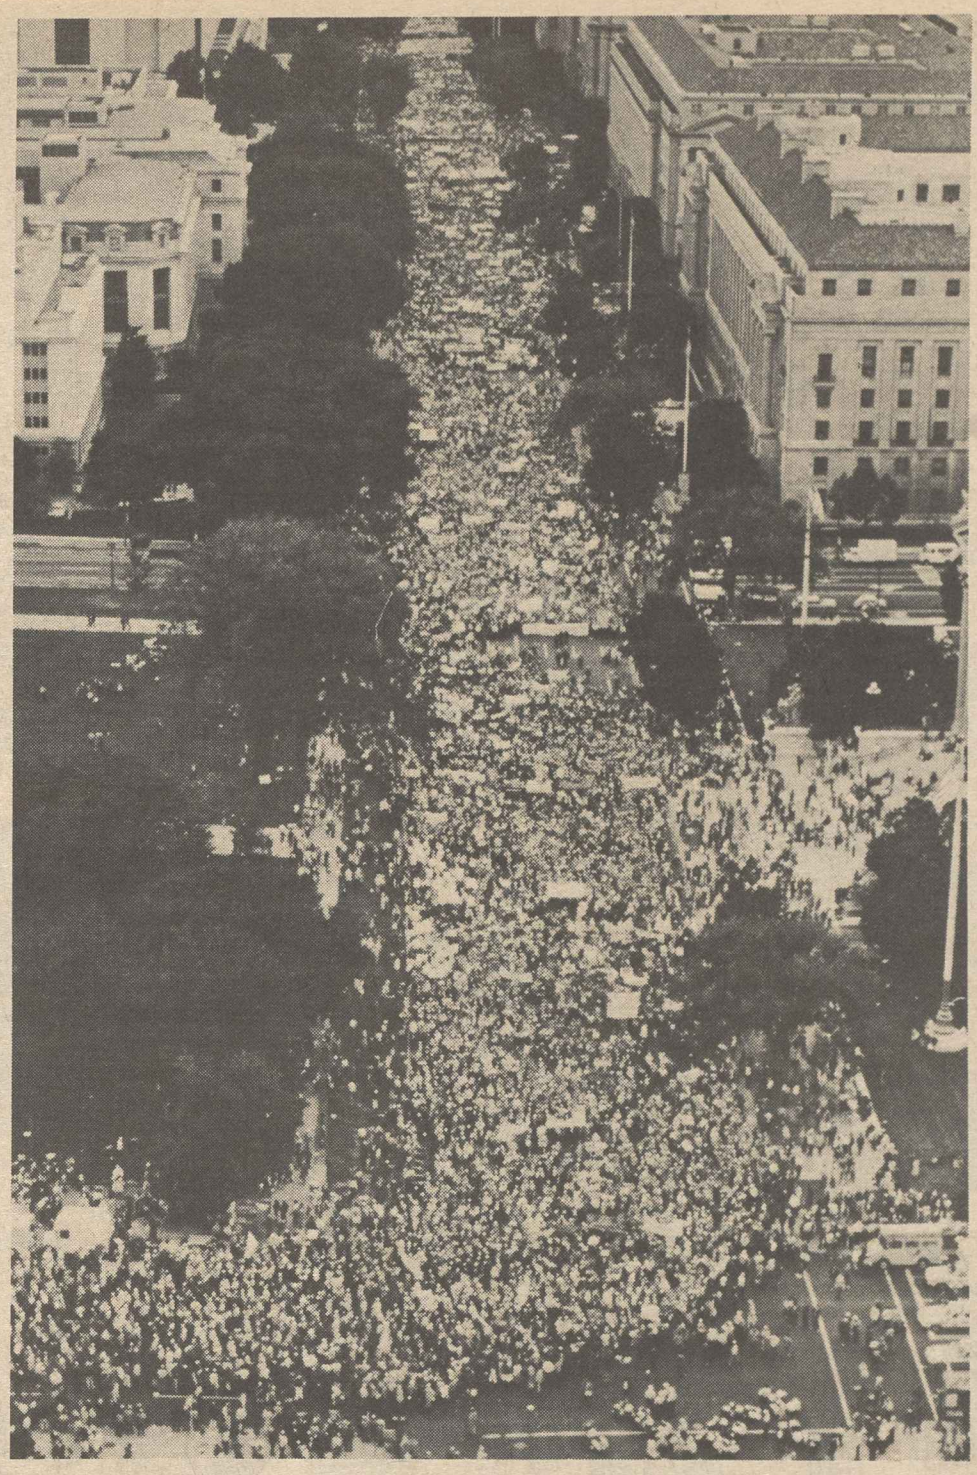
long skirts and colonial bonnets from ILG's "union label" printed fabric.

The Ironworkers who build facilities for the Tennessee Valley Authority wore their work clothes and hard hats. "We got right on the bus after the shift," they explained. It took them 16 hours from Nashville, and they were to be back on the bus at 6 p.m. to head home.

THE ENTERTAINMENT started after George Shirley, tenor with the Metropolitan Opera, sang the National Anthem. By this time, the monument grounds were packed. Hats came off everywhere when Shirley began to sing, and a roar went up when he finished.

The staging area quickly filled as thousands of demonstrators at a time emerged from nearby subway stations after their trip from the fringe parking areas where they had left their buses. Washington's Metro trains were packed throughout the morning with jacketed, capped demonstrators. They weren't worried about missing the stop, they said, they were all going to the same place.



Demonstrators filled every side street, seeking a glimpse of Washington's historic sights as they waited for the long day's march to begin. Some stood in the line to catch the early tour of the White House, and a Government Employee from Baltimore asked directions to the National Archives, "because I've always wanted to see the original Declaration of Independence."

People came with their children, one family all in matching cowboy hats. Some carried babies. H. Claude Hudson, a member of the national board of the NAACP, came from Los Angeles, and at 97, may have been the oldest demonstrator.

ON THE STAGE at the monument grounds, an Irish folk group had the huge crowd clapping time and dancing to reels and jigs. Labor singers on stage were joined by thousands of voices singing "We Shall Not Be Moved." By 10 o'clock, marshals were assembling their delegations for the march up Constitution Avenue.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, flanked by the representatives of the coalition that had joined Solidarity Day and the federation's Executive Council, got a cheer when he took his place behind the Solidarity Day banner to start the march at noon.

The first wave of marchers took about an hour to reach the West Front of the Capitol for the rally. By themselves, they had filled the width and length of the avenue, and hours later marchers were still flooding the expanse of the Mall. From the platform, they stretched a solid mile back to the Washington Monument. You had to be impressed.

Media Coverage Near 2,000 At 'Banner Day for Labor'

Nearly 2,000 reporters, photographers and technicians from print and electronic media covered the Solidarity Day march, and the stories they filed reflected the impact of the huge demonstration.

The New York Times pronounced the rally "a stunning success" and pointed particularly to the varied nature of the crowd. "It was young and old, black, white, Hispanic, construction union and industrial workers. Because of this diversity, it was unlike the single purpose crowds that gathered in the civil rights and antiwar days."

THE TIMES also noted that the mood of the day was one of "great camaraderie and happiness" among "genuine American workers."

The New York Daily News called the march "A Banner Day for Labor Protest." The paper's front page headline, "Labor Rally Blasts Ron," caught the theme of the rally, a show of opposition to the Administration's economic and social policies.

The rally was "a massive wave . . . unprecedented in modern labor history and perhaps the largest political protest in Washington during the past 20 years," the Washington Post reported.

THE CROWD, the Post noted, "was a broad slice of America . . . a colorful patchwork of men, women and children . . . which might become the most powerful grass roots progressive coalition since the civil rights and anti-Vietnam War days."

The "therapeutic value to the labor movement" of the demonstration was highlighted by the Wall Street Journal, which quoted AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue's remark, "if this doesn't put an end to the nonsense about us not speaking for our members, I don't know what will."

Solidarity Day was meant to "send a clear message to the White House," the Journal said, pointing out that "many demonstrators appeared to be Mr. Reagan's constituents—middle class and middle-aged."

Chicago Tribune columnist Anne Keegan, commented that the city of Washington was impressed not only by the numbers who came for the rally, but also the character of the crowds.

"WHO WAS IT that was so impressive? It was Middle America," Keegan said. "It was the people that built this country and want to keep on doing it. It was the meat-and-potatoes people, the ones who put in eight hours and have no company expense account. The ones who fight our wars. The ones who pay our taxes and have no loopholes."

"It was the working class. And they came to Washington because they want to stay that way," Keegan observed.

Demonstrators Mark Time To Gospel, Jazz, Folk Beats

Gospel, jazz and opera blended with labor songs, blues, country music and marching bands to entertain the Solidarity Day crowds.

From a stage on the grounds of the Washington Monument, dozens of entertainers, themselves members of performers' unions, played to the thousands of demonstrators waiting on the slopes to take their places in the line of march to the Capitol.

MANY OF THE groups performed from the Capitol rally platform as well, and singer-composer Stevie Wonder also was introduced. Wonder attended the rally to show support of Solidarity Day, but did not perform.

Metropolitan Opera tenor George Shirley opened the program with the National Anthem, and stage actor Ossie Davis and "Alice" star Linda Lavin introduced the nearly three-hour outdoor show.

Even bus-trip weary demonstrators danced and clapped with the Irish songs and reels of Washington's Celtic Folk and with the Billy Sparks Band of Austin, Tex., billed as "labor's own country-western band."

Folk singer Pete Seeger was greeted with a roar of applause.

Labor singers included Joe Glazer, Bobbie McGee, Si Kahn and "Groundwork" as well as 81-year old Florence Reeves of Harlan County, Ky., who wrote "Which Side Are You On?"

GOSPEL SINGER Jennie Burton electrified the crowd, and jazz pianist Frank Hinton and Spanish singer Jorge del Castillo were enthusiastically received.

Other entertainment included original songs by AFSCME District Council 37's "Serious Business," the New York Street Theatre Caravan, the Howard University Chorus and the ILGWU Chorus.

Long Journey Fails to Deter Participants

Virtually every state in the union was represented at the Solidarity Day march by the 400,000-plus demonstrators who arrived by bus, car, van, train and even on foot. Travel through U.S. air space was out, however, with union members sticking to ground travel to show support for the striking Air Traffic Controllers.

Most demonstrators, many of whom had been on the road all day and night, said they had arrived in Washington in the early morning and would get back on their buses immediately after the rally for the trip home.

AFL-CIO Solidarity Day coordinators reported requests for more than 5,000 bus permits from unions and allied organizations and estimated that many more buses would be arriving at the last minute. The majority of the buses were parked in metropolitan Washington's fringe parking areas, and demonstrators rode the city's subway, free for the day, to the Mall.

Amtrak, which had added trains to its Northeast corridor, Florida, and Midwest schedules, reported that its reserved seat Metroliners were sold out and non-reservation trains were full.

Although the PATCO strike led to cancellations of air reservations, demonstrators were determined to make the trip to the nation's capital no matter how long it took.

"ONLY THE bus captain is allowed to be cranky on this trip," Ross Rieder warned the 41 demonstrators in the caravan that left Seattle at 7 p.m., Thursday, Sept. 17. Rieder, Washington State AFL-CIO Solidarity Day coordinator, led his delegation to Vancouver, B.C., where they caught a night flight to Toronto and changed to an all-day bus to D.C. They reversed the process on Sunday.

The Wisconsin AFL-CIO arranged a bus caravan through the state to pick up its delegation for a 900-mile trip.

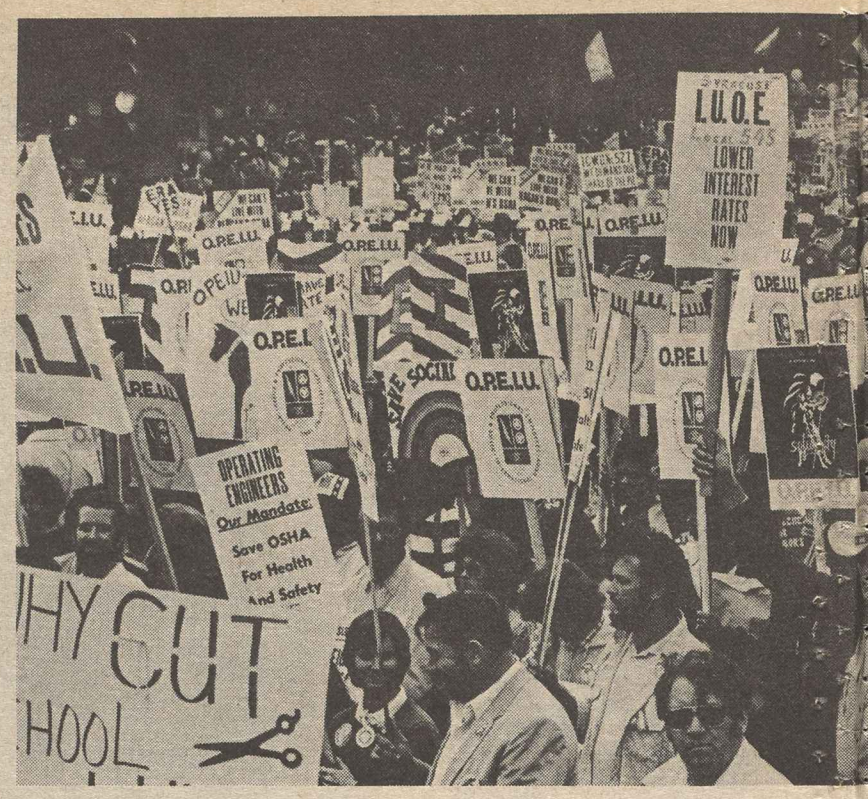
The Alabama AFL-CIO reported at least 11 buses from that state organized by central labor councils. The Iowa AFL-CIO changed its last convention session to 6:30 a.m. so its buses could leave Davenport by 8 for the trip east.

AT LEAST three buses and dozens of cars and vans with Oklahoma union members made the 22-hour drive, and the Minnesota AFL-CIO rallied trade unionists and representatives of allied organizations in Minneapolis and St. Paul for a bus caravan.

Demonstrators from dozens of unions and other cities told the same story: most had ridden on all-night buses, most were returning home the same way immediately after the Solidarity Day rally ended.

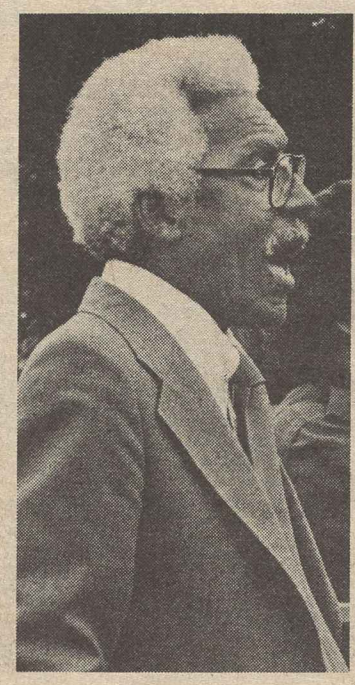
Signs and license plates on buses, hometowns printed on jackets, signs and banners read like an atlas. Among them: Punxsutawney, Pa.; Wheeling, W. Va.; Raritan Valley, N.J.; Tulsa, Okla.; Monck's Corner, S.C.; Lorain, Ohio; Muskingum, Ohio; Waukesha, Wis.

Demonstrators wore banners announcing they were Service Employees from Boston, Auto Workers from Detroit, Steelworkers from Alabama, or striking Teachers from Philadelphia.



City Counts Crowd At Over 400,000

More than 400,000 demonstrators were on the Mall and in the march staging areas at the height of Solidarity Day, according to an official estimate released by Sam Jordan, acting deputy director of the Washington, D.C., Mayor's Office of Emergency Preparedness.



Official city estimates of previous record crowds at Washington demonstrations logged 250,000 or more at both the Nov. 15, 1969, anti-Vietnam War protest and the civil rights "March on Washington" of Aug. 28, 1963.

A Starting Point

GREAT AS IT WAS, Solidarity Day must be viewed as a starting point, not a finish line, for the trade union movement and its many allies.

The more perceptive members of Congress will recognize that the massive Solidarity Day protest touched a wellspring of back-home resentment that is building up against Reagan Administration policies.

Increasingly, this Administration is seen as callous to the poor, hostile to workers, indifferent to minorities, neglectful of the public need—and excessively generous to those who already have wealth and power.

Were it otherwise, not even the meticulous organization that went into the making of Solidarity Day could have produced such a turnout. Ordinary Americans simply do not board buses at daybreak or drive through the night merely to listen to speeches. Not by the hundreds of thousands, they don't.

BUT THE PRESSURE must be kept up, or Congress will tend to relegate Solidarity Day to the status of a one-day wonder with no permanent impact. This must not happen.

The answer lies partly in the shaping of effective working coalitions in the cities and states by the groups that marched together on Sept. 19. There are some such coalitions, but not nearly enough. "We Are One" is not just a slogan for a single day.

Another part of the solution is to perfect the grass-roots lobbying effort that already exists in some localities and in some unions, but again not enough.

Certainly, none of our organizations can do it alone. Even together, there is a realistic limit to what can be accomplished given the nature of the Congress and Administration already in office. But there will be other elections, and an electorate that is aware of the issues and the records of the candidates can make a difference.

THE NEXT BATTLE is already on us. The President is asking Congress for still a new round of budget cuts, including a reduction in "entitlements," such as the right to receive social security benefits promised by law.

Given continued high interest rates—themselves a result of Administration economic policies—the President and his aides argue that further cuts are the only way to keep the goal of a balanced budget within sight.

There is, of course, a simpler way. There is no reason why Congress cannot at least defer new tax breaks for oil companies and oil royalty holders.

Nor is there any reason why a cap cannot be put on the individual income tax cut for 1982—affecting only the top 6 percent of taxpayers who are now scheduled to receive 35 percent of the total tax cut. And was it really more important to give still further depreciation tax breaks to business firms than to fund job training or food safety?

These are some of the things a responsive Congress should be thinking of in the aftermath of Solidarity Day.

Turning Things Around

Meeting on the Mall Laid Basis For Strong, Effective Coalition

By Gus Tyler

SOLIDARITY DAY was much more than a mass meeting; it was a meeting of the masses. And the difference is more than a play on words.

You can have a huge assembly of the like-minded, a homogeneous gathering of political clones. That's one kind of meeting. Or you can have an assemblage of the unlike, and even the unlikely, a coming together of the uncloned. That is another kind of meeting—a coalition of diverse elements in a common cause.

EARLY ON, our country found a slogan for this "meeting of masses." You will find it imprinted on some of our coins. It reads: E Pluribus Unum, "Out of Many, One." Under that rubric this nation was born.

Under the same inscription, this nation may be reborn at a time when there was the danger that we were moving toward a moment when these United States would go down—yes, down—historically as those "Disunited States."

In the last dozen years or so, we appear to have become unglued. John Gardner calls it "pluralism run amok." Others see it as an indulgence in narcissism, a victory of "me-ism" over all "isms." Politically, this fragmentation of our society expresses itself in the proliferation of single-issue groups. Whatever the description or diagnosis, this breakup of our society into multiple warring sects seems to fulfill the gloomy prophecy of Yeats about the hour when "things fall apart, the center cannot hold."

THE REAGAN REGIME threatens to make matters worse. The economic squeeze has been turning people against people in a cannibalistic struggle to survive.

There is much history to suggest that widespread suffering does not necessarily unite people in a rational effort to stay collectively alive. Just as often, hardship turns each against each.

We have been seeing a growing trend toward such cold civil wars: Men are out of work because too many women are in the labor force; teenagers are unemployed because too many old fogeys hang on to jobs, and vice versa; workers are overtaxed because the poor are over indulged; the snow states are in trouble because the sun states are being favored, etc.

As the budget is cut, each group sees the other as "the enemy," as a rival in the bitter battle over a piece of the shrunken pie. Carried to the ultimate, social order falls into disorder, into a Hobbesian war of everyone against everyone.

To the party or person involved, such a falling-out of the people may not be an unwelcome event. Once again a minority, responsible for the catastrophe, may govern a majority by the ancient strategy of "divide and rule."

What Solidarity Day did was to start turning things around, to name the common foe: the Reagan Regime. By that act, the meeting on the Mall laid the basis for an effective coalition in the years ahead.

BUT SOLIDARITY DAY is, at best, only a beginning; a common foe is not a common cause; a shared emotion is not a shared program.

The necessary feeling is present for a creative coalition, for a meeting of the masses, but we still need the ideas, to program a policy, for a meeting of the minds.

'We Will Be Back Again and Again . . .'

In his remarks at the beginning of this program, Lane Kirkland read the Sam Gompers statement of 1983 outlining what the people want. As we conclude today, let me read you a similar message spoken 12 years ago by Lane Kirkland, and even more valid today, on how we're going to fight for those things.

He said, "We are blessed and strengthened by one piece of sure and certain knowledge: that there are no lost causes for us. . . . Though we may lose a round, and another and another and another, we will always be back again and again . . . and we are going to win because we are not going to quit, not today, not tomorrow, not while we breathe."

So spoke Lane Kirkland 12 years ago. So spoke each and every one of you today by your presence here. So spoke the more than 400,000 people who participated in this rally today.

—Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, in closing remarks at Solidarity Day, Sept. 19, 1981.

Response to Reagan's Challenge

Solidarity Day Reaffirms Goals, Rejects 'Mandate' for Retreat

Following is the text of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's address at the Solidarity Day demonstration.

WE ARE HERE today to reaffirm the great goals that have drawn us together, in solidarity, for a hundred years.

We are here to answer a challenge to those goals and to all that we have gained together, in solidarity.

President Reagan has told us that he alone speaks for the working people of this country—and that we do not.

He has told us that he has a mandate from the people for what he wills—and that when we pursue our contrary instructions, we are simply "out of step."

THE OBJECT of governance in America, we are told, is but to raise armies, to foster and nourish commercial enterprise, and to suppress those forces that might check or temper its rapacity.

If you reject the notion that only the state, through its Chief Executive, faithfully expresses your will—look about you. You are not alone.

If you do not embrace the proposition that this President has a mandate to destroy the programs that feed the roots of a decent society, look about you. You are not alone.

If you believe that governments are raised by the people, not as their enemies but as their instruments, to promote the general welfare, look about you. You are not alone.

Behold your numbers, as far as the eye can see. Attend their spirit, vital, strong and free.

LOOK AT YOUR brothers and sisters, by the thousands, still marching—in solidarity—down the historic ways of their capital city.

You are working men and women who have come here with your friends and allies because you care deeply about the course of your country.

You have given up your family days of rest and spent long and tiring hours in buses, trains and cars, from every part of this land, as an act of devotion and testimony.

Your testimony must be heard. The future course of this nation hangs upon it.

You are the people that do the work of America. You run its factories and offices, work its farms, transport its produce, maintain its buildings, teach its children, nurse its sick, clean its streets and fight in its defense.

When something goes wrong in America, you feel it first—before the politicians or the more securely placed. You know it before the pollsters take your pulse.

SOMETHING HAS gone wrong and you know it all too well.

Those who have risen to power in this city have set out to strip our government of any capacity to serve your needs and aspirations.

They have set out to cancel and dismantle the safeguards of a humane society and to commit us to the economic jungle.

They are sacrificing the homes, health and hopes of millions on the altar of crank economic abstractions that defy the laws of simple arithmetic and dismay even their friends on Wall Street, who never allow sentiment to blind them to the bottom line.

Their tax cuts—transferring resources from the common good to the private purses of the rich—are proving the most irresponsible fiscal act in our times—as we said they would.

Their monetary policies are causing record high interest rates—as we said they would.

They have attacked social security and other covenants between the people and their government—as we said they would.

THEIR INDIFFERENCE or hostility to social justice threatens voting rights, women's rights, workers' rights and human rights—and this too we warned, many months ago, would come to pass.

We were right then and we are right today. Attention should, at last, be paid.

Labor is here, in its one hundredth year, to deliver a simple message to the Administration and to the Congress.

We have come too far, struggled too long, sacrificed too much, and have too much left to do, to allow all that we have achieved for the good of all to be swept away without a fight. And we have not forgotten how to fight.

We are out of step with no one but the cold-hearted, the callous, the avaricious and the indifferent.

We are out front and we shall not fall back to hide and wait for better political weather.

BUT THE WINDS are changing as they always do. The winter's chill is approaching and the bloom is fading from false mandates.

Today is just a start, but Solidarity is more than just a day. As our brothers and sisters in Poland have shown the world, it is a quality of the human spirit that can never be defeated.

On this historic day of that new start let us all pledge to each other to return to our communities and to build a new mandate for a humane and just America.

Our mandate responds to the call of Gompers, for:

"More school houses and less jails, more books and less arsenals, more learning and less vice, more constant work and less crime, more leisure and less greed, more justice and less revenge."

Let us bind that mandate in the spirit of Solidarity—forever.

Reagan Plan Raises Alarm

Proposed Social Security Cuts A Basic Issue for Protesters

THE SPREAD AND DEPTH of the public protest against President Reagan's huge social security cutbacks were clearly displayed in the Solidarity Day demonstration Sept. 19 in Washington, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said on a network radio interview.

Seidman pointed to growing alarm about the Administration's determination to press Congress for even greater benefit and protection cuts than those approved just before the August congressional recess.

"There is nothing in the President's recent statements that should encourage older Americans," he observed.

President Reagan is maintaining his demand that Congress make "huge cutbacks" on top of those that have already hit early retirees, disabled workers and students, Seidman noted. He appeared on the network radio interview, Labor News Conference, aired weekly by the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Seidman said the President is pushing hard for the deep cuts because "he really believes that social security is doing too much" and wants a smaller program that does less for the elderly, the disabled and the survivors of deceased workers. But, he added, an even greater motivation for the President is to "cut benefits and thereby build up a surplus that can be used" to achieve his number-one objective of balancing the budget.

THAT, SEIDMAN SAID, is a wrong approach. "The budget is used for year-to-year fluctuations in federal expenditures, while social security is a long-term commitment to the American people."

Reporters questioning Seidman on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Alan E. Adams of Employment Relations Report and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

SOLIDARITY DAY was a spectacular success and some of the credit has to go to President Reagan. He is bringing America together again by threatening to destroy the role of the federal government in promoting the common good.

In the name of balanced budgets, the Reagan Administration is dismantling and slashing programs that have helped the unemployed, the disadvantaged, the disabled, the elderly and the hungry.

In the name of dubious economic theories, Reagan is using the presidency to shift power and resources and regulatory protection from workers and consumers to big business and the rich.

Now the working people of America have drawn the line. By the hundreds of thousands, they assembled at the foot of the U.S. Capitol on Sept. 19 to tell Reagan and the 97th Congress that things have gone too far.

IF THIS WAS the "silent majority," it is silent no longer. Many of them opposed Reagan, but accepted his victory. Some voted for him, and now regret it.

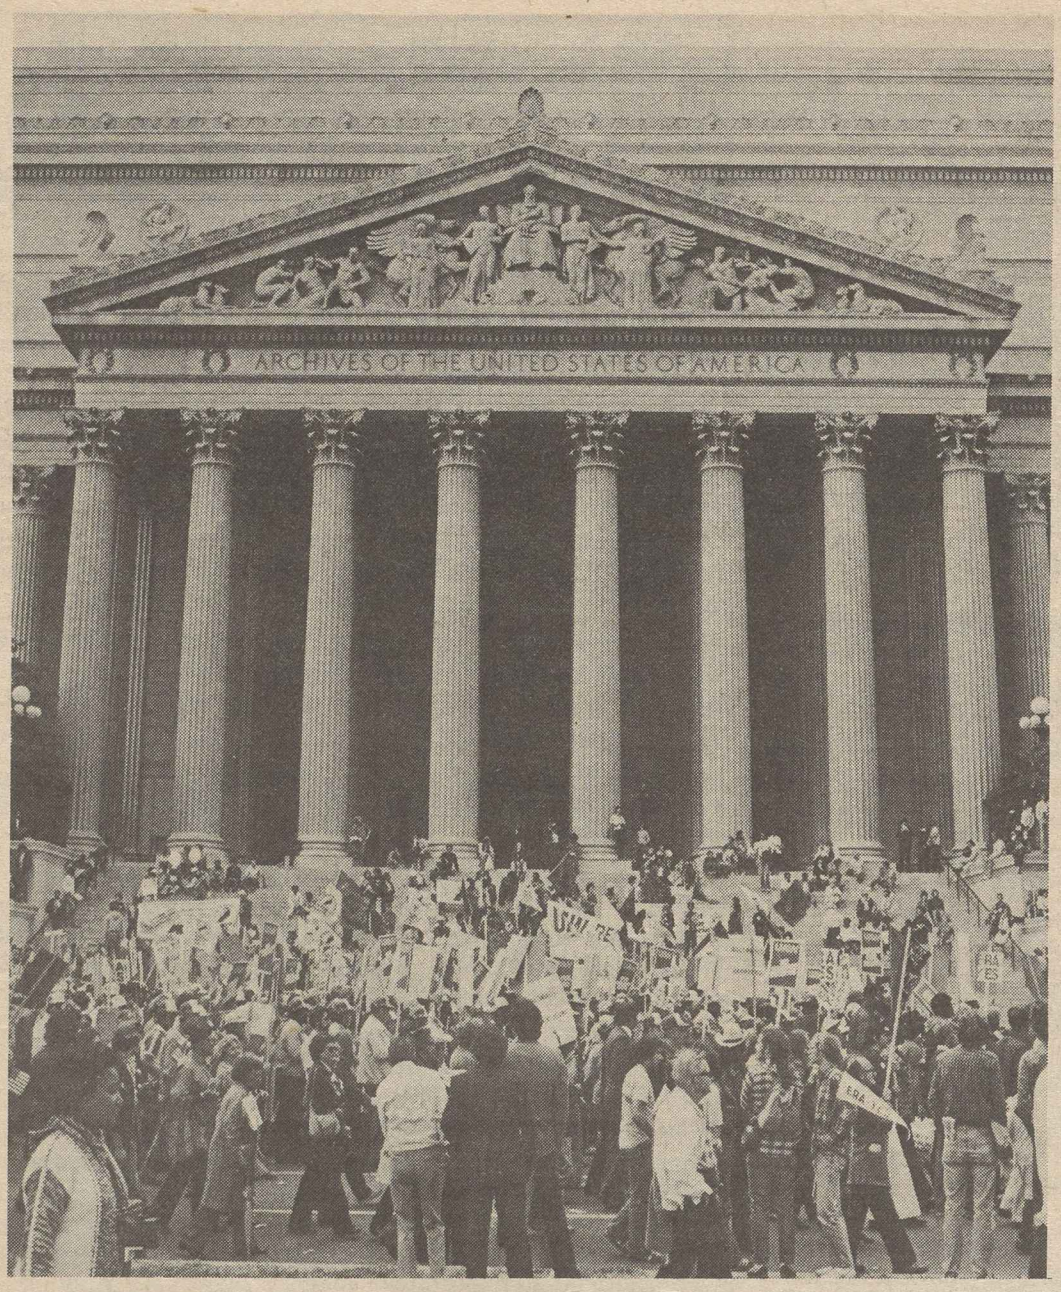
They were coal miners and steelworkers and auto workers. They were operating engineers, machinists and iron workers. They were teachers and social workers. They were the disabled and the elderly. They were public employees who provide social services and maintain public buildings and streets.

These were the people who work hard, pay their taxes and fight the nation's wars. They know the value of the G.I. Bill, student loans for their children, jobless pay, workers' compensation, school lunches, food stamps, job health and safety, and social security.

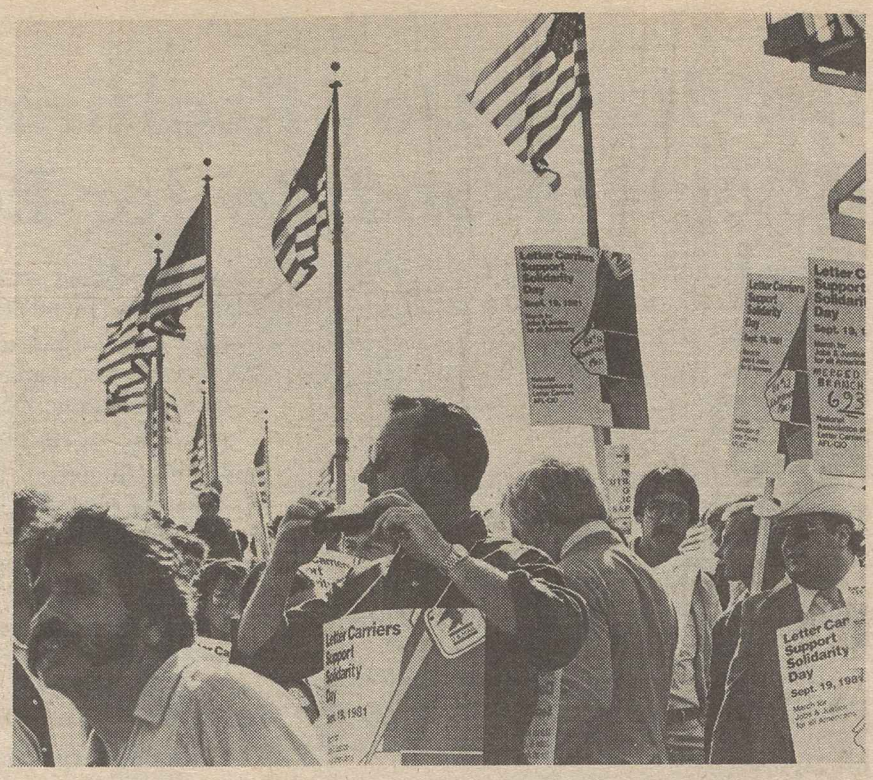
That's what their placards said and what they said in interviews. Wall Street and the financial markets don't believe in Reagan's economic policies and are showing it. The people demonstrating on Solidarity Day, as much in regret as in anger were saying they don't believe the Administration, either.

SOCIAL SECURITY was perhaps the issue mentioned most frequently. Here is what several marchers said:

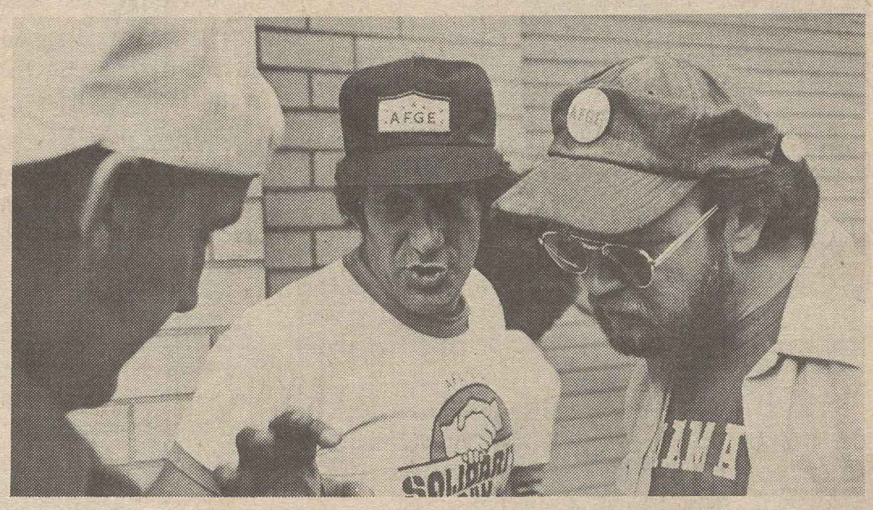
- Rudy Kuzel, a member of UAW Local 72 in Kenosha, Wis. "Reagan didn't have a mandate to do what he's doing. . . . After he broke promises on auto imports, trade adjustment aid and social security, you can't find hardly anybody in our local who will admit they voted for him."
- Jerry Lozupone, a member of Washington-area Local 26, IBEW—"We are fighting back. Social security is a guaranteed thing. We paid into it."
- Ray Parsley, a member of Carpenters' Local 1578 in southern New Jersey, complained about the housing slump and added: "People have worked all their lives building social security. Now he's taking even that from them."
- Earl Hemick, another union carpenter from Fort Wayne, Ind., had voted for Reagan. But he came to protest because "we don't know where he's going to stop—like with social security."



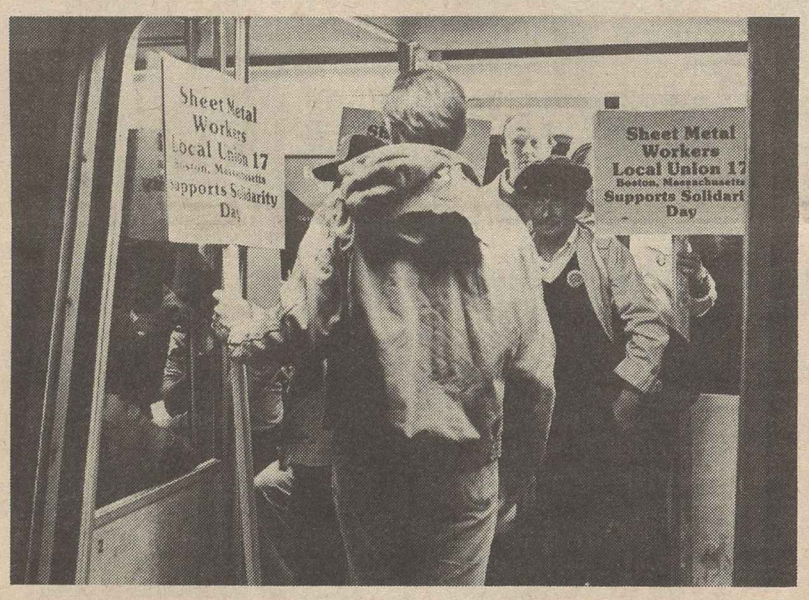
THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION has played a cruel form of politics with social security and other vital programs, and the people seem to sense it.



The Solidarity Day rally and a new Washington Post-ABC News poll show support for Reagan on the decline. There has been a decided shift in the Post-ABC poll showing that people now perceive the President's policies as favoring upper-income people and going too far in cutting social programs.



Reagan's downward slide lends relevance to the observation of the first Republican president, Abraham Lincoln: "If you once forefeit the confidence of your fellow citizens, you can never regain their respect and esteem . . . you may fool all the people some of the time; you can even fool some of the people all the time; but you can't fool all of the people all of the time."



SOLIDARITY DAY demonstrators clearly displayed the spreading public protest against President Reagan's retirement benefit cuts, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, center, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Alan E. Adams, left, of Employment Relations Report and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc.

SOLIDARITY DAY RALLIES in Denver, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and Lake Charles, La., protested Reagan Administration positions on social and economic issues just as strongly as the demonstration in the nation's capital. At left, Executive Sec.-Treas. William Robertson of the Los Angeles AFL-CIO addresses a crowd of 10,000 workers and their allies. In Denver, on the day before the Washington demonstration, President Robert F. Goss of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers warned an audience of about 2,000 that Reagan's basic economic thrust is to take from the poor and give to the rich. The rally was organized to coincide with the Denver appearance of Reagan and Vice President Bush before the National Federation of Republican Women.

Message of Washington Protest Echoes at Rallies in Other Cities

As hundreds of thousands of Americans gathered in Washington to protest President Reagan's economic policies, smaller but no less enthusiastic Solidarity Day rallies were mounted in Colorado, Louisiana, and California.

The rallies were held to accommodate those at far distant points who wanted to attend the demonstration in the nation's capital but would not fly airways controlled by non-union personnel.

AT LOS ANGELES' MacArthur Park, Executive Sec.-Treas. William Robertson of the Los Angeles AFL-CIO told nearly 10,000 trade unionists and members of progressive organizations from throughout southern California:

"This Administration has to be stopped in its attempt to establish a new caste system with the elite at the top and the rest of us at the bottom.

"This is a call to arms. We can and we will muster all of the forces gathered here today, as well as additional allies, to create the political clout so essential if we are to regain the ground we lost in the 1980 election."

THE LARGEST of its kind in Los Angeles since the 1940s, the demonstration was a direct answer to the Administration's claim that labor leaders are out of step with the rank-and-file union membership.

Also speaking in Los Angeles were actresses Jessica Walter and Patty Duke Astin, and Sen. Alan Cranston (D-Calif.).

Colorado's version of Solidarity Day, held in Denver a day before the Washington demonstration, drew attention to the presence of Reagan and Vice President Bush who were in the city to address the National Federation of Republican Women.

"We felt that they ducked out of the demonstration in Washington," said Jack Easter of the Communications Workers, "so we decided to have one here."

CHANTING "Ronald Reagan's got to go, hey-hey, ho-ho," a line of marchers six blocks long wended its way to the Capitol, where a succession of speakers decried the Administration's anti-labor stance and economic policies.

Rep. Patricia Schroeder (D-Colo.) assailed Reagan programs which she said do nothing for women, workers or the poor. She wore a button reading "59¢," the average amount women are paid for every dollar men earn in comparable jobs.

Schroeder pointed out that 10 years ago 85 percent of working people could afford to buy a home but that today only 4 percent can. Reagan's economic policies won't change that, she said.

President Norman Pledger of the Colorado AFL-CIO told the crowd of 2,000 that the government badly handled the air traffic controllers' walkout last month. He called on the Administration to end its "punitive" measures against PATCO, and engage in contract negotiations.

In Louisiana, State AFL-CIO President Victor Bussie led a march to the steps of the Lake Charles civic center where he pledged:

"We're not letting Reagan destroy the union. We've stopped Dave Train, and we can stop Reagan." The reference was to last summer's unsuccessful attempt by Train, the state's first Republican governor in 100 years, to abolish Louisiana's prevailing wage law.

BUSSIE ALSO predicted that Reagan "will be one of the most effective union organizers we've ever had" before the battle over his budget cutbacks is over. Workers increasingly will seek union membership as the best way to counter Administration programs and policies harmful to their well-being, he said.

In San Francisco, an estimated 10,000 Solidarity Day demonstrators jammed Justin Herman Plaza at the foot of Market Street to spur on speakers who denounced the Administration's "take from the poor, give to the rich" domestic policies and called for unity to repulse Reagan's attacks on workers' rights.

Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning of the California State AFL-CIO touched off a loud cheer when he announced the magnitude of the Washington demonstration.

"THAT'S THE greatest labor assemblage ever pulled together in the nation's capital in the history of the American trade-union movement," he declared.

Former Vice President Walter Mondale, the keynote speaker at the San Francisco rally, said that "the job we've got to do is to make clear the American opposition to the radical policies being pursued by the current Administration."

Mondale charged that the Reagan Administration is pursuing a policy of "the most radical opposition to organized labor of any Administration since Herbert Hoover. Even Eisenhower, Nixon, and Ford had decent relationships with the leaders of organized labor."

Other speakers at the rally included Farm Workers President Cesar Chavez, Rep. John L. Burton (D-Calif.), Sec.-Treas. John F. Crowley of the San Francisco Labor Council, and President James Herman of the unaffiliated Longshoremen & Warehousemen.

Those taking part in both the San Francisco and Los Angeles demonstrations included members of the Plumbers, Teachers, Farm Workers, Machinists, Service Employees, Air Traffic Controllers, Longshoremen as well as representatives of coalition organizations, including the National Organization for Women, the Congress of California Seniors, the NAACP, the National Council of Senior Citizens, the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, the National Urban League, and other minority groups.

'Unity' Forms Central Theme For Speakers

have today and we promise you a lot more in the bye and bye.' Well, we aren't buying pie-in-the-sky economics," Jordan declared.

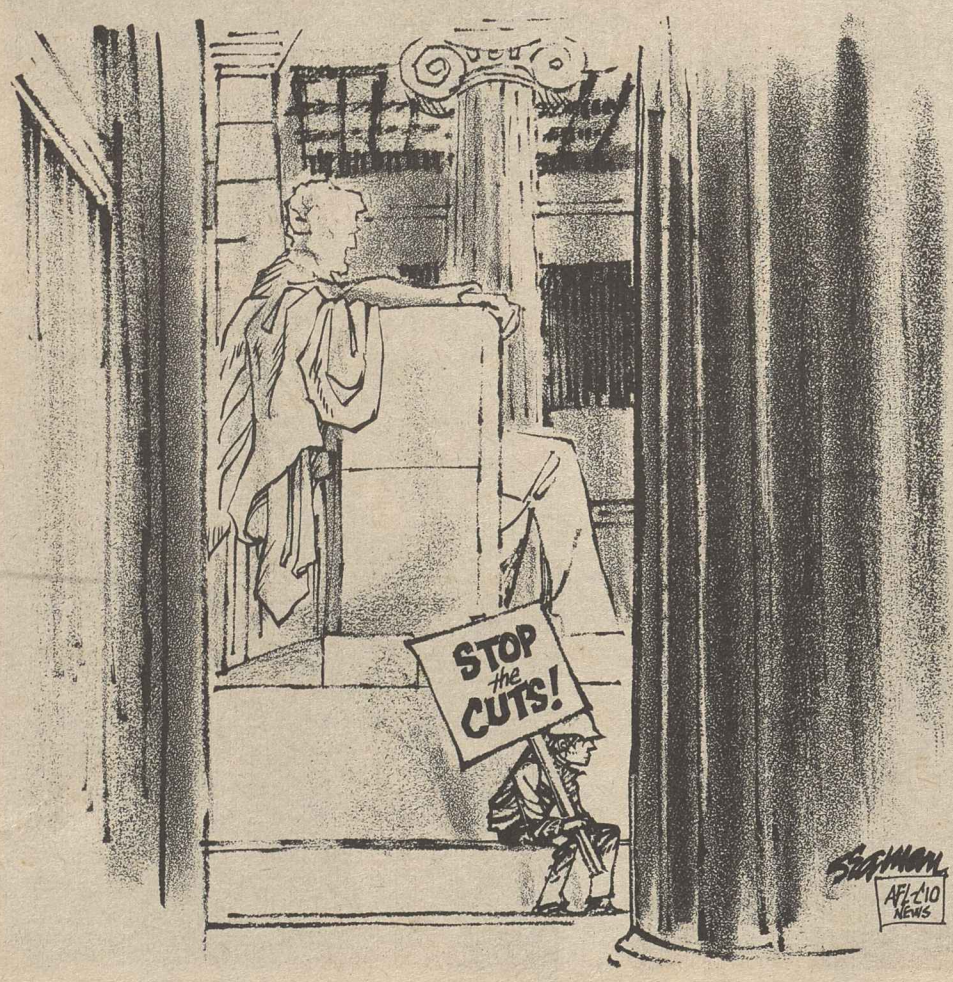
Jacob Clayman, head of the National Council of Senior Citizens, called the President's allegations that the social security system will go bankrupt "a propaganda hoax." He charged that the Administration's "true intent is to use the slashing of social security as a means to balance the White House budget. No balancing of the budget is worth that kind of economic and psychological violence to the lives of America's elderly."

UAW PRESIDENT Douglas Fraser scoffed at Reagan's pledge to build "a shining city on the hill." He warned that the Administration budget cuts scheduled to take effect on Oct. 1 will show people that "America has lost its heart, has lost its compassion, has lost its way." Fraser also blasted the Administration for "acting in an extreme and cruel fashion" in dealing with members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization who went out on strike last month for better wages and working conditions.

PATCO Local 291 President Steve Wallaert of Norfolk, Va., who was chained, shackled and jailed for leading his local in the strike, said he was angry at an Administration "that would not negotiate the issues important to my survival as a worker."

Wallaert thanked the AFL-CIO and the entire labor movement for their support of the walkout and said PATCO members are proud of their leader, Robert Poli, and would remain on strike until Poli told them to return to work.

"And you'll have our support until you go back to work," Donahue assured Wallaert.



THE SOLIDARITY DAY speakers cautioned participants in the huge demonstration not to expect immediate, tangible results. They stressed, though, that in the long run Reagan and members of Congress would have to modify their stand toward the poor, the elderly, minorities, and the workers of America or face the voters' judgment at the ballot box.

The inspirational impact of the rally was deemed most important. "People take heart from events like this," Donahue said. And the remarkable show of unity would serve to "stiffen the spines of some of our friends on Capitol Hill," Douglas Fraser added.

Speakers acknowledged that the road on the drive to turn around Reagan economic policies would be rough. As President Jerry Wurf of the State, County & Municipal Employees summed up, "it's going to take everything you've got—plus."

"In spite of this marvelous turnout, there is no guarantee that we will succeed," said Wurf. "It is the beginning, just the beginning, of a very long and difficult process."

Solidarity Day Sends Strong Message

starts singing Solidarity Forever. It's taken up quickly.

AT THE SUBWAY transfer point, more marshals are on hand to point people in the right direction and it's like a holiday crowd.

The assembly areas along the mall are like a fairground, with huge balloons and helium blimps as floating signposts. The IBEW is one of the unions that has set up tents and it has prepared 16,000 box lunches for its members.

In the entertainment area, it's union songs and folk songs, a local Irish group, the Ladies' Garment Workers Union Label Chorus. Some big name entertainers, union members themselves, could have been brought in. But to do so would have been to invite the speculation that the huge crowd really came to see or hear some popular star.

SO THE performers were not announced in advance and for the most part were people who have strummed guitars on picket lines and in union halls. Tom Herriman, whose more usual role is editing the newspaper of the Clothing & Textile Workers, gets a turn before a bigger audience than any but a handful of professional entertainers has ever faced.

Stevie Wonder, the blind singing idol of a generation, will march with the NAACP and his friend, Benjamin Hooks. But he's at Solidarity Day to join his voice in protest, not song.

Shortly after noon, police escorts and photo trucks take their place. An early banner of the American Federation of Labor, symbol of the labor federation's centennial, is in its case, wheeled to the head of the procession.

BEHIND THE ranks of organization leaders comes the city's finest high school marching bands.

And then, lined up from curb to curb, 20 or more abreast, are block after block of AFSCME members. The union won the leadoff honor by having the largest single contingent.

Some of the elderly and disabled are bused to the rally area at the Capitol, where members of Congress are welcome to listen but are not invited to speak.

THE SCHEDULE called for the program to be complete at 5 p.m. to meet bus and train departure schedules, and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, who served as master of ceremonies, came astonishingly close to the goal.

Msgr. George G. Higgins gave the invocation, and most people in the audience had never heard a Father Higgins invocation before. They gave it a hearty round of applause, as a good speech deserves, which is something that a lot of union convention goers have often wanted to do.

The speeches were short enough so that people listened to them—in between craning their necks to get another look at the size of the gathering.

TELEVISION teams and reporters picked their way through the crowds, interviewing the people who, as Kirkland said, "have given up your family days of rest and spent long and tiring hours in buses, trains and cars, from every part of this land, as an act of devotion and testimony."

Solidarity Day Coordinator John Perkins was the walking command post, getting reports from 60 key staffers with walkie-talkies. Organization & Field Services Director Alan Kistler and Legislative Director Ray Denison had the best seats in the house earlier in the day, two cherry pickers near the Washington Monument grounds from which they made decisions on how to slot groups into the line of march.

As the program neared its close, a small group of Solidarity Day participants made their way to the fenced-in speakers' area carrying a large carton. They had taken up a collection for the PATCO Family Fund, to help the families of striking air traffic controllers. Where could they leave the money, they asked the white-capped Seafarers security guard.

The Rev. Robert L. Pruitt, from a local AME church, gave the moving benediction to an historic day.

"EACH OF YOU take your neighbor by the hand," he enjoined, and white hands and black hands and brown hands clasped.

"May our society of solidarity not be temporary," he urged, asking blessings for the millions who work "and the millions who want to work."

"Yes, Lord," a voice in the crowd urged. "Please, Lord."

"Go forth with courage," the Rev. Pruitt concluded.

And then as the crowd followed the signs to the subway station nearest them, George Shirley, the Metropolitan Opera singer joined Bayard Rustin, the architect of the civil rights March on Washington 18 years ago, in singing Solidarity Forever. And then, lest we forget, the stirring "We Shall Overcome."

So ended Solidarity Day.

Workers Raise Their Voices High

A Boilermaker from Louisiana thought he knew what brought most people out for Solidarity Day: "People just do not like what is happening with Reagan. It's everything for the rich man and nothing for the working man. I don't think that's what they expected when they voted for Reagan, but that's what they got."

The same thought was on other people's minds. A member of the Allied Industrial Workers from Muscle Shoals, Ala., remarked that "people voted for a change in the last election, but we wanted to go forward, not backward."

A SERVICE EMPLOYEES' member, Judy Haddon, who had driven with 12 others in a van from Cleveland, said she was trying to raise three children, alone, on $15,000 a year. "I can't save anything," she said, "and now Reagan's putting the financial pressure on us."

One demonstrator, hands stuffed in his jacket pockets while the wind kicked up, answered the question about why he was here, by unzipping the coat to reveal an "I Support PATCO" T-shirt.

"We got sold out," Thomas Ramsey, a sugar worker from Florida, insisted, and a Laborer from Jacksonville, Fla., complained: "He said he wouldn't touch social security, but now they want to cut that. But they won't touch defense."

A MACHINIST came to the march, "because I'm probably the only damn liberal in Sheffield, Ala.," and a Carpenter from Clarksville, Ind., ticked off "OSHA, Davis-Bacon cuts" as his motivation.

Members of the Clothing & Textile Workers from Johnstown, Pa., "drove all night to get here. We wouldn't have missed this for anything. It's great the way people feel united."

Chuck Wilkinson, a Washington, D.C., Ironworker, pointed to the White House. "If he won't listen," he said, turning to point toward the Capitol, "then they will."

With signs like a Musician's "Brahms Not Bombs," and "Cement Masons Stick Together, Baltimore Local 43," many let their signs do their talking.

DISABLED CITIZENS called out "Cut Curbs, Not Budgets." Teachers, protesting cuts in the school lunch program which include an Administration claim that condiments can be considered vegetables, said "Sorry Kids, No Lunch Today," and "Let 'Em Eat Ketchup."

"Reaganomics — Welfare for Wall Street" read a banner strung the length of a bus. There was even a UAW frisbee with the slogan "Buy American." A Plumber from Beaumont, Tex., said, "Don't Bust the Unions."

Signs for "Jobs Not Jellybeans" mingled with "Down with Bonzo Economics," "Support the PATCO Strikers" and "ERA Now." A Communications Worker stuck a picket sign, "Mr. Reagan . . . Here's Your Mandate" in the back of his jeans with a large downward pointing arrow in case anyone missed the point.

There were signs in Spanish and at least one in Chinese.

"I'M ANGRY and disappointed," New Jersey Carpenter John Laden said. "This is America. This government is supposed to represent the people back home. They're trying to put the working man down. They're trying to make this a different kind of country."

Mildred Donahue, a school librarian from Orange, Conn., said she wanted to make the point "that this Administration doesn't have a mandate for what they're doing. Ronald Reagan made me come here."

Kate McClure of Bethesda, Md., thanked the AFL-CIO and its allies for organizing the "opportunity to stand with others in support of labor and for social justice. It has been a lonely time for many of us. We needed the chance to come together."

Kirkland's Message Stirs Solidarity Congress

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI 3 Saturday, October 3, 1981 No. 40

By James M. Shevis

Solidarity, the year-old Polish labor federation, has brought hope and a sense of renewal not just to Polish society but to workers throughout the world, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared in a message to the second session of Solidarity's national congress in Gdansk.

Kirkland, who was to have delivered a speech at the convention but was denied a visa by the communist government of Poland, conveyed fraternal greetings and the "deep admiration" of the AFL-CIO's 15-million members to the delegates for creating the first genuinely free labor unions in Soviet-dominated Eastern Europe.

"YOU HAVE transformed the word 'solidarity' from a slogan to a living moral force that has galvanized the universal cause of free and independent trade unionism," Kirkland said. His remarks were distributed at the convention by Monsignor George G. Higgins of Catholic University, former director of the U.S. Catholic Conference's Social Concerns Dept., who attended the congress as a fraternal delegate. (Text, Page 5.)

In his speech, which was interrupted by applause repeatedly as it was read to the Congress, Kirkland described Solidarity as the sole "authentic voice" of Polish workers and noted that the nearly 900 delegates "confront many difficult, even momentous, questions." The AFL-CIO "would not presume to advise you on the direction you should take," he said, adding: "You alone understand the needs of Poland's workers.

"Let Poland's history be made by Poles," he said. "To Solidarity, to the workers of Poland, we pledge—in the words of an old American labor song—solidarity forever."

KIRKLAND MADE no reference in his speech to the Polish government's denial of visas for him and the AFL-CIO delegation, but said in a separate statement that the American labor movement

REJECTION OF President Reagan's nomination of John R. Van de Water as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board was urged by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas Donahue in testimony before the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee. Donahue said that Van de Water's record as a management consultant makes him an unsuitable candidate for NLRB membership. Seated with Donahue is Legislative Director Ray Denison.

Management 'Partisan' Opposed as NLRB Chief

The AFL-CIO urged the Senate to reject the nomination of John R. Van de Water as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board because of his "active and partisan role on the management side" of employer-union disputes during much of his career.

"The NLRB's institutional integrity is best served by consistent application of the rule that no one should be appointed to the board from the ranks of management or labor," Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue asserted in a confirmation hearing on Van de Water's appointment conducted by the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee.

"One side's armorer should not make or enforce the rules governing both sides in the ensuing contest," said Donahue.

VAN DE WATER, 64, headed his own California management consulting firm, Van de Water Associates, from 1949 until his recent appointment by President Reagan in August. Donahue told the Senate committee chaired by Sen. Orrin Hatch (R-Utah) that records of the AFL-CIO Los Angeles-Orange County Organizing Committee for 1963-1972 showed that at least during that period Van de Water's firm served as management consultants to numerous employers who actively opposed their employees' attempts to organize.

"The role of such consultants," Donahue observed, "is to denigrate unions and collective bargaining and to play on the insecurity bred by what the Congress and the Supreme Court have recognized is the central aspects of 'the labor relations setting—the economic dependence of the employees on their employers.' "

HE SAID the question for the committee and the Senate is whether it is proper to appoint as chairman of the quasi-judicial agency charged with running representation elections and with judging the legality of the conduct of the parties "a man who has devoted a substantial part of his professional career to putting together anti-union campaigns and anti-union materials."

No one should be appointed to the board from the ranks of labor or management, Donahue said, since its members are all supposed to represent the general public and not the special viewpoint of either side. This, he said, has been the AFL-CIO's consistent position down through the years.

Sag in Economy Reflects Impact Of Tight Money

The nation's economy continued to sag under the weight of oppressively high interest rates, which have made money and credit hard to come by and kept thousands of Americans from buying homes and automobiles.

The Commerce Dept. reported that the government's index of leading indicators dropped five-tenths of 1 percent in August after an increase of a modest four-tenths of 1 percent in July and declines of 1 percent in June and 1.6 percent in May.

IN ANOTHER report, the Commerce Dept. said real gross national product—the value of the nation's total output of goods and services—fell at a seasonally adjusted 1.6 percent annual rate in the second quarter.

Congress Pressed To Bar Reagan's New Budget Cuts

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged Congress to reject President Reagan's newest proposed federal budget cuts, which Kirkland said can be traced to "miscalculations made by this Administration only a month ago."

"At that time, Congress gave the President everything he asked for—and more. Despite promises made then, he is now back seeking deeper cuts in the already badly reduced programs so vital to the American people."

KIRKLAND'S criticism of the second round of cuts came in a statement issued after Reagan's Sept. 24 TV address.

At the same time, Kirkland cited an alternative approach which would regain $16 billion in lost federal revenues without continuing the trend of taking care only of those at the top of the economic ladder "and not by punishing the weak or creating new hardships."

A $700 cap on the proposed individual tax cut for 1982 would alone return $9 billion to the U.S. Treasury, Kirkland noted. Another $1.3 billion is available from postponing oil company and oil royalty-owner tax breaks, and $6 billion could be gained by returning the business investment tax credit to 7 percent—especially now that the depreciation changes made earlier are going to leave many firms with a negative tax rate, anyway.

IN CRITICIZING Reagan's latest budget proposal, Kirkland had more company than earlier in the year—and, for the first time, some of it was coming from the President's own party.

Northern and northeastern Republicans were stung by Reagan's televised attempt to attribute the likely budget deficits to congressional tinkering with his original budget and tax proposals. Some House Republicans, whom the press has termed the "gypsy moths," began to perceive the damage to their districts by the harsh budget cuts and pull away from the rubber stamp they had given Reagan earlier.

THUS, EIGHT months after the inaugural, the Reagan Administration's plans for the four-pronged attack on taxes, budget, federal regulation and tight monetary restraints were more dependent than ever on the coalition it has struck with the most conservative of southern Democrats.

Kirkland pointed out that much of what has gone wrong with the Reagan budget—troubles the AFL-CIO had predicted as early as February—could be corrected if elected officials were willing "to recognize a mistake and take corrective action."

Kirkland also issued a stern warning that while Reagan seemed to back away from social security cuts in his televised speech, "nevertheless, a careful reading of his speech shows that he made no promise to preserve benefits to anyone who is not yet receiving social security benefits."

PUTTING THE best possible political face on his social security proposals, Reagan had told the nation "our feet were never embedded in concrete on this proposal" and, later on, "I therefore am asking for restoration of the minimum payment and for inter-fund borrowing as a temporary measure to give us time to seek a permanent solution."

The President then announced plans to form an executive-legislative task force on social security, with 10 members named by him and the Senate majority leader, Howard Baker of Tennessee, and five by House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill.

Labor Condemns Campaign To Hamstring Safety Law

By John R. Oravec

The Reagan Administration is pursuing a callous campaign to wipe out basic worker protections of the federal job safety law, the AFL-CIO charged at congressional oversight hearings.

"For the past six months, we have seen attempts to undermine, erode and dismantle OSHA through the circuitous route of administratively cutting away OSHA's principal underpinnings," Legislative Director Ray Denison declared in a statement to a Senate Labor subcommittee.

"APPARENTLY, strangulation in the closet of a government agency by deregulation and disaffirmation is the chosen means of silently disposing of what is seen as a troublesome burden," Denison observed.

He cited cutbacks in enforcement and attacks on worker and union rights as well as a systematic rollback in OSHA standards in the name of cost-efficiency.

Other major concerns of the federation are over the Administration's relaxation of compliance actions, reductions in OSHA's enforcement staff and a return to ineffective state plans, Denison said.

"THERE ARE NO indications that the Reagan Administration intends to maintain an active enforcement program," he observed. "Indeed, one of the agency's fiscal year 1983 budget documents reveals a deliberate plan to cut the OSHA enforcement efforts to pre-1975 levels, reducing the staff from its 1980 high of 1,697 inspectors to just 983."

Labor Blasts 'Callous' Bid To Gut OSHA

Denison charged that a series of OSHA draft directives proposed in July to gut enforcement programs are contrary to the intent of the 1970 job safety and health law.

"Also illegal is the proposed directive which eliminates penalties for any employer who abates serious or other serious violations," he said.

DENISON ALSO assailed a Sept. 18 directive by Assistant Labor Sec. Thorne G. Auchter that would set up a loose targeting system for general schedule safety inspections in the manufacturing sector.

Linking the directive to a provision of the labor-opposed Schweiker OSHA reform bill of 1980, Denison branded it "an ill-conceived" scheme that would remove some 12.9 million workers from basic OSHA coverage and give "notice to most employers that the threat of an OSHA inspection is no longer a reality."

The federation also cited a rollback in programs ordered by Auchter, head of OSHA, which had been initiated during the Carter Administration. These include actions to revoke "walkaround" pay for workers and their representatives who accompany compliance officers on OSHA inspections, the weakening of a hearing conservation program, and withdrawal of a proposal to guarantee workers the right to know the kind of hazardous substances they handle on the job.

DENISON TOLD the panel that a major concern of the AFL-CIO is that since February, "labor unions have been virtually excluded from deliberations on changes in key OSHA policies."

Denison outlined a number of AFL-CIO recommendations for improvement of the federal program:

- Maintenance and expansion of a well-trained and experienced compliance staff to assure strict enforcement of standards.
- Development of an inspection target system based on injury and illness data.
- Implementation of a right-to-know standard dealing with hazardous substances and in conformity with Supreme Court decisions on cotton dust and benzene.
- Assurance of full worker rights under the law on inspections and implementation of regulations.
- Development of effective program evaluation methods.
- Better use of advisory committees having worker representation.
- Continuation and expansion of funding for job safety training and education.

DENISON pointed out that for the past decade the AFL-CIO has supported and defended the job safety law and its effective enforcement. He warned that the federation would fight very attempt to roll back protections.

His testimony was delivered by Margaret Seminario, of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Occupational Safety & Health. She was accompanied by Legislative Rep. Jay Power, George Smith of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Eric Frumin of the Clothing & Textile Workers and John J. Sheehan of the Steelworkers.

Paperworkers Counsel Warren Woods Dies

Warren Woods, general counsel to the Paperworkers and senior partner of a Washington law firm, died Sept. 23 of an aneurysm at George Washington University Hospital. He was 67.

Woods served as a regional attorney for the National Labor Relations Board in the late 1930s and 1940s before joining the War Labor Board. He entered private practice in 1946.

Survivors include his wife Jane and a daughter Jennifer. The family suggests expressions of sympathy be in the form to contributions to the George Meany Center for Labor Studies.

SAN FRANCISCO'S Justin Herman Plaza is jammed with an estimated 10,000 persons for a Solidarity Day demonstration to protest Reagan Administration economic policies and slashes in vital social programs. Similar protests were held in Los Angeles and Denver while more than 400,000 brought their protest to the National Mall in Washington. The San Francisco demonstration was jointly sponsored by the City Labor Council and the California AFL-CIO.

Impressive Solidarity Day Turnout Continues to Draw Wide Acclaim

By Susan L. Dunlop

The massive turnout of working Americans at the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day rally in Washington continues to impress the news media while drawing high praise from individuals and organizations.

News stories filed following the demonstration that drew over 400,000 people to the National Mall pointed particularly to the diversity of people who took part in the day-long protest against the Reagan Administration's social and economic policies. Several stories saw the demonstration, led by the AFL-CIO with the support of some 200 allied organizations, as an indicator of growing public concern over the direction of the Administration's policies.

THE NEW YORK TIMES, in an editorial, said the Solidarity Day rally was held on the same ground that had seen many political demonstrations in the past 20 years, " but never before has the popular army been so diverse, so mature, and so dominated by middle-class working people."

Solidarity Day demonstrators "wanted to present what they hope is a new, united front against the Administration's massive social service program cuts, and against what they see as threats to worker safety and prevailing wage laws," the Louisville, Ky. Courier-Journal observed.

The Miami Herald called the march "a broad slice of America," and the Bridgeport, Conn., Sunday Post, said the large number of union members from the state who participated "came to let the country hear loud and clear that they, at least, aren't happy with the economic policies of President Reagan."

AMONG THE letters received by the AFL-CIO in support of the goals of Solidarity Day was one from Esther McGhinnis of Huntsville, Mo.

"As a mother of a Professional Air Traffic Controller and the wife of an IBEW member, I wish to congratulate you on the organization and success of Solidarity Day. I think it is one of the biggest steps forward the working class has achieved since the beginning of the Reagan Administration," Mrs. McGhinnis said.

Ronald K. Ikejiri, Washington representative of the Japanese American Citizens League, called the demonstration "the first step toward regaining hope in ourselves and our country."

ELEANOR L. GUERCI, of Eatontown, N.J., in a letter to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, said, "As a slightly more than middle-aged teacher, who had never gone to a large rally before, I must confess I had some apprehension about participating. I was proud to be there, and I have nothing but praise for your efficient staff."

Another New Jersey teacher, John A. Molloy, field worker for the New Jersey Education Association, said that "if our collective roar failed to penetrate the walls of the White House, it was certainly heard in the corridors of Congress where perhaps sanity will return. I have a suspicion, though, that the solitude of Camp David was disturbed a bit by our voices."

Mary Morris of Old Greenwich, Conn., wrote that "as a trade unionist since the '30s, I applaud Solidarity Day with all my heart. I only wish I could have been there but I am too disabled."

MORRIS, an editor of the Harper Dictionary of Contemporary Usage, said, "I am frightened by the losses which Reagan would impose upon us. We have worked too hard and too long to give up what we now have. The inhumanity of this Administration is enough to enrage a saint."

Tony Lombardo, president of Musicians Local 402, Hastings-on-Hudson, N.Y., said, "I am thrilled with what we accomplished on Solidarity Day. I am only 72 years old, but I have never been so active."

AFSCME member Bernard Aronowitz of the Bronx, N.Y., praised the rally as "the most thrilling, inspiring and effective demonstration I ever had the privilege to attend."

SOME SOLIDARITY DAY supporters sent messages to President Reagan and members of Congress and copies to the AFL-CIO.

Rev. Dorothy M. Field, chairperson of the Commission on Social Concerns of the Eastern Pennsylvania Conference of the United Methodist Church, told the President her organization was "saddened that either you fail to see or choose to ignore the enormous human pain your policies are inflicting on a very large number of Americans."

Rev. Field, who was joined in signing the letter by the commission's secretary, Rev. Thomas W. Bare, asked President Reagan to accept the letter "as notificathat we side with the persons of Solidarity who this day in Washington are lifting their voices against the 'profits above all else' emphasis of your economic policies and who are urging a revision of your Administration's policies so as to serve the safety, health and well-being of all Americans."

Slumping Economy Reflects Impact of High Interest Rates

The government's revised estimate of real GNP in the second quarter showed a more moderate shrinkage than the previously reported 2.4 percent annual rate of decline. In the first three months of the year, the economy grew at an 8.6 percent annual rate.

The report on the leading economic indicators for August showed that the 10 indicators that were available were split evenly between favorable and unfavorable signs. Negative implications for the economy were found in the layoff rate, new orders adjusted for inflation, contracts and orders for plants and equipment, building permits, and changes in raw material prices.

POSITIVE indicators were the average workweek, the pace of deliveries, stock prices, liquid assets, and money supply adjusted for inflation.

Hardest hit by the Federal Reserve Board's tight-money policies, the housing industry reeled in August as the number of new housing starts plunged 10.7 percent to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 937,000, the lowest level in over five years. The August figure was the third lowest monthly level since World War II, and the first time this year that housing starts dropped below 1 million units.

Building permits for new housing also were down in August. The government said permits for new starts totaled 863,000, or 5.5 percent below the July permits rate of 913,000.

ALL MAJOR geographic regions felt the cut in housing starts, but the Northeast was hit much more sharply than any other area, with starts down 34.2 percent.

Michael Sumichrast, chief economist for the National Association of Home Builders, predicted further sharp declines in the months ahead. "The bottom is still to come," he warned.

Another government report, issued by the Federal Reserve Board, showed that the nation's factories last month operated at 79.3 percent of capacity, down from July's level of 79.8 percent. The August level was the lowest factory operating rate since October 1980. The capacity utilization rate for the motor vehicle and parts industry fell sharply, while the rate declined more moderately for the food, textiles, rubber, metals and equipment industries, the Fed reported.

Separately, the Commerce Dept. said new factory orders for durable goods declined in August for the first time since January.

At Transit Union Convention

Labor Held Key Force For Defense of Rights

Hollywood, Fla.—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared that organized labor must form "the center line of defense against the naked assault on the rights and welfare of ordinary people" that marks the policies and programs of the Reagan Administration.

In a speech before the 46th biennial convention of the Amalgamated Transit Union here, Kirkland said labor's task in the months and years ahead is "to rally the American people in the fight to restore human concerns to the business of government."

HE SAID he believes the majority of Americans are awakening to the "vast differences" between President Reagan's "self-proclaimed mandate won in his campaign" and the realities of his programs.

"The President did not campaign among senior citizens for cutting social security, among parents for poorer schools or among construction workers for lower pay," Kirkland said. "Nor did he campaign among workers with promises of higher and higher interest rates, fewer jobs, less concern for occupational health and safety, and of more tax giveaways to corporations and the wealthy."

He said that basic issues such as a worker's right to freedom of association and to bargain collectively are in jeopardy if the Administration has its way and cited the Air Traffic Controllers' situation as an example.

"IF EVER the weight and power of government has been piled on the backs of human beings, it is the Administration's assault on PATCO. How ironic that those who talk so sanctimoniously of getting off our backs should rush to use the might and majesty of government to crush the legitimate claims of workers who are seeking a fair shake from their employer," he observed.

Furthermore, Kirkland pointed out, the Administration energetically supports compulsory open-shop laws, court injunctions and all of the other government restrictions on the activities of workers and their unions.

He told the 526 delegates that labor is not only willing but also able to take on the challenge being posed by the anti-worker forces. He cited the labor-sponsored Solidarity Day rally Sept. 19 in Washington, attended by more than 400,000 trade unionists and other concerned citizens as evidence that the American people are getting fed up with Reagan policies.

"THESE HUNDREDS of thousands of workers and their allies sent two powerful messages to the Administration and Congress on that day," Kirkland said. "One is that the American labor movement is alive and well. Only the deaf and blind can contend American labor is out of step with the rank-and-file. Union members are their union. Second, the labor movement is not alone. The links forged on Solidarity Day will be strengthened all across the land in the days to come."

Kirkland's views were echoed in an early session of the convention by Sen. Don Riegle (D-Mich.), who called for the government to develop a "fair standard across the land for all people."

Riegle said the Reagan Administration doesn't understand the needs and concerns of America's workers, and he urged the labor movement to help "take this country back from the phony ideologues" presently running it.

"IF WE DON'T fight and get it back, all gains made by workers over the past decades will be stripped away one by one," he said. "We must no longer be misled by the friendly mask put on the Reagan policies."

Other convention speakers dwelt on the effects the Reagan policies are having in areas of their particular interests. Among them were Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) and William Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, who spoke on problems confronting the elderly, and Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, who cited the effects on minorities.

ORGANIZED LABOR must play a prime role in the battle against the blatant attacks of the Reagan Administration on vital social programs, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told Transit Union convention delegates in Hollywood, Fla.

Union Charges Unfair Tactics In Stevens Vote

New York—The Clothing & Textile Workers charged J. P. Stevens & Co. with illegal acts during the recent representation election at Stevens's Rock Hill, S.C., plant.

ACTWU accused the company of unlawfully firing a union supporter at the plant "because of her membership in and/or activities in behalf" of the union during the organizing campaign.

In election objections filed with the National Labor Relations Board, the union also claimed that Stevens threatened to fire workers if they engaged in a strike, illegally questioned employees about their union beliefs and sympathies, made payments to laid-off employees to influence their votes and spent "inordinate sums of money" on employees during the campaign.

These and other actions "destroyed the laboratory conditions required for the conduct of a valid NLRB election," ACTWU said.

The union lost the Aug. 27 election by a vote of 433 to 299. It was the first election since the giant textile manufacturer agreed to sign its first labor contracts with ACTWU last October, following a 17-year battle to get Stevens to negotiate with the union.

Senate Panel Acts to Revive Social Security Minimum

The Senate Finance committee voted unanimously to restore the minimum social security benefit for most present recipients but sought to balance the cost of this move by cutting back benefits in other areas.

At the same time, the panel took a long step toward solving the immediate financial difficulties of the system by approving the reallocation of social security tax revenues among the various trust funds along with inter-fund borrowing in future emergencies.

A DAY AFTER the committee's 19-0 vote, President Reagan announced he was abandoning his insistence on elimination of the minimum benefit, which was scuttled earlier this year as part of the big budget cutback, and his opposition to inter-fund borrowing to solve short-term shortages in the retirement fund.

Reagan made the announcement in his televised speech calling for a new round of budget cuts to bring the projected federal deficit for fiscal 1982 closer to his target. He also proposed creation of a 15-member task force to devise a permanent solution to social security funding needs.

A FULL Senate vote on the Finance committee's bill was delayed at the insistence of the Democratic leadership, to permit participation in the debate by a number of absent members. The bill was to be taken up as a substitute for a House-passed measure that would simply restore the minimum benefit for present and future recipients without further restrictions.

Under the Finance Committee bill, those currently eligible for the $122 minimum monthly benefit would continue to receive it in full unless they were also receiving a government pension of more than $300 a month or lived outside the United States, Puerto Rico or U.S. territories.

THE BENEFIT would not be payable to future retirees meeting present standards or to present recipients living abroad. Retired government workers would have their minimum social security benefit offset dollar-for-dollar by the amount their government pensions exceeded $300 a month, except that they would remain eligible for the amount of social security benefits actually "earned" through payroll contributions on non-government employment.

To offset the cost of this partial restoration, the committee bill would subject sick pay to full social security taxes and limit benefits for a family to 150 percent of the basic benefit in both retirement and survivor cases.

On financing of the system, the committee called for reallocating the payroll tax distribution from the healthier disability and hospital insurance funds to the retirement and survivors insurance fund. This is expected to keep the retirement fund solvent at least through 1984 and possibly longer if the economy improves. If cash-flow problems persist, borrowing by the retirement fund from the disability fund would be authorized.

In other congressional developments:

- The House Appropriations Committee and a Senate Appropriations subcommittee both voted to bar the expenditure of any funds to move the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health and its personnel from the present NIOSH headquarters in the Washington area to Atlanta and Cincinnati.

THE MOVE HAS been vigorously opposed by the AFL-CIO and the American Federation of Government Employees, which represents the NIOSH staff, on the ground that it would be harmful to the agency's role to and would lead to the loss of many of the agency's highly qualified staff members unable to make the transfer.

- Congress approved a stopgap funding bill to permit federal agencies to continue operating at present spending levels through Nov. 20 pending action on regular appropriations measures.

THE BILL also contains provisions that would mean virtually automatic increases in the salaries of House and Senate members by linking them in the future to the annual salary raises for federal white collar workers.

Other parts of the bill remove the $25,000 ceiling on outside earnings of senators, mostly from speeches, and the $3,000 ceiling on tax deductions members of Congress are allowed for the cost of living away from home.

Kirkland Hits Reagan Bid for More Cuts

Kirkland characterized the Reagan social security changes as something on which "Americans of all ages should not be misled." The original changes were prompted by "paper budget-balancing" rather than concern for the soundness of the system, Kirkland noted, and were accompanied by the drumbeat of propaganda that the system was "bankrupt."

"HE INSTEAD now supports modest changes that many experts had been urging," Kirkland noted, while the task force concept may delay the battle for more than a year—or beyond the 1982 elections.

On the proposed cuts Kirkland asked Congress to reject, he observed that "the President's 12-percent cut sounds easy and impersonal, but in real terms it means sharp additional reductions in child care, school programs, care for the disabled, student loans, jobless worker aid and many other programs that he chose not to specify."

"No social program, regardless of merit, remains untouched and no beleaguered American, no matter how needy, is safe. Once again the less fortunate will be forced to bear the burden," Kirkland said.

IN CONTRAST, Kirkland said the AFL-CIO proposal to gain $16 billion from the excessive tax breaks earlier given the wealthy and corporations would be "an equitable and effective way to achieve the $16 billion sought and avoid adding to the present budgetary pain."

In a fact sheet released with his statement, the AFL-CIO described a plan in which the bulk of the money comes from the $700 cap on individual cuts.

Under that plan, the tax break would remain the same for a family earning $42,000 a year or less, with the cap applying over that income level. For example, a family with a $45,000 income would get a tax cut of $700 instead of $793.

"THE REAGAN three-year rate schedule could remain in effect, but a one-year cap of $700 per taxpayer would be an equitable way to meet the Administration's self-created budget problems," the AFL-CIO said.

The flurry of action over Reagan's "second-round" of budget cuts came just a week before the Oct. 1 effective date of the tax and budget changes enacted earlier in 1981. On that date, about 25 percent of revenue-sharing with the states was dropped, 875,000 people became ineligible for food stamps, student loan interest rates jumped and some 400,000 welfare families had their benefits cut wholly and another 279,000 in part.

Undermining OSHA

LAST YEAR we appeared before the full Senate Committee on Labor & Human Resources to oppose amendments offered by then Sen. Richard Schweiker to the Occupational Safety & Health Act. Today we appear to convey our strongest opposition to the manner in which the Act is being administered under the policies of President Reagan, the Secretary of Labor and his assistant for occupational safety and health.

Underlying today's testimony is the abiding conviction of organized labor that the right to a safe and healthful workplace is as basic a right as any of our freedoms. The Bill of Rights is not predicated on cost-benefit, or cost-efficiency analysis, or that its protections should be made available only to some, but not to all who are employed in establishments covered by the Act.

The Act was created 10 years ago by Congress for the fullest protection of all workers in covered establishments, not just some categories defined by occupation, by number of employees in a workplace, or by an arbitrary determination that some workplaces are more hazardous than others and that these are therefore entitled to all available rights and protections of the Act while others falling outside these sacred circles are entitled to nothing.

WE BELIEVE OSHA should reinforce a principle as old as the Republic—equal protection under the law.

Unfortunately, that principle is finding no advocates in the Reagan Administration in the conduct of OSHA. For the past six months we have seen attempts to undermine, erode and dismantle OSHA through the circuitous route of administratively cutting away OSHA's principal underpinnings.

For example, thus far we have seen: final and proposed actions to wipe out OSHA's enforcement program through a system of exemptions, relaxation of compliance actions, reduction in enforcement staff and a return to ineffective state plans; an attack on worker and worker representative rights; and a systematic rollback in worker health and safety standards in the name of cost-efficiency.

Organized labor will no more accept these efforts to squeeze the life from OSHA than we have accepted those efforts in past years.

IT IS TRULY unfortunate that this Administration has chosen to gnaw away at the foundations of OSHA. President Reagan said only last Saturday, on Solidarity Day, that "as we progress, more and more working people will see they have a friend in the White House." And Secretary of Labor Donovan said earlier that his job is to look to the concerns and needs of all American workers, not union members alone.

Surely, they do not believe that choking to death a law that protects all workers, without regard to whether they are union members or not, whether they are men or women, or of whatever ethnic background, honors either of their statements.

It is our belief that it is the proper role of government to do what its citizens cannot do alone. That's what OSHA is meant to do.

'Folks Back Home' Hurting

Poison of High Interest Rates Spreads Through the Economy

By Gus Tyler

OVER THE LAST two weeks, noises have been issuing from Washington complaining about "high interest rates."

Why now?

Interest rates have been climbing steadily ever since 1969 when President Nixon decided that the way to check inflation—then running at 4 percent—was to "cool the economy." The medicine to bring down the fever was "high interest rates."

IT BECAME crystal clear—to use a Nixonian phrase—that high interest rates, "cooling the economy," were throwing people out of work and, instead of pulling prices down, were pushing them up.

I do not say this in hindsight. On July 24, 1974, I wrote a column on high interest rates and said: "The present Administration in Washington started applying this cure several years ago when prices were rising by only 4 percent a year. That cure is killing us."

I went on to say that the rates were not only pushing prices up but were knocking small businessmen down, "driven out of business by the intolerable interest rates."

ALTHOUGH THE interest rates were poison labelled as medicine, it was perfectly clear that the powers-that-be would continue to prescribe the same foul cure. I quoted the then economic czar of the country, Kenneth Rush, as saying: "I think that they (interest rates) have to stay high until we see the inflation going down."

It struck me then as laughable. "Having caused inflation, lending institutions now explain that they must keep interest rates high to keep up with inflation."

That was all said more than seven years ago. Yet, through the Administrations of Nixon, Ford, Carter and now Reagan, the same sickening nostrum is applied.

BUT WHY is Congress so upset now?

The congressmen have heard from their constituencies. They were back home in late summer and discovered that the folks were hurting—hurting bad.

The "folks" were not just plain workers, who have been losing ground for at least a decade as earnings (real earnings after taxes and inflation) slipped. Although they have been the biggest sufferers, their complaints were dismissed on the theory that if workers buy less then prices will come down sooner or later.

The kind of "folk" who are now complaining are those who make up the mass base for the Republican Party in this country—the small businessmen, shopkeepers, little farmers. These "petit bourgeoisie" to use a classic phrase, are being badly bruised by the high interest rates: they are going bankrupt in panic proportions.

THEY ARE letting their Republican congressmen know.

That's why the GOP is uneasy: it is no longer just those "Democratic" blue-collar stiffs who are bellyaching; now it is those good, solid, respectable "Republican" entrepreneurs who can't live with those high interest rates.

NLRB Not the Place For Anti-Unionist

A decent respect for the opinion of the other parties regulated by the NLRB calls for the appointment of individuals whose careers have been devoted to bringing management and labor together, not of individuals who have been employed by one side or the other to advance that side's interest or who intended to seek such employment when they leave the board.

The labor movement has . . . not pressed for the appointment of a union lawyer or official to the NLRB, and there has never in the board's 45-year-history been such an appointment. Management, to be sure, has not shown similar self-restraint. . . .

(Mr. Van de Water is) a man who has devoted a substantial part of his professional career to putting together anti-union campaigns and anti-union materials.

Kirkland Message

Spirit of All Workers Renewed By Poland's Solidarity Union

Following is a statement by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sept. 25, 1981.

I HAVE JUST been informed by the Polish Ambassador that his government will not grant visas to the AFL-CIO delegation which has been invited by Lech Walesa to the second session of the Solidarity Congress in Gdansk.

I had looked forward to the opportunity to meet with our brothers and sisters in Solidarity and to bring the greetings of the AFL-CIO to their Congress.

The AFL-CIO is not only disappointed, we are incensed that the Polish government would deny Solidarity its right, as a free and independent union, to decide who will attend its convention. We pledge Solidarity our continuing support.

In recent days, the Soviet Union has launched a vicious and slanderous propaganda attack on the AFL-CIO delegation. There is little doubt in our minds that this attack was aimed at discouraging our visit and preventing contact between Solidarity and the AFL-CIO.

I have made a videotape of the speech I intended to deliver to the Solidarity Congress, and I have sent the tape to Poland in the hope that it will reach Solidarity.

The text of the speech:

I AM HONORED to stand before this assembly of brave men and women, and to express to you the warm fraternal greetings and the deep admiration of your 15 million brothers and sisters in the AFL-CIO.

You have not only brought "renewal" to Poland. You have renewed the spirit of workers throughout the world.

You have transformed the word "Solidarity" from a slogan to a living moral force that has galvanized the universal cause of free and independent trade unionism.

On Sept. 19, hundreds of thousands of American workers and their allies demonstrated in Washington, in exercise of their constitutional rights, to protest the social and economic policies of our government.

THE ISSUES we addressed were entirely domestic. But you were very much in our thoughts. We called this event "Solidarity Day."

This was not the first time that our land has been touched by the Polish spirit.

From the window of my office, I can look out over Lafayette Park, in front of the White House. There stands a statue of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko, who fought in the American Revolution—a revolution for democracy and independence, a revolution against colonialism and foreign domination.

Inscribed on that statue are these words: "And freedom shrieked as Kosciuszko fell."

Freedom does not shriek today. It smiles on the Poland of Solidarity.

AMERICAN LABOR owes a special debt to the workers of Poland, a debt incurred long before the American Revolution.

The first strike in my country was conducted by Polish glassblowers in 1619, near Jamestown, Va. They struck for the right to vote in the election of the first American legislative assembly, where representation was decreed limited to "those of English stock." Their strike, 362 years ago, was successful. They won the right to vote, with far-reaching implications for the development of democracy in the New World.

Polish workers continue to teach the world.

For all who believe in peaceful relations among states, there is no task more urgent than unlinking human rights and freedom from the question of who owns the means of production.

Freedom of association, of assembly, and of expression are the indispensable means by which the people of each nation can decide for themselves which forms of social and economic organization are most appropriate to their needs, their traditions, and their aspirations.

RESPECT FOR workers' rights does not automatically flow from any economic system. It humanizes all economic systems.

To the extent that this principle is reflected in the conduct of government, doors will open on broader avenues to peace, to normal intercourse among nations, and to more just allocations of resources.

The delegates to this Congress confront many difficult, even momentous questions. The AFL-CIO would not presume to advise you on the direction you should take. You alone understand the needs of Poland's workers. You alone are their authentic voice.

Let Poland's history be made by Poles.

To Solidarity, to the workers of Poland, we pledge—in the words of an old American labor song—solidarity forever.

Fighting Reagan's Policies

Solidarity Day Demonstration Strengthens Ties of Coalition

CEMENTING the foundation of a nationwide grass-roots coalition to work at every level of government to stem the Administration's assault on social and economic gains was the key achievement of Solidarity Day, John Perkins, coordinator of the Sept. 19 demonstration, declared in a network radio interview.

"The battle is already upon us," Perkins stressed. He pointed out that the President is seeking a new round of budget cuts that will inflict even greater damage and suffering on the nation and the broad range of Americans represented by the 400,000 leaders and activists who came from all parts of the country to take part in the Solidarity Day march and rally.

He said the trade union movement and its many allies will "focus on the hard decisions" that must be made at the state, county and city levels as a result of the budget slashes forced by the Administration and approved by the Congress.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, the AFL-CIO public affairs program broadcast weekly by the Mutual radio network, Perkins said the widespread opposition to the Reagan budget, tax and economic policies drew a large number of participants beyond the coalition that has been "battling side by side" for civil rights and other progressive measures for many years.

"WE'RE NOT IN total agreement on all issues," he said, but those that were the focus of Solidarity Day "there is universal agreement."

Perkins, who is associate director of the AFL-CIO Committee on Political Education, said that the pre-Solidarity Day organizing and the event itself clearly stirred new enthusiasm at the grass-roots level, particularly in the handful of states that elect governors and legislators this year. He said that momentum should "give us a leg up in the 1982 campaign."

Perkins said that while there may not be a turnaround overnight, neither the White House nor Congress missed the impact of the "We Are One" proclamation that was made so strongly on Solidarity Day.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

RECENT FRONT-PAGE news stories described a battle of corporate giants to acquire Conoco, the nation's ninth largest oil company.

The public watched in suspense as the offers escalated. The prize finally went to Du Pont, which beat out two rivals—Mobil and Seagram—in plunking down a mind-boggling $7.6 billion, more than the yearly gross national product of many nations.

Du Pont's acquisition of Conoco made it the nation's seventh largest corporation, just behind Ford. Before, it ranked number 15 in the Fortune 500.

The merger is convenient for Du Pont, which makes chemicals from oil. Conoco owns a lot of oil. That's what is called a "vertical trust," a kind of monopoly which high school textbooks relegate to the days of the 19th Century Robber Barons.

That sort of thing has been frowned on by the law since the time of the "trustbusters" and the Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890. But no longer, it appears.

For the Reagan Administration has been saying that big corporate mergers and other monopolistic activities are okay. In fact, maybe the bigger the better. And never mind what Congress or the Supreme Court or the Constitution have said about it.

MAINLY BECAUSE of the green light being flashed by a sympathetic Justice Dept., merger fever is on the rise. Corporate mergers increase a third faster during the first half of this year than during the first half of 1980. The total dollar value of mergers in the first half of 1981 rose to over $35 billion, 60 percent above the first half of 1980.

So what difference does it make, one might ask, unless you own stock in a particular merger candidate?

For one thing, American consumers pay as much as $100 billion extra a year because of economic concentration, monopoly power, and anti-competitive price-raising and price-fixing, according to a Federal Trade Commission estimate.

Further, monopolies make it more difficult for small businesses to compete and for a competitive market to survive.

THE GROWTH of monopolies concentrates economic power and consequently political power in the hands of an unelected and unaccountable few.

Despite the constitutional mandate that the President "faithfully execute" the nation's laws, including the antitrust laws, the Reagan Administration is refusing to enforce the law in seven different kinds of antitrust violations.

William Baxter, chief of the Justice Dept. antitrust division, told the Senate Judiciary Committee that mergers which are "vertical" (between buyers and sellers of the same product, like Du Pont and Conoco) and "conglomerate" (between firms in different lines of business, like Conoco and Seagram) "should be left alone."

BAXTER SAID this even though Congress specifically outlawed these kinds of mergers in a 1950 amendment to the 1914 Clayton Antitrust Act. The Supreme Court also has invalidated them.

Although Congress and the courts make no distinction between so-called "good" and "bad" monopolies, Atty. Gen. William French Smith said recently that "bigness in business does not necessarily mean badness."

So while Reagan and his supporters preach the evils of big government, they appear to regard big business as a paragon of virtue.

And while the Attorney General declares war on crime in the streets and the President chastises the air traffic controllers for striking "illegally," the Administration chooses not to enforce laws it doesn't like regarding corporate activities.

MASSIVE TURNOUT in Washington for Solidarity Day has added new strength to the grass-roots coalition of labor and its allies, John Perkins, center, coordinator of the Sept. 19 demonstration, said on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Tom Sherwood of the Washington Post. The public service program, produced by the AFL-CIO, is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Kirkland's Message Stirs Solidarity Congress

was not only disappointed but "incensed" that the Polish government would deny Solidarity "its right, as a free and independent union, to decide who will attend its convention."

The American delegation was to have been made up of Kirkland; AFL-CIO Vice President Martin J. Ward, chairman of the AFL-CIO International Affairs Committee, and the federation's European representative, Irving Brown. It had been invited by Solidarity's leaders and chief founder, Lech Walesa, to the eight-day session, scheduled to end late next week.

Pledging Solidarity "our continuing support," Kirkland noted that Poland's Soviet patrons recently had launched "a vicious and slanderous propaganda attack" on the AFL-CIO delegation, and "there is little doubt in our minds that this attack was aimed at discouraging our visit and preventing contact between Solidarity and the AFL-CIO."

THE SOVIET government newspaper, Izvestia, among other communist organs, has regularly attacked Solidarity's supporters in the West, particularly the AFL-CIO, which has responded to the independent union federation's request for assistance and given it moral backing since the birth of the new labor movement.

Also denied visas were officials of the International Metalworkers' Federation, a trade-union secretariat in Geneva to which many AFL-CIO affiliates belong, and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in Brussels.

KIRKLAND SAID that he was informed of the government's refusal to grant visas to the AFL-CIO delegation by Polish Ambassador Romuald Spasowski during a private meeting at federation headquarters on Sept. 25. The Gdansk conference opened the following day.

In his speech, Kirkland referred to the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day turnout in Washington of more than 400,000 American workers and their allies protesting governmental social and economic policies. "The issues we addressed were entirely domestic," he said, "but you were very much in our thoughts."

That was not the first time that America has been touched by the Polish spirit, Kirkland noted. He cited the contributions to the American Revolution by Polish Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko and the strike by Polish glassblowers in 1619 near Jamestown, Va., to win the right to vote in the election of the first legislative assembly conducted in America by the early settlers.

"POLISH WORKERS continue to teach the world," Kirkland said. "For all who believe in peaceful relations among states, there is no task more urgent than unlinking human rights and freedom from the question of who owns the means of production.

"Freedom of association, of assembly, and of expression are the indispensable means by which the people of each nation can decide for themselves which forms of social and economic organization are most appropriate to their needs, their traditions, and their aspirations. Respect for workers' rights does not automatically flow from any economic system. It humanizes all economic systems."

Before they conclude their first national congress, Solidarity delegates will elect officers, deal with internal union business, and take positions on a variety of issues. Some of the most extensive debate centered on a proposed worker self-management law calling for cooperation between workers and authorities in choosing plant managers.

OVERSHADOWING the debate on the controversial worker self-management law was the announcement that the Committee for Social Self-Defense, formed five years ago to fight for the rights of workers imprisoned for participation in demonstrations, had formally dissolved itself. The dissident group, known by the Polish acronym KOR, had a small but influential membership which was instrumental in the creation of Solidarity.

Prof. Edward Lipinski, an economist who helped form KOR, announced that it was being dissolved because it had achieved its purpose now that the independent labor federation was in existence. Many of its members have since joined the new labor movement.

IN HIS remarks at the historic congress, Msgr. Higgins spoke of the need of workers the world over to form unions, and referred to the new and special emphasis Pope John Paul II gave recently to workers' right of freedom of association. In the third encyclical of his pontificate, "Laborem Exercens," John Paul "sounded a clarion call for worker solidarity at both the national and the international level, and strongly emphasized the dignity and rights of labor," Msgr. Higgins observed.

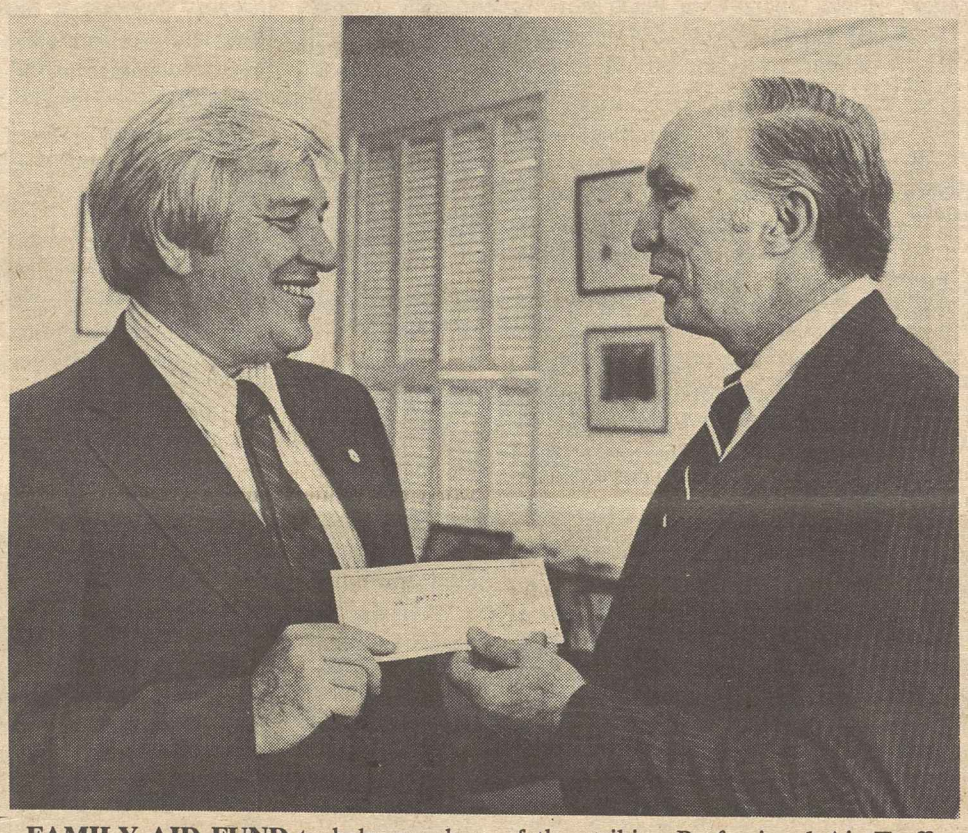
Yet, "as recent events in the United States have demonstrated, opposition to unions dies very hard," he said. "Please God, Pope John Paul's new encyclical will help to counteract this opposition."

N.Y. Press Office Opened to Serve Solidarity Union

New York—A press and information office has been opened in New York City with the assistance of American unions to provide reports on Poland's independent union, Solidarity.

The announcement was made at a news conference at the offices of the United Federation of Teachers by Zygmunt Przetakiewicz, who arrived in the United States from Warsaw several weeks ago to direct the new office. He said its purpose would be to "transmit Solidarity's information to the people of the United States. Solidarity is eager that people everywhere be informed of the true nature of its work and goals."

THE NEW YORK PRESS office will be independent of but in close daily contact with the press offices of Solidarity in Poland, Przetakiewicz said. The New York office is a project of a newly formed, not-for-profit corporation, the Friends of Poland's Independent Trade Union, Solidarity, Inc., with Przetakiewicz serving as president. On its board will be Bayard Rustin, chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, and Tadeusz Walendowski, president of the Poland Watch Center in Washington.



Przetakiewicz said that the press and information office would receive daily Telex messages from Solidarity headquarters in Poland and would make them available to the American media. He said he intended to issue a bulletin of news and analysis based on materials transmitted from Poland and would distribute it to a subscription list.

Funds raised by subscriptions and contributions would be used to offset the cost of the office here, he said.

Rustin stressed that the office is not to be perceived as speaking officially for Solidarity, but will serve "as a funnel of information from Poland to the American news media and to the trade union movement."

THE OFFICE has begun its work on the 6th floor of 260 Park Ave., South—the building which houses the United Federation of Teachers, which, with its president, Albert Shanker, helped the office get started. Przetakiewicz expressed his gratitude for the assistance of the UFT and for the loan advanced to the press office by the AFL-CIO.

The first issue of the office's news bulletin released at the news conference featured a statement by Janusz Onyszkiewicz, Solidarity's official press spokesman, on the union's negotiations with the Polish government.

FAMILY AID FUND to help members of the striking Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization meet severe financial crises is bolstered by a $10,000 donation from the Letter Carriers, presented by NALC President Vincent Sombrotto to AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. Payments to PATCO members with pressing needs are being disbursed from the aid fund, which now totals nearly $500,000.

Tuition Tax Credit Scheme Scored as Treasury Drain

Although the Reagan Administration is on record supporting tuition tax credits, Teachers President Albert Shanker said the Treasury Dept. has offered some of the best arguments against tax credits.

Shanker made his comments in testimony before a House Education subcommittee, citing earlier testimony by John Chapoton, assistant secretary for tax policy in the Treasury Dept. that "this Administration is determined to work as closely as possible with Congress in constructing a tuition tax credit bill." During his testimony, however, Chapoton did acknowledge the overall revenue impact of tuition tax credits.

SHANKER SAID tuition tax credits would be bad legislation on many grounds:

- The full costs are unknown.
- The federal government would be in the position of determining which private institutions are eligible.
- Savings to parents now sending their children to private schools may become moot because private schools could drastically inflate tuition rates.

"We are talking about a $7 billion minimum cost for those there now and a blank check for $14 billion or $21 billion or more that would be drained from the federal treasury through tax credits," Shanker said.

HE QUESTIONED the Treasury Dept. suggestion that one way of assuring that the drain on the U.S. Treasury is not excessive would be to reduce current federal expenditures for education. Such a course would only serve to harm the handicapped, minorities, low-income families and those in special education programs that depend on federal support, Shanker pointed out.

"We have here direct evidence of a major shift in federal policy," he said.

Shanker also predicted that tuition tax credits would be found unconstitutional and would prompt private schools to increase fees dramatically.

HE SAID he was "shocked" that the conservative Reagan Administration is not interested in preserving such a time-honored tradition as public education—"an institution which has had at its main goal the development of a common set of values and ideals."

Legislative Issues Mark Connecticut Labor Sessions

New Haven, Conn.—A comprehensive legislative agenda was adopted by the Connecticut AFL-CIO convention calling for improvements in worker compensation benefits, reform of the state's regressive tax system and protections against plant closings.

The 494 convention delegates called on the state legislature to upgrade jobless benefits from the current 49 percent of Connecticut's average manufacturing wage to 66⅔ percent and to extend coverage to strikers.

The average wage in the state currently is $308 per week.

ADDITIONAL improvements are needed for workers disabled by industrial accidents and disease, the convention stressed in urging an increase in benefits to 150 percent of the average wage from the current 100 percent rate.

The state federation's tax reform proposal calls for lowering the 7.5 percent state sales tax—the highest in the nation—as well as reductions in excessive property taxes. The convention urged establishment of a progressive state income tax program that would shift the major revenue burden from workers earning less than $34,000 a year.

In an effort to discourage the flight of industries from Connecticut, the state body is seeking enactment of measures to set up economic penalities that runaway shops would pay affected workers and communities.

DELEGATES re-elected President John J. Driscoll, Sec.-Treas. Betty L. Tianti, Executive Sec. Dominic Badolato and 43 vice presidents to new two-year terms. Wayne Gilbert of the Machinists was elected executive vice president to succeed Gordon Sawyer, who did not seek re-election.

The convention also approved a 4-cent increase in the monthly per capita, raising members payments to 30 cents effective Oct. 1.

In another constitutional change, delegates gave the 160-member state COPE committee authority to make candidate endorsements in primary and special elections. The constitution had required the calling of a special convention to approve endorsements.

During the three-day convention, the State AFL-CIO's Humanities Council gave its premiere showing of an audio-visual presentation documenting the growth of the labor movement in Connecticut over the past 100 years.

Convention Action

Laborers Score Attack On Worker Protections

Hollywood, Fla.—The Laborers assailed the Reagan Administration's drive to slash hard-won federal wage standards, job safety programs, workers' compensation and social security benefits.

The 2,500 delegates to the union's 18th convention warned in a series of resolutions that the President's short-sighted economic and budgetary policies will cost LIU members dearly in employment opportunities and entitlements.

IN HIS KEYNOTE address, Laborers President Angelo Fosco charged workers and the elderly will have to bear the brunt of Reagonomics. He said Reagan has betrayed the trust of many LIU members who had voted for him last November.

"They believed him when he said his economic program was for all Americans. They believed him when he said his Administration would not destroy worker protections. But their trust has been betrayed," Fosco declared.

Reagan's plan to eliminate "waste and extravagance" turns out to be the jobs of LIU members, he charged. When Reagan talked about "getting government off our backs," he really meant taking away the $122 minimum monthly social security checks from elderly widows, he said.

THE BILLIONS of dollars slashed from federal construction and housing projects will have a severe impact on the jobs of Laborers, Fosco pointed out.

"The cut in unemployment insurance will particularly hurt our members. Workers in seasonal industries, like construction, will have trouble qualifying for benefits, and our unemployed members will be forced to abandon their trade and take minimum wage jobs or lose their unemployment benefits."

In a telephone hookup with the convention, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told delegates that Reagan's supply-side economics is just another name for the discredited trickle-down theory.

"But while the theory is not new, this is the first time we have been asked to gamble so much on it," Kirkland said. "Working people are asked to risk their jobs, their homes, their children's education, their social security and their health and welfare."

Kirkland said this is not a gamble the AFL-CIO is prepared to embrace, and the point of the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day demonstration was to express the deep concern of trade unionists over the direction the nation is headed.

Resolutions adopted at the five-day convention called for an all-out fight to preserve the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law and the Service Contract Act, and opposition to efforts to undermine the Occupational Safety & Health Administration's programs and the Administration's "tampering" with social security.

DELEGATES ALSO opposed efforts to apply the Hobbs Act to picket line disturbances and endorsed the development of nuclear power projects with proper safeguards.

The convention voted a $1.25 increase in per capita payments to $4 per month effective next Jan. 1. It also authorized the union's executive board to raise payments 25 cents a month once during the next five years. Minimum dues for local unions were increased from $7 to $9 per month.

Fosco was re-elected to a new five-year term over token opposition. Sec.-Treas. Arthur E. Coia and eight vice presidents were re-elected by acclamation.

The convention voted to raise the president's annual salary from the current $120,000 to $125,000 and the secretary-treasurer's from $114,000 to $120,000. Vice presidents were given cost-of-living increases on their $20,000-per-year salaries.

The convention paid a special tribute to Canadian Ambassador Kent Taylor, who during his tour in Iran helped in rescuing six American hostages.

Maryland Unions to Seek Tax Reform, Bargaining Law

Baltimore—A wide-ranging legislative agenda adopted at the Maryland-District of Columbia AFL-CIO convention focuses on the need to plug oil company tax loopholes, gain full collective bargaining rights for public employees, and reject new attempts to enact a "right-to-work" law.

The 312 delegates also called for improvements in jobless benefits and workers' compensation and safeguards for workers in the communications industry from company monitoring of telephone calls.

PRESIDENT THOMAS M. Bradley noted in his keynote address to the five-day convention that labor succeeded in pushing through five key goals in the last session of the legislature, including stronger safeguards against the occupational hazard of asbestos, improved unemployment compensation and benefits for survivors of fire fighters, and the expansion of education funds.

A prime objective of the state labor federation is to reform Maryland's tax structure to insure that oil firms pay full taxes on their profits. A labor-consumer coalition study estimates that states are losing more than $800 million a year in tax revenues as a result of questionable oil company accounting practices. The next session of the state legislature will open next January.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told delegates that the Reagan Administration's calloused lack of concern for workers and the poor was made clearly evident in its budget and tax programs. Its policies reveal a devotion to giving the nation's wealth to the rich and granting unrestricted power to corporations, he charged.

Citing the role of Congress in embracing the Reagan "trickle-down" economic policies, Donahue noted that next year's congressional elections will give the American people the first opportunity to pass judgment on the performance of their representatives.

"Those who voted for the senseless budget cuts, those who endorse the crippling of social security, those who acquiesce in the dismantling of a half-century of progressive labor legislation will be forced to run on their records," he stressed.

IN MARYLAND, he said, unions will have to work as never before to repel the right-wing attacks on labor's supporters in Congress and the state house.

The convention unanimously endorsed the re-election of Maryland's Sen. Paul S. Sarbanes, who has been a prime target for defeat by the National Conservative Political Action Committee. Sarbanes has a 97-percent "right" COPE voting record in his first five years in the Senate.

Delegates re-elected all top officers, including Sec.-Treas. Edward A. Mohler and 30 vice presidents to new four-year terms. Bradley, who has been serving as president for the past two years, was elected to his first full four-year term.

Four new vice presidents elected to the executive board are James F. Combs, Local 37 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Cumberland; John C. Hazel, Local 2 of the Office & Professional Employees, District of Columbia; Charles L. Stover, Local 77 of the Operating Engineers, D.C., and Melvin Broyles, Local 689 of the Amalgamated Transit Union, D.C.

Minnesota Delegates Urged To Mount Election Drive

St. Paul, Minn.—The Reagan Administration came under sharp attack at the Minnesota AFL-CIO's 24th convention as speaker after speaker identified threats to existing laws beneficial to workers and urged the labor movement to counterattack in the 1982 elections.

Former Vice President Walter Mondale reminded the delegates of his prediction during the 1980 presidential election campaign that if Reagan were elected, tax relief would mean a "Lincoln automobile for the rich" and a "hubcap for the workers."

"IN THE YEARS I've spoken to this convention, never before have threats to the labor movement and threats to social justice been greater than they are now," Mondale said. He termed President Reagan's relations with organized labor the worst the White House has seen since the days of Herbert Hoover.

Mondale received a standing ovation after warning "high government officials" that "you cannot support free unions in Poland and then turn around and try to weaken them and cripple them in the United States."

In regard to the Air Traffic Controllers' strike, Mondale questioned why no effort is being made by the FAA to "negotiate with these decent Americans" and get them back to work. He added that "whatever point the Administration wished to make" by firing the controllers had been made.

MORE THAN 200 striking PATCO members and spouses came to the stage and front of the ballroom for a rally while the delegates sang Solidarity Forever.

PATCO Local 305 President Tom Callopy detailed the festering problems that led to the strike and declared: "With your help, the controllers have the strength to hold out until the government finds out it can't do without us."

Minnesota AFL-CIO President David Roe said that basic rights for workers and their unions are the issue at stake in the PATCO strike. "They're trying to smash the air controllers, and all of us know we're next," he said.

A collection among the delegates drew contributions of more than $14,000 to aid the PATCO strikers and their families.

THE CONVENTION voted to create a series of seminars around the state to defend workers' compensation. Other resolutions opposed decontrol of natural gas prices, reaffirmed support for the Equal Rights Amendment, requested a shorter lag time on rate rulings by the state Public Utilities Commission, rejected the "voluntary quit" disqualification for unemployment insurance, and called for the legal right for public employees in Minnesota to honor picket lines put up by any striking union.

Addressing state issues, Speaker Harry Sieben, Jr., of the Minnesota House warned that Gov. Al Quie will push reductions in workers' compensation and unemployment insurance benefits to regain lost favor with the business community and will resurrect his 1978 campaign theme that Minnesota has a bad business climate.

"We're not going to repeal the public employees' right to strike. And we're not going to cut unemployment compensation or workers' compensation benefits, and that's a promise," Sieben vowed.

A SIMILAR THEME was sounded by State Majority Leader Roger Moe, who warned that the pressure to slash workers' compensation benefits will be strong and that union efforts must be united and well-organized to resist the pressure.

Among the other speakers were U.S. Senate Minority Leader Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.); Minnesota Democratic Reps. James L. Oberstar, Martin O. Sabo and Bruce F. Vento; State Atty. Gen. Warren Spannaus; Earl McDavid, AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and St. Paul Mayor George Lattimer.

NLRB Choice Hit On Partisan Role As 'Consultant'

Never in the board's 45-year history has the labor movement pressed for the appointment of a union lawyer or official to the NLRB, and never has there been such an appointment, Donahue noted. Management, however, has not shown similiar self-restraint, he said, citing the appointments in recent years of Chairman Edward Miller, General Counsel Peter Nash, and Board Member Peter Walther —men who interrupted their careers as employer lawyers for short stints with the NLRB.

Van de Water, who has served as a management representative for both the Ford Motor Co. and North American Aviation and as a member of the Labor Relations Committee of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, was sworn into office on Aug. 18 while the Senate was in recess. The Senate still must confirm his appointment, however.

Robert P. Hunter, 41, former chief counsel and chief of staff for the Hatch committee who was appointed to the board at the same time as Van de Water, received unanimous confirmation from the panel on Sept. 15. Like Van de Water, he is a Republican.

VAN DE WATER replaced Democrat John Pennello, who resigned his member's seat last January. As chairman, Van de Water succeeded Democrat John Fanning, who remains on the five-man board as a member. Hunter replaced John Truesdale, a Democrat, who resigned in January after Reagan withdrew his nomination for another term.

The remaining members of the board are Republican Howard Jenkins, Jr., and independent Don A. Zimmerman.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRATION will slow only when any U.S. employer who hires an illegal worker is subject to stiff fines and criminal penalties, the AFL-CIO, the Farm Workers and the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement told a Senate subcommittee. Testifying are AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald and Stephanie Bower, Farm Workers legislative representative.

Against Exploiting Employers

Stiff Hiring Fines Urged To Halt Illegal Aliens

"The quickest and best way to stop illegal immigration is to stop giving jobs to illegal immigrants," and the key is stiff penalties against employers who hire illegal workers, the AFL-CIO told a Senate subcommittee.

Research Director Rudy Oswald told the Senate Subcommittee on Immigration & Refugee Policy that Reagan Administration proposals for sanctions against employers who hire illegal aliens are "a step in the right direction, but they do not go far enough."

THE AFL-CIO supports penalties of up to $1,000 per worker per day with no exclusions, Oswald said.

The Reagan Administration proposals, unveiled by the Justice Dept. in July, propose fines of only $500-$1,000 per offense and permit the exclusion of many employers, including wealthy families employing one or two domestic servants.

The government should also provide employers with a secure, counterfeit-proof identification system for legal workers and increase its enforcement of existing wage and working standards legislation, Oswald testified.

IN OTHER testimony before the committee, Jack Otero, executive vice president of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, underscored the need for quick passage of legislation forbidding U.S. employers from hiring illegal immigrants.

Otero, a vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, had served as a member of the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy, appointed by President Carter in 1979.

He pointed out that, in addition to recommending employer sanctions and a sound identification system, the commission's study called for tighter enforcement of existing labor laws, stepped-up border controls, and better funding and larger staffing for the Immigration & Naturalization Service.

STEPHANIE BOWER, legislative representative for the Farm Workers, also emphasized the need for deterrent penalties and secure, non-discriminatory identification such as a counterfeit-proof social security card.

Bower pointed out that the use of illegal aliens as farm workers has tempted growers and labor contractors to avoid making social security payments, thus robbing the program of needed revenues.

At the same time, she told the committee, issuing social security cards to farm workers would help bring them into the system and provide them with deserved benefits in their older years.

THE "LURE OF JOBS" is what brings and keeps most illegal workers in the United States, Oswald told the panel. Illegal workers take jobs away from American workers and they undermine U.S. wages and working conditions by offering employers a work force "willing to work hard for long hours and little pay," he said.

Oswald emphasized that the need for work and "their continuous liability to deportation if they don't behave and accept what is offered to them" leaves them at the mercy of "unscrupulous, exploiting employers" who often deliberately seek out illegal aliens.

"Decent, law-abiding employers," he said, suffer from unfair competition from unscrupulous employers who pay low wages and avoid their legal and social responsibilities to withhold income taxes and make social security and unemployment insurance payments.

Oswald stressed the need for civil liberties safeguards to prevent any crackdown on illegal immigration from being turned into "discrimination against U.S. citizens with Hispanic surnames."

Harsh Results of Reagan Cuts Outlined to Hispanic Caucus

One of the pernicious consequences of the Reagan Administration's economic policies is that they threaten to unleash a new era of social strife and tension, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told some 1,200 Hispanic-American leaders from across the country.

"By slashing vital social programs in order to finance massive tax cuts for the rich," Kirkland said, "the Administration sets the stage for class conflict between the haves and the have-nots. But it also pits those who have little against those who have barely enough.

"IT PITS the 10 percent of Hispanics who are unemployed against the 15 percent of blacks who are unemployed . . . young workers against older workers, public employees against private employees, women against teenagers."

Kirkland's keynote address at the fourth annual Congressional Hispanic Caucus dinner concluded two days of seminars on issues such as employment, housing, health and urban economic development. The Hispanic Caucus consists of the five Hispanic-American congressmen, Manuel Lujan Jr. of New Mexico, Robert Garcia of New York, Edward R. Roybal of California, and Henry Gonzalez and Kika de la Garza of Texas. All but Lujan are Democrats. Garcia is chairman of the organization.

KIRKLAND SAID that organized labor is in "profound disagreement" with President Reagan's sense of history and philosophy, and pledged to fight for those programs giving all citizens an even chance to realize their full potential.

Specifically, he said, the AFL-CIO will fight the Administration's abandonment of bilingual education, its "guest worker" program that would provide unfair employers with a pool of short-term workers who would be used to depress the job market and undermine the security of full-time workers, and the government's "mean-spirited" decision to lock up refugees from Haiti, El Salvador, and other tropical countries in Montana, where temperatures can drop to 40 below zero and there are no communities of Salvadorans and Haitians to give aid and comfort to these refugees.

Kirkland also pledged the AFL-CIO will press for a humane and rational immigration policy providing amnesty for those who have "found a way to make a home and lead a constructive life in our country."

UAW, Chrysler Approve Plan for Profit Sharing

Detroit—Chrysler workers stand to share in the company's profits starting next year if the federal government approves a plan announced jointly by the company and the Auto Workers.

The profit-sharing plan, agreed to in principle by the company and the union last January as part of a package of wage and benefit concessions to help keep the firm afloat, is subject to approval by the Chrysler Loan Guarantee Board that oversees government-backed loans to the company.

AS A FIRST STEP, the company agreed to pay each of its 70,000 UAW-represented workers a $50 bonus, effective Oct. 16. Additional compensation under profit sharing could be paid out of 1982 profits under a formula worked out by Chrysler and the UAW.

The plan calls for union workers to receive the equivalent of 15 percent of any United States and Canadian profits in excess of 10 percent of Chrysler's U.S. and Canadian net worth. UAW Vice President Marc Stepp, director of the union's Chrysler Dept., said an individual worker may elect to take his or her share in the form of credit toward the purchase of a U.S.- or Canadian-made Chrysler vehicle at the rate of $1.50 for each $1 share of entitlement. The shares generated by the profit-sharing plan would be in addition to the stock currently allocated to eligible Chrysler employees under the Employee Stock Ownership Plan, Stepp noted.

THE UNION ALSO has negotiated an agreement with the company under which workers may win one of more than 3,000 prizes, or "purchase certificates," for Chrysler products ranging from a free Chrysler Imperial to a $500 rebate on a compact Dodge Omni. The certificates will be distributed to workers through a drawing.

Stepp also announced that the company has agreed to keep open its Trenton, Mich., chemical plant through the 1983 model year. The plant, which employs 230 workers, had been slated for permanent closing in a year.

Housing Costs Keep Price Index Rising

Living costs shot up again in August, lifting the government's consumer price index eight-tenths of 1 percent as housing costs continued to register sharp gains.

Compounded and annualized, last month's CPI increase translated into an inflation rate of 10.6 percent. Over the past 12 months, inflation has advanced at a 10.9 percent pace.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which released the latest monthly report on consumer prices, said the annual inflation rate for the first eight months of the year was a seasonally adjusted 9.6 percent.

Steep as it was, the August CPI increase of eight-tenths of 1 percent marked a sharp decline from the 1.2-percent rise in July, and was the result of a moderation in price rises for transportation, food and beverages. The cost of buying and maintaining a home rose 1 percent after jumping 1.6 percent in July and accounted for over half the month's increase in the CPI.

High mortgage rates continued to exert strong upward pressures on shelter costs in August. There were large increases in property taxes, property insurance, rent, fuel and other utilities as well. Last month's 1.2-percent rise in rental charges was the largest in a year, BLS reported. The housing component of the index has risen 16.2 percent on an annual basis during June, July and August.

Food prices climbed over the month by seven-tenths of 1 percent after rising by eight-tenths of 1 percent in July. These two months were significantly higher than any other this year and have surprised economists, most of whom have been expecting continued modest advances for food. Among last month's sharp food price hikes, beef, pork, poultry, and fresh vegetables led the way.

MEDICAL CARE costs rose at a high rate for the eighth consecutive month, increasing a full 1 percent. Hospital rooms rose 2.2 percent. Charges by physicians, dentists, and other medical professionals rose nine-tenths of 1 percent, while the cost of medical commodities, including drugs and medical supplies, rose 1.1 percent.

Transportation costs rose by six-tenths of 1 percent over the month, partly because of the third consecutive sharp increase in used-car prices. Gasoline prices continued to fall, but at less than the rate in the four preceding months. Apparel prices rose eight-tenths of 1 percent after rising five-tenths of 1 percent in July.

Housing constitutes 45.5 percent of the consumer price index's weight, transportation 19 percent, food and beverages 18.3 percent, apparel 4.9 percent, medical care 4.7 percent, entertainment 3.6 percent, and other goods and services 4 percent.

BLS ALSO reported that workers' real spendable weekly earnings increased four-tenths of 1 percent—the first monthly rise in four months—but were 2.7 percent below the year-earlier level. Real spendable earnings are what is left after taxes and inflation.

A married worker in the private sector with three dependents who earned the average weekly wage of $259.88, took home $223.26 in August, measured in current earnings. That is $2.41 more than in July and $15.77 more than in August 1980.

But in "constant dollars," keyed to the 1977 buying power, the same worker's real spendable earnings last month averaged $147.08. While 53 cents more than in July, the figure was still $4.26 less than a year earlier.

Jobless Rate Shoots up to 7.5 Percent

By James M. Shevis

The number of unemployed Americans nudged the 8 million mark in September, increasing by 309,000 over the month and heightening concern over the state of the nation's economic health.

The rise lifted the national jobless rate three-tenths of 1 percent to 7.5 percent. The rate has jumped a half-point since July.

BESIDES THE 7,966,000 officially unemployed workers last month, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that there were 1.1 million "discouraged" workers—those who want to work but are not looking for jobs because they believe they cannot find any — and a record 4.5 million "partially unemployed" workers. The latter group includes many persons working part time because they could not find full-time jobs.

BLS said the increase in unemployment was concentrated among adult workers over 25, both men and women, but all major workforce categories except workers of Hispanic origin posted jobless rate increases over the month. Unemployment among blacks hit a record high of 16.3 percent.

At the same time, the total number of Americans holding jobs fell to 98,270,000 over the month, a decline of 674,000. The government said the entire decline occurred among white workers, mostly adult women.

BLS COMMISSIONER Janet L. Norwood told a congressional Joint Economic Committee hearing that the September figures "show continued weakness in the demand for workers." She noted that unemployment had returned "to about the levels which prevailed during the second half of 1980" as a result of last year's recession. The marked rise in unemployment combined with the drop in total employment indicate that "at best the economy is very flat," she said.

"There is a very weak employment situation, extremely weak," Norwood said, adding: "There's special distress in areas sensitive to interest rates, such as construction and like industries—lumber and wood manufacturing, and the larger durable goods manufacturing industries which are related to housing. In the automobile industry, there's been a decline over a period of many months, and it hasn't picked up with the new models."

Construction employment, which had shown some growth in the latter part of 1980 and early months of 1981, fell an additional 20,000 to 4,253,000 last month, depressing employment in the industry 165,000 below the April level and slightly lower than that of the July 1980 recession trough. Voting Rights Measure Clears House, 389 to 24

REDUCED HEALTH CARE benefits and higher out-of-pocket expenses will result for workers and their families from poorly conceived legislation now before Congress, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a House Ways & Means health subcommittee. He was accompanied by Cathy Schoen of the Service Employees; Melvin A. Glasser, executive director of the Committee for National Health Insurance, and Associate Director Robert McGlotten of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation.

Kirkland Cites 'Consensus' in Wide Margin

The overwhelming House vote to extend the landmark Voting Rights Act "reflected the consensus of the vast majority of workers and the American people at large" as expressed in the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said.

In a statement congratulating the House on its bipartisan 389-24 vote, Kirkland observed that on "the fundamental issue of the right to vote—the keystone of democratic equality—the American people are united."

HE CALLED ON the Senate to follow through "as quickly and expeditiously as possible to endorse and transmit this measure for President Reagan's signature."

An extension bill has been introduced in the Senate by Sen. Charles McC. Mathias (R-Md.) with subcommittee hearings scheduled for early January, and supporters of the measure said the House action, in which 160 Republicans joined 229 Democrats for passage, enhances prospects for a strong Senate bill.

The legislation would extend for two years the central provisions of the act, which has protected minority voting rights since 1965. The enforcement provisions require nine states and parts of 13 others with histories of discrimination against minority voters to clear with the Justice Dept. any changes in their election laws and procedures.

UNDER A 1975 amendment to the original Voting Rights Act, the enforcement provisions are slated to expire on Aug. 5, 1982. The House-passed bill would extend these provisions through Aug. 5, 1984, and add a number of mea-

With Lower Benefits

'Competition' Plan Seen Boosting Medical Costs

By John R. Oravec

Health insurance legislation promising to lower costs by supposedly instilling competition in the health care industry would actually slash benefits and increase medical costs for workers and their families, the AFL-CIO warned at House hearings.

Social Security Director Bert Seidman described the so-called competition proposal encompassed in three bills now before Congress as a "Rube Goldberg contraption" that would backfire.

"IF CONGRESS were to be misled into enacting such a fanciful scheme to deregulate the health care industry and to substitute competition and the marketplace as a cost containment strategy, the result would be exactly opposite of that intended by proponents," Seidman told a House Ways & Means health subcommittee.

"Health care costs would increase, not decrease," he said, adding that more regulation would be required to make the industry more competitive.

All three measures—one House bill and two Senate bills—would require employers to offer their workers a choice of prepaid health insurance plans. But there's a catch.

WORKERS CHOOSING a higher-cost plan with more comprehensive benefits would be penalized through higher income taxes because the employer's contributions exceeded a specified ceiling.

If workers elected to take a less-costly plan, they would receive a tax-exempt refund. However, Seidman pointed out, the workers' out-of-pocket health care expenses would increase because of the limited coverage in the lower-cost plan.

"Central to the cost containment strategy of these bills is the notion that by establishing a ceiling on employer contributions for health insurance, employees and other consumers of health services would be encouraged to shop around for the less expensive physicians, hospitals, insurers and health maintenance organizations," Seidman noted.

Based on that assumption, competi-

House Adopts Funding Bill Without New Reagan Cuts

The House served notice to President Reagan that his economic program no longer faces clear sailing on Capitol Hill as it approved an $87.3 billion appropriations bill for the Departments of Labor, Education, and Health & Human Services, rejecting the President's call for more cuts in education, health, welfare and jobs programs.

Also rejected, in the course of debate on the funding bill, was a new move to cut back the coverage of the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

AN AMENDMENT proposed by freshman Rep. Judd Gregg (R-N.H.) would have broadened the exemption from OSHA inspections to firms with 25 or fewer workers instead of 10. It failed to attract enough support for a record vote.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison had written each House member urging rejection of the additional budget reductions. The federation "believes strongly that the course being pursued by this Administration and this Congress to drastically cut back social and economic stabilization spending is wrong," Denison said.

The appropriations bill was the first to reach the House floor since Reagan's televised appeal on Sept. 24 for a further reduction of 12 percent in discretionary spending programs to help achieve his fiscal 1982 budget target. The key vote came on a Republican motion to recommit the measure without instructions, which was rejected 168-249.

REAGAN HAD outlined nearly $4 billion in additional cuts he wanted in programs covered by the Labor-HHS funding bill. But the House trimmed its Appropriations Committee's bill only $74 million to bring it in line with the budget recon-

New Mood on Hill Since Solidarity Day

A change in mood and a "firming up" of Congress have been evident on Capitol Hill since the massive Solidarity Day protest against the Reagan Administration's policies, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison observed.

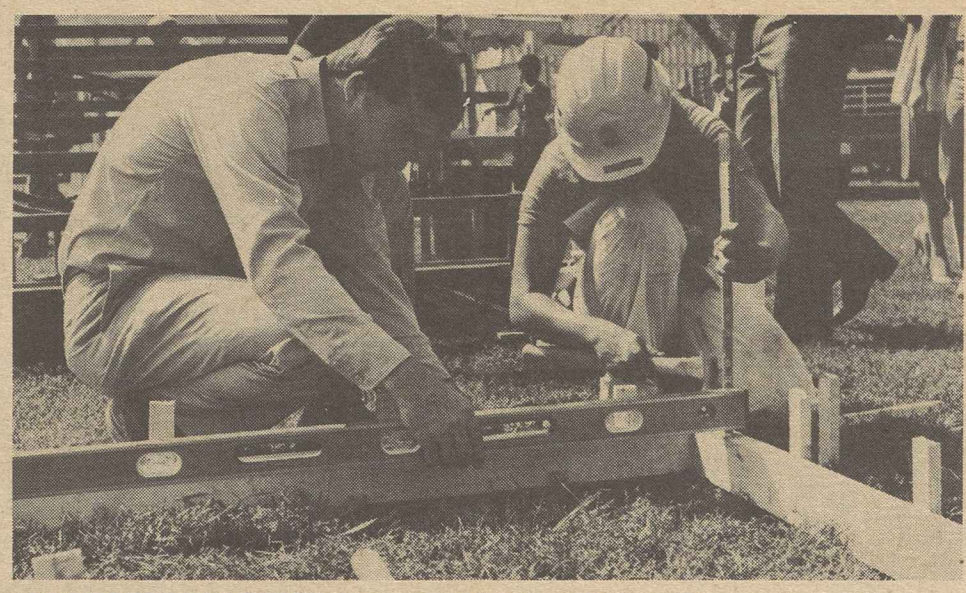
As evidence, Denison cited three successive victories for labor on key legislation: the House's overwhelming passage of a bill to extend the Voting Rights Act, its approval of funds for the Departments of Labor, Education, and Health & Human Services without the further cuts sought by Reagan, and its rejection of a new bid to reduce coverage of the Occupational Safety & Health Act. (Stories, this page.)

In addition, Denison noted, the President himself has shown an awareness of this new mood in retreating from Administration plans for sharp cuts in social security benefits and reductions in the quality and quantity of food served in the school lunch program.

Public Sector Contracts Set 7.3% Boosts

Major bargaining agreements covering some 217,000 state and local employees negotiated during the first half of 1981 provided average first-year wage increases of 7.3 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The figure compares to an average gain of 7.5 percent for all of 1980. Over the life of the contracts, the annual increase averaged 7.3 percent, down half a percentage point from the 7.8 percent average increase in settlements reached last year.



THE FIRST-HALF 1981 settlements were negotiated by 20 different bargaining units, one of which had two settlements. BLS said 55 percent of the employees worked for state governments, and the rest for local jurisdictions.

The size of the state and local contract settlements, which covered units with at least 5,000 workers, differed sharply from private-sector settlements in the first half of 1981. BLS earlier reported that contracts covering 1,000 or more workers in the private sector yielded average first-year wage gains of 11.3 percent and over-term annual increases of 9.2 percent during the first six months of this year.

All of the state and local contracts provided for specified wage increases in the first contract year, with no cost-of-living clauses in any of the pacts.

TOTAL COMPENSATION changes—adding benefits to wages—increased an average 7 percent both in the first contract year and annually over the life of the contracts, BLS said. The comparable figures for private-sector agreements negotiated during the same period were 11.4 percent for the first year and 10 percent over term.

BLS also reported that "effective wage adjustments were made during the first six months of 1981 resulting from settlements reached during the period, deferred increases paid under agreements reached in prior years, and increases under COL clauses. About 511,000 workers in 36 bargaining units received pay raises averaging 6.3 percent in the January-June period.

Job Corps Training Praised As Vital to Young Workers

The success of the Job Corps in getting training and work experience to disadvantaged young people proves the value of cooperative efforts between labor, business and government to fight unemployment, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said.

Donahue spoke at ceremonies honoring past and present directors of the training agency during a Job Corps exposition and demonstration in Washington.

THE AFL-CIO's own long-term support of the skill and job training program is based on the labor movement's commitment to "improve the quality of life for all Americans," Donahue pointed out.

In the hundred years since the founding of the modern organized labor movement, Donahue said, the goal of labor has been "to increase the participation of workers in the economic wealth of this country."

A government that is mandated by the Constitution "to promote the general welfare" has a duty, Donahue emphasized, to help its disadvantaged citizens share the benefits of society. He added, "the entire economy has a stake and a vested interest in improving the participation of the poor and the disadvantaged as both producers and consumers."

DONAHUE PRAISED the Job Corps for "filling the gaps" between school and work left for many young people by the education system and by society.

"The Job Corps," he said, "has provided young people with a useful work experience, many for the first time in their lives. It has offered them a chance to get the sound, basic, education they need to function in our increasingly sophisticated and fast-paced world."

The AFL-CIO is proud of the eight affiliates "who have in a real sense 'joined the Jobs Corps' by offering a wide range of training in useful, lifetime skills that lead to decent jobs," Donahue said.

THOSE UNIONS include the Operating Engineers, Plasterers & Cement Masons, Railway & Airline Clerks, Auto Workers, National Maritime Union, Painters, Bricklayers and Carpenters.

Stressing the importance of the role of government in curbing joblessness, Donahue said the country "needs national policies that deal realistically and fairly with our economic problems, particularly with unemployment."

The AFL-CIO disagrees, he said, with the theory that government has no place in helping the disadvantaged. In a democracy, he pointed out, government has an obligation to provide citizens "who desperately need training and job opportunities that they have been unable to secure from any other sector."

"WE DO NOT believe," he asserted, "that massive tax cuts are the answer to the stimulation of the economy and the creation of jobs. We have strongly supported employment and training programs for both young people and adults, and we have opposed the budget cuts that have ended programs such as CETA and curtailed federal aid to vocational education."

He said direct, targeted training and job creation programs, fitted to the needs of disadvantaged workers have been "demonstrably more effective than past attempts to throw tax breaks at industry with the hope and prayer that the money will be used to create jobs—and not to acquire a department store chain or move operations to Taiwan."

Donahue pledged the AFL-CIO's continued support for full funding of Job Corps programs.

October Schedule Listed By Labor Studies Center

The George Meany Center for Labor Studies has five training institutes for full-time union officers and representatives at its Silver Spring, Md., campus in October. In addition, six unions, one AFL-CIO department and the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD) are using the campus for their own training programs. The schedule:

Issues in the Economy, Oct. 5-7—A three-day seminar on the environment for collective bargaining, supply-side economics, the new tax structure and merger mania.

Labor Law, Oct. 11-16—A short course for non-lawyers covering the laws on internal union affairs, organizing, bargaining, duty of fair representation, equal opportunity, ERISA and OSHA.

Pension Investment, Oct. 13-15—A two-day institute for labor trustees of joint union-management pension plans covering investment policy, pension planning, and sound investment policy.

Media Relations, Oct. 18-23—An institute to help officers of state and local central bodies improve relations with television, radio and the press. Topics include coping with TV, speaking before the camera, radio and cable opportunities, writing news releases and preparing beeper tapes.

Basic Skills for Union Leaders, Oct. 25-30—Workshops on how to read faster and remember more, speak more effectively, write more clearly, and chair a union meeting.

Unions using the campus for their own leadership training are the Service Employees, Oct. 4-9; Fire Fighters, Oct. 5-8; Operating Engineers, Oct. 8-9; Printing & Graphic Communications Union, Oct. 18-23; United Transportation Union, Oct. 18-30; and Letter Carriers, Oct. 30.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services will conduct a staff training session on campus, Oct. 25-28.

The AIFLD will welcome a new group of Spanish-speaking trade unionists from Latin America Oct. 12 for courses on industrial democracy and political theories, and the labor movement until Nov. 14.

Information on these and other labor study programs can be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone: 301/431-6400.

Morris Iushewitz Dies, Retired New York Leader

New York—Morris Iushewitz, who retired in 1974 as secretary of the New York City AFL-CIO, died Sept. 18 after a long illness. He was 79.

Iushewitz was a founding member of the Newspaper Guild and served as secretary-treasurer of the New York State CIO during the 1940s. He also had been a member of the New York City board of education and a trustee of the State University of New York.

6,000 Gain Joint Accord At Square D

Nashville, Tenn.—A new agreement negotiated by a coordinated bargaining committee representing five unions has won pay boosts averaging $1.29 over three years for some 6,000 workers at 27 plants of the Square D Co.

The pact, approved by a 10 to 1 vote among rank-and-file members, was reached here after two months of talks at various other locations. Square D manufactures electrical and electronic components.

WORKERS' WAGES, now averaging $7.84 an hour, will rise by 62 cents an hour in the first year of the agreement, 34 cents in the second year, and 33 cents in the final year.

In addition, a cost-of-living clause providing quarterly adjustments of one cent an hour for each increase of three-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index was carried over from the old contract.

Union bargainers, whose efforts were coordinated by the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., resisted company proposals to reinstitute a "cap," or ceiling, on COL payments and to require employee contributions toward health insurance. Over the life of the agreement, the parties estimated the value of the wage and benefit package at $3.52 an hour, assuming an 11 percent annual inflation rate.

MEMBERS OF THE coordinated bargaining team were from the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which represents about 3,800 of the employees; the Machinists, representing 1,600; the unaffiliated Teamsters, 375; the Molders, 190, and the Auto Workers, 70.

Square D, whose largest plant employing about 900 workers is in Lexington, Ky., also agreed to a payroll checkoff of workers' voluntary contributions to their unions' political action committees.

Other provisions of the new contract call for a new personal leave program giving workers four days off in each of the first and second years of the agreement and five days in the third year, a new prescription drug plan, and dental coverage paying 80 percent of all charges up to a $1,000 maximum for an employee and each of his dependents.

North Carolina Delegates Elect New President

Raleigh, N.C.—E. A. Britt, secretary-treasurer of the North Carolina AFL-CIO for the past six years, was elected president over incumbent Wilbur Hobby at the state labor federation's annual convention here. Britt received 30,970 weighted votes to Hobby's 19,330.

The nearly 400 convention delegates elected Britt's entire slate to two-year terms, including Sec.-Treas. Christopher Scott, seven new vice presidents and 18 incumbent vice presidents.

BRITT, 51, served as president of the Wilmington AFL-CIO and headed the North Carolina Council of Paperworkers before he was elected secretary-treasurer of the state labor federation in 1975. Hobby had been state president since 1969.

Scott, a state legislative representative for the Communications Workers, defeated James Andrews of the Food & Commercial Workers.

IN SETTING labor's agenda for the 1982 "short session" of the state legislature, delegates put a priority on improving coverage of workers' compensation beyond on-the-job accidents. The state program currently has severe restrictions on providing benefits for occupational disease.

Delegates also called on Congress to reject efforts to weaken the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law and attempts to extend the Hobbs Act to picket line disturbances.

Selective Controls

Credit Policies Pressed To Solve Housing Crisis

The AFL-CIO renewed its call for the imposition of selective credit controls to help solve the housing dilemma facing the country.

"We should turn away from the disastrous reliance on tight money to fight inflation," Director Henry B. Schechter of the federation's Office of Housing & Monetary Policy declared in testimony before the House Subcommittee on Housing & Community Development.

"THE PRESIDENT should authorize the 'Fed' (Federal Reserve Board) to use selective credit controls to channel credit for productive purposes," Schechter said. Such purposes would include farming, home mortgages, financing of capital equipment, cars, and trucks, and new residential, industrial and commercial construction.

"If selective credit regulations were used to defer capital investment that is not urgent and bring interest rates down to affordable housing levels, the depository institutions specializing in home financing. could remain in that business, a needed higher level of residential construction could again be achieved, and the economy as a whole would be in a healthier condition," Schechter said.

The combination of inflated prices due to a shortage of houses, plus mortgage interest rates that have soared to 18 percent and more have "devastated" the housing market, Schechter observed.

FROM A LEVEL of 2 million in 1977 and 1978, annual housing unit starts declined to 1.8 million in 1979 and 1.3 million in 1980, Schechter pointed out. An annual starts rate of 1.1 million in 1981 would be "an optimistic estimate," he said.

The downward trend continues, with the seasonally adjusted annual rate down to 937,000 for August, he noted, adding that "this trend is likely to be prolonged until the continuation of current monetary and fiscal policies deepens the economic recession to a level at which long-term funds for housing and business are not in much demand."

The current economic pattern is apparent in the September jobless figures, he noted. Of the nearly 8 million Americans unemployed in September, 828,000 were construction workers, he pointed out. Sales of new and existing homes have declined sharply, and rental vacancies are at record low levels. Condominium conversions have further reduced the supply of rental units, and rental housing development has ground to a halt.

UNLIKE PREVIOUS similar periods of sharp downturns in home building, Schechter observed, there are no emergency programs today to provide below-market-rate mortgage financing. Another unique feature of today's housing market is the avowed intention of the Federal Reserve Board to continue its tight-money policy until inflation is licked, he said. This has resulted in a spate of construction industry bankruptcies—up 49 percent in the first 35 weeks of 1981 compared to the same quarter a year earlier.

As long as credit allocation is left to market forces, reinforced by a monetary policy that drives up interest rates, the home buyer simply cannot compete for funds with large corporations and businesses, Schechter said.

"EXPERIENCE BOTH here and abroad demonstrates that credit controls provide a viable alternative to slowing down the money supply," he observed. The brief implementation of credit controls in 1980 under the Carter Administration proved helpful in rapidly bringing down interest rates, he noted.

As a result the decline in home building and general economic activity was reversed.

The 1969 Credit Control Act gives the President the authority to use flexible credit controls as a supplement to general monetary policy. Schechter pointed out. He said the AFL-CIO strongly supports making this authority permanent before its scheduled expiration next June, and using it now to bring down interest rates and revive key sectors of the economy.

TECHNOLOGICAL CHANGES in the printing industry and their impact on workers are discussed by Graphic Arts Vice President William A. Schroeder and Alfred Kaufman, assistant secretary general of the International Graphic Federation, at an International Labor Organization conference in Geneva.

ILO Urged to Explore Impact Of New Printing Technology

Geneva—Employer and government representatives joined trade unionists in calling on the International Labor Organization to keep a close watch on the social impact of technological developments that are revolutionizing the printing and allied trades.

"The innovations are coming so fast that we cannot afford to leave undetermined the time between meetings," William A. Schroeder, vice president of the Graphic Arts International Union, commented after a 10-day ILO session on the printing industry.

NOTING THAT 19 years had elapsed since the ILO had last held a meeting on the printing industry, Schroeder expressed strong satisfaction at the unanimous call addressed to the ILO Governing Body for further sessions at intervals of no more than five years.

Schroeder, who was the worker member of the U.S. delegation to the 24-nation meeting, said he had been impressed "by the genuine concern the delegates showed for the social consequences in all nations of the industry's rapidly changing technology."

The conference agreed that the continuing structural and technological developments require close study of their impact on employment and job and income security of the industry's workers. Working conditions and occupational safety and health should also be included on the agenda of the next meeting, the report said.

CONSIDERATION of possible reductions in working times as a means of preserving jobs was likewise urged. A comprehensive analysis on how such reductions could help safeguard employment is to be undertaken by the ILO in preparation for the next meeting on the printing and allied trades.

Schroeder also welcomed the conference's call for an extensive study of the "full range of possible psychological, physical and other effects" on workers from their increasing use of video display units on the job.

After some hesitation, employer delegates went along with a resolution asking the Governing Body to include the printing industry among those in which the social and labor practices of multinational firms are being examined by the ILO.

"At least we will be taking a look at what is going on," Schroeder commented after remarking that many frontier-jumping companies are "without social conscience."

The GAIU had a second representative at the ILO session. Vice President Leonard Paquette was the worker member of the Canadian delegation and served as vice chairman of a committee that explored the training and the retraining of workers in the industry to meet the challenge of technological changes.

Study Refutes Subminimum Wage Claims

New York—A new study has taken sharp issue with claims that the federal minimum wage is a significant factor in the high unemployment of minority youth.

The study, commissioned by the League for Industrial Democracy and written by social scientist B. Bruce-Briggs, declares that evidence of a major impact on minority teenage unemployment is "unsubstantiated and unconvincing" and urges that "meddling with the minimum wage should be well toward the bottom of everybody's list of priorities."

Arch Puddington, executive director of the LID, said the organization had commissioned the study "because we were convinced that there was a great deal of misinformation and downright propaganda being circulated about the minimum wage." The LID is a labor-supported research and educational organization which focuses on social and economic policy and international human rights.

"THIS STUDY demolishes the arguments of the critics of the minimum wage," Puddington said.

While some conservatives have called for outright abolition of the minimum wage, the most commonly advanced proposal calls for the establishment of a special "subminimum" wage for teenagers at a rate lower than the minimum wage rate for adults. The arguments of two leading proponents of a teenage subminimum, economists Walter Williams and Thomas Sowell, are examined in detail in the study.

Among the points advanced by Bruce-Briggs in the study, titled "The Minimum Wage Muddle," are the following:

- Minimum wage critics have consistently ignored the impact of inflation on minimum wage rates. The value of the minimum wage, after taking inflation into consideration, was $1.25 in 1980, a figure no higher than the inflation-adjusted figure for the year 1963. Indeed, the study concludes that the value of the minimum wage "has not really increased since 1950" because of inflation.

- The minimum wage has not significantly changed as a percentage of the average wage of an individual worker for the past thirty years.

- The 42 years since the inception of the minimum wage have seen, until the past decade, "our longest sustained economic growth, which resulted in the first prosperous working class in history and the largest business profits." Although the study does not suggest that the minimum wage caused this boom, "just as surely it did not hinder it."

- Black workers generally, and teenage black workers in particular, are confronted with a series of special employment hurdles having nothing to do with the minimum wage, but which are often ignored by the proponents of a teenage subminimum. These problems include the shift of manufacturing jobs from inner cities to the suburbs, a large increase in minority birth rates which has increased job competition, the trend towards young women seeking jobs that in the past were filled by young males, and the increased number of minority youth attending college and therefore not looking for work.

THE STUDY concludes that "the most important determinant of non-white youth unemployment rates is most likely that of all unemployment rates — the overall health of the economy. . . . The gains to be made from modification of our minimum wage laws have not been demonstrated, and our economic condition, while hardly optimum, cannot be described as desperate. And in any event, we should concern ourselves with adult heads of family first."

Sadat Mourned as Leader, Peacemaker

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in a telegram to the widow of assassinated Egyptian President Anwar Sadat, praised Sadat as "one of the world's great statesmen."

Kirkland, who extended the federation's sympathies and condolences, said that he was "deeply shocked and saddened" by Sadat's death. "He enjoyed the respect of all who knew him and shared his dreams for peace and freedom in the Middle East," he said.

Kirkland and AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue sent similar messages to Saad Ahmed, president of the Egyptian Federation of Labor, and to Ashraf A. Ghorbal, the Egyptian ambassador to the United States.

Betty Kaye Taylor Named To N.Y. State Labor Post

Albany, N.Y.—Betty Kaye Taylor, former assistant director of the Jewish Labor Committee, has been named deputy commissioner of the New York State's Labor Dept.

Prior to joining the JLC in 1948, Taylor had been an organizer for the Ladies' Garment Workers in Milwaukee.

Alfred Shibley Dies, Retired AFL-CIO Staffer

Lorain, Ohio—Alfred C. Shibley, who retired in 1973 as an AFL-CIO field representative, died Oct. 1 after a heart attack. He was 73.

Shibley had served as treasurer of the Lorain County AFL-CIO since the mid-1950s and had been secretary-treasurer of county federation of labor for 15 years prior to merger. He also had been a member of the International Typographical Union for more than 50 years.

Survivors include his wife Gloria and three daughters. Services were held Oct. 5 and burial was at Ridgehill Memorial Park.

Reagan's Very Own Budget

PRESIDENT REAGAN doesn't have Jimmy Carter's budget to kick around any more. As of the new fiscal year, the federal budget is all his. So were the mistaken economic projections on which he based it. So is the formidable deficit that he now belatedly foresees, and so are the reckless tax cuts that caused it.

Anyone can make mistakes, and Mr. Reagan could easily correct his. He could do it simply by asking Congress to rescind or delay the effective date of some of the most flagrantly misguided and unneeded tax windfalls that he has distributed to the rich.

But that would be the easy way. Rather than allow a single raindrop to fall on the rich, Mr. Reagan chooses to further soak the poor, including the unemployed who are already struggling to keep their heads above water.

THE AFL-CIO has pointed out two actions that would save the Treasury $10 billion in 1982 alone: First, eliminate the tax giveaways to oil companies and oil royalty owners; second, limit the individual income tax cut to $700 in 1982, cutting back some of the huge tax windfalls to the extremely wealthy. Every American earning less than $42,500 a year would get his full tax cut; those earning more would get $700.

Mr. Reagan is urging Congress to keep hands off the enormous largess earmarked for energy suppliers and, instead, to impose new income taxes on unemployment benefits and to eliminate the modest tax credits that encourage home conservation of energy.

At the same time, he has called for another round of budget cuts affecting domestic programs that have already been slashed to levels that are less than humane.

In assuring the public that the proposed new cuts would reduce all federal programs other than defense and guaranteed programs such as social security by "only" an additional 12 percent, Mr. Reagan has understated his intentions.

THE FACT IS that in many programs these 12-percent cuts would be taken from the base he set in his original budget proposals of last March, not from the spending base to which Congress ultimately agreed, with Mr. Reagan's approval.

Here are a few of the cuts that would go far beyond 12 percent:

- Aid to low-income families to meet soaring energy costs actually would be cut 34 percent.
- Education aid for the handicapped actually would be cut 29 percent.
- Guaranteed student loans actually would be cut 43 percent.
- Federal highway programs would be cut 14 percent.
- The Economic Development Assistance program for needed local public works projects actually would be cut 89 percent.
- Education assistance to needy children actually would be cut 29 percent.
- Amtrak actually would be cut 46 percent, and Conrail would be cut 89 percent.

Mr. Reagan's political and social philosophies are perfectly consistent. Those who benefit the most from his policies are to reap the benefits even of his mistakes. Those who have been most injured by those policies have to pay for his blunders, as well.

Absurd School Lunch Rules Product of Broader Absurdity

By Gus Tyler

REAGAN'S TROUBLE with his ill-fated school lunch program is one of those little things that tells us much about many bigger things. The fuss offers an insight into a state of mind that is so absurd it is no longer recognizable as absurd.

The first absurdity was to cut the school lunch program from $4.5 to $3 billion in 1982 to save $1.5 billion. If Uncle Sam could not afford that billion or so, he could easily have picked up the necessary funds by denying tax cuts to millionaires who will be fattened by billions in 1982. But, in the topsy turvy world of Washington today, the richest were made richer at the expense of kids.

THE SECOND absurdity was the set of regulations that came from the Dept. of Agriculture on just how to save the billion and a half dollars. The responsibility was placed with Agriculture because the whole idea of a school lunch program did not originally spring from compassion for the kids but from a desire to provide a solid, steady, subsidized market for farm products.

That, in itself, may seem like an absurdity to some. But what struck many as tragi-comic were the actual dietary "regs" put out by the department.

The pundits had a field day with their verbal punts, kicking around an Uncle Sam turned Uncle Scrooge, turning our children into so many Oliver Twists begging for two more ounces of milk or a less transparent hamburger. The one "reg" that promised endless entertainment officially certified catsup and pickle relish to be true-blue vegetables.

THE FIRST RESPONSE of various Administration spokesmen was to defend the "regs." Despite all these cutbacks on nutrients, they said, there would be a "safety net" underneath the truly needy bellies. But the more they spoke, the more ridicule they inspired.

Finally, the President himself stepped in. He was against these regulations. Indeed, he said, they were so obviously absurd that they must be an act of "bureaucratic sabotage."

How could anyone have put together such stupid regulations? Obviously there was someone in the Dept. of Agriculture who was out to embarrass the Reagan regime and had carried through this reductio ad absurdum as an act of "sabotage."

Reagan's comment, of course, prompted an immediate investigation. After which the Secretary of Agriculture announced:

"It's safe to say he (Reagan) no longer feels it was sabotage, and that it was a legitimate attempt to change the standards in response to budget needs."

The poor soul who wrote the regs! How was he to know what was absurd in the world of the absurd that is Washington today?

Even the 'Trickle' Has Halted for Poor

The myth-makers are wrong: Poverty has not been abolished—and there are no signs that it will be in the near future. Growth in the private economy has largely ceased to 'trickle down' to the poor in the form of jobs, better income, and a more rewarding and productive role in society. . . .

In the immediate future—as well as in the long run—our national priorities must take into account the millions of Americans who, through no fault of their own, cannot find jobs and who are in desperate need of basic social services.

Attempts to balance the budget—at the expense of social programs—and efforts to deliberately shift the economy into a recession—with its concomitant hardships for those who are least able to withstand its effects—will not only fail to make significant inroads towards reducing inflation, but will aggravate our economic problems as well.

Moreover, they may also make it even more difficult to balance the budget if the result is sharply increased unemployment. It is estimated that each one percent increase in unemployment will cost the federal government, and the nation as a whole, approximately $29 billion as a combination of lost revenue and increased transfer payments. Thus, such policies may bring the budget more rather than less out of balance.

'Rube Goldberg Contraption'

Consumer 'Choice' Health Plan Would Lift Costs, Cut Benefits

The following summarizes AFL-CIO testimony to a House Ways & Means subcommittee opposing legislation that would limit tax exemptions for employer-paid health care plans.

WE CANNOT ACCEPT the unfounded premise that competition in the health care industry can contain health care costs as proposed by three bills now before Congress.

If Congress were to be misled into enacting such a fanciful scheme to deregulate the health care industry and to substitute competition and the marketplace as a cost containment strategy, the result would be exactly the opposite of that intended by the proponents. Health care costs would increase, not decrease. More, not less, regulation would be required to force the non-competitive health industry into a competitive mold.

There is no magic solution to cost containment in the health care field other than placing controls and/or incentives on physicians. Fee schedules in lieu of open end reimbursement could control costs as could cost containment incentives such as capitation payments for physician services.

ALL THREE BILLS would require employers to offer their employees a choice of more than one insurance or prepayment plan. They would require employers to contribute the same amount for each employee in the plan. The employer contribution would be subject to a ceiling. After the ceiling is exceeded, the employee would be subject to income tax for the excess contributions.

Employees who might desire a plan with comprehensive benefits and no co-payments would have to pay extra out of gross or pretaxed income. Those who elected a plan with minimal benefits and with deductibles and co-payments (or other limitations) costing less than the employer contribution would receive a tax-exempt refund for electing to be covered by the low-cost plan. In effect, this is a bribe for employees to disinsure themselves and try to pay out-of-pocket for health services they may require if they become sick.

CENTRAL TO the cost containment strategy of these bills is the notion that by establishing a ceiling on employer contributions for health insurance, employees and other consumers of health services would be encouraged to shop around for the less expensive physicians, hospitals, insurers and health maintenance organizations and that in turn, through the invisible hand of competition, providers and insurers would be forced to reduce costs.

It is, therefore, assumed by the proponents of these bills that the delivery of health services can be adapted or transformed into the competitive economic model now exceedingly rare today where the national marketplace is dominated by major corporations and even the world market is dominated by multinational corporations. The fact that the medical care market is dominated by physicians is ignored. Any rational cost containment strategy must address itself to this issue. These bills do not.

Even the most enthusiastic supporters of the competition theory know it is the doctor who controls medical care costs so they have concocted an indirect way of pressuring physicians to control health care costs.

IN ORDER TO appeal to the presumed "cost conscious" consumer, third parties would compete for customers on the basis of lower premium costs. Insurers would, then, pressure physicians to control medical care costs who in turn would then be motivated to form health maintenance organizations or other forms of organized health care delivery systems.

This Rube Goldberg contraption is supposed to in some way, somehow contain health care costs.

One of the bills proposes to allow Medicare beneficiaries a choice of public or private insurance. It is alleged this will reduce medical care costs for the disabled and the elderly. The cost of administration of the Medicare program is only 3.1 percent of benefit payments. The cost of private insurance exceeds 12 percent.

IT WOULD BE impossible, therefore, for private insurance to match the overhead cost of the public program. It can be suspected that the sponsors of the bill may have their doubts since the bill prohibits a Medicare beneficiary from returning to the public program once he or she opts out. Freedom of choice would be denied to Medicare beneficiaries if they made a mistake.

All of the competition bills would levy a regressive tax on all employees having comprehensive health insurance coverage. For example, for an average family of four, one-half of the recently enacted tax cut would be taken away. Many poor families with below average incomes or large families could lose their entire cut.

Unions have fought over the years for comprehensive health insurance programs. This is what union members and all consumers want. The AFL-CIO is determined to preserve the gains that have been made through collective bargaining.

Deepest in 25 Years

High Mortgage Rates at Root Of Severe Slump in Housing

THE HOUSING INDUSTRY is suffering the lowest production of new units since the post-war economic dislocation period 25 years ago, AFL-CIO housing expert Henry Schechter, said on Labor News Conference.

The problem is not lack of demand for housing units, Schechter said. He pointed out that fewer than half the units needed just to keep pace with demand will actually be built this year. The severity of the short supply of housing has been on the rise over the last two years, he said, and is resulting in a substantial reduction of living standards.

"More than 1.6 million American families are forced to live doubled up—two families living together in a single unit," Schechter pointed out. He said the lag in production—though not as severe as it is this year—stretches back to the Seventies, when some 2.5 million units were added "by making two-family homes out of one-family homes," many built in attics and basements.

Schechter said the Administration's tight-money and high-interest rate policies have forced almost everyone "except the very well-to-do, most of whom are already well-housed," out of the housing market.

"Similarly," he said, "there will be practically no multi-family rental housing construction . . . except for a few luxury apartment projects and some subsidized housing still in the pipeline," until the Administration and the Federal Reserve Board ease their policies, which are the "central factor" in the recession that grips the housing and construction industries.

Schechter noted that nearly 900,000 construction workers are now jobless and the direct impact of that unemployment is probably double, because for every job in housing construction there is a non-construction job to supply materials.

HE SAID THE so-called all-savers certificate scheme will not prove to be much help to the housing industry. While it will probably draw a lot of new money into savings and loans and other institutions, it is only a "one-shot, one-year deal," and lenders "will be very wary of putting one-year money" into long-term housing mortgages, he predicted.

Schechter renewed the call for the kind of credit controls used for a short period last year, which quickly brought down both prime and mortgage interest rates and boosted both the housing industry and the overall economy.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE IS A CERTAIN knack in Congress for attaching worthy-sounding labels to bills to make them more palatable and even enticing to legislators.

Who could be against "consumer choice" health plans? What sounds more American? Or call them "competition" health plans. What could be more efficient?

There are some 50 million Americans lacking adequate health coverage. Entire areas are underserved, such as Appalachia, the rural South and the ghettos.

Instead of moving toward more universal coverage and effective cost control, perhaps along the lines of the successful program in Canada, Congress is threatening to go in the opposite direction.

A House Ways & Means panel has taken up several so-called competition plans to lower costs through price competition, and union experts do not like what they see.

"These are not health insurance programs; they are 'have less' plans," declared Douglas Fraser, president of the United Auto Workers and head of the Committee for National Health Insurance.

"WORKERS WOULD have increased costs and union-negotiated contracts would be undermined," Fraser said. He also said attempts by employers to introduce co-insurance and deductibles, which the health care competition bills seek to do, have caused strikes in the auto and mining industries.

Three competition health insurance proposals are before Congress in bills introduced by Rep. Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.), Sen. David F. Durenberger (R-Minn.) and Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (R-Utah). The Administration also is reported to be considering its own health care reform legislative proposal based on the competition idea, but it won't be introduced until later in the year.

All three bills use a similar approach. Employers would be required to offer a choice of more than one insurance or pre-payment plan to employees, usually a high, medium and low-cost plan. Employers, who may now deduct their contributions to employee health insurance from business income taxes, would be allowed to deduct only a certain maximum premium payment.

The economic theory behind the bills is that employees would be encouraged to select lower-coverage, lower-cost health insurance plans, and insurance companies would be encouraged to compete by offering low-cost plans. This competition among insurance companies theoretically would lower health care costs.

But that's not how it would work in reality, in labor's view.

"In effect, this is a bribe for employees to disinsure themselves and try to pay out-of-pocket for health services they may require if they become sick," AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told the House panel.

The causes of rising costs in the health care industry are the fee-for-service system of reimbursing physicians and cost-plus reimbursement of hospitals, it was pointed out.

THE FIRST encourages physicians to order unnecessary visits or other treatment to increase their income. The second encourages hospitals to compete for doctors, and indirectly for patients, by investing in high-cost technological equipment, which doctors prefer, without regard for cost or cost-effectiveness.

Other criticisms leveled at the competition heatlh care proposals include these points:

- Lower-cost health insurance would mean fewer benefits and higher deductibles. Total health care costs would not be lowered by higher deductibles. Consumers would merely be absorbing high costs through out-of-pocket payments.
- Although the bills purport to reduce regulation, they merely introduce different, not less, regulation into the industry.
- The bills assume that consumers with health insurance that costs them little tend to go to doctors more frequently, thus driving up health care costs. Only 16 percent of doctors' office visits are initiated by patients, Seidman pointed out.

TIGHT MONEY and high interest rates are stifling housing production and fueling high unemployment in construction and allied supply industries, AFL-CIO housing expert Henry Schechter, center, said on Labor News Conference. Schechter was questioned by Robert Cooney, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

Panel Warns Reagan Cuts Add to Plight of Poor

Administration cuts in job training, social services and anti-poverty programs will only add to the despair of disadvantaged Americans and "could very well shatter the social equilibrium of our nation," a government advisory panel warned in its final report on poverty in the United States.

"Attempts to balance the budget—at the expense of social programs—and efforts to deliberately shift the economy into a recession—with its concommitant hardships for those who are least able to withstand its effects—will not only fail to make significant inroads toward reducing inflation, but will aggravate our economic problems as well," the National Advisory Council on Economic Opportunity added in its report, "The American Promise: Equal Justice and Economic Opportunity."

THE "TRICKLE-DOWN" economic policies of the Reagan Administration will not work, the council warned, and "only those comprehensive and national economic revitalization efforts targeted specifically toward disadvantaged communities and the jobless" will be effectively combat poverty in the 1980s.

Arthur I. Blaustein, who chaired the panel, accused the Administration of separating economic theory from social policy and pursuing the former at the expense of the latter." He warned that there will be a price to pay for the cuts in human and social services.

"That price is that these cutbacks will not reduce crime; they will increase it. They will not reduce the use of drugs; they will increase it. They will not reduce alcoholism; they will increase it. They will not promote better family life; they will destabilize it. They will not increase respect for the law; they will weaken it," said Blaustein. He is director of the National Economic Development & Law Center, which provides assistance to legal service attorneys and community organizations.

THE NATIONAL Advisory Council on Economic Opportunity, which itself was abolished when the Administration's $35 billion cuts in social and other federal spending took effect Oct. 1, was created in 1967 as part of President Johnson's "war on poverty." Its presidentially appointed members included UAW Vice President Irving Bluestone, who has since retired.

Chairman Blaustein warned that the "radical changes" effected by the Reagan budget reductions have not yet sunk in on the national consciousness, "but the day of reckoning will come shortly." Oct. 1 "will be remembered as a day of infamy, for it will mark the worst massacre of social and human-service programs in American history," he said.

Blaustein said his remarks and the report of the committee were not influenced by partisan considerations or the council's administrative death. "These conclusions were reached long before there was an announcement of phaseout for the council," he said.

Instead of cutting programs for the poor, the council said, the President and Congress should extend the 1964 Economic Opportunity Act, which established the 15-member panel.

The council attacked what it called the "myth" that poverty has been abolished in the United States, and disputed the "mistaken" view of some economists that the reduction in the poverty population had been a result of growth in the private sector. Despite significant gains in the battle against poverty, there are still 25 million poor Americans and another 30 million near poor, "so that, in effect, one-third of our citizens are materially deprived," the panel observed.

"The myth-makers are wrong: Poverty has not been abolished—and there are no signs that it will be in the near future. It is not simply that some groups have not done as well as others, or that we have not gone far enough. The problem is deeper," the council said in its report.

"Growth in the private economy has largely ceased to 'trickle down' to the poor in the form of jobs, better income, and a more rewarding and productive role in society. This is increasingly true, even in the South and rural areas where in earlier years economic development had the strongest impact on poverty rates."

THE STUBBORN persistence of poverty in the face of economic growth results in part from changing nature of the poverty population, the council noted. Unbalanced national growth in the inner cities in the past decade has spawned a growing number of what it called the "new" poor, heavily made up of female householders and their children, and even more disproportionately minority than in the past.

Because few of these people can be absorbed into the private economy without special assistance and support, the council said, the "massive suffering" that the Reagan budget cuts will bring "cannot be balanced by any credible long-range benefits from the Administration's program—even under the most optimistic assumptions. Any economic "renewal" that might take place from Administration policies would occur at the expense of "stable, rewarding family lives and genuine work opportunities for the poor and their children," it declared.

Blaustein added that "we are watching a great tragedy unfurl before us. The steady drumbeat of rhetoric emanating from Administration officials and shrewdly orchestrated by the White House is intended to create, and has heretofore succeeded in creating, a counter-reality and new myths with respect to social policy.

"FOR EXAMPLE, by continuously referring to economic opportunity and equal justice programs as 'welfare' programs, the Administration has misled the American public. These programs are, in fact, designed to achieve the opposite, to create jobs and economic opportunities and to encourage people who are dependent upon welfare to become productive citizens and taxpayers.

"By seeking to eliminate these programs and substituting its own policies, the Administration will deny upward mobility to millions on welfare and will force many of the working poor into welfare dependency. By shifting program authority from the federal government to the states through block grants, the Administration has created a bureaucratic nightmare that will result in government by provisional catastrophe."

LEGISLATION IS SIGNED by California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., permitting local government bodies to negotiate agency shop agreements with public employee unions. Present for the signing ceremony were Assemblyman Curtis R. Tucker, seated left, a chief sponsor of the bill; John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, and Tim Twomey, vice president of the Service Employees; standing, Ron Woods of the State Council of Operating Engineers, left, and James S. Lee, president of the State Building & Construction Trades Council.

New California Law Allows Local Agency Shop Pacts

Sacramento, Calif.—Labor-backed legislation authorizing all local government bodies to negotiate agency shop contracts with public employee unions was signed into law by Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr.

The measure, which takes effect next Jan. 1, permits bargaining for contract language to require city, county and district public employees to join the union that represents them or pay a service fee covering the cost of representation. State employees are not covered by the law.

PASSAGE OF the agency shop bill culminated a 10-year campaign in the state legislature by the California AFL-CIO. Final approval came on the last day of the 1981 session with an Assembly vote of 43 to 32. The Senate had passed the measure earlier by a vote of 21 to 16 after rejecting a series of crippling amendments.

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the State AFL-CIO, hailed passage of the bill "because it helps to strengthen public employee unions in California at a time when the national administration has launched the most massive assault on the rights of workers—both public and private—in the past half-century."

At a bill-signing ceremony, Brown said the legislation "recognizes the basic service which unions perform for their members." He noted that all employees would now pay a fair share toward the cost of union contract bargaining and union protection.

THE MEASURE exempts management, supervisory and confidential employees from the agency shop provision. It also exempts workers who are members of religious groups which historically have objected to the support of employee organizations. For those workers, the law requires they pay an equal sum to non-religious, non-labor charitable organizations.

Several local unions already have contracts providing for the agency shop pending the effective date of the new law.

'Competition' Health Schemes Would Boost Patient Costs

tion would result and force a reduction in costs.

The trouble is that this theory will not work, Seidman told the panel, because it is the doctor, not the patient, who dominates the demand for health services.

"PHYSICIANS control 70 to 75 percent of all health care expenditures," he pointed out. "Patients cannot just check into a hospital; they have to be admitted by their doctor. Patients do not order lab tests; doctors do."

A Congressional Budget Office report indicated that the impact on overall costs of the "competition" plan would be negligible, possibly lowering costs 1 to 2 percent by 1988.

But Seidman warned that all three bills would levy a regressive tax on workers who carry comprehensive health insurance.

"Unions have fought over the years for comprehensive health insurance programs," he stressed. "The AFL-CIO is determined to preserve the gains that have been made through collective bargaining."

"WE ARE confident that Congress will not vote to increase taxes on the working population nor to vote to disinsure most Americans," he said.

Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, chairman of the Committee for National Health Insurance, reinforced that point in his testimony. He stressed that the so-called "competition and consumer choice" legislation would not only fail to achieve intended goals, but would reverse years of progress in negotiated health care insurance programs.

"Perhaps the least understood aspect of these plans," Fraser said, "is that they are revenue-raising measures."

WHILE COSTS of health care programs would increase in total, coupled with higher out-of-pocket payments for consumers because of reduced coverage, the government would reap a huge windfall in new tax collections, Fraser warned. He cited government estimates that the resultant new tax take would amount to $4.1 billion in the first year of operation and rise to $9.4 billion by 1986.

Cathy Schoen, special assistant to the president of the Service Employees, told the panel that the measures before Congress would impose an especially heavy burden on low-wage workers.

"Many of our members in hospitals and nursing homes still cannot afford to pay for the care they deliver each day," Schoen stressed.

"The price we pay each year for protection against the cost of a possible illness and for access to decent care long ago impelled us to work for enactment of national health care legislation," she testified.

1980 Pay Boosts Average 14% for Top Executives

The pay of top corporate executives increased an average 14 percent during 1980, a private survey conducted for the Financial Executives Institute revealed.

Typically, executive pay increases are about 25 percent above the annual inflation rate but last year, with some industry exceptions, the average increase was essentially only equal to the rate, the institute observed.

The survey reviewed the salary and bonus pay levels of jobs in the executive and financial departments of 1,425 companies. By industry, the survey found the highest average total compensation—about $160,000—was paid to top executives in the mining, chemical, and petroleum industries. At the other end of the scale, the commercial banking industry paid its top executives the least, but still a hefty average of $84,500.

Increases ranged from a high of 23 percent in mining and 18 percent in business services, food products, and instruments to a low of 9 percent in wholesale trade and 3 percent in transportation equipment.

Executives in the Northeast earned the most, with average total compensation of $128,600, while executives with the lowest average pay, $94,900, lived in the Southwest.

Voting Rights Extension Bill Sent to Senate

sures, including one allowing jurisdictions for the first time to end their coverage under the law.

This "bail-out" opportunity would come into play beginning in August 1984, and would allow those jurisdictions with demonstrably good records of non-discrimination to escape coverage under the Voting Rights Act if they can show that for the 10 years prior to 1984:

- They used no test or device designed to deny or limit an individual's right to vote because of race, color, or language.
- No federal court has found that they denied or abridged a person's voting rights.
- It was not necessary to send federal examiners into the jurisdiction to enforce election laws.
- They engaged in constructive efforts to eliminate intimidation and harassment of groups whose voting rights are protected under the law and to expand opportunities for registration and voting by minorities.

The nine states covered by the Voting Rights Act are Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, South Carolina, Virginia, Alaska, Texas and Arizona. The areas in 13 other states still covered by the law are generally characterized by low voter participation by blacks and other minorities despite a high concentration of those groups within the jurisdictions.

PRESIDENT REAGAN has not taken a firm stand on the legislation, although he told a news conference last week that he was "wholeheartedly in favor, let's say in principle, of the Voting Rights Act."

Passage of the measure to extend the law's provisions is a high-priority objective of the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups.

CIVIL RIGHTS COMMITTEE of the AFL-CIO reviews federation's activities at its semi-annual meeting at federation headquarters. The committee, chaired by Actors & Artistes President Frederick O'Neal, center, discussed the Dept. of Civil Rights' current and future programs. The meeting focused on action to head off Reagan Administration plans to weaken federal contract compliance regulations that now open job opportunities to women and minorities.

House Spurns Reagan's Plea For More Cuts

ciliation measure. It cut $43.7 million from the Work Incentive (WIN) program and $30.2 million from agency salaries and expenses.

The bill, which is second in size only to that of the defense appropriations bill, exceeds Reagan's request of last March by about $796 million, but is $3.9 billion more than the President sought in his Sept. 24 call for more cuts in these areas.

During debate on the measure, there was speculation that Reagan might veto the bill if it clears Congress as passed by the House. "It's excessive, and the President will surely consider it unacceptable," Republican leader Robert H. Michel (R-Ill.) said.

BUT WHILE GOP leaders appear to have the votes to sustain a veto, the heavy majority against recommittal shows widespread opposition to the President's bid for additional cuts.

Remaining in the bill is $400 million for youth employment and training under Title IVA of the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act, which the Administration did not request. The House inserted the funds after the Appropriations Committee recommended the money to ease the "unacceptably high" jobless rate among young people. The bill also includes $766 million for summer youth jobs, and $1.4 billion for continuation of Title IIB and IIC employment and training programs under CETA.

Gregg's proposal to reduce OSHA's coverage originally sought exemption from the law of businesses employing fewer than 50 workers. Had the House gone along, two-thirds of all the nation's firms would have been exempt from periodic safety inspections. The current exemption applies to firms with 10 or fewer employees—1.6 million small businesses.

'Trickle-Down' Policies Hit at Vermont Parley

Bennington, Vt.—The trickle-down economic policies the Reagan Administration is pursuing are clearly against the best interests of the nation's workers and the needy, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas Thomas R. Donahue told the 25th anniversary convention of the Vermont State Labor Council.

Rather than making government responsive to the needs of its citizens, Donahue observed, the Administration is headed in the opposite direction.

"IT IS DEVOTED instead to making government less humane, giving an inordinate share of the nation's wealth to the rich and returning unrestricted power to the corporations," he declared. "That's what this Administration stands for, and that's why we oppose it."

Donahue expressed concern that President Reagan's actions could polarize the country—causing serious division in society.

"We have to hope that we can prevent that polarization from becoming too extreme," he said, "that we can continue to work in, and for, an America that doesn't perceive itself as a society rigidly divided by class, and with those classes at war with one another."

FOR THE PAST 100 years, the labor movement has sought to make America a better place for all its people, and it continues to play that role today, Donahue stressed.

In convention action, the 85 delegates voted a 5-cent increase in the per capita tax, raising monthly payments to 30 cents.

President Robert E. Clark, who has headed the State AFL-CIO since 1975, was re-elected to a new two-year term. Sec.-Treas. Carla Thomas and Executive Vice President Maurice Fortier were elected to their first full two-year terms. Delegates also elected 19 vice presidents.

FOCUSING ON legislative issues, the convention called for closing loopholes in the state's tax structure to insure that oil companies pay full taxes on profits, lifting limitations on workers' compensation benefits for permanent disability and death, and opposing attempts to set fixed payments on unemployment compensation rather than gearing benefits to two-thirds of the average state wage.

Speakers at the three-day convention in addition to Donahue included Vermont's congressional delegation—Senators Robert T. Stafford (R) and Patrick J. Leahy (D), and Rep. James M. Jeffords (R).

Hawaii AFL-CIO Names Epstein to Executive Post

Honolulu—Henry B. Epstein has been appointed executive secretary-treasurer of the Hawaii AFL-CIO, President Walter H. Kupau of the State federation announced.

Epstein, formerly a staff representative of the State, County & Municipal Employees and AFSCME Local 646, fills a position with the state body that has been vacant since Phil Mayer resigned last December.

Transit Union Convention Elects Rowland President

Hollywood, Fla. — Delegates to the Amalgamated Transit Union's 46th biennial convention here elected John W. Rowland as the union's new international president. Rowland defeated the incumbent, Dan V. Maroney, who had served in the position since 1973.

Rowland, 60, had served since 1976 as the union's executive vice president. For two years before that he was secretary-treasurer. His election as president marks the first time in the 89-year history of the union that one person has held all three top international offices.

ROWLAND BECAME a vice president of the ATU in 1964, after holding all elected positions in his home local in St. Louis.

James LaSala, a vice president since 1969, was elected executive vice president and Sec.-Treas. Raymond C. Wallace was re-elected, both by acclamation.

In other actions, the delegates adopted a resolution decrying the Reagan Administration's proposed phasing out of federal transit operating subsities over the next three years. The subsidies curently account for about 13 percent of public transit revenues.

"THE ELIMINATION of operating subsidies will result in a lessening of transit services and/or steep increases in fares, either or both of which will wipe out the significant progress mass transit has made in this country in the past decade," the resolution said. "Rather than ignore mass transit in the pursuit of the nation's energy conservation, economic and jobs goals, the Administration and Congress should actively promote and support it."

The convention also spoke out strongly against deregulation of the intercity bus industry, declaring that such a move would ignore the service needs of the general public, particularly those in smaller communities.

In other resolutions, the union renewed is call for implementation of no-fare or low-fare transit on a nationwide basis to increase the use of mass transit and at the same time help in the nation's energy conservation fight, opposed federal policing of pickets under the Hobbs Act, opposed decontrol of natural gas prices, endorsed extension of the Voting Rights Act, called for reduction in interest rates and a more equitable tax program, and opposed any further attempts by the Administration to tamper with the social security system.

Jobless Periods Hit 21.4 Million Persons in 1980

About 21.4 million workers 16 years and older were unemployed at some time during 1980, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported. This is nearly 3 million more than 1979 and is the largest annual increase since 1974.

Persons who encountered some unemployment in 1980 represented 18.1 percent of all persons 16 years and older who worked or looked for work during the year. This proportion was significantly higher than the 15.8 percent in 1979 but still below the 20.2 percent recorded in 1975.

Of the 21.4 million affected workers, 18.8 million held at least one job during the year, while the remaining 2.6 million never worked although they made efforts to find work.

Among the workers with some unemployment, the proportion with two or more spells of joblessness was the same in both years—32 percent. However, the length of total unemployment did increase in 1980. In 1979, 33 percent of the unemployed looked for work 15 weeks or more. In 1980, that proportion increased to 41 percent.

Jobless Rate Shoots up to 7.5 Percent

18 and 19 percent, house sales have screeched to a halt and sent the home-building industry into a tailspin.

THE SEPTEMBER rise in the jobless rate marked the second successive increase after three months of decline last summer. From 7 percent in July, the low for the year, the rate jumped to 7.2 percent in August before moving up to 7.5 percent last month.

"It's difficult to recall a quarter of the year in which we've had a rise of half a percentage point in the unemployment rate," said Rep. Henry S. Reuss (D-Wis.), chairman of the Joint Economic Committee. He termed the September figures "very disturbing."

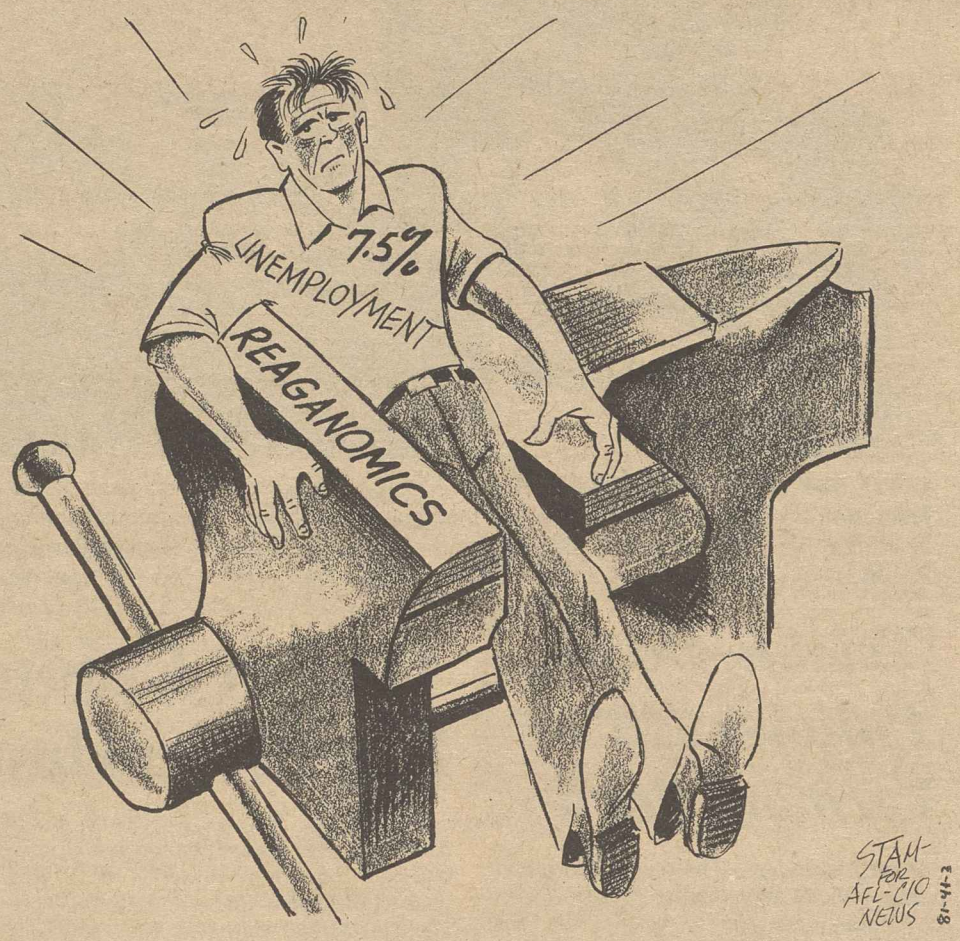
Of special concern to Reuss and other economists is the continuing high rate of unemployment among blacks and other minorities. Their rate taken together inched up over the month to 15.1 percent from a previous record high of 15 percent in August, while the jobless rate for whites rose from 6.1 to 6.5 percent. Last month's 16.3 percent rate for blacks alone compared with 16.2 percent in August.

BLACK JOBLESSNESS has failed to show any improvement over the past year, Commissioner Norwood observed. Even though the jobless rate for black teenagers fell back to 37.5 percent in September after "an abnormally sharp" rise to 45.7 percent the month before, the rate for black teens remains much higher than for any other worker group, she noted.

Joblessness among white teens last month was 17 percent, up 1.4 percentage points from the August level. Overall, teenage unemployment rose five-tenths of 1 percent during the month to 19.3 percent.

Unemployment rates for adult men and women, at 6.2 and 6.8 percent, respectively, rose three-tenths of 1 percent each in September. The jobless rate for full-time workers jumped five-tenths of 1 percent to 7.2 percent while that of Hispanic workers declined four-tenths of 1 percent to 9.3 percent.

The number of nonfarm payroll jobs, at 91.9 million in September, remained about unchanged for the second month in a row. The only major over-the-month movements were a decline of about 150,000 in state and local government employment and an increase of 84,000 in service jobs.



BLS SAID the drop in state and local government employment occurred primarily in local school systems, which hired fewer teachers and other personnel in September than they usually do. In the past year, state and local government jobs have declined by 400,000, a substantial shift from the previous pattern of continuing increases.

The average workweek of nonfarm payroll workers declined by three-tenths of an hour to 34.9 hours in September. In manufacturing, the workweek fell nine-tenths of an hour to 39.1 hours and average factory overtime dropped to 2.6 hours from three. These sharp drops in hours are generally harbingers of future layoffs.

Another Turn of the Screw

Labor Cites Anti-Unionism Of Reagan's NLRB Choice

Anyone who doesn't accept the central thrust of basic national labor policy—that the right of workers to form and join unions is proper and contributes to industrial peace and justice—ought not to head the agency charged with administering that policy, the AFL-CIO said in pressing its opposition to President Reagan's nomination of John R. Van de Water as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board.

Expanding on his earlier testimony against the Van de Water nomination, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a letter to Sen. Orrin G. Hatch, chairman of the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee:

"WE OPPOSE Mr. Van de Water to be NLRB chairman because his management consultant activities, as we understand them, show him to be an active anti-union partisan, opposed to the exercise by employees of their right to choose union representation, and opposed to people's efforts to gain access to collective bargaining.

"We do not believe that union organizers or management opposers of organization should serve on the NLRB."

Donahue submitted materials with his letter showing that the 64-year-old California attorney has "demonstrated an anti-union animus" through much of his career.

In an article titled "How to Deal with the Union," published in the early 1970s, Van de Water repeatedly "stresses that union organization is an evil which management should fight and that where organization has already occurred it can and should be undone," Donahue observed.

Donahue also submitted a list compiled by the AFL-CIO's Los Angeles-Orange County Organizing Committee for 1964-72 showing that the nominee's management consulting firm, Van de Water Associates, served in at least 18 campaigns to defeat efforts of workers to organize unions.

IN "HOW TO DEAL with the Union," which constituted excerpts Van de Water had given at a seminar, the Californian admitted that he had been personally involved in 130 employer campaigns to block organizing efforts, and boasted that unions lost the election in 125 of those.

In one of those cases, Van de Water described how he defeated an organizing campaign at Disneyland by calling the Teamsters and asking them to get on the ballot.

"They went in and had a fight trying to organize their people—who happened to be the office workers—and the office workers union that started the picketing was there," Van de Water said. "We got both of them involved in this particular campaign, had an election held, and the vote was only 17 percent of Disney employees for the two unions combined."

IN THE SAME article, Van de Water describes how he guided a division of General Dynamics to declare an impasse in bargaining, put in a wage increase unilaterally, bring the 4,500 workers together in groups of 35 for captive audience meetings and win a decertification vote in a relatively short time.

The key to the victory, Van de Water wrote, was the patriotic message of the captive audience meetings. "This union is building a class war with its attacks on management. We build Atlas missiles to protect our nation against the nations that represent the class war ideology abroad. And here we have class war fomented right here." With that completed, Van de Water reported, the workers voted 70 percent for decertification.

Donahue urged the committee to look into those cases to determine whether Van de Water was engaged in "persuader activities." Advising employers during a campaign would be a persuader activity, and would have to be reported under the Landrum-Griffin Act.

PATCO Aid Fund Passes Half-Million

The AFL-CIO fund to help striking members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization and their families meet severe financial problems pushed past the half-million-dollar mark as contributions from unions and individuals poured in from all over the country.

As of Oct. 6, the PATCO Family Fund had received $521,968, said Director Walter G. Davis of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services, which oversees disbursement of the funds. Msgr. George G. Higgins of Catholic University is trustee of the fund, which was created in August following the mass firing of PATCO members by the Reagan Administration.

"WE HAVEN'T turned anybody down," Davis said. So far, more than 300 claims have been approved and checks totaling over $150,000 mailed out. Hundreds of other applications for aid are being handled by the department's staff.

Davis said requests for assistance of one kind or another have been averaging about 100 a day. Because of the heavy response, amounts of assistance have been limited to $450 per family.

In a letter to AFL-CIO unions and their members, PATCO President Robert E. Poli thanked all for their help, and said: "You have given us the added strength to withstand the oppressive actions and policies laid down by the Reagan Administration. We will never forget your support, and with your continued assistance we will win."

RECENT LARGE contributors to the fund include the Machinists, $28,000; New York Local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, $25,000; Newspaper Guild, $25,000; Minnesota AFL-CIO, $14,000; Washington State AFL-CIO, $7,500; Farm Workers, $5,000, and the Railway Signalmen, $2,500.

Earlier, contributions of $100,000 each were made by the Steelworkers, Communications Workers, and the Auto Workers.

By and large, however, average donations have been smaller and, as Davis pointed out, none is too small. One check for $2 that came in last month was particularly poignant. "I'm an unemployed student," wrote Julie Cuellar of El Toro, Calif. "Sorry that all I can afford is $2. I'm with you all the way."

In determining eligibility for aid, consideration is given to the need for funds to avoid home foreclosure or eviction, and for medical emergencies, clothing, fuel and food.

Checks for the fund should be made payable to the PATCO Family Fund and mailed to AFL-CIO national headquarters, 815-16th St. NW, Washington, D.C. 20006.

Air Controllers Say Thanks For Moral, Financial Aid

The following letter is addressed to AFL-CIO unions and their members:

Dear Brothers and Sisters:

On behalf of the striking controllers in this country, I wish to extend our deepest gratitude for the support (both moral and financial) received from AFL-CIO unions and their members.

Every member of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization has been touched in some way by the unity and generosity of the AFL-CIO—whether it be picketing, letters to the editors of major newspapers, newspaper adverisements educating the public as to what our goals are, or financial donations to assist our members and their families. Solidarity is the theme of the labor movement in this country, and you have proven that this is not just a mere word—it is a feeling of brotherhood that comes from the heart.

You have given us the added strength to withstand the oppressive actions and policies laid down by the Reagan Administration.

We will never forget your support, and with your continued assistance we will win.

Fraternally,
Robert E. Poli, President
Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization

Social Security Floor Restored

BANNER OF SOLIDARITY, Poland's free trade-union federation, was brought back from Gdansk by Msgr. George G. Higgins as a gift to the federation. Higgins attended Solidarity's first national congress there last month. He gave a report of his trip to AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. The flag bears the signature of Solidarity leader Lech Walesa. The Polish government denied Kirkland a visa to attend the conference.

Senate Bill Trades Off Other Cuts

The Senate passed up a chance to approve full restoration of the minimum social security benefit and adopted instead its own plan for a partial restoration of the pension floor financed by benefit cutbacks in other areas.

Substituting a bill drawn up by its Finance Committee for the full restoration bill adopted overwhelmingly by the House, the Senate voted unanimously to revive the $122 minimum monthly retirement benefit for most present recipients—but not for workers living overseas or receiving more than $300 a month in a government pension.

THESE PLUS other cutbacks would mean that for the first time many currently retired persons would actually have their social security benefits reduced. And no future retirees would be eligible for the minimum benefit under the Senate plan.

The vote on the measure was 95 to 0.

Earlier the Senate had rejected, 65 to 30, a labor-supported amendment that would have cut $14.2 billion from tax breaks voted for the oil industry last summer, using the funds instead to strengthen the social security system. In urging support for the amendment, introduced by Sen. Thomas Eagleton (D-Mo.), AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison said the fund reserve would guarantee stability for the program "and peace of mind" for workers and retirees.

THE MINIMUM benefit is designed to give an income base to retired persons whose past earnings in covered employment were not enough to make them eligible for a benefit of more than $122 a month. It was a major target in the Reagan Administration's budget-balancing drive earlier this year and was eliminated in the budget reconciliation bill that swept through Congress.

Before the final action on the budget measure, however, the House had second thoughts and voted 404 to 20 for separate legislation to restore the minimum benefit.

In the face of a growing public uproar over the attack on the social security program by the Administration and its conservative Republican supporters in Congress, President Reagan later retreated from his stand favoring elimination of the benefit floor and enactment of sharp reductions in other promised benefits.

INSTEAD, the President announced he would go along with inter-fund borrowing to resolve short-term problems of the social security trust funds and proposed creation of a 15-member task force to come up with a permanent solution to the system's funding needs.

The Senate bill includes provisions for

Renews Call for National Board

Kirkland Presses Plan To Revitalize Industry

The AFL-CIO called for a "new partnership" with business and government to revitalize the nation's economy through a program of reindustrialization of the country's ailing industries and decaying communities.

In remarks prepared for a conference on setting national priorities, Federation President Lane Kirkland renewed labor's proposal for creation of a tripartite National Reindustrialization Board that "would take into account more than just short-term profits for a corporation; rather it would be attuned to the long-term development and welfare of the nation."

KIRKLAND WARNED that "the obsession of business with short-term goals needs to be balanced by a longer term perspective of the needs and aspirations of the American people." President Reagan's economic policies are wrong, he declared, because they are steeped in 18th and 19th Century theoretical models that are inappropriate today.

"And we think America—both Wall Street and Main Street—is beginning to wake up to that fact," he said. Kirkland's remarks were read at the George Washington University-sponsored conference by Director Rudy A. Oswald of the Dept. of Economic Research. Kirkland was unable to attend because of a prior commitment.

Also participating in the conference from labor were Assistant Research Director Arnold Cantor, Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman of the Clothing & Textile Workers, and former Auto Workers general counsel Stephen Schlossberg.

AS WELL AS the resuscitation of sick industries and dying inner cities, the reindustrialization board proposed by Kirkland would seek to develop new industries with promise for the future.

The board would encourage economic growth, greater productivity, the spread of research and development findings and a balanced use of national resources, and would target industrial sectors and regions that need the most help. It would also direct the activities of a financing agency, similar to the Reconstruction Finance Corp. of the 1930s and 1940s, which would guarantee loans for approved reindustrialization projects.

"Instead of using industrial development bonds to support more McDonald's and K Marts—currently the biggest recipients of industrial development bonds financing—the RFC would be concerned with the industrial base of the country," Kirkland said. "That industrial base is threatened today by both domestic monetary policies as well as unfair foreign trade policies."

PRIVATE PENSION funds would be encouraged to underwrite the agency's financing arrangements as a way of supporting and expanding industrial employment in the United States, Kirkland said.

House Rejects Reagan Bid on AWACS Sale

The House overwhelmingly turned down President Reagan's proposed sale of sophisticated radar planes and other aircraft equipment to Saudi Arabia, setting the stage for a Senate showdown on the $8.5 billion arms package.

By a vote of 301 to 111, the Democratic-controlled House disapproved an Administration plan to sell the Saudis five Airborne Warning and Control System (AWACS) planes as well as equipment and missiles to enhance the performance of F-15 aircraft that the United States agreed to sell to Saudi Arabia three years ago.

THE DEFEAT was the biggest rebuff President Reagan has yet received from members of his own party. Despite Reagan's argument that the deal is crucial to the success of his Middle East policy, 108 Republicans voted for the disapproval resolution.

Meanwhile, members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee voted 9 to 8 against the arms sale, reflecting the uncertainty over the proposal in the full Senate.

Strongly opposed to the AWACS sale, the AFL-CIO and other groups charged that it would be dangerous to sell such sophisticated radar planes to a potentially unstable regime. The aircraft could be used to coordinate F-15s in an attack against Israel, and might fall into the hands of U.S. enemies, they pointed out.

Lifting of Homework Ban Assailed

The Reagan Administration's action lifting a 40-year ban on homework in the knitted outerwear industry "reopens the door to exploitation of wages, hours and working conditions," the AFL-CIO warned.

Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan ordered an end to the homework restriction in knitted outerwear, effective Nov. 9, despite strong opposition from unions, employers and trade associations encompassing seven industries that the Labor Dept. sought to exclude.

WHILE ACKNOWLEDGING that comments ran almost 4 to 1 against lifting homework restrictions from among the several thousand the Labor Dept. received, Donovan contended that few comments addressed the knitted outerwear industry.

He said the industrial homework restrictions will be retained in six other industries: women's apparel, jewelry, gloves and mittens, buttons and buckles, handkerchiefs and embroideries.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said the federation remains opposed to lifting homework restrictions in any industry.

Donovan's order "renews the danger for the same child labor abuses which existed so extensively prior to the ban on homework imposed under the Fair Labor Standards Act," Oswald said.

He pointed out that lifting of the homework bans has been opposed by both management and labor and by five former secretaries of labor.

"Since these regulations on industrial homework have been given the force of law by congressional action, we question whether the Secretary of Labor even has the authority to make retrogressive changes," Oswald stressed.

President Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers expressed concern that the deregulation would deeply affect traditionally exploited workers.

"Donovan's action turns American industry's calendar back to the darkest days of industrial exploitation," Chaikin declared.

"BY TAKING advantage of the most deprived members of our society—undocumented aliens, the poor and the unprotected—unscrupulous employers will deprive thousands of American workers, both organized and unorganized, of decent jobs and decent conditions of employment," he warned, adding that "they will cheat the government out of millions of dollars in revenues."

Chaikin noted that past experience shows there is no way of policing indus-

Labor Mobilizes Forces for ERA Ratification

The AFL-CIO and its state and local labor bodies are mobilized to press for final ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment, federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the National Organization for Women.

The federation will cooperate with NOW in testimony, lobbying and other action in support of ERA by the June 30, 1982 ratification deadline, Donahue pledged at NOW's annual issues conference in Washington.

HE POINTED OUT that throughout history the trade union movement has been a means for women workers to improve their working conditions and to "redirect the course of society."

ERA is "in harmony" with the principles of individual human dignity on which the labor movement is founded, and it "demands action," Donhaue stressed.

Thrity-five states, representing about 72 percent of the population, have ratified the amendment since it passed Congress in 1972. Three more state legislatures must vote in favor of the amendment before the deadline for it to become part of the U.S. Constitution.

The first duty of the trade union movement has been to represent the interests of its members throughout collective bargaining, Donahue told the delegates, pointing out that "the pragmatic process of barganiing and representation" is founded on high ideals of human dignity and justice.

"We believe that as the trade union movement has fought to improve the wages, working conditions and indeed the standard of living of our members, every American has benefitted," he said.

All of society, Donahue asserted, has gained as all those concerned with the human rights movement "have worked to bring this country closer in reality to the rich dreams on which it was founded."

SOLIDARITY DAY helped to dispel the idea that Americans want to reverse that progress, Donahue said. The Solidarity Day demonstrators "came straight out of the shops, the offices, the factories and backyards of America," he pointed out, adding: "They were the average mainstream working people the Reagan Administration has been boasting made up its 'mandate' for dismantling 50 years of social progress."

On Sept. 19, Donahue declared, "the mandate paid a call on Washington, but they were not marching to the Administration's drummer. They were calling out 'ERA, Yes'; 'Social Security, Yes'; 'Affirmative Action, Yes'; and they were saying 'no' to budget cuts that will stop progress in its tracks."

The demonstration provided "a lift of the spirits and sense of community" to the labor movement, the women's movement and their allies, Donahue said, and it strengthened the "long-standing and time-tested" human rights coalition.

DIFFERENCES of opinion and interest within that coalition, he said, are "healthy and normal because we are so secure in our beliefs, so bound by our common goals" and "linked by an overriding belief in equality and justice."

Donahue emphasized the labor movement's long history of concern for women workers, pointing out that within a year of its founding the organization which became the American Federation of Labor had acted to guarantee the equal status of women trade unionists and by 1883 had called for equal pay for equal work by men and women workers.

The interests of women workers have been important to the trade union movement, Donhaue said, "first of all because they are the concerns of workers, but also because women have been singled out for special exploitation."

HE CHARGED that the same "noisy minority" that opposes ratification of ERA "also applauds the Reagan Administration's program of dismantling safety and health programs for workers, of choking off funding for training and employment programs, stripping wage and hour protections, and squeezing the social security systems which ought to be adjusted instead in the direction of increasing its protections and removing its inadequacies and inequities, particularly as they affect women."

The Administration's promise to "unburden" employers from the "paperwork" of affirmative action is "clearly a signal to employers that they need not worry about affirmative action." Management will find it more "cost-effective," Donhaue predicted, to use the excuse that no qualified women are available for jobs rather than spend the time and money to train women or place them in jobs that lead to promotion.

ADMIRAL OF THE OCEAN SEA award, presented posthumously to Seafarers President Paul Hall, is accepted by his widow, Rose, and his successor as president of the union, Frank Drozak, at a New York dinner. AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, who spoke at the dinner, praised Hall for his lifetime work in organizing maritime labor. The award, given annually by the United Seamen's Service, honors individuals in the maritime industry or government for contributions to the American merchant marine.

Donahue Affirms Labor Stand For Strong Merchant Marine

New York—The AFL-CIO will lend its full support to the fight to give the nation a strong merchant marine, "and we are going to throw heart, mind, and hand into the fight in the spirit of Paul Hall." Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue pledged at an award ceremony honoring the late Seafarers president.

Hall gave a large share of his life to saving and restoring the merchant marine, "which he knew to be absolutely essential to the health and safety of the nation," Donahue said. Now, the American labor movement must do its best to prevent further deterioration of the industry, he declared.

"FOR TOO MANY years, we have watched that industry falling to pieces. We have seen too many American shippers and shipowners turning their backs on America, building ships in foreign yards, manning them with foreign crews, running up foreign flags in order to escape American wages, prices, and taxes and American working conditions, safety regulations, and training standards," Donahue said.

"We find ourselves in a dangerous state of almost total dependence on the resources of other countries because of a total lack of a positive, unified national maritime policy," he added. "No other major trading nation has been so foolish.

"Other countries make no apology for defending their industries and their economies from assault and destruction from economic piracy. Ours provides no such defense."

DONAHUE SPOKE at a dinner at which Hall was given the first posthumous Admiral of the Ocean Sea Award by the United Seamen's Service in recognition of his contributions to the maritime industry. Hall, an AFL-CIO vice president and president of the Maritime Trades Dept., died last year.

In his address, Donahue observed that the booming market for American coal that has been developing since the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries began inflating oil prices has given the United States "a golden opportunity to begin a little remedial action" toward revializing the U.S. merchant marine.

The various port development programs that are finally getting started should include guarantees that U.S.-flag ships will handle "a decent percentage" of the new business that is generated, he said, and the labor movement is pressing hard toward that end. At the same time, organized labor will fight to prevent a sellout of Alaskan oil and the jobs that depend on it, Donahue declared.

Car Dealer Rebates Slow Rise In Prices at Wholesale Level

Inflation at the wholesale level slowed in September as producer prices for finished goods rose only two-tenths of 1 percent, the smallest monthly increase in more than three years.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics attributed the slowdown largely to stable food prices, moderate increases in energy prices, and a once-a-year dealer discount for new cars.

THE DISCOUNT, or "liquidation allowance," that domestic automakers gave their dealers to close out the 1981 model year had the heaviest influence on the September price figure. Without the rebates, the government's producer price index for finished goods would have risen seven-tenths of 1 percent, BLS said.

Last month's increase was the smallest rise since August 1978, when wholesale prices edged up just one-tenth of 1 percent. The September increase followed rises of three-tenths of 1 prcent in August and four-tenths of 1 percent in July.

The September index was 7.8 percent higher than the year-earlier level, which itself was 13.1 percent above the level 12 months earlier.

Many economists believe that October producer prices will climb higher than in September. Agriculture Dept. experts predict substantial price increases for food the rest of the year, especially for meat, and automakers will be introducing higher-priced 1982 models over the month.

Among finished goods, consumer food prices at the wholesale level were unchanged in September, following a two-tenths of 1 percent increase in August. Finished consumer foods include unprocessed foods such as eggs and fresh vegetables, as well as processed foods such as bakery products and meats.

PRICES FOR processed poultry fell 8.2 percent last month following a sharp August increase, and pork prices turned down after no change the month before. On the other hand, prices for beef and veal increased 3.3 percent following a decrease in August.

BLS said natural gas prices rose considerably more last month than in August and gasoline prices continued to fall, but at a smaller rate than in the previous four months.

Heating oil prices edged down one-tenth of 1 percent.

Stamp Club Offers Solidarity Day Cachet

To commemorate Solidarity Day, the Samuel Gompers Stamp Club issued a special cachet, or souvenir envelope, on Sept. 19. The cover honors the 400,000 Americans from all walks of life who gathered on the National Mall to protest the Reagan Administration cuts in social programs.

A limited number of covers may still be obtained by writing the Samuel Gompers Stamp Club, P.O. Box 1233, Springfield, Va. 22151, and enclosing 50 cents for each or $1.25 for three. A self-addressed envelope should accompany each order.

Dock Union Wins Cargo Container Ruling at 3 Ports

The Longshoremen won a limited victory in their legal fight to implement rules giving the union job protection rights in the handling of van-sized containers.

Administrative Law Judge Joel Harmatz of the National Labor Relations Board found that the rules, which were negotiated in 1973 with maritime employers, were a lawful response to "reduced job opportunities" brought on by containerization.

The rules apply to ports from Maine to Texas and require that much of the handling of cargo containers must be done by ILA members, including their packing and unpacking. The rules apply to 50-mile zones around the ports.

The rules have been contested over the years by shippers and truckers and, except for a six-week period earlier this year, they have never been put into effect.

The rules currently are enjoined by a federal appeals court in Philadelphia. The Supreme Court, on an appeal of the injunction by the union, refused to review the federal court order. The injunction is likely to remain in effect until the NLRB issues a final decision on whether the rules are legal.

In his finding, Harmatz recommended dismissal of charges that the rules had been illegally applied in ports in New York, Philadelphia, and Jacksonville, Fla., but said that the ILA had unfairly sought to apply them in Baltimore, Hampton Roads, Va., and Miami.

URW Elects Milan Stone To Succeed Bommarito

Bal Harbour, Fla.—Milan Stone, who has held the second-ranking office with the Rubber Workers since 1977, was decisively elected president of the URW to succeed Peter Bommarito at the union's 31st convention.

Bommarito, an AFL-CIO vice president, declined to run for a new three-year term. He has headed the 150,000-member URW for the past 15 years.

THE 850 CONVENTION delegates also unanimously elected URW District 2 Director Joseph H. Johnston to the vice presidency vacated by Stone, re-elected Sec.-Treas. Donald C. Tucker by acclamation and elected 15 executive board members—all on Stone's slate. Stone defeated Glenn Ellison, a URW district director, by a vote of 1,058 to 287.

The convention approved a constitutional amendment authorizing the call for a special merger convention upon a two-thirds vote of the executive board.

The URW has been exploring a merger proposal with the Auto Workers, and Stone, head of the Merger Committee, had described the discussions as "friendly and fruitful." But he ruled out the possibility of the two unions reaching a merger agreement before URW contracts with major U.S. rubber firms expire next Apr. 20.

In his keynote address, Bommarito called on the union's negotiating committee to put a high priority on job security in the 1982 contract talks.

THE TIME has come "to move toward the concept of a guaranteed workweek . . . to insure true job security for our members," Bommarito declared.

Delegates overwhelmingly aproved a resolution commending Bommarito for his leadership and conferred on him the title of president emeritus.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland also praised the retiring URW president for his contributions to the federation's Executive Council and as chairman of the AFL-CIO Community Services Committee.

Kirkland said the demand for services of the nationwide network of union volunteers has never been greater because of the Reagan Administration's dismantling of essential jobs and social programs.

"EVERY CITIZEN will pay a heavy price for the social blindness and indifference of those now in power in Washington," Kirkland warned.

"All of this—along with cutbacks in social security and unemployment benefits and the wholesale abandonment of government regulations that protect the health and pocketbooks of workers and consumers—is undertaken, so we are told, to get government off our backs," he observed.

"The President claims that his program of stuffing the rich and starving the poor has a mandate from the people, won in his campaign," Kirkland said.

"BUT MR. REAGAN did not campaign among senior citizens for cutting social security, among parents for poorer schools, among workers for fewer jobs and less concern for occupational health and safety. He did not campaign among consumers or small businesses for higher and higher interest rates and more and more bankruptcies."

Those were the very issues that brought the massive turnout of Solidarity Day protesters to Washington, Kirkland noted.

In convention action, delegates voted to:

- Retain the union dues structure linking increases to hourly wage boosts.
- Direct all local unions to establish organizing committees.
- Press for the restoration of full trade adjustment benefits to workers laid off by import competition.
- Reinforce the URW's boycott of Michelin tires and intensify organizing efforts at Michelin plants in the United States and Canada.
- Resist Administration attempts to destroy OSHA protections.
- Work for efforts to combat plant shutdowns and to ease the economic impact on affected workers and communities.
- Call on URW locals to support and participate in AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. coordinated bargaining efforts.

STONE, 54, has been a member of the Rubber Workers since 1946 when he joined URW Local 19 in Eau Claire, Wis. He served as vice president of the local and president of the Eau Claire AFL-CIO in the early 1960s. He joined the URW staff as a field representative in 1963 and the following year became the union's time-study engineer.

In 1972, Stone was appointed a special representative of the URW's pension and insurance department and in 1974 became director of URW District 4 based in Rock Island, Ill. He was appointed the union's vice president in 1977 and was elected to a full three-year term the following year.

Convention speakers in addition to Kirkland included Sen. John Glenn (D-Ohio), Sec.-Gen. Charles Levenson of the International Federation of Chemical, Energy & General Workers, President Jacob Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens and President Noriyoshi Matsumoto of the Japanese Rubber Workers.

TWU Convention Launches New Mass Transit Division

San Francisco—The Transport Workers' 16th Convention launched a new Mass Transit Division paralleling the union's existing Railroad and Air Transport Divisions.

With most of TWU's 130,000 members involved in mass transit, the 400 delegates resolved that the new division "would help focus more sharply on the particular problems of the workers in our transit locals and permit quicker and stronger actions to seek solutions."

THE NEW DIVISION will follow the same organizational structure and have the same functions as the air transport and railroad arms, addressing itself "to the formulation and coordination of efforts to meet the needs of our mass transit members on pay, hours, benefits and working conditions."

In other business, TWU President William G. Lindner was re-elected along with Sec.-Treas. Roosevelt Watts and Executive Vice President John E. Lawe, who also serves as president of the union's largest local, Local 100 in New York.

Among the more than 50 resolutions adopted by the convention was an expression of firm support for the Air Traffic Controllers' strike. The union urged its locals to contribute to the special fund to aid the PATCO strikers and their families.

ANOTHER RESOLUTION called for further study by the union's executive council and board of a possible merger with the Amalgamated Transit Union, a concept which both unions had eyed over the last few years.

In viewing the possible merger, TWU pointed out that "consolidations and governmental authority takeovers of present transit systems are threatening the pay rates, benefits and working conditions of our members." It said "the Amalgamated Transit Union has proposed a merger with TWU as the best way to counter the growing threat from an unfriendly national administration and increasing attacks on our wages, benefits and working conditions by managements and their co-conspirators in the media and local governments."

The council merger committee was instructed to report back to the full council within a year.

IN OTHER business, the convention called for reform of New York State's Taylor Law, which mandates heavy union and individual fines for striking public employees.

As a result of Local 100's 11-day New York City transit strike of April 1980, the union has already been hit with $1,250,000 in fines. Individual members who took part in the strike were fined $18 million, and the local learned just this month of an impending 18-month suspension of its dues check-off, a penalty certain to be appealed. In each case the penalties were mandated by the Taylor Law.

In his keynote address, Lindner called for a stepped-up COPE campaign to counter reactionary groups and politicians.

HE PRAISED a new spirit of awakening in labor, telling the delegates:

"Those of you who were down in Washington for Solidarity Day probably got the same feeling that I did. When you looked around and saw the variety of people from all parts of the country, from all economic levels, from all types of unions and many other organizations, there was a grass-roots feeling of comradeship, of unity of purpose and of oneness that tells me that this thing is going to turn around."

Major addresses to the delegates also were given by California Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr.; State AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning, and Rep. Norman Mineta (D-Calif.).

Construction Jobs Victims of Tight Money

High interest rates spurred by federal "tight money" policies threaten to destroy the construction industry, the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. told Congress.

In testimony before the Senate Small Business Committee, Department President Robert Georgine pointed to the steep reductions in residential, industrial and commercial construction and the 16.7-percent rate of unemployment in the industry. Construction workers are "cannon fodder" in the "misguided campaign" to reduce inflation by tightening the supply of money and availability of credit, Georgine said.

THE ECONOMIC effects of the Federal Reserve Board's Administration-supported monetary policies are "socially unacceptable and economically inefficient," he stressed.

Selective credit controls that direct credit to productive purposes are a better solution, Georgine told the committee.

High interest rates themselves fuel inflation, Georgine charged, since they drive up the cost of goods and services.

The high cost of money has choked off housing starts, frozen most buyers out of the housing market, and "devastated" the traditional mortgage lenders, savings and loan associations, Georgine told the committee.

Combined effects of high interest rates and the Reagan Administration's income tax cuts that favor the wealthy have "destroyed the market for state and local bonds," which finance public construction, Georgine said. He pointed out that this squeeze on municipal bond markets comes at a time when the Administration's budget and tax cuts are causing state and local revenues to decline and their borrowing needs to increase.

IN THE SECOND quarter of 1981, the seasonally adjusted volume of new public construction was 15½ percent below its level in 1978, Georgine pointed out.

Interest on the federal debt, which Georgine called the fastest rising segment of the federal budget, is also linked to high rates, he stressed. During the year ending in June 1981, he said, this figure increased by an estimated 32 percent, requiring more federal borrowing "that raises interest rates even higher."

A better solution to inflation, Georgine suggested, would be selective credit controls of the type advocated by the AFL-CIO.

The joint Reagan Administration/Federal Reserve policy of slowing down the money supply must be abandoned, he stressed.

"WE SHOULD turn away from the disastrous reliance on tight money to fight inflation," he said, "because tight money results in rationing credit through high interest rates, thereby often favoring nonproductive uses of credit."

Instead, Georgine said, selective credit controls should be used to channel credit to productive purposes such as home mortgages, new residential, industrial, state and local bonds.

EXPERIENCE with credit controls in the United States and abroad have shown them to be a "viable alternative" for slowing down the money supply, Georgine said.

Authority for flexible controls is provided under the Credit Control Act of 1969, Georgine pointed out. He urged that these measures be used now to bring down interest rates and made permanent before they expire in June 1982.

P. J. Ciampa Dies at 61, AFSCME Area Official

Baltimore—Panfilo J. Ciampa, area director of the State, County & Municipal Employees and a former official of the Auto Workers, died of cancer at Franklin Square Hospital here Sept. 21. He was 61.

Ciampa had been a UAW regional director for the southeastern states and served on the union's executive board from 1953 to 1955 before he joined AFSCME in 1964. He also served as director of field services and took part in the 1968 sanitation workers strike in Memphis, during which Martin Luther King, Jr., was assassinated.

Speak Out for the ERA

ECONOMIC JUSTICE, pure and simple, is the real issue in the debate over the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment.

This constitutional guarantee is needed to establish once and for all—without danger of repeal—a national policy that will lead to an end to discrimination because of sex.

Its passage would be the best assurance that all citizens, men and women alike, will have fair, equal and reasonable opportunities in employment, education, benefits and retirement plans, insurance, credit, and financial matters in marriage and divorce.

OPPONENTS OF the Equal Rights Amendment have mastered the old divide-and-conquer strategy. They seek to distract attention from the real purpose of ERA by manufacturing a set of ludicrous, emotional issues which in most cases have nothing at all to do with equal rights or the ERA.

The fact is, women are America's cheap labor pool, and the opponents of ERA want to make sure things stay that way.

Women today, even in professions, are paid about half of what man are paid in similar jobs. Most women workers are stuck in the lowest paying, least promotable jobs.

It is no accident that the same people who oppose the Equal Rights Amendment favor of the dismantling of OSHA protections. They favor a youth subminimum wage and the gutting of most other fair labor standards that govern decent wages and conditions. They want to see the Davis-Bacon Act and the Service Contract Act weakened or repealed. They support any measure to lower wages, or keep them low.

ERA will help change that for women. And that is what the opposition to ERA fears most.

IT IS NO accident, either that nearly all the states that have not ratified the Equal Rights Amendment are also "right-to-work" states that outlaw union shop agreements. That alone should be a clue to the real motives of ERA's opponents.

The argument that state or federal laws are good enough to "protect" women ignores reality. All such laws can be repealed or thwarted by administrative action. In the past, many such laws have been thin disguises for actually excluding women and minorities from jobs rather than "protecting" them.

In the past twenty years, the number of working women, has risen to the point that more than half of all women now work outside the home, and they make up almost half the U.S. workforce.

They work for one simple reason: they need the money to provide a decent life for their families.

More and more women are joining unions because they realize that the union contract is a vital tool for achieving equality through improved wages, better jobs, equal benefits and the almost priceless guarantee of a fair grievance procedure on the job.

The union contract should be backed up by the strength of the Equal Rights Amendment as the law of the land.

THIRTY-FIVE states have ratified the amendment, and by June 30, 1982, three more states must pass it for the ERA to become part of the Constitution.

The labor movement and its Coalition of Labor Union Women have joined the National Organization for Women and other allies in this all-out campaign for ratification. We will speak out for the Equal Rights Amendment, and more, we will fight for it.

Simplistic Notion

U.S. Economic History Refutes Arguments for Gold Standard

By Gus Tyler

A RETURN TO THE gold standard is the latest conversation piece in Washington. They're talking about stabilizing prices. Putting an end to inflation—once and for all. If a dollar is redeemable for such and such an amount of gold, we know what the true worth of the buck is, and that will stop depreciation of our money.

The notion is so simple that it is almost irresistible — as it will be to simpletons who know nothing about the century we spent living with the gold standard. During those years, prices rose and prices fell repeatedly. The rises were staggering and the drops were murderous. But, good or bad, the cost of living shot up and down, despite the gold standard.

1815 IS A GOOD date to start tracing the fluctuation of prices in the United States, since it was a time of peak inflation, brought on partly by our own War of 1812 and by the Napoleonic wars in Europe. From 1815 to 1843, wholesale prices dropped by almost 60 percent. But that "deflation" did not last too long.

Between 1843 and 1864 (end of Civil War) prices leaped upward by 157 percent—in spite of the gold standard. The war itself was the biggest reason for the jump.

In the next ten years prices fell again in the United States. But in Europe, which was on a metallic standard of gold and silver, prices continued to rise by 60 percent between 1843 and 1873.

AFTER THAT TIME, as the western world moved away from silver exclusively into gold, prices began to fall again up to 1896. But then the price level rose by 233 percent from 1896 to 1920 —again getting its chief impetus from the First World War.

What is evident from these few facts is that gold standards are no guarantee against inflation or deflation. Your dollar may be as good as gold, but the goodness of gold varies from time to time.

What is also clear is that the price rises are most startling in wartime because of the great drain on resources that do not go to fill consumer needs. What holds for war times is equally valid obviously for periods of heavy armament—and for the same reason: use of resources that do not go to meet consumer needs.

These morsels of monetary history are but a few of the facts that are contained in an illuminating article by Edward M. Bernstein, a monetary expert of international renown, who is currently a guest scholar at the Brookings Institution. In his piece, appearing in the Brookings Bulletin, he notes that in the 100 years from 1815 to 1914 there were 12 crises and panics in the United States and seven in England.

"THE PANICS were extreme crises, usually accompanied by numerous bankruptcies," Bernstein says. "In England, the crises were due to the rigidity of the Bank Charter Act of 1844. . . . In the United States the national banking system provided no flexibility at all in the issue of currency, and that was the cause of the recurrent crises."

In the table listing the exact dates of each of these crisis or panics between 1815 and 1914, Bernstein attaches a small footnote: "Does not include fourteen recessions in the United States and nine in the United Kingdom that are not classified as crises or panics."

Opening the Lid For Exploitation

Mr. Donovan's action (lifting the ban on industrial homework on knitted outerwear) turns American industry's calendar back to the darkest days of industrial exploitation.

By taking advantage of the most deprived members of our society—undocumented aliens, the poor and the unprotected—unscrupulous employers will deprive thousands of American workers, both organized and unorganized, of decent jobs and decent conditions of employment, and they will cheat government out of millions of dollars in revenues.

With one rash stroke, the Labor Dept. has removed one of the major areas of protection that took American workers and employers more than 100 years to build.

The Labor Dept. simply does not have the right to remove restrictions that were imposed by an act of Congress.

—President Sol Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

Tripartite Role

'New Partnership' Holds Key To Revival of Industrial Base

The following is from remarks by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland to a conference on national priorities, Oct. 13, 1981.

ONE OF THE KEYS to attaining full employment and solving some of the nation's economic problems is to reindustrialize America. That can best be achieved through a new partnership between government, management and labor.

To that end, the AFL-CIO proposes the creation of a tripartite National Reindustrialization Board—including representatives of labor, business and government — which would develop a balanced program to insure the revitalization of the nation's sick industries and decaying communities, while at the same time encourage the development of new industries with promise for the future. The board would encourage productivity growth, dissemination of research and development finding, and a balanced use of the nation's resources. It would target industrial sectors and regions that particularly need help.

This board would also direct the activities of a financing agency, patterned after the Reconstruction Finance Corp. of the 1930s and 1940s, which would be authorized to make and guarantee loans to finance approved reindustrialization ventures.

INSTEAD OF using industrial development bonds to support more McDonald's and K Marts —currently the biggest recipients of industrial development bonds financing—the RFC would be concerned with the industrial base of the country. That industrial base is threatened today by both domestic monetary policies as well as unfair foreign trade policies.

Private pension funds could be encouraged to make investments in such financing arrangements to support and expand industrial employment in the United States. National policies that encourage investment abroad rather than in the United States undermine domestic employment opportunities.

A common thread that runs through the economics of countries that have grown faster than ours is their adoption of a coordinated industrial policy that systematically includes the views of labor, industry and the public.

The Reindustrialization Board would take into account more than just short-term profits for a corporation—but rather would be attuned to the long-term development and welfare of the nation.

THE BOARD would bring together all of the elements in economic society. It would insure that the interests of capital, of labor, and of the people are all made an integral part of the economic decision-making process.

We believe that credit allocation is preferable to destroying the housing industry, while funds are siphoned off for corporate merger activities and speculative investments, and margin purchases. We believe that the Administration and the Federal Reserve Board should use their authority under the Credit Control Act to direct the allocation of credit. Instead of finding $7 billion of funds overnight to underwrite a Conoco oil merger, the credit sources should be targeted to developing new productive facilities, and rescuing the crippled housing and auto industries. The United States should learn from foreign experience with credit allocations.

IT IS TIME for the United States to formulate a national industrial policy and abandon the irrational attachment to policies that threaten to bring about the wholesale condemnation of entire industries and regions. We reject the Administration's attempt to cast government as the whipping boy—government spending, government deficits, government taxes, government borrowing, government employees, etc.

They are not the cause of every problem that can be identified as the Administration would have us believe. The solution to America's problems is not to hamstring the federal government by cutting its programs and its sources of income and weakening or undermining its laws, regulations, and standards used to protect health, safety, civil rights and the environment.

We are unwilling to accept a return to the burned-out America of the 1930s, when the willy-nilly movement of investment capital left the farm mortgage foreclosed, the top soil eroded and no hope of revival because no one had the purchasing power to lift an economy or reopen a bank. We believe that government must enter into a new partnership with business and labor to revitalize the nation's economy.

We insist that, to succeed, any plan for economic recovery must be fair and equitable. But the Administration's cuts in social programs will have a disproportionately large and negative impact on unemployed workers, on the poor, on the needy, at the very time that its tax cuts will have a large and beneficial effect on the rich, the affluent, and highly profitable businesses.

ADD TO THIS a deregulation policy that weakens the impact of laws protecting the consumer, the environment, and the health and safety of workers—and it is clear that the Administration's proposals do not meet the test of equity.

We in the AFL-CIO have studied carefully all that has been unveiled since Inauguration Day 1981, and have found Reaganomics lacking in comparison to our national economic, social and international goals. We reject the idea that there is anything resembling a "new beginning" in the revival of the hoary old trickle-down economics in the guise of "supply-side."

But more important, we reject the policies themselves, simply because they will not work. And we think America—both Wall Street and Main Street—is beginning to wake up to that fact.

Rule Changes Skirt Congress, Undermine Worker Protections

THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION'S attack on worker protections shaped by Congress has grown to alarming proportions through regulation changes that draw less public attention than direct legislative proposals, Machinists Legislative Rep. Dorothy Ellsworth charged in a network radio interview.

Ellsworth cited quiet moves in the Labor Dept. that skirts the intent of the Service Contract Act without giving Congress a chance to assess changes that will adversely affect tens of thousands of workers. She said such administrative steps are "undermining and weakening the collective bargaining" that Congress clearly intended to safeguard when it approved the act 15 years ago. The act establishes standards for prevailing wages and working conditions of workers employed by firms holding service contracts with the government.

Questioned by reporters on Labor News Conference, Ellsworth predicted that House hearings on the Service Contract Act later this month will show a pattern of regulation changes that have had "tragic effects on both union and non-union workers."

She said the impact of the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day protest against the Administration's budget and tax policies is already beginning to show up on Capitol Hill. Members of Congress who earlier in the year questioned rank-and-file opposition to Reaganomics "now know that union members are aware, that they are concerned and that they are going to fight," she said.

THE MOMENTUM of Solidarity Day, Ellsworth said, is also seen at the local grass-roots level, and this is bound to increase as the harsh effects of the new budget, which took effect Oct. 1, "filter down to the state and local levels" and make it increasingly clear that the Administration is "cutting very close to the bone."

By Press Associates, Inc.

THE REAGAN ADMINISTRATION has put the low-income and poor families of America on a very strict diet.

Beginning in October, nearly one million people will be dropped from the food stamp rolls, as ordered in the omnibus budget reconciliation bill passed by Congress in July. These people lost their benefits because the legislation raised the income eligibility limit for the program.

Persons with income over 130 percent of the poverty level are no longer eligible for food stamp benefits. The only exceptions made or special circumstances recognized were for elderly and disabled people living on social security or Supplemental Security Income (SSI).

The cut-off for a typical family of four is now $916 a month or less in earned income to be eligible for stamps. The previous cutoff was $705 per month.

MANY OF THE more than 21 million still getting benefits will see them reduced. Families with earned income will lose 2 percent in deductions allowable in calculating benefits.

Also, despite rising food costs, the new food stamp law will not increase benefits as often to keep pace with inflation, so food stamp dollars will buy less food in the years ahead. According to estimates, benefits will lag two years behind actual grocery store prices.

The Food Research & Action Center, a public interest group, developed some hypothetical examples to show how the food stamp changes might affect individuals. FRAC used data gathered from federal agencies, such as the Social Security Administration and Agriculture Dept., and detailed analyses of the food stamp law changes to develop the profiles.

Here is what some of them show:

- The Smiths are an elderly couple whose only source of income is $397 a month in SSI benefits. Before the law change, they would have been eligible for $84 in food stamps every month. Now they will receive $70 per month.

- Frank earns the minimum wage of $3.35 an hour and supports three dependents. His housing costs are about $150 per month, with other expenses average. Frank now will be eligible for only $151 in food stamps each month, instead of the $201 allowed under the previous law.

- George earns $5.25 an hour and has three dependents. His wife needed surgery and developed a handicap that requires special care and adds extra expenses. Because of the law change, George's special circumstances no longer will be recognized. He will be eligible for only $64 per month in food stamps, instead of $104 per month under previous law.

ANOTHER GROUP that will feel the pinch of the new rules is strikers and their families. They are now ineligible.

Previously, if a striker met all the program's eligibility rules, that is, had little or no supplemental income and few assets, he could receive food stamps on the basis of need. Strikers accounted for only some 28,000 households out of eight million receiving food stamp benefits in 1980.

The aim of cutting the food stamp program, as in other budget cuts, was to reduce overall federal spending—part of Reagan's "economic recovery program."

But, despite tightening of the food stamp program, it is still expected to cost more than the Administration anticipated because unemployment is rising and more people will become eligible for benefits.

Also, since the law changes primarily hurt the working poor, there may be some incentive for those earning a marginal living to quit work, go on welfare and collect full food stamp benefits.

WORKER PROTECTIONS are being undercut by Labor Dept. regulation changes that disregard congressional intent of the Service Contract Act, Machinists Legislative Rep. Dorothy Ellsworth charged on Labor News Conference. She was questioned by Calvin Zon, left, of Press Associates, Inc., and Frank Swoboda of the Washington Post. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

House Group Calls for New PATCO Talks

Thirty-seven House Democrats urged the Reagan Administration to reopen contract talks with the striking Air Traffic Controllers, saying that a negotiated settlement "offers the most promising and responsible course for resolving" the 11-week dispute.

An agreement between the Federal Aviation Administration and PATCO "would be in the national interest, and would reflect great credit upon all parties," the congressmen said in a letter to President Reagan initiated by Rep. James Oberstar (D-Minn.).

MEANWHILE, flight delays at major airports mounted and a House staff analysis warned that the nation's air traffic control system could be in "serious trouble" by the winter of 1983 because of overly optimistic projections on replacing the 11,000 controllers fired by President Reagan after they went on strike Aug. 3.

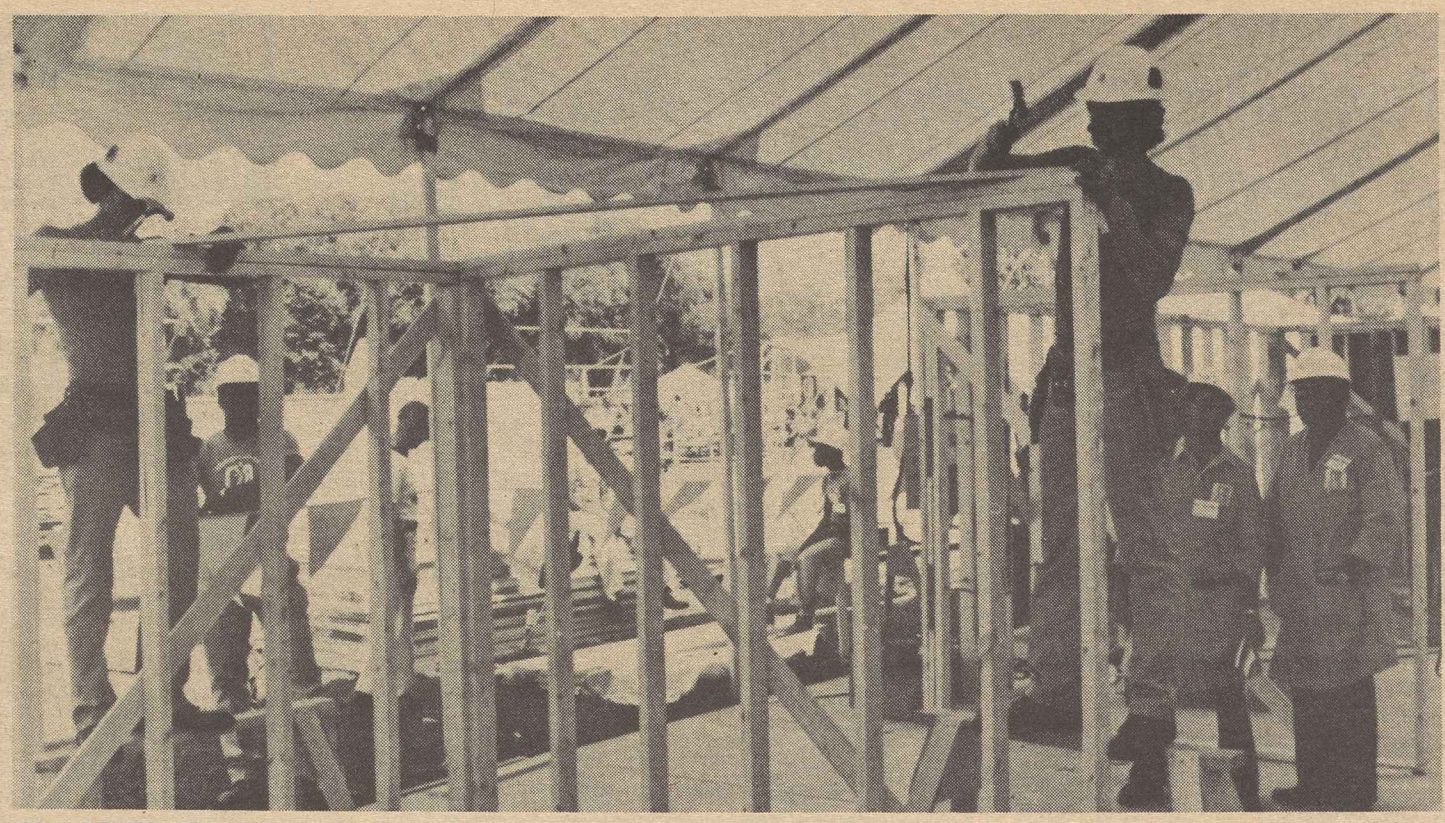
Administration officials have insisted that they do not intend to rehire the controllers, and have begun training new controllers to replace those who were fired. At the same time, flight schedules throughout the country have been scaled down as a safety measure. As a result, delays at major airports the last two weeks in September doubled from the same period last year, the FAA reported.

In an analysis of the FAA's plans to replace the striking controllers, the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee said "the only way to lessen the strain on the system is to rehire a substantial number of the striking controllers." The committee's staff said FAA Administrator Lynn Helm's position that strikers are forever barred from federal employment "is legally untenable."

REP. WILLIAM D. FORD (D-Mich.), who heads the committee, said in an Associated Press interview that the airline industry is suffering undue hardships and that the Administration must consider rehiring experienced controllers.

"The real world is that the people in labor and management relations resolve their differences without it turning into a permanent problem, and that's what we have now," Ford said.

Florida Delegates Back Expanded Public Services



Miami Beach—Delegates to the Florida AFL-CIO convention endorsed a proposal to expand police and fire protection and needed improvements in education and mass transportation that would be financed through a 1-cent increase in the state sales tax.

The 360 delegates also called for reinstatement of Florida's "little Davis-Bacon Act" to assure payment of prevailing wages on state funded construction and urged Congress to reject attempts to repeal the federal Davis-Bacon law.

OTHER KEY resolutions adopted at the three-day convention expressed strong opposition to the Reagan Administration's efforts to dismantle the Occupational Safety & Health Administration and wage protections provided by the Service Contract Act, stressed the need for expanded labor political action programs through wider COPE checkoff contributions, and gave strong support to the striking Air Traffic Controllers.

Delegates overwhelmingly re-elected State AFL-CIO President Daniel J. Miller, Sec.-Treas. Joseph E. Martin and First Vice President Dongal G. Resha to new four-year terms. All district vice presidents were elected to new two-year terms.

Convention speakers included union Presidents William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists, Frank Drozak of the Seafarers and Sol C. Chaikin of the Ladies' Garment Workers, National COPE Director Al Barkan and Rep. Claude Pepper (D-Fla.).

JOB CORPS TEAMS trained by the Carpenters union swept three top prizes in their category at the Job Corps Anniversary Expo held in Washington. Here, one of the winning teams constructs a frame structure under accuracy and time requirements. Teams from a number of other construction trades also participated in the contest.

Administration Backs Proposals To Gut Model Job-Injury Benefits

The Reagan Administration has proposed wholesale changes in the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act that would cut off thousands of workers from coverage, sharply restrict benefits and weaken protections.

The law, which was strengthened in 1972 with broad support from labor, the insurance industry and the Republican Administration then in office, has been cited by the AFL-CIO as the "best workers' compensation law in the nation" and a model for the states. It is closely in line with the recommendations of the National Commission on State Workmen's Compensation Laws.

THE FEDERATION had recommended extension of the provisions of the act to all workers in testimony earlier this year before the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee, which is now considering amendments that would gut the act.

The Administration's proposals are similar but not identical to the bill before the committee. Deputy Labor Under Sec. Robert Collyer told the committee the Administration favors returning coverage under the act to the pre-1972 definition of "the water's edge." Onshore dock and harbor workers would be ineligible for coverage except under state workers' compensation laws, most of which fall far short of the National Commission's standards.

The proposals also call for returning some "over the water" injuries to state programs.

The law now covers dock and shipyard workers, all private employment in the District of Columbia, employees at overseas military bases and workers at military post exchanges and other self-supporting federal activities.

BENEFIT increases under the Administration's plan would be capped at 6 percent a year for permanent total disability and death beneficiaries. The current law provides for an increase tied to the percentage increase in the national average weekly wage.

A cap would "not recognize current reality" in the increasing cost of living and inflation rate, the AFL-CIO contends.

The Administration also backs the proposal to reduce benefits by computing them on a base of 80 percent of the employee's spendable earnings rather than the present base of two-thirds of gross weekly wages. A proposal to deduct state and local taxes along with federal income taxes and social security taxes would lower the base even more.

IN CONTRAST, the National Commission recommended a different 80 percent spendable earnings formula that would take into account fringe benefits and deduct only federal income and social security taxes.

The Administration also proposes to cut off benefits to workers with partial disabilities when their current income reaches the point that it exceeds pre-disability income.

Another proposal would eliminate the disabled workers' right to choose the doctors treating their injuries if an employer lodges an objection to a particular physician. The Administration would give the Labor Dept. authority to make a final decision on the appropriateness of the doctor in disputed cases.

THIS PROPOSAL is less harsh than the Senate bill which would permit employers to give the Labor Dept. their own list of recommended doctors to be "authorized" under the law, but the AFL-CIO warned that any restriction of choice would take away the assurance of impartial examinations.

Other Administration proposals would increase the amount of benefit payments that could be offset by other compensation programs such as social security and income protection programs and sharply curtail the usage of the "second injury fund." This fund, paid for by insurance companies and self-insured employers, pays benefits to a worker whose on-the-job injury aggravates a pre-existing injury. The proposals would tighten the definitions of existing disability, give the Labor Dept. more authority to limit the fund's use and charge administrative and legal costs to it.

THE ADMINISTRATION has also asked that authority be returned to the Labor Dept. to review compensation cases and make binding decisions on them. The role of administrative law judges would be eliminated.

Other provisions recommended by the Administration include a stiff increase in the penalty against workers for misrepresentation, from a fine of $1,000 to $50,000 and from a year in jail to five years, along with an increase in the fine against employers who fail to secure a means of paying compensation, from $1,000 maximum to $1,000 a day.

Kirkland Presses Program To Revitalize U.S. Industry

ism," Kirkland assailed the monetarist views that are the underpinning of Administration economic policy. Monetarism "depends upon the rigorous assumption that all economic elements are determined by the money supply. But the monetarists cannot even tell us how it can be accurately measured, or even what money is," he said.

As seen in Britain, where Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher has applied monetarist theories for the last two and a half years, such policies are anachronistic and only exacerbate economic conditions, Kirkland observed. Britain's unemployment rate under Thatcher has more than doubled to 12.4 percent and its rate of inflation—about 8 percent when she adopted a strict monetarist approach to keep down prices—is now 11.5 percent, he added.

RATHER THAN trusting to the outdated classical economic theories of 18th-Century natural philosopher Adam Smith or 19th-Century supply-side economist Jean Baptiste Say, "the true father of what is better known as trickle-down economics," the Administration could get a better handle on inflation by focusing on its true causes, Kirkland said.

These, he said, "are to be found in energy, food, health care, housing costs, and the unconscionably high cost of money," and attacking the problems "requires an array of specific, targeted measures."

One such measure would be the use of government authority under the 1969 Credit Control Act to lower interest rates by channeling available credit to productive use, Kirkland said.

"WE BELIEVE that credit allocation is preferable to destroying the housing industry, while funds are siphoned off for corporate merger activities and speculative investments and margin purchases," Kirkland said. "Instead of finding $7 billion of funds overnight to underwrite a Conoco oil merger, the credit sources should be targeted to developing new productive facilities, and rescuing the crippled housing and auto industries."

In summary, Kirkland said, the AFL-CIO has carefully studied the Administration's proposals over the past nine months and found them completely wanting in what it takes to meet America's economic, social, and international goals.

"We reject the idea that there is anything resembling a 'new beginning' in the revival of the hoary old trickle-down economics in the guise of 'supply-side' economics," he said. "But more important, we reject the policies themselves, simply because they will not work."

Convention Action

Bricklayers Restructure Key Executive Positions

Toronto—The 75th convention of the Bricklayers & Allied Craftsmen restructured the union's executive board, elected officers and adopted a comprehensive program to keep the union on a course of progress toward its objectives.

Some 1,500 delegates and guests attended the sessions, held here to honor the 100th anniversary of the affiliation of two Canadian local unions—Local 1 of Hamilton, Ont., and Local 2 of Toronto—which gave the union international status.

PRESIDENT JOHN T. JOYCE, Treas. L. Gerald Carlisle, Sec. Edward M. Bellucci and First Vice President James F. Richardson were re-elected without opposition.

The convention revised the executive board by combining the offices of secretary and treasurer and adding a fifth member. As now constituted the board includes Joyce, Bellucci as secretary-treasurer, and three executive vice presidents, Carlisle, Richardson and Louis Weir, formerly 5th vice president.

Donald Williams of Toronto was named first vice president. His appointment "underscores the union's awareness of the important issues and concerns of our Canadian members," Joyce told the delegates.

Williams will attend executive board meetings and play a key role in the newly established Canadian Advisory Board. That board will consist of representatives of Canadian local unions and provincial conferences and will enable BAC to better meet the needs of its Canadian members, Joyce said.

Also, the delegates endorsed a proposal to hold BAC conventions every five years, rather than every four. That provision, however, will not take effect until after the 1985 convention.

The convention also expressed its concerns at attacks on labor, moves to weaken prevailing wage and job safety laws and the Reagan Administration's effort to cut back social security provisions.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) brought delegates to their feet as he promised to "oppose the attempt by the Reagan Administration and its allies to destroy the strength of the labor movement. I will oppose their attempt to apply antitrust laws against unions," he said.

PROPOSALS TO extend anti-extortion provisions of the Hobbs Act to union activity drew heavy criticism from Kennedy. "The criminal code should be used to fight crime. It should never be misused as a tool for anti-union employers and anti-union prosecutors to deny the legitimate rights of organizd labor," he said.

Kennedy charged that the Reagan Administration's economic recovery program is simply a "policy of tax cuts for the privileged, social security cuts for the elderly and Davis-Bacon wage cuts for construction workers."

He suggested more of the Administration's tax benefits should be geared to workers, adding: "Conditions on a construction site are not quite as plush as they are in the deep-carpeted, well-decorated offices of David Stockman."

In other action, the convention approved an increase in monthly per capita dues of $1 on Jan. 1, 1983, and an additional $1 the following year. The increases are necesary to maintain funding levels for major BAC programs, including the death benefit fund.

THE UNION'S Louis Sullivan Award for Architecture was presented to Henry Klein, senior partner in the Henry Klein Partnership in Mt. Vernon, Wash.

The award and accompanying $5,000 prize was established in 1970 to demonstrate the concern of masonry craftsmen for architectural and environmental quality. It is presented every two years to the practicing U.S. or Canadian architect whose work is judged to best exemplify the ideas and accomplishments of Sullivan, the father of modern architecture. The award program is administered by the American Institute of Architecture, and winners are chosen by a jury selected jointly by the AIA and BAC.

Donovan Scored On Move to Lift Homework Ban

trial work done in the home, thus leaving sweatshop conditions to flourish.

He also expressed concern that by eliminating protections in one of the seven industries, the spillover of abuses into the other areas "is inevitable and unstoppable."

Clothing & Textile Workers officials stressed similar points. ACTWU President Murray H. Finley and Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman said, "The United States has long prided itself on ending the blight of sweatshops and child labor. Now, more than 40 years after passage of the 1938 Fair Labor Standards Act, the Reagan Administration has turned back the clock and opened the doors to inhumane abuses which characterize exploitive nations."

THE UNITED Knitwear Manufacturers League denounced the deregulation as a danger to the four decades of progress in upgrading conditions in all sectors of the knitted apparel industry.

"Donovan's disregard for the ban and its purpose—to bring order, decency and industrial progress to the apparel trades in America—seriously threatens our domestic factories, our investment and our workers, and will promote the return of industrial homework to all branches of the apparel industry," the league charged.

Iowa Spurs Coalition Effort To Counter Reagan Policies

Waterloo, Iowa—Delegates to the Iowa State AFL-CIO's 26th annual convention, bent on transforming the spirit of Solidarity Day into action, resolved to organize grassroots coalitions of likeminded groups to protest the impact of President Reagan's economic policies on workers and their families.

The 300 delegates—many of whom joined 2,000 other Iowans in an 18-bus caravan to the Sept. 19 demonstration in the nation's capital—approved a resolution calling for the establishment of chapters of the Iowa Progressive Coalition in every key city and town in the state. A major task of the coalition is to draw up an "economic bill of rights" based on the principles of "jobs, dignity, and justice." The coalition was formed about six months ago by leaders of Iowa minority, labor, church, civil rights, women's, and other progressive groups.

CHAPTERS ALREADY exist in several cities, and State AFL-CIO President James J. Wengert said he expects others to be formed by the end of the year. The resolution called upon all affiliates to assist the State AFL-CIO in the establishment of still others.

In a keynote address, Wengert warned that labor's struggle for economic and social justice is "threatened by an Administration in the total service of the rich and powerful. Today we confront a concentration of wealth, income, and power greater than at any time in our history."

Wengert added that "virtually every element of the progressive movement of this century is on the chopping block: social security, employment and training programs, unemployment insurance benefits, food stamps, the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law, and worker safety and health laws."

HE DESCRIBED "Reaganomics" as an economic policy that steals from poor and working people and rewards rich individuals and corporations. "This is not the time to retreat," he exhorted. "It is time to take a stand."

"We have to take concrete steps to build solidarity in our ranks and solidarity with our allies—the poor, the elderly, blacks, Hispanics, women, peace, farm, and religious organizations," he said. "You can be sure that if we don't unite around a program worth uniting for, corporate America will walk through the door and play its old game of divide and conquer."

Another resolution condemned irresponsible "runaway" corporations that have "levied great social and economic hardships on workers and the communities in which they reside for the sake of greater profits." The measure called on corporations to give advance notice before closing a factory and institute job retraining programs. It recommended government takeover as a last resort to protect workers from economic disaster in the event of sudden plant closures.

CONVENTION resolutions also called on the Administration to negotiate a new contract with members of the striking Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization, pledged support to the PATCO Family Fund established by the AFL-CIO, and opposed any expansion of corporate tax breaks.

Wengert and Sec.-Treas. Mark L. Smith both were elected to new terms of office. Also elected to the federation's executive board were Executive Vice Pres. Donald P. Rowen, at-large Vice Presidents Lloyd J. Freilinger, William F. Fenton and Steve Elliott, and district Vice Presidents Leo Ruth. Pat Marshall, Gene Redmon, Perry Chapin, Ken Rains, and Joan Little.

Survey Finds Gas Heating Costs Soaring

Natural gas heating costs will rise an average 25 percent this winter and will go even higher if the Reagan Administration wins its campaign to decontrol natural gas prices, according to a survey of gas utilities by the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition.

"Home heating costs continue to rise at a terrifying rate, far outstripping inflation," said William R. Hutton, executive director of the National Council of Senior Citizens, who serves as the coalition's secretary-treasurer.

"EACH WINTER more senior citizens and working households have trouble paying their heating bills," Hutton noted. "The Reagan Administration's plan to accelerate this cost increase by decontrolling gas prices is cruel and unrealistic," he declared.

Some 60 percent of the nation's households heat with gas. Costs for the Nov. 1-Mar. 31 heating season generally represent two-thirds to three-fourths of a homeowner's gas bills for the year.

"This study shows that, even without decontrol, most households will pay out more in higher gas bills this winter than they will get back in federal tax cuts," said Robert M. Brandon, Washington director of the Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition. "Gas decontrol would mean a giant step backward in the standard of living of most Americans."

The survey shows that the typical residential gas-heating customer will pay $398 for gas this winter. Costs vary by region, with New England customers averaging $618 and homeowners in the west south central region averaging $210. The coalition warned that the Administration plan for immediate decontrol could push 1982-83 gas bills to nearly double last year's levels and even higher in some regions.

"PRESIDENT REAGAN is in for a rude awakening if he tries to push through a bill to decontrol natural gas," said Howard Marlow of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation.

"Even the Republicans are deserting him when they come face-to-face with angry constituents and the combined muscle of labor, senior, minority, farm and consumer groups."

The coalition, which represents over 200 labor, senior and citizen-action organizations, has joined the AFL-CIO in a national Campaign to Stop Natural Gas Decontrol. The campaign's sponsors aim to win pledges of opposition to decontrol from a majority of Congress. Already, one-fourth of the House of Representatives has lined up against decontrol.

Auto Workers Rejoin Industrial Union Dept.

The Auto Workers will rejoin the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept. on Nov. 1, ending a 13-year absence, IUD President Howard D. Samuel announced.

UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said the Auto Workers are looking forward to working closely with the IUD in areas of vital interest to its members as well as to continued participation in coordinated bargaining and cooperative organizing efforts.

The IUD was formed in 1955 and was headed by the late UAW President Walter Reuther until the union withdrew from the AFL-CIO in 1968. The UAW reaffiliated with the AFL-CIO July 1.

'Bracero' Experience Cited

Guest Worker Plan Hit As Threat to U.S. Jobs

A so-called guest worker program would aggravate U.S. unemployment and undermine wages and working conditions, the AFL-CIO warned a congressional committee studying illegal immigration.

AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald told the House Subcommittee on Immigration, Refugees & International Law that a program to admit temporary workers from Mexico would not stop or even reduce illegal immigration as its supporters claim.

THE REAGAN Administration has proposed a program that would allow up to 50,000 Mexican workers into the United States annually for a two-year trial period.

"It is difficult to understand," Oswald said, "why a guest worker program is being considered today when we have eight million unemployed and an unemployment rate of 7.5 percent."

He branded as "fiction" the argument that temporary foreign workers are needed to fill jobs U.S. workers refuse to take. He cited the findings of a Los Angeles Times poll that 75 percent of unemployed Americans would apply for and accept menial work at or near the federal minimum wage. A job that pays $4.50 an hour, Oswald pointed out, yields an annual full-time income just barely above the poverty level for a family of four.

HE REJECTED claims that wages are not an issue and that U.S. workers refuse to work in remote areas. The adequate supply of workers for construction of the Alaska pipeline demonstrate that wages "are indeed the issue," Oswald told the committee.

The AFL-CIO is convinced, he said, "that fair wages and decent working conditions would solve most so-called labor shortages, and we are even more convinced that the program being proposed would generate significantly more problems that it would solve."

Oswald cited the failure of the "bracero" guest worker program in effect from 1951 to 1964.

The program was introduced when the unemployment rate was at 3.3 percent, Oswald said, adding that when Congress abolished it in 1964 because unemployment had topped 5 percent for seven years, there was evidence that the program was neither desirable nor successful.

During the period when half a million braceros were legally entering the country, Oswald told the committee, "more than twice that number of illegals were being picked up by the Immigration & Naturalization Service."

The federation economist also pointed to the European experience with guest working programs, noting that even when such programs were ended in 1973, illegal workers continued to enter the same countries.

RACIAL CLASHES between foreign and domestic workers competing for a limited number of jobs, almost unknown in Europe before the era of guest worker programs, are now widespread, Oswald noted.

He told the committee the Administration's proposal recognizes some problems of guest worker programs, but its language covering wages and working standards is too vague. For example, he said, the proposal says only that "normal" wages and conditions would apply, but it does not define "normal."

Excluding guest workers only from those states that certify there is an "adequate" supply of American workers might tempt states "to interpret 'adequate' to mean workers who will work at substandard pay under poor conditions," Oswald pointed out.

THE PROGRAM is not restricted to farm workers, he stressed, adding that workers could be brought in to work in textile and apparel industries, in hotels and restaurants and in both skilled and unskilled jobs.

Although the Mexican government has not taken an official position, he noted, the temporary worker plan is opposed by the Mexican trade union movement.

GUEST WORKER program proposed by the Administration will increase U.S. unemployment and undermine wages and working conditions, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald testifies at House subcommittee hearings. Appearing with him were left, Stephanie Bower, legislative representative of the Farm Workers, and Evelyn Dubrow, vice president and legislative representative of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

New Social Security Cutbacks Mar Senate Vote on Minimum

reallocation of the revenues from the social security payroll tax, drawing from the healthier disability and hospital insurance trust funds to shore up the retirement and survivors' insurance fund. This is expected to keep the funds solvent at least through 1984, and possibly longer if the economy improves. If the financing problems continue, the bill authorizes borrowing by the retirement fund from the disability fund.

But the Senate also set a heavy price for partially restoring the retirement benefit floor as it sought to recover $3.7 billion of the $5 billion estimated cost of that concession through other changes that would mean benefit reductions for many present and future retirees. These include:

- A dollar-for-dollar offset in the minimum benefit for retired government workers by the amount their pensions exceed $300 a month, except that they would remain eligible for the amount of social security benefits actually "earned" through payroll contributions in non-government employment.
- Extension of social security payroll taxes to the first six months of all sick pay.
- Reduction of the maximum family benefit from 188 percent to 150 percent of the primary insurance amount in both retirement and survivor cases.

A HOUSE-SENATE conference committee must now attempt to reconcile the two bills before the elimination of the minimum benefit takes effect with the December 1981 payment. The heavy House vote for full restoration points to a strong fight in the conference to wipe out the Senate cutbacks.

Meanwhile, congressional Democrats reacted warily to Reagan's proposal for a 15-member task force on the social security system's long-term problems.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, in a letter to the President, expressed a willingness to go along with the task force concept, but rejected Reagan's plan to have it report back in January 1983 so as to keep the issue out of the 1982 congressional elections.

O'NEILL SAID he and Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker have agreed on an earlier report—by next Apr. 15—after which he said Congress "should proceed promptly" with legislation.

Under Reagan's plan, the Senate and House leaders each would name five members of the "bipartisan" task force and the President would fill the remaining five slots.

House Rejects Reagan Plan For AWACS Sale to Saudis

In a letter to House members before the vote, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison warned that the sale would be "an act of irresponsibility and high potential risk to the peace of the world."

THE PROPOSED arms sale—the biggest arms deal in history—is still alive, however, since a 1974 amendment to the Arms Export Control Act provides that both houses of Congress must pass a joint resolution to block a sale. The outcome in the Senate, which has until Oct. 31 to act on the resolution, remains in doubt as Reagan has restated his intention to persuade a majority of senators to go along with the measure.

In an apparent move to give Reagan more time to lobby senators, Senate Majority Leader Howard H. Baker, Jr. (R-Tenn.), postponed full Senate action on the measure from next Tuesday, as originally scheduled, until sometime during the week of Oct. 26.

EVEN IF both congressional chambers reject the arms sale, Reagan might seek to invoke emergency powers to consummate the transaction. The Arms Control Act allows a President to go ahead unilaterally with a sale if he deems it "important to the security interests of the United States."

In the four hours of debate preceding the House vote, Rep. Lee Hamilton (D-Ind.), chairman of the House Near East subcommittee said that he feared the sale would "fuel, not dampen, the spiraling Middle East arms race."

Controversy over the proposed sale erupted immediately after the Reagan Administration announced it last March. Those supporting the AWACS sale argued that refusal to approve it would jeopardize continued U.S. access to Persian Gulf oil and lose Saudi Arabia as an ally.

BUT IN MAY, the AFL-CIO Executive Council warned that, used in conjunction with enhanced F-15s, the radar planes would serve only to further destabilize the Middle East arms balance.

"The assassination of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat and indications of continued unrest in the Middle East have not changed the AFL-CIO position of opposition to the proposed AWACS sale," Legislative Director Denison said in his letter to congressmen. "Rather, our position has been reinforced."

Operating Costs 1.5% For Social Security

Although administrative costs of the Social Security Administration amount to only $1.50 for every $100 collected, a public opinion survey found that most people think the costs are much higher.

The survey, based on interviews with 2,000 adults, showed that respondents thought SSA spent a median of $53 for every $100 it receives from social security taxes—nearly 35 times higher than the agency's actual administrative expenses in 1980.

Only 2 percent of the persons interviewed by the Roper Organization thought the administrative costs were below 10 percent of contributions. SSA noted that the 1.5 percent expense ratio for 1980 was one-tenth of 1 percent lower than it spent in 1979.

Job Losses Laid To 'Zero Tariff' Trade Program

American industries and workers are being unnecessarily burdened by repeatedly having to fight off unfair competition from a growing list of duty-free imports that are flooding U.S. markets, the AFL-CIO charged.

Federation Research Director Rudy Oswald, in testimony before an interagency panel of the U.S. Trade Representative, traced the problem to the administration of the Generalized System of Preferences.

ALTHOUGH special "zero tariffs" on imports were designed to help developing countries, Oswald said the GSP program continues to cost U.S. jobs and production while benefiting countries and companies already enjoying industrial prowess in world trade.

Oswald told the GSP Trade Policy subcommittee that a wide range of items proposed for exclusion from tariffs would have a dire impact on many U.S. workers.

He noted that the list includes such items as leather and luggage, woven fabrics, fabricated steel, radio and electronic instruments, food products, steel wire, dolls and bicycle tires, as well as many chemicals—all produced by a number of endangered U.S. firms.

The tariff preference system is not free trade or fair trade, Oswald stressed.

"THIS IS A special privilege given in U.S. law supposedly to help the neediest countries get some competence in trade without harming U.S. industries and workers. Instead, the list of items to be added suggests that there is no screening of the impact on the United States before the item is accepted for formal consideration," he observed.

Oswald noted further that countries such as Brazil and South Korea—which are not considered developing nations—can be granted special treatment unless contested by representatives of American firms and workers.

Building Crafts Blast Interest Disaster

Heavy Loss Of Jobs Cited By Kirkland

By John R. Oravec

Atlantic City, N.J.—Excessive interest rates are turning construction workers into unemployment statistics by the hundreds of thousands, AFL-CIO Pres. Lane Kirkland said in assailing the Reagan Administration's economic policy.

Kirkland noted in an address to the Building & Construction Trades Dept. convention that 17 percent of the nation's construction industry workforce was jobless last month—some 800,000 skilled craftsmen—and the toll is rising steadily.

THE FALLOFF in construction jobs stems from an interest rate scheme, he told the BCTD delegates, that is robbing home buyers, crippling the housing industry and bankrupting small contractors.

"What was criminal loan-sharking a few years ago is now standard practice," he said, "and it is as damaging and demoralizing to the producers as to the consumer. When the banker takes his 18 or 20 percent off the top, the builder either sells a shoddier product at a higher price or he goes under."

Kirkland charged that President Reagan failed to level with the American people when he campaigned for their votes last year.

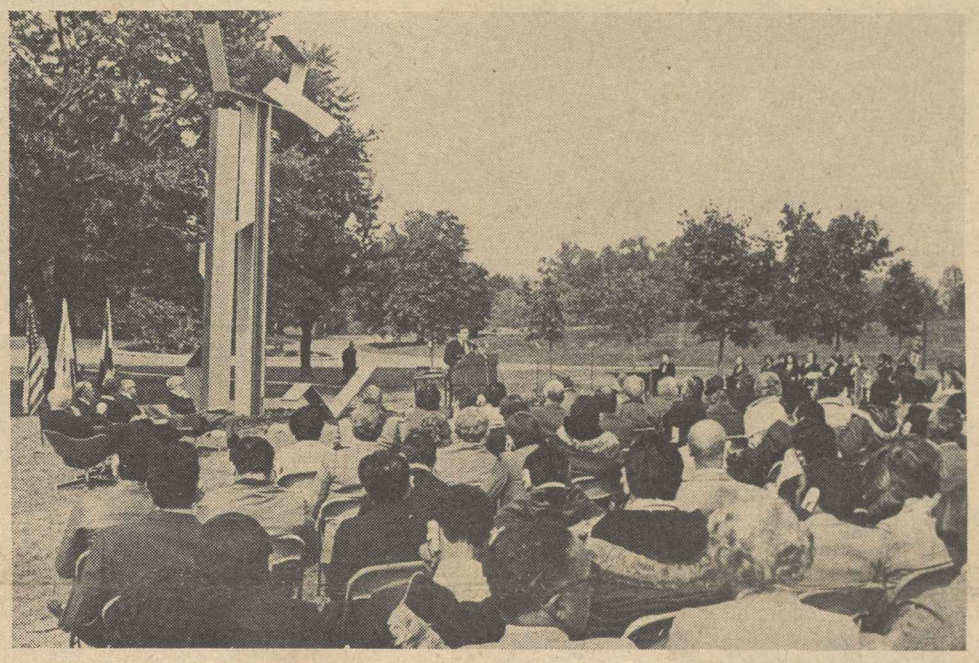
"HE DID NOT try to win the hearts of building tradesmen or other workers with promises of higher and higher interest rates, fewer and fewer jobs, less and less concern for occupational health and safety and more and more tax breaks for banks and corporations."

Since 1969, Kirkland said, "when Richard Nixon introduced his tight-money, high-interest rate policies under the tutelage of Arthur Burns, the construction industry has dragged along in a state of chronic recession."

And the new super-saver certificate recently introduced means even higher lending rates, he warned. "Other gimmicks and formulas, such as variable interest rates, are not aimed at controlling inflation but only at insulating money lenders against inflation at the expense of homebuyers."

BCTD PRESIDENT Robert A. Georgine observed in his keynote address that over the years Administrations and Congresses have attempted without success to reduce interest rates through ineffective tactics.

"Only one option has not been tried fully, the one we have repeatedly put forward for national debate: the regulation of credit," he said.



Georgine stressed the need for easing credit restrictions on productive investments such as housing and new plant construction, improvements in existing fac-

Recession Grips Nation, Output Drop Continues

GNP Down 2nd Quarter In Succession

By James M. Shevis

The nation has sunk into its eighth business-cycle recession since the end of World War II, according to government statistics.

"Real," or inflation-adjusted, gross national product—the total output of goods and services—contracted at a seasonally adjusted rate of six-tenths of 1 percent from July to September, the Commerce Dept. reported, the second consecutive quarterly decline in economic growth.

At the same time, the government said inflation was running at an annual rate of 9.4 percent, considerably above the second quarter's 6.4-percent rate, with the rise attributed mainly to higher costs for food and services.

THE DOWNTURN was shrugged off by Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige as "almost necessary" to hold down inflation —and the AFL-CIO sharply dissented.

"Joblessness, already high, is likely to grow further," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald warned.

"The Administration's only response," he charged, "is to propose further budget cuts that will worsen the suffering of the growing numbers of unemployed. Meanwhile, the tight monetary policies that the Administration has been encouraging for the past 10 months have severely crippled the housing and auto industries, and led to increased bankruptcies."

Oswald pointed out that the indicators

PATCO Slates Appeal In Decertification Case

The Professional Air Traffic Controllers announced the union will appeal the action of the Federal Labor Relations Authority stripping the union of its right to bargain for the 11,500 striking controllers employed by the FAA.

PATCO Attorney Richard Leighton said that pending the appeal, the union would move quickly to seek a stay of the FLRA order from the U.S. Court of Appeals.

The FLRA voted 2 to 1 to decertify PATCO as exclusive bargaining representative of the controllers, upholding the finding of an administrative law judge that the union had violated the no-strike provision of the law governing federal employees by engaging in the strike, which began last Aug. 3.

THE FLRA majority in the case consisted of Members Henry Frazier III and Leon B. Applewhaite. Dissenting from the revocation order was Chairman Ronald W. Haughton.

While agreeing with the majority that the strike constituted an unfair labor practice under federal law, Haughton said the record was insufficient to determine the appropriate remedy, whether it be revocation of bargaining rights or other action. He would have remanded the case to the chief administrative law judge for further hearings.

THE DECISION was issued just two days after union officials renewed their appeal to the Reagan Administration for reinstatement of the striking controllers and cited the spreading economic consequences of the Administration's continuing refusal to do so.

PATCO President Robert Poli told the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee that since the walkout began, more than 25,000 airline employees have been laid off, while others have been forced to take pay cuts.

"THE LAYOFFS are now spreading to associated industries, such as aircraft man-

GOP Moderates Balking At Hard-Line Reaganomics

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan's insistence on a new round of spending cuts and his apparent hostility to a voting rights bill that has strong bipartisan support is shaking the once-solid lineup of congressional Republicans.

In the House, a swing group of northern Republicans has balked at the Administration's demand for an additional 12 percent federal spending cut—on top of the drastic cutbacks already imposed.

The first signs of resistance came early this month, when 37 Republicans joined all but 22 House Democrats to defeat an Administration attempt to make further cuts in appropriations for the Labor Dept., the Dept. of Health & Human Services and the Education Dept.

Since the House has already passed the bulk of its appropriations bills, the next round will be fought in the Senate, where most of the spending bills are still in committee.

Senate Republican leaders have already told White House officials that the cuts the President wants for the current fiscal year are too extreme. But rounds of negotiations involving House and Senate Republican leaders and the Administration found the President's party unable to reach a consensus. Senate Republicans reportedly got the White House to agree to a package of new taxes as a partial alternative to budget cuts. But House Republicans said they couldn't go along with higher taxes and would rather risk a bigger budget deficit.

Perkins Named COPE Director, Succeeds Barkan

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has announced that he will appoint John Perkins as director of the federation's Committee on Political Education (COPE), succeeding Alexander E. Barkan who is retiring at the end of 1981.

Perkins, 48, has served as a COPE area director, assistant director on the national staff and associate director since 1977.

He joined the Carpenters Union in Elkhart, Ind., in 1952 and served as business manager of his local for 11 years. He also was an officer of the Indiana State Building & Construction Trades Council and held various offices in the local central labor body.

NORDIC TRADE UNION LEADERS met with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and other federation leaders to discuss matters of mutual concern. The delegation, headed by Vice President Knud Christensen of the Danish Federation of Trade Unions, discussed free trade unionism in Poland and the status of talks on AFL-CIO reaffiliation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions among other topics.

World Problems Explored By Nordic Unions, AFL-CIO

Leaders of the AFL-CIO exchanged views with a delegation of trade union representatives from Nordic countries on a wide variety of topics of common concern at a two-day meeting at federation headquarters.

The meeting with the 16 delegates representing the Council of Nordic Trade Unions was marked by frank and open discussions on the status of AFL-CIO reaffiliation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, the situation in Poland where the independent labor federation, Solidarity, is struggling to survive, and other matters.

THE COUNCIL of Nordic Trade Unions comprises the national labor federations of Norway, Finland, Iceland, Sweden, and Denmark. All but Iceland were represented at the meeting.

Bilateral discussions between the two labor bodies began last year with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's visit with council leaders in Stockholm. It was decided at this year's meeting to continue the exchanges.

Other discussions focused on the economic situation in each of the countries represented, with particular emphasis on government policies toward unemployment and economic growth, and the position of trade unions with regard to government policies in their own lands. Delegates also discussed assistance to trade union movements in other countries, particularly South Africa.

AFL-CIO LEADERS involved in the talks were Kirkland; Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue; the federation's European representative, Irving Brown; Research Director Rudy A. Oswald, Assistant to the President Dale Good, and Vice President Sol Chaikin, a member of the federation's International Affairs Committee and president of the Ladies' Garment Workers.

While in Washington, the delegation attended a dinner in its honor at the home of the Swedish ambassador. The visitors also spent two days in New York City, visiting Chaikin and other ILGWU officers before returning to their own countries.

The Nordic trade unionists included Vice President Knud Christensen and International Sec. John Svenningsen of the Danish Federation of Trade Unions; President Kirsten Stallknecht and Hans Martens of the Danish Federation of Civil Servants & Salaried Employees Organization; President Pertti Viinanen and International Sec. Markku Jaeaeskelaeinen of the Finnish Confederation of Salaried Employees; President Matti Kinnunen and International Sec. Kari O. Virtanen of the Central Organization of Finnish Trade Unions.

ALSO, PRESIDENT Gunnar Nilsson and International Sec. Erik Karlsson of the Confederation of Swedish Trade Unions; President Lennart Rodstroem and International Sec. Sven Fockstedt of the Swedish Central Organization of Salaried Employees; International Sec. Kaare Sandegren of the Confederation of Norwegian Trade Unions, and Gen. Sec. Lennart Forsebaeck and Sec. Christer Ahlen of the Council of Nordic Trade Unions. Labor Attache Sune Ahlen of the Swedish Embassy also was a member of the delegation.

Ohio Unionist Honored By State Arts Council

Cincinnati—Ben Shouse, cultural arts committee chairman of the Cleveland AFL-CIO-sponsored United Labor Agency, received a top award from the Ohio Arts Council for his service to the arts on behalf of organized labor.

Shouse, who retired last year as president and business manager of Upholsterers Local 48, has headed the arts committee since its founding five years ago.

Among its numerous community service projects, the committee produced a 1976 hit play, John L. Lewis, Disciple of Discontent.

Corporate Dividends Surge To Record Rate for Quarter

Corporate dividends climbed to a record level in the third quarter of 1981, despite a drop in the stock market and a generally weakening economy.

The Wall Street Journal reported that American companies paid out dividends at an estimated rate of $62.9 billion in the July-September period, a record for any quarter. The rate was nearly $1 billion higher than in the second quarter of the year and $6.2 billion more than in the third quarter of last year.

Thanks to the recent surge, dividend payments in the last year have risen about 11 percent, matching fairly closely the comparable increase in consumer price rises, the Journal noted.

Interest income has recently risen even more sharply than dividend payments, a report by Merrill Lynch Economics Inc. shows. "Individuals will earn roughly $307 billion of interest income this year," the report estimates. "This is twice the level of just four years earlier."

Illinois Adopts 2-Year Interval For Conventions

Chicago—Almost 2,000 delegates to the 24th annual convention of the Illinois AFL-CIO approved a series of constitutional amendments to streamline the operation of the state federation, reaffirmed legislative goals and attacked policies of the Reagan Administration that put new burdens on working families and the poor.

Convention speakers toasted the success of national Solidarity Day on Sept. 19 and Illinois Labor Lobby Day on June 2, the largest labor demonstrations ever held in Springfield and Washington.

CHANGES IN the State AFL-CIO constitution provide for biennial instead of annual conventions starting in 1982, adjustments in the apportionment of delegates to attend conventions, enlarging the executive board from 19 to 23 vice presidents and streamlining election procedures. The convention also added a Committee on Public Employment to the list of constitutional committees.

Delegates called for legislation to ban the contracting out of work done by public employees and urged new efforts to pass a public employee collective bargaining bill.

IN HIS KEYNOTE address, State AFL-CIO President Gibson stressed the need for labor unity to combat "the siren songs of the left and the right" and bring "the real issues into the workplaces and the homes of our members and to everyone else we can reach."

"Right and justice are on our side," Gibson declared." That was the message of Solidarity Day in Washington. . . ."

In addresses to the delegates, the state's U.S. senators both denounced proposals to cut back social security benefits.

SEN. ALAN J. DIXON (D) said any Administration that would eliminate the $122 minimum benefit for the elderly "is an Administration without heart."

Sen. Charles H. Percy (R) assailed efforts "to pull the rug out from under those who have been pouring into the social security system for 35 or 40 years and give them seven months notice that their retirement date on Jan. 1 is going to be changed."

Rep. Cardiss Collins (D-Ill.) cited the Solidarity Day demonstration as a loud, clear appeal for economic democracy. She said the right-wingers must be challenged firmly to prevent America from returning to the days of unsafe working conditions, sweat shops, child labor and low pay.

GOV. JAMES R. Thompson (R) said his top priority is jobs for the people of Illinois. Thompson, who will seek re-election next year, urged labor not to tie itself to one party and to support those who have backed the trade union movement's program.

National COPE Director Al Barkan urged unions to start the 1982 election drive now and to initiate the dues checkoff system to raise funds for COPE-endorsed candidates.

Panel Rejects Move to Kill Usury Laws

A labor-opposed bill that would invalidate state interest rate ceilings on consumer loans was rejected by a House subcommittee by an 8-1 vote despite Administration endorsement.

Consumer organizations had charged that federal pre-emption of state usury laws which limit interest rates on loans and credit purchases would amount to legalization of "loan sharking."

CONGRESS LAST year exempted mortgage and auto loans from state interest rate ceilings on the assumption that this would make financing more rapidly available. In fact, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison noted, the removal of interest ceilings contributed to an escalation of interest rates that left both the homebuilding and auto industries worse off.

In a letter to the House Banking Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs that was considering the bill, Denison stressed that the real problem Congress should be addressing is "the high level of interest rates," rather than state laws that seek to hold interest costs down.

Encouraging higher rates for consumer loans, he warned, would only "saddle consumers with high debt burdens and lead to increased bankruptcies."

ASSISTANT TREASURY Sec. Roger Mehle testified for the bill, contending that interest ceilings "dampen economic growth." But a senior Republican on the subcommittee, Rep. Chalmers P. Wylie of Ohio, explained the near-unanimous rejection of the measure by noting that constituents back home would be likely to perceive a vote for the bill as a vote for high interest rates.

An interest pre-emption clause is, however, included in an omnibus bill being considered by the Senate Banking Committee.

staff in 1968 as COPE area director for Illinois and Indiana and moved to Washington in 1971 as assistant director.

He was the coordinator of the Sept. 19, 1981, Solidarity Day demonstration.

Barkan, 72, has been on the COPE staff since the merger of the AFL and CIO in 1955, serving as an assistant director, deputy director and as director since 1963.

A native of Bayonne, N.J., he graduated from the University of Chicago and joined the Textile Workers Organizing Committee, predecessor of the Textile Workers Union of America, as an organizer. After service in the Navy he became veterans director for the CIO Community Services Committee, served as executive secretary of the New Jersey CIO Council and in 1948 rejoined TWUA as political action director. He was named assistant director of COPE in 1955, deputy director in 1957.

Merger Goals Pressed

Solidarity Theme Marks Graphic Arts Sessions

Detroit — The Graphic Arts International Union carried on two traditions at its third constitutional convention here.

One was the transferring of its convention from Honolulu to Detroit as an act of solidarity with the striking Air Traffic Controllers. This made it possible for delegates to travel by means other than air.

IT WAS THE third time in 12 years that the GAIU had transferred its convention site on short notice for trade union reasons. In 1969 and 1978, it switched convention sites because of strike action by hotel workers.

The other tradition was the reaffirmed goal of unifying all graphic arts unionists into a single union. Major steps toward that objective were the merger of the Lithographer and Photoengraver unions in 1964 and the subsequent merger with the Bookbinders union in 1972. The Lithographer craft was the first to unionize in 1882, so the convention was "on the eve" of the union's centennial.

Unanimously adopted by the delegates, the resolution directed GAIU officers to pursue the goal of unity. It said dramatic changes in technology and in corporate restructuring "mean the day is past when we can afford wasteful competitiveness of all the resources of all the unions in the graphic arts industry to obtain better contracts, greater job security and maximum unionization."

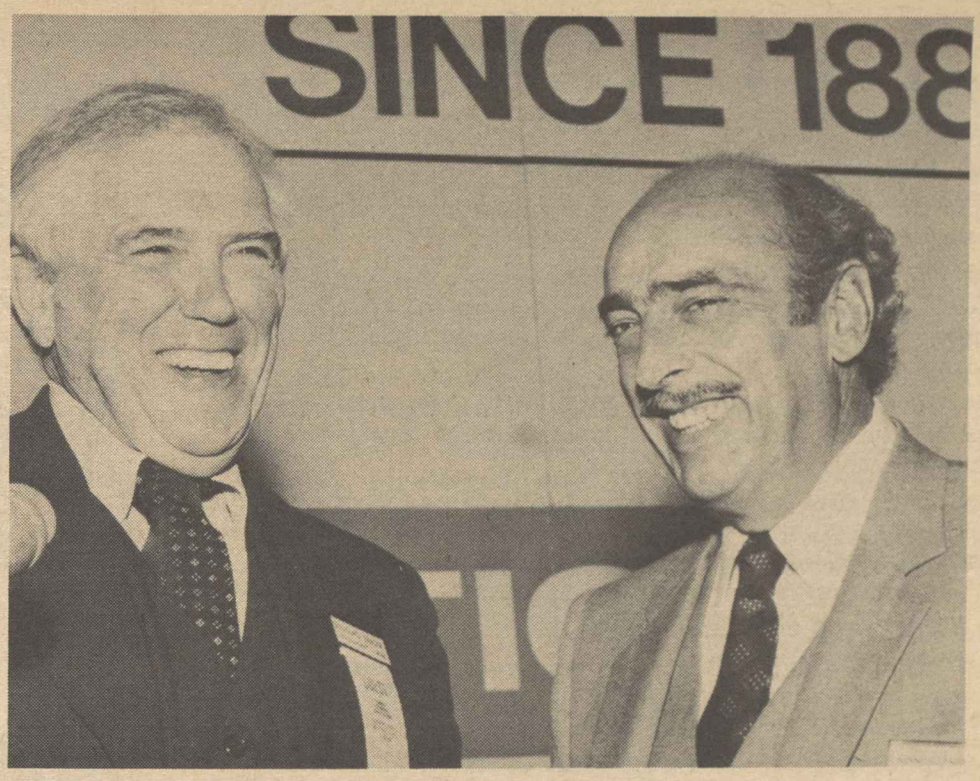
GAIU PRESIDENT Kenneth J. Brown extended convention invitations to the other unions in the industry to "compare notes" on the need "to close ranks at this most critical moment."

Newspaper Guild President Charles A. Perlik, Jr., expressed the hope to convention delegates that all four unions would "sit down and talk—talk about what we can do to forge the kind of solid unity we desperately need. And then I hope something else."

Robert L. Wartinger, a Typographical Union vice president, stated: "We can do a better job in the years ahead by working together—by 'closing ranks.' We are pledged to find the formulas and, hopefully, the elusive merger formula that will again make us one."

IN ANOTHER major address, Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser branded the Reagan Administration a "government of the rich, by the rich and for the rich" and accused President Reagan of "making something of his victory that it isn't. Reagan did not get a mandate to repeal the New Deal, Fair Deal, Great Society, he said.

However, Fraser added, "the Democrats are covered with no glory, as shown by their voting windfall tax credits for big oil and the wealthy."



To complement the organizing program of the union, for which the members last year voted a 50-cent per capita increase to add six more fulltime organizers, the convention approved a new education program that will go to a unionwide membership referendum during November.

Based on statistics showing that 50 percent of GAIU members have been in the union less than five years and 30 percent less than three years, the proposal would divide the education department into two divisions. The craft training division, which has established 60 local training programs since 1966, will remain. A new division would concentrate on shop steward and membership education.

The convention marked the end of the nine-year merger agreement that created GAIU in 1972. The original GAIU International Council had 50 members (18 officers and 32 councilors). It will now be reduced to 24 (10 officers and 14 councilors), with all posts open to any craft.

Brown, first elected to his post in 1960, is unopposed for re-election as president, as are five of seven vice presidents. For the 14 councilor posts, there are 24 candidates. Elections will be by membership referendum in December.

Two veteran leaders announced their retirement as of Mar. 31, 1982. They are Sec.-Treas. Joseph Hellman and Vice President Edward V. Donahue, who heads the union's political and legislative activities.

CLOSING RANKS in defense of organized labor's gains for working people was a key theme of the Graphic Arts International Union's convention in Detroit. GAIU President Kenneth J. Brown welcomes Auto Workers President Douglas Fraser for a major address to the delegates.

Workshop Sessions Highlight Washington State Convention

Everett, Wash.—The Washington State AFL-CIO combined a special constitutional convention with a series of workshops on pressing issues to draw an overflow number of delegates to a three-day meeting here.

Only 300 delegates had been expected to attend the event. The actual turnout of more than 500 attested to the fact that the labor movement in Washington is active and growing, State AFL-CIO President Marvin L. Williams observed.

THE FEDERATION'S executive board called the meeting to update and amend the organization's constitution, which had not been rewritten since the AFL-CIO merger in 1955. The delegates adopted nearly all of the proposed changes.

Besides streamlining constitutional language and attending their choice of seven different workshops, the delegates approved a series of resolutions. The measures included support for a proposed boycott of Cudahy Bar-S products for the company's union-busting tactics at its Seattle plant, an initiative campaign next year to roll back interest rates in the state, and plans for a labor rally at the state capitol during the 1982 legislative session.

One of the workshops dwelt on the critical need for effective plant-closure legislation to protect workers faced with sudden job loss. The need for such protection has become starkly evident in Washington, where the important lumber and sawmill industry is being devastated by the crippling construction slowdown. Unemployment rates of 20 and 30 percent in lumber-dependent towns are common, delegates were told.

ANOTHER TOPIC dealt with the state's current financial crisis. Gov. John Spellman has called a special session of the legislature next month to find a way out of the financial morass that the state now finds itself in. Republicans have called for cutbacks in programs and services for the needy, while the State AFL-CIO is seeking more equitable solutions.

A workshop on the issue of sex harassment and comparable worth was especially timely. The State AFL-CIO, along with Council 28 of the State, County & Municipal Employees, recently filed sex discrimination charges against the state with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission on behalf of nine individual female plaintiffs.

The charges cite the state's own pay equity studies showing that male state employees are paid 22-35 percent more than females in job classes requiring the same levels of skill, effort, and responsibility.

WORKSHOPS BY State AFL-CIO President Williams and Sec.-Treas. Larry Kenney outlined labor's goals in Washington State and focused on the federation's financial picture.

Kenney said that the success of this year's workshops could make them a feature of the federation's off-year conventions. Regular conventions will continue to be held every two years, he noted.

Camp David Pact Inspires Sculpture at Labor Center

The AFL-CIO pledged its continued support for the security of Israel while at the same time reaffirming its commitment to a lasting Middle East peace as envisioned in the Camp David agreement.

Federation President Lane Kirkland warned that "terrorism is the enemy of civilization," the big threat to peace.

AT A CEREMONY at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies dedicating a steel sculpture to commemorate the Camp David peace accord, Kirkland noted that the assassination of Egyptian President Anwar Sadat has once again given the world a glimpse of the "terrible reality of the terrorism that would destroy not only great men but an entire nation and people." And he vowed:

"The AFL-CIO will vigrously oppose any actions by our government that lend legitimacy and respectability to terrorist organizations—whether or not they recognize Israel's right to exist."

Dedication of the three-piece sculpture, created by noted American artist Vivienne Thaul Wechter, had been scheduled before Sadat's assassination. In the wake of Sadat's death, the ceremony took on a special meaning, Kirkland observed.

"ANWAR SADAT'S faith in humanity cost him his life," he said. "As we stand before this work of hope, we are reminded that all who share that hope are also victims of the assassins who destroyed the peacemaker."

Egyptian Ambassador Ashraf A. Ghorbal, who spoke at the dedication ceremonies along with Israeli Ambassador Ephraim Evron, said that while Sadat is gone "his legacy is with us and will so continue. . . The peace that he charted and we unanimously support will continue, I daresay, with more conviction and more vigor."

The overwhelming election of Hosni Mubarak to succeed Sadat as president of Egypt "confirms our unwavering stand to enhance and maintain the Camp David accord as a framework of a comprehensive peace that encompasses all the peoples and countries in the area," he said.

Ambassador Evron warned that the Palestine Liberation Organization can never be a partner to the peace process because it is committed to the destruction of Israel. "There can never be any dialogue with people who are committed and determined to eliminate you," said Evron.

The ambassador said the Israelis were encouraged by Mubarak's expressed intention to "follow in the road to peace that was charted by his illustrious predecessor," and that the peace talks are continuing. But he cautioned that peace means more than words.

"THERE CAN BE no peace if Israel is weakened, if Israel is put in a situation where it cannot defend itself. A weak Israel is a temptation and an invitation to war," Evron said, "and therefore security is an indivisible part of the peace process."

Formally titled "Leap into Faith—Homage to the Camp David Accord," the commemorative sculpture was crafted by members of the Steelworkers in Pittsburgh and assembled early this month as a permanent addition to the Meany Center. Its creator describes the work as "a tangible affirmation of the always possible strength of the human spirit."

Mediation Service Shuts 4 Offices

The Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service announced consolidation of its eight regional offices into four geographical areas to conform to the Reagan Administration's order for cutbacks in government agencies.

The headquarters office for each area, Eastern, Southern, Central, and Western, will be situated in New York, Atlanta, Chicago, and San Francisco, respectively.

Continued Ban Urged on Export Of Alaskan Oil

Existing restrictions on exports of crude oil from Alaska's North Slope are in the nation's interest and should be retained, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland urged in a letter to Interior Sec. James G. Watt.

Kirkland expressed concern that a Cabinet committee is considering supporting legislation that would lift export restrictions so that Alaskan oil could be sold to Japan or "swapped" for oil from other nations.

CONGRESS HAS mandated that Alaskan oil be kept in the United States, with rare exception. But Kirkland noted that repeated pressures to allow its export have discouraged the construction of new West Coast refineries and west-to-east pipeline facilities.

In any emergency, Kirkland stressed, the United States "will need all the oil it can get" and shouldn't have to depend on foreign sources.

Further, he noted, consumers are unlikely to benefit from any export profits, and the economy will suffer "from decreased employment, oil transportation and shipbuilding."

'Off Our Backs'

OKAY, now government is off our backs. It happened Oct. 1, the start of a new federal fiscal year, when Reagan budget and tax cuts went into effect.

It's a great feeling, isn't it? Getting the government off your back? Following is a partial listing of whom the government is getting off the backs of.

- Government is now off the backs of more than one million jobless workers who'd previously been eligible for extended unemployment benefits. No such benefits will be loaded on their backs anymore.
- Government is now off the backs of 234,000 workers, jobless because of imports. Special unemployment benefits are no longer available to them.
- Government is now off the backs of millions (nobody's sure just how many) who will lose their eligibility for health care under the Medicaid program. Most of these are the working poor. In fact, most of those whose backs government is getting off of in a whole range of programs are the working poor.
- GOVERNMENT is now off the backs of some 340,000 workers who held jobs under the CETA program and whose jobs provided needed community services.
- Government is now off the backs of several hundred thousand college students and students-to-be—most of them the children of workers—who now will be ineligible for low-interest loans for their education.
- Government is now off the backs of more than 400,000 families previously getting help under Aid to Families With Dependent Children (another 258,500 families will have benefits reduced).
- Government is now completely off the backs of 875,000 families that previously got food stamps and partly off the backs of 1.4 million families representing five million persons who've had their food stamp benefits reduced.
- Government is now off the backs of millions of elderly Americans. The deductible amount of hospital costs they must pay under Medicare rises 27 percent.

—Memo from COPE.

'Almost Necessary'

IF THERE is any chagrin on the part of the Reagan Administration that the first fruit of its economic policy is a recession, you won't find it in the reaction of Secretary of Commerce Malcolm Baldrige.

"A slight recession," he told reporters, is "almost necessary right now."

The policies that put the economy into reverse, he suggested, are what the nation needs to hold down inflation.

With no visible regret, Mr. Baldrige said the economy's "sluggishness" is likely to continue. "I don't think there is any way out of it."

THERE IS, of course, a way out through the job-creating, economic stimulus programs that previous Administrations, both Democratic and Republican, have used to counter unemployment. But this is not the way of the Reagan Administration.

Unfortunately, for workers without jobs because of an "almost necessary" recession, it is "almost necessary" to eat and pay the rent.

Foot in the Door

Going Down in Flames

Rise in Arson for Hire Reflects Continuing Decline of Economy

By Gus Tyler

FOR MANY BUSINESSMEN, the light they see at the end of the tunnel is the burning of their own business property.

Whether landlords, manufacturers or small storekeepers, they look to the flames for their financial salvation. Faced with nothing but loss upon loss, they seek the only gain of which they can be certain: collect insurance.

AS IN SO MANY other social phenomena, one of the surest indicators of what is happening to our society is what goes on in the world of crime, where arson is the most rapidly growing business in the criminal world. Last year arson cost the nation $15 billion. The sum is big, but it will soon be bigger. Arson is rising at the rate of 20-25 percent a year.

Not all arsonists, of course, are in it for the buck. There are just plain nuts, firebugs, who like to set things aflame just to see the flash and the flare.

The number of such psychos, however, does not rise appreciably. The great increase in arson comes from those who apply the torch for profit. Those crimes are rising even more rapidly than arson in general.

EVIDENCE THAT arson is big time is the change in the entrepreneurs now engaged in the burning business. At one time, the arsonist was a loner, some individual who, for a couple of bucks, would pour the gasoline and strike the match.

That is no longer so; arson is now the jurisdiction of organized crime. Which means that setting fires for profit is a highly profitable business, for otherwise it would not be worth the time and trouble of the biggies to enter the racket.

Organized crime people are also, of course, more reliable folk with whom to deal. They are professional; they leave fewer telltale clues; they are not likely to squeal, fearing that they will be punished for hurting the good name of the "family" for whom they work.

ARSON IS on the rise because there are more arsonists around and more people who want to hire the torch for profit. And both factors are basically caused by the same fact: an economy in trouble.

The high unemployment rate puts more people on the street who are ready to make a buck by arson. The failing economy puts more business people in the desperate position where they try to "liquidate" their assets by burning down their property to collect insurance.

THE NECESSARY correlation between the downward movement of the economy and the upward movement of crime—such as arson—is such that the number of fires-for-profit might well be used as a key indicator.

Viewed in this manner, it is more than metaphor to suggest that our economy may go down in flames.

'Terrorism Itself Is the Enemy...'

Anwar Sadat's faith in humanity cost him his life. As we stand before this work of hope we are reminded that all who share that hope are also victims of the assassins who destroyed the peacemaker.

They have reminded us of the boundless brutality that animates their cause. They have revealed the heart of darkness into which they would draw the world.

In the assassination of Anwar Sadat the world has once again glimpsed the terrible reality of the terrorism that would destroy not only great men but an entire nation and people. The AFL-CIO will vigorously oppose any actions by our government that lend legitimacy and respectability to terrorist organizations—whether or not they recognize Israel's right to exist. One cannot pick and choose the agents of terrorism that one will support or reject. It is terrorism itself, stripped of its political rationalizations, that is the enemy of civilization.

In dedicating this work of art, we rededicate ourselves to the spirit it symbolizes and the course it commends.

Safeguards Termed Inadequate

'Guest Worker' Plan Attacked As Reviving Bracero Program

The following is from AFL-CIO testimony before the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Immigration, Oct. 14, 1981.

THE REAGAN Administration's proposal to import temporary labor from Mexico is euphemistically labelled a "guest worker" program.

It would provide for up to 50,000 guest workers to be admitted annually for a two-year trial period. The Labor Dept. would be responsible for allocating the 50,000 job slots among the states which certify that there is an inadequate supply of American workers.

We had a guest worker program in this country for some 13 years—from July 1951 to December 1964. That program, known as the bracero program, was instituted when the unemployment rate was 3.3 percent and there were 2 million unemployed persons in the United States.

AT THAT TIME, the case was made that with a relatively small number of unemployed, it was virtually impossible to meet the seasonal needs of employers who use temporary workers for limited periods of time.

The bracero program was abolished by the Congress in 1964, in part, at least, because unemployment had remained at or above 5 percent for a seven-year period, and there was reason to believe that a guest worker program, with its attendant problems, was neither essential nor desirable.

If Congress eliminated the bracero program when unemployment had risen to 3.8 million workers and the unemployment rate was 5.2 percent, it is difficult to understand why a "guest worker" program is being considered today when we have 8 million unemployed and an unemployment rate of 7.5 percent.

We are aware that there may be a few problems in recruiting seasonal workers for certain jobs even when the pool of unemployed workers is 8 million, but we insist that the problem is one of wages and working conditions.

We urge you to reject the undocumented but oft-repeated charge that temporary foreign workers must be brought into the United States to take jobs which American workers refuse to take. The charge is a fiction.

THE PROPOSAL for a guest worker program notes that "normal" wage and working standards would apply but does not define "normal." In fact, despite considerable experience in the field of labor standards, I have never encountered the word "normal" as applied to a standard for wages or working conditions.

Our experience with guest worker programs would lead us to require more than an assertion by a state that they require guest workers. We are not reassured by the requirement that guest worker jobs would be excluded in a state only if the state certifies that there is an adequate supply of American workers.

I do not wish to sound cynical but I can foresee instances in which states might well interpret the word "adequate" to mean workers who will work at substandard pay under poor conditions and, lacking a pool of such workers, would feel justified in asking for guest workers.

There is nothing in the program which restricts it to farm workers. Workers could be brought in to work in the textile and apparel industries as well as in hotels and restaurants, and in skilled and unskilled jobs.

WE NOTE that the advocates for this program see it as a means of improving relations between Mexico and the United States. However, the National Committee for Full Employment, a coalition of church, civil rights, Hispanic Americans and labor groups, has said that "it makes no sense to bring additional workers to the United States when there are 8 million unemployed."

Other groups have opposed the program because they foresee the creation of a group of employees ripe for exploitation.

To my knowledge, the Mexican government has not taken an official position on the issue but the Mexican trade-union movement has indicated opposition to the program.

Also, Mexican officials have expressed concern not only that they might lose workers with needed skills but also concern with the social problems which would be generated by requiring that guest workers leave their spouses and minor children at home.

THE AFL-CIO has frequently stated its support for a coordinated, integrated immigration policy.

We have also endorsed the use of strong and effective federal sanctions against employers who hire illegal immigrants, including injunctions backed by criminal penalties for repeat violators.

We do not view the guest worker program as a means of stopping or even reducing illegal immigration. We see it only as aggravating our already serious unemployment problem and as a tool for undermining wages and working conditions.

A thorough review and overhaul of the nation's immigration policy is long overdue. The AFL-CIO pledges that organized labor will taken an active role in the effort to pass constructive legislation.

Policies Not Working

Downturn in Economy Linked To Reagan's Failed Programs

THE ADMINISTRATION'S economic plan has plunged the economy to a new low that is hurting millions of ordinary Americans while high-income individuals and corporations reap increasing benefits, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald charged in a network radio interview.

Stressing that half-a-million more workers have hit the unemployment rolls in the last two months and that bankruptcies are running substantially ahead of last year, Oswald scored President Reagan's new push for more budget cuts "just two months after he had signed a bill that he said contained more than everything he wanted."

In effect, the President is admitting that "his program of budget cuts and tax policies is not working the way he predicted it would work," Oswald asserted. He was questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO public affairs program, Labor News Conference.

Oswald said that with "very minor changes" in the tax cuts, the President could get the $16 billion he wants without "compounding the problems" caused by undercutting essential programs. He urged a $700 cap on the individual tax cuts scheduled for 1982, return of the business tax investment credit to 7 percent, and repeal of the "windfall oil profits loophole that was put into the recent tax changes."

The $700 tax cut cap would affect only those individuals with incomes over $42,000, Oswald pointed out, and assure that individuals with very high incomes would bear a fairer share of the burden of balancing the budget. He noted that under the "open-ended" cuts now scheduled, many very wealthy persons would get cuts of $2,000 and more.

OSWALD ALSO URGED that the makeup of the Federal Reserve Board, which sets the nation's basic monetary policy, be changed to make it more responsive to the agricultural, labor and "broad consumer interests of this country."

He said the current board is a "reflection of a group of bankers and persons who previously served in congressional or administration posts."

Such a body, he protested, ignores the vast majority of Americans, who are workers, farmers and consumers.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

PRESIDENT REAGAN and the men around him keep repeating that the federal government has grown out of control and the country is in the greatest economic mess since the 1930s. They say the "mess" will disappear if federal regulations of business are scrapped and the federal tax burden cut.

If Reagan's economic theory turns out to be sound, a score of trade union and university economists will be as surprised as they are relieved. The group gathered for an economic policy seminar recently at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies in Silver Spring, Md. They came away convinced that the facts fail to support the President.

Here are some of the examples they cited of Reagan's assumptions that ignore the realities.

• Reagan—The federal government is growing out of control.

Reality—Federal employment and federal purchases of goods and services actually have been declining when measured against total wage and salary employment and the total of all goods and services produced in this country (GNP).

Federal employment was 4.19 percent of all wage and salary employment in 1960, but only 3.16 percent in 1980. Federal employment declined from 6.9 percent of total U.S. employment in 1955 to 4.1 percent in 1979. Between 1969 and 1979, the total number of federal employees did not increase at all.

Federal purchases were 10.60 percent of GNP in 1960, 9.64 percent in 1970, and only 8.77 percent in 1980.

• Reagan—The federal debt has been increasing dangerously.

Reality—The federal debt has increased much less than most other debt since 1950. In 1979, it was only three times higher than in 1950. The relative numbers for other forms of debt were: consumer installment, 14 times more; mortgage debt, 16 times higher; corporate debt, 13 times, and state and local government debt, 14 times more.

• Reagan—Government efficiency will be increased and government costs reduced if responsibility can be shifted from the federal to state and local governments.

Reality—The growth in government expenditures and employment has been mostly at the state and local levels. Between 1949 and 1979, federal government employment increased by 850,000 or 41 percent while state and local governments increased employment by 9.7 million or 400 percent.

Between 1958 and 1977, purchases of goods and services by the federal government increased from $53.9 billion to $143.9 billion or 167 percent. In the same period, state and local government expenditures increased from $44.3 billion to $270 billion or 500 percent.

PROF. RAY MARSHALL of the University of Texas, former Secretary of Labor, summed up the seminar's misgivings about the Reaganite faith in private industry as an economic cure-all:

"While the private market can be a marvel at promoting short-run efficiency, it cannot do many things. It cannot prevent recession and inflation or create the environment for relatively free trade and competition. Markets also have difficulty in protecting the environment, and the health and safety of workers, eliminating discrimination, promoting equal opportunities, fostering long-run basic research and innovation and ensuring national security."

When the George Meany Center seminar ended, the consensus was that America's future depends on a sensible division of responsibilities among government, the private market and mechanisms such as collective bargaining that promote cooperative problem-solving.

MILLIONS OF ORDINARY Americans are hurt while wealthy persons and corporations reap bigger breaks as the Administration subbornly holds to its unwise economic plan that has plunged the economy into an ever-deepening low, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald, center, charged on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Jerome Cahill, left, of the New York Daily News and Drew Von Bergen of United Press International. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired on Mutual radio.

Key House Rollcalls on Voting Rights

The House defeated all weakening amendments and passed a labor-supported bill extending enforcement provisions of the Voting Rights Act on Oct. 5, sending the measure to the Senate.

Column I shows the 277-132 defeat of an amendment that would have abolished the present requirement that suits seeking to end court supervision of elections must be heard by a three-judge federal panel in the District of Columbia, rather than in the state affected. Right votes (R) were cast by 202 Democrats and 75 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 30 Democrats and 102 Republicans.

Column II is the 284-128 defeat of an amendment to drop the requirement that bilingual election material must be provided in counties with significant Hispanic or other language-minority groups. Voting right were 219 Democrats and 65 Republicans; 16 Democrats and 112 Republicans voted wrong.

Column III shows the 389-24 vote to pass the bill. On this, 229 Democrats and 160 Republicans were right; 7 Democrats and 17 Republicans were wrong.

PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; A—absent and not paired.

Job Losses Mount

Building Trades Blast High-Interest Policies

tories, and the modernizing of public facilities.

"INVESTMENTS that yield jobs and improve the nation's productive base are so important to the economy that they should not have to compete against speculators and corporate takeover bids for the limited amount of credit available," he said.

"Until interest rates come down to more sane levels, we will never know whether the Reagan tax program can be translated from theory into reality.

"The most valuable contribution this convention can make to improving the health of the economy is to speak clearly and forcefully to the issue of reducing interest rates," Georgine told the delegates.

Both Georgine and Kirkland warned that attempts to repeal and weaken the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law could put added burdens on construction workers.

"THE ATTACKS on unions, on labor protections, on wages and hours are little more than an attempt to legislate the wage-busting conditions that led to the Great Depression," Georgine warned. Kirkland reinforced that point, declaring.

"In the name of fighting inflation, the enemies of Davis-Bacon tell us the lowest bidder on any government construction project should be free to auction off the jobs to the lowest bidder among workers" —the ones with the lowest skills and the most desperate workers in a depressed industry, he said.

"The argument that this would boost productivity and open new opportunities for deserving contractors is cynical nonsense.

"It would put conscientious, fair-minded contractors out of business. It would put government construction in the hands of scab-herders and short-cut artists. It would injure local businesses, local workers and local communities by reducing earnings to the lowest common denominator."

KIRKLAND CHARGED that the Administration is making other attempts to fight inflation at the expense of workers. He cited efforts to repeal overtime wage protections, remove minimum wage guarantees for young workers and lift restrictions on industrial homework.

Kirkland and Georgine also warned delegates of similar efforts to undermine job safety and health standards and to impose Hobbs Act penalties on strikers.

OSHA is vital to the interests of building trades workers, Georgine declared. To those who would undermine it, he warned, "keep your hands off OSHA."

GEORGINE ALSO stressed that the nation's energy needs cannot be ignored, and he called for wider use of alternative fuels and the development of synthetic energy sources.

"Similarly, America must not make the mistake of halting the development of safe nuclear power without having alternative sources on line and ready to fill the needs for energy," he declared.

It would be sheer folly to endanger the future health of the economy by ignoring any source of energy, he said.

Other speakers addressing the delegates on opening day of the convention included Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan, OSHA Director Thorne G. Auchter, and Robert Bonitati, special assistant to Reagan. All three speakers defended the Administration's policies, contending that their aims were the same as those of the labor movement although the Administration's approach may be different.

DONOVAN promised the delegates that the President would not allow the Davis-Bacon Act to be repealed.

He said the changes the Labor Dept. has proposed are intended to make the program more workable, not to destroy labor standards.

Donovan insisted that the new regulations would be less "burdensome."

Tennessee Labor Approves 10-Cent Per Capita Rise

Nashville, Tenn.—The Tennessee AFL-CIO convention approved a 10-cent increase in per capita payments and drafted a legislative agenda focused on winning full collective bargaining rights for public employees and improved administration of the state workers' compensation program.

The 328 convention delegates unanimously endorsed the re-election of Sen. James R. Sasser, who has been targeted for defeat by right-wing political action groups. Sasser, a Democrat, will be seeking a second term in 1982. He has compiled a 71 percent "right" COPE voting record in the Senate.

THE PER CAPITA increase, effective Oct. 1, raises monthly payments to 35 cents.

Delegates called on the state legislature to explore alternatives to the current court-administered system of determining workers' compensation benefits and urged legislation mandating all employers to make payroll deductions available to cover union dues.

Turning to federal legislative issues, the convention called on Tennessee's congressional delegation to reject all attempts to gut the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law and urged adoption of measures to halt the export of U.S. jobs.

STATE AFL-CIO President James G. Neeley reported that membership in the state labor council had increased 17,000 over the past two years to exceed the 100,000 mark. Neeley was elected to a new two-year term.

Delegates paid a special tribute to Lee Case, who retired as secretary-treasurer after 18 years. In 44 years of service to labor, Case has been president, financial secretary and business agent of Plumbers & Pipe Fitters Local 43 in Chattanooga. He also served a stint as Tennessee's labor commissioner.

Eddie Bryan, administrative assistant to Neeley, was elected to succeed Case. Bryan is a member of the Communications Workers.

THE CONVENTION also elected First Vice President H. T. Powell and Second Vice President Ross Hudson and 19 vice presidents to new terms.

Speakers at the three-day convention included Sasser, Democratic Representatives Marilyn Bouquard, Albert Gore, Jr., William H. Boner, Harold Ford and Ed Jones, Nashville Mayor Richard Fulton and President Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Oregon State Labor Elects Fletcher, Baugh to Top Posts

Springfield, Ore.—Irvin H. Fletcher of the Teachers is the new president of the Oregon AFL-CIO and Robert C. Baugh, also of the Teachers, is the new secretary-treasurer. Nellie Fox of the Food & Commercial Workers continues as director of legislation and political education.

Fletcher unseated Robert G. Kennedy of the Machinists for the state federation's executive position in elections at the Oregon AFL-CIO's 25th annual convention. Kennedy had held office since 1975.

Baugh, at 32, is the youngest of the three full-time officers in the State AFL-CIO's history. He narrowly defeated Glenn H. (Pat) Randall for the administrative post. Randall, of the Carpenters, had served since 1967.

FOX RETAINED the political directorship, which she has filled since 1975, turning back a challenge from Lloyd B. Knudsen of the IBEW, who previously held the job from 1969-75.

Fletcher, 49, had been executive secretary-treasurer of the Lane County AFL-CIO in nearby Eugene for 10 years and also worked as director of an apprenticeship information center.

Nine persons were re-elected to federation executive board posts along with 10 new members. Only two races were contested.

Delegates gave standing ovations to the new and former officers and board members in a demonstration of solidarity as the outgoing leaders pledged to work with their successors.

EARLIER IN the five-day convention, delegates recognized the need for stepped-up political action by unanimously enacting a special 5-cent per capita tax increase earmarked for assisting COPE-endorsed candidates for statewide and legislative district races. The special levy will run for two years until Oct. 1, 1983. Delegates also voted to continue a special one-cent per capita tax for organizing purposes.

The importance of political action by labor to offset the threats posed by the Reagan Administration and its right-wing allies was stressed by major speakers, including Representatives Les AuCoin and James Weaver, and State Sen. Ted Kulongoski, all Democrats; President Keith Johnson of the Woodworkers; Vice President Stanley Jensen of the Machinists, and Walter Gray, regional COPE director.

Johnson noted that Oregon's official unemployment rate had just hit 10 percent, third highest in the nation, but said the actual jobless figure is closer to 20 percent. The state's bellwether timber industry has been especially hard hit along with construction, and there have been plant shutdowns and layoffs in steel, textiles, fish processing and other industries. It is estimated that unemployment in the building trades is at 40 percent and that 49 percent of the workers in the state's timber industry are jobless or working reduced hours.

GOV. VICTOR Atiyeh (R) also addressed the convention urging labor to work with management and government in addressing the state's economic problems.

The 445 delegates, their ranks swelled by nearly 300 fraternal delegates and guests, acted on 90 resolutions covering a broad range of subjects. Among the goals pressed by the convention were improvements in the state workers' compensation system, enactment of plant closure legislation, equal pay for work of comparable worth, deepening of the Columbia River channel and other public works projects, lowering of interest rates, federal funding for Public Health Service programs for maritime workers, strengthening of the merchant marine, and establishment of a state ethics commission for the media.

Sen. Mark Hatfield (R-Ore.) was commended for his leadership in clearing through the Senate Appropriations Committee a postal subsidy bill to continue the present rate system for second-class nonprofit publications.

NEW PRESIDENT of the Rubber Workers, Milan Stone, left, is congratulated at the URW Convention in Bal Harbour, Fla., by outgoing President Peter Bommarito, who is retiring. Stone, 54, has been a URW vice president since 1977.

U.S. Economy Sinks Deeper Into Recession

that define a recession translate into "lost jobs and lost output of goods and services."

Despite the Reagan rhetoric of increasing "supply," he noted, its policy has been to reduce the supply of goods and services.

WHILE A FINAL, technical judgment still is to be given by the National Bureau of Economic Research, a private organization, the U.S. economy appears to have entered its latest recession in July or August. That is when industrial production started to fall off, initial claims for unemployment benefits jumped and new factory orders began to dwindle.

A recession is usually defined as two consecutive quarters of decline in real GNP. In the second quarter, real output fell at an annual rate of 1.6 percent after rising abnormally at an 8.6 percent rate in the first three months of the year.

Even before the government announced the latest drop in real output, President Reagan conceded that the nation was indeed in a recession. Responding to White House reporters' questions about the unusually sharp decline in September industrial production, he said:

"I THINK this is a light, and I hope short, recession. Yes, I think everyone agrees on this."

Reagan's remarks were the first acknowledgement from the Administration that the economy was in a recession, despite an abundance of signs that had pointed in that direction over the summer.

For months, the housing and automobile industries had been in a state of depression as prospective buyers held back under the pressure of prohibitive interest rates. As the September report on industrial production underscored, however, the weakness in the economy had spread.

THE FEDERAL Reserve Board said that industry output last month fell eight-tenths of 1 percent, the second monthly drop in a row and the largest in 16 months. A wide range of industries reported production declines, and these cutbacks were leading to layoffs. Industrial production constitutes about one-third of the nation's gross national product.

In the past two months, the unemployment rate has jumped half a percentage point to 7.5 percent as many adult men and women lost their jobs. Nearly 8 million Americans were out of work in September, and their number is growing daily.

Joblessness is on the upswing at U.S. Steel and Bethlehem Steel because of "soft" orders and high interest rates. Caterpillar Tractor recently laid off 2,300 workers indefinitely. Lumber mills in the Pacific Northwest reported joblessness of 20 to 30 percent. Westinghouse plans to lay off 1,300 at its Fairmont, W. Va., lamp plant.

Jerry L. Jordan, a member of the President's Council of Economic Advisers responsible for forecasting, said he expects the unemployment rate to climb above the 8 percent mark this winter and average 8.1 or 8.2 percent in the first quarter of 1982.

THE COST OF TRAINING replacements for the 11,500 air traffic controllers fired for walking off their jobs in August will be about $1.4 billion, far more than the $100 million estimated by the Reagan Administration, Executive Director John F. Leyden of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. told a House committee. He urged the Administration to resume negotiations with the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization. Leyden, left, was accompanied by Steven Pruitt, PED legislative affairs coordinator.

Employer Penalties Asked To Halt Illegal Immigration

Penalties against employers are needed to stem the tidal wave of illegal immigration that has depressed wages and added to unemployment, union witnesses testified at House hearings.

Ladies' Garment Workers Executive Vice President Frederick R. Siems blamed the return of sweatshops in the apparel industry on the absence of any penalty for employers who seek out and hire undocumented workers.

ALONG WITH employer penalties, Siems urged a generous amnesty policy for undocumented workers already in the United States and a tamper-proof identification card.

The need for such an identification card, linked to a worker's social security number, was stressed also in testimony by the AFL-CIO Food & Beverage Trades Dept.

Peter Allstrom, the department's research director, told the House committee that restaurants are the largest single employer of illegal aliens, who are preferred over U.S. residents because "they work hard and scared," often for substandard wages. He cited studies that found wages of illegal aliens averaging 40 percent below that of legal workers and repeated instances of unpaid overtime.

ALLSTROM ALSO testified at companion hearings being held by a Senate Judiciary subcommittee on the Administration's so-called "guest worker" proposal to bring up to 50,000 Mexican nationals into the United States in each of two years for stays up to 12 months.

The Reagan Administration seems to be abandoning its "marketplace" philosophy by advocating importation of labor to relieve supposed shortages of workers, Allstrom suggested. Without government action, he said, wages and working conditions would be improved in order to attract the needed workers.

HE REMINDED the panel of the abuses of the bracero program with Mexico, which Congress ended in 1964, and the social tensions generated by the guest worker programs in Europe.

At the House subcommittee hearings, Siems pointed out that the ILGWU's membership is made up largely of women, minorities and recent immigrants — groups whose hard-won gains are most vulnerable to the unfair competition of sweatshop operators who exploit undocumented workers in fear of deportation if they complain.

GOP Moderates Balk At New Round of Cuts

The voting rights issue appeared to put the President at odds with the majority of House Republicans who joined in the 389-24 passage of the bill. (Rollcall, Page 6)

At a meeting with newspaper editors, Reagan commented that the House "has been pretty extreme in what it's done" and expressed the hope that the Senate will be more "reasonable."

His comment was later linked by a White House aide to a section of the House bill that makes clear that an election law which has the effect of discriminating against a racial minority is illegal even if the federal government can't prove that the intent of the law was to discriminate.

A Supreme Court decision last year appeared to impose an obligation to show intent to discriminate, and civil rights groups consider it essential to tighten the law.

Meanwhile the House-passed bill has been placed on the Senate calendar—a safeguard against the risk that it would be bottled up in a hostile Judiciary Committee.

Controllers Set Appeal on Union Rights

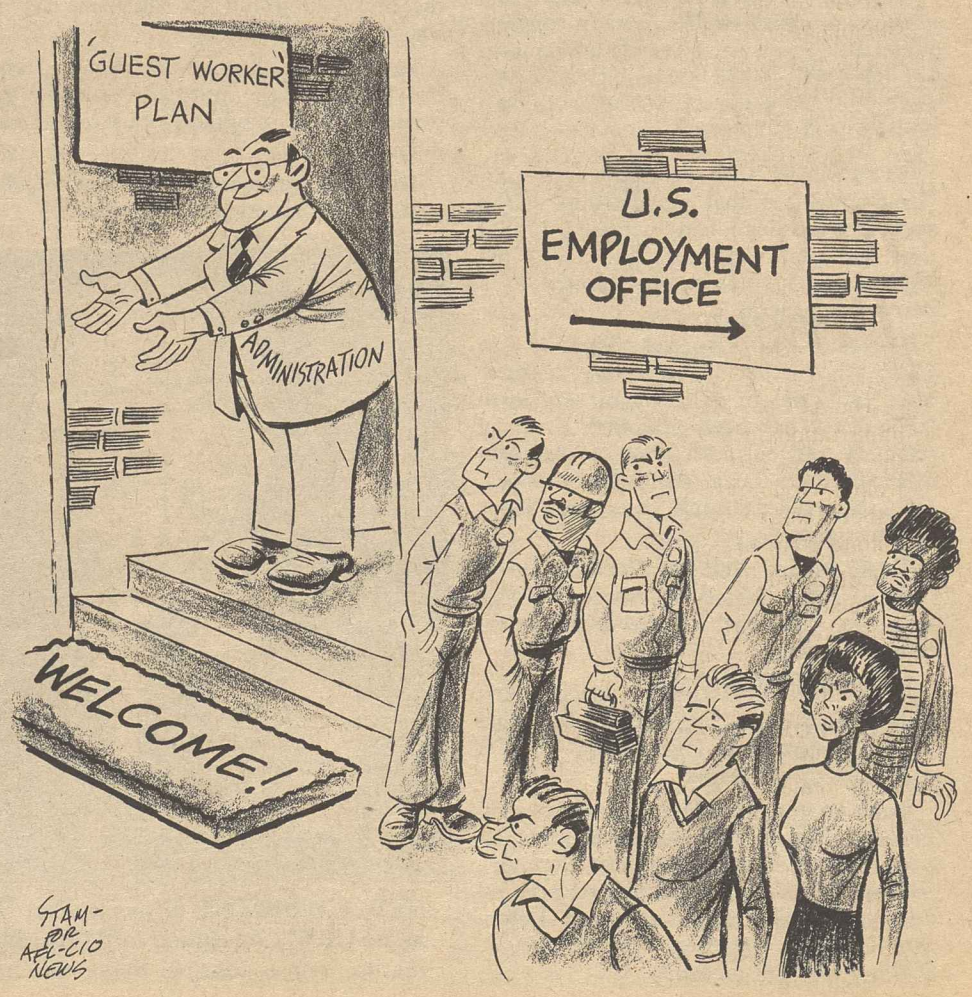
ufacturers and suppliers," Poli noted. "While almost everyone has an opinion as to who is at fault for the controllers' strike, surely these employees who have lost their jobs are blameless."

The impact on the airline industry and the general economy has been staggering, Poli said, adding that the amount of money that the Administration has spent since Aug. 3 in its efforts to rebuild the nation's air traffic control system from the ground up "far outweighs any contract proposal ever made by this union."

Other witnesses reinforced Poli's observations. They told the committee, chaired by Rep. William D. Ford (D-Mich.), that machinists, flight attendants, and workers in related businesses are losing their jobs because airlines have reduced operations to cope with the cutback in the air traffic control system.



JOHN F. PETERPAUL, general vice president of the Machinists, said about 3,200 IAM members have been laid off as a direct result of the strike and that as many as 50 percent of the union's 88,000 airline industry members could be laid off if flight schedules at major airports are reduced when the Federal Aviation Administration revises its flight schedules in December.

"Fewer flights generally result in fewer jobs for our members in the manufacture, construction, servicing, and staffing of aircraft," said Peterpaul. "The Administration has waged an all-out war and has won the war. It should now win the peace with reason and tolerance."

Executive Director John F. Leyden of the AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. said the current aviation service disruption could well be "the most costly labor-management impasse in recent labor history," and he called on the Administration to reconsider its position on rehiring the controllers.

"A MID-COURSE correction by the Administration will not be perceived as weakness but as a sign of strength and compassion," said Leyden, the immediate past president of PATCO.

Meanwhile, the FAA announced plans to scale back already curtailed air traffic at 20 of the nation's major airports starting Dec. 1. The agency said it will reduce airline activity nationwide to about 79 percent of the operating level before the strike. It claims that airline activity now is at about 84 percent of prestrike flight levels.

Senate Vote Clears Sale of Radar Planes

By David L. Perlman

President Reagan persuaded a 52-48 majority of the Senate to allow the sale of sophisticated AWACS radar planes to Saudi Arabia despite concerns that it will tilt the military balance in the Middle East.

The Senate vote cancelled out the 301-111 resolution of disapproval adopted by the House two weeks earlier. Both the House and Senate would have had to vote against the arms sale in order to block it.

THE AFL-CIO Executive Council had urged Congress to reject the agreement to sell five highly secret Airborne Warning and Control Systems aircraft to the Saudis. The council termed the sale irresponsible and a threat to world peace.

There were strong signs that Congress shared labor's concerns. At the time of the one-sided House vote disapproving the sale, a majority of senators were on record in opposition to putting America's most sensitive and sophisticated technology in the hands of a feudal power that has called for Israel's destruction.

But an intensive personal lobbying effort by Reagan switched enough votes to change the outcome. The $8.5 billion sale to the oil-rich Saudis includes missiles and fuel tanks to increase the range and firepower of 60 F-15 fighter planes Saudi Arabia is buying from the United States.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council noted that when the sale of the F-15 fighters was consummated three years ago, Congress was assured that the planes would not carry the offensive armaments and capabilities that are now being provided.

In the domestic area, the President lost a round in the Senate despite a Republican majority.

The test came on a multi-billion-dollar appropriations bill for the Interior Dept. that took on significance because it was

HOUSTON ORGANIZING Project, announced at this press conference, will seek to build union membership in the fast-growing area through the coordinated efforts of the AFL-CIO, 30 international unions and the city's labor movement. From left, are Director Alan Kistler of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, President Harry Hubbard of the Texas AFL-CIO, Sec.-Treas. Don A. Horn of the Harris County AFL-CIO, Project Coordinator Robert Comeaux, and President Maynard White of the county labor federation.

Coordinated Project

30 Unions Pool Forces For Houston Organizing

Houston — The Houston Organizing Project was publicly launched here by the AFL-CIO, 30 international unions and the city's labor movement to build trade unionism in the nation's fastest-growing and, now, fourth-largest city.

Alan Kistler, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services, told a gathering of nearly 200 Houston and international union representatives that with the city central body providing the spark, unions in the city have pooled their resources and drawn on those of the entire labor movement to press their determination to match the city's growth.

THE PROJECT, modeled to some extent on a successful organizing campaign begun 20 years ago in Los Angeles, commits organizers from most of the 30 international unions involved, along with AFL-CIO field staff and project staff to strengthen the organizing efforts of Houston's local unions.

The drive confronts directly the challenges of Sunbelt economics and the burgeoning use of union-busting labor management "consultants" to stifle union membership in this "right to work" state.

"Labor has much to face down the road," said Service Employees Sec.-Treas. Richard Cordtz at the kickoff. "Unions must reach out to millions. . . . But the real challenge is organizing in the South. I feel certain this organizing program will be a success."

STEELWORKERS District Director Edward Ball, speaking on behalf of USWA President Lloyd McBride, stressed that organizing "is the lifeblood of the labor movement," vital to build its strength and effectiveness in serving the needs of working people.

"Sometimes we just pay lip service to the principle of 'in unity there is strength'," Ball observed, "but through the efforts of this organizing project, we are clearly working together."

The project has the strong support of the Harris County AFL-CIO Council and the Houston Gulf Coast Building & Construction Trades Council.

The Houston project offers the local

Rehiring of Air Controllers Pressed to End 'Vendetta'

The AFL-CIO called on the Reagan Administration to end its "vendetta" against the striking Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization now that the Federal Labor Relations Authority has revoked the union's right to represent its members.

Continued refusal to rehire the controllers "would not be justice but revenge," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a statement following the federal panel's decertification announcement.

DEPLORING THE 2-1 decision, Kirkland said that "FLRA's action does, at least, remove the last semblance of an excuse" for the government's refusal to address the real question still at stake, namely, how to restore the air traffic system to full operation promptly while providing controllers with fair working conditions.

Within hours of the FLRA's Oct. 22 decertification order, a federal appeals court issued a temporary stay that was subsequently discontinued as "unwarranted." The court, which criticized the government's presentation of reasons for going ahead with the decertification, gave the union 10 days to file papers appealing the FLRA decision.

The agency's decertification decision marks the first time it has stripped a union of its status as legal representative of a group of federal workers. The FLRA, created three years ago as part of the Civil Service Reform Act, functions in the federal sector much as the National Labor Relations Board in the private sector.

IN VOTING against the decision to decertify, FLRA Chairman Ronald W. Haughton agreed with the majority that the strike constituted an unfair labor practice under federal law, but said the record was insufficient to determine a remedy.

Kirkland Hits Shift to New 'Yardstick'

By James M. Shevis

The Labor Dept.'s planned revision of the housing cost component of the consumer price index is a political expedient that undercuts the nation's most important measure of inflation, the AFL-CIO charged.

"Since the Administration's anti-inflation program is clearly not working," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a statement, "the Administration is seeking a new solution—change the method of computing the consumer price index. In other words, if you don't like the measurements, invent a new yardstick. . . .

"THE AFL-CIO will continue to fight for an effective, comprehensive anti-inflation program, without regard to the Administration's tinkering with the CPI," Kirkland declared.

The planned change in the computation of home ownership costs in the CPI would occur in two stages, the first in January 1983 and the second in January 1985, and could eventually reduce social security and wage and benefit increases for millions of workers and retirees. Existing contracts are not affected.

The reason for the two-stage revamping of the housing component is that there are two CPIs—the consumer price index for all urban consumers (CPI-U), which covers about 80 percent of the population, and the consumer price index for urban wage earners and clerical workers (CPI-W), which covers about half the population covered by CPI-U. The indexes are issued monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics, which has authority to define how they are calculated.

BLS COMMISSIONER Janet L. Norwood said the CPI-U will be changed with publication of price data for January 1983 and the CPI-W with data for January 1985. The latter is the index widely used for cost-of-living adjustments under thousands of labor contracts. It is also used in formulas for COL adjustments in a number of government programs, including social security, civil service and military pensions, and food stamps.

The BLS had planned to revise the index by 1985 or 1986. "However," Norwood told a news conference, "a number of things which have occurred during the

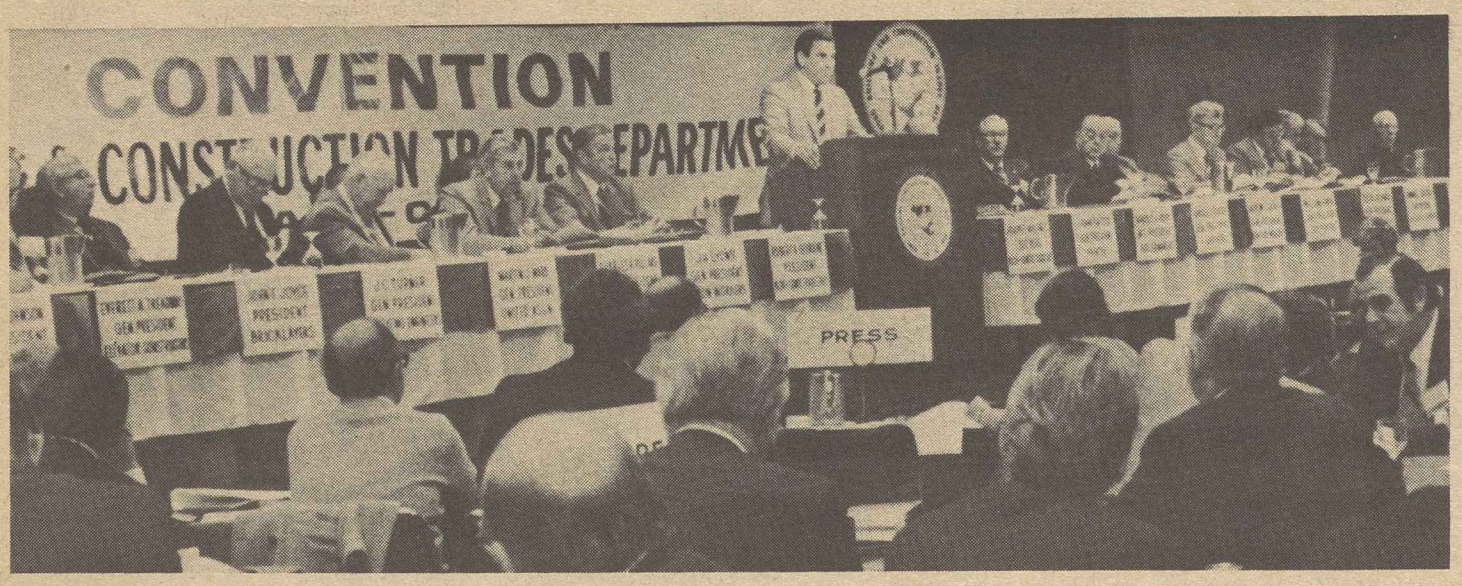
'Real' Earnings Of U.S. Workers Decline Sharply



Another sharp rise in consumer prices—1.1 percent—coupled with a drop in hours worked, reduced the typical American worker's "real" spendable earnings 1.9 percent in September, the largest one-month decline in almost two and a half years.

Spendable earnings—what's left after taxes and inflation are stripped away—came to $221.05 a week for a married worker who had three dependents and earned the average wage. The figure, which is $2.20 less than the August level, is expressed in current dollars.

IN "CONSTANT DOLLARS," keyed to 1977 buying power, however, the same worker's real spendable earnings last month averaged $143.91 a week—$2.80 less than in August and $6.83 below the year-earlier level. Over the year, real spendable earnings were down 4.4 percent.

The last time workers' purchasing power declined so precipitously was in April 1979, when the drop was 2.2 percent. The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which reported the latest figures, said the steep September decline in real spendable earnings resulted ROLLING BACK excessive interest rates and repelling attacks on the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage law are priority issues for the Building & Construction Trades Dept., President Robert A. Georgine told convention delegates.

Building Trades Key Per Capita Hike To Legislative, Organizing Campaigns

By John R. Oravec

Atlantic City, N.J.—The Building & Construction Trades Dept.'s campaigns to preserve worker protections and expand organizing activities were reinforced by convention delegates with the approval of a 5-cent increase in per capita tax.

The convention expressed unanimous agreement on the need to finance efforts to combat attacks on the Davis-Bacon prevailing wage safeguards, repel an anti-union drive in Congress to impose Hobbs Act penalties in picket line disturbances, and improve the department's services to affiliates and BCTD councils.

THE INCREASE in the per capita tax, effective next Jan. 1, will raise monthly payments by affiliates to 21 cents per member.

Stressing the need to intensify political action, the 270 delegates also called on affiliates to establish check-off programs for contributions to meet the challenge of well-funded corporate and right-wing political machines.

"Anti-labor forces have been working steadily in Congress and in the states," the political action resolution noted, "targeting Davis-Bacon, state prevailing wage laws, health and safety protections, and other hard-won rights and benefits of working Americans for weakening or repeal."

The convention pledged an all-out fight against efforts to repeal Davis-Bacon, as well as "tampering" by the Reagan White House with provisions of the existing law.

It noted that recent proposals by the Labor Dept. to alter Davis-Bacon regulations "would have the effect of lowering wage rates on federal projects, permitting many workers to be paid substandard wages under the fiction that they are merely 'helpers,' and weaken the mechanism for detecting violations and enforcing the law."

IN HIS REPORT to the convention, BCTD President Robert A. Georgine observed that "the right wing has taken control of both the White House and the Senate, making it extremely difficult to pass pro-worker legislation and defend past gains. Therefore, it is no surprise that the Davis-Bacon Act is now encountering the most severe attack in its 50-year history."

Georgine charged that the Administration's "misguided" economic policies have caused interest rates to soar, depressing the construction industry and triggering a new surge in unemployment among construction workers. He said the nation's entire economy is feeling the impact.

The convention called for immediate action by the Administration, Congress and the Federal Reserve Board to lower interest rates "to levels which will support a healthy construction industry and a healthy economy."

IT URGED Congress to adopt reforms that would assure the availability of adequate capital at reasonable interest rates to finance investments in new industrial capacity and housing by imposing credit controls on excessive speculation and corporate takeovers; restricting investment abroad, and expanding membership on the Federal Reserve Board to include representation of labor, industry, agriculture and consumers.

To alleviate the housing shortage that is driving up home prices and rents, delegates urged government action to ease tight-money policies and establish programs to expand the supply of low-income and middle-income housing. They also cited the need to encourage union pension fund investments in government-guaranteed mortgages and discourage conversion of rental housing to condominiums.

Other key resolutions adopted at the two-day convention call for:

- Congressional action on legislation to ease the impact of sudden plant closings on workers and communities.
- Federal legislation giving construction workers full rights to picket struck employers at construction sites.
- Support for continued development of nuclear power plants and upgrading safety margins.
- Wider participation by unions in a coordinating committee promoting multi-employer pension plans.

Speakers on the closing day of the convention included Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.), who pledged to help lead the fight in the Senate against the repeal of Davis-Bacon and other anti-worker measures; Rep. James J. Florio (D-N.J.), the Democratic candidate for governor of New Jersey; President William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers, and President Norman Hill of the A. Philip Randolph Institute. Earlier speakers included AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and President Howard D. Samuel of the Industrial Union Dept.

Al Zack Dies, AFL-CIO Spokesman for 25 Years

Albert J. Zack, the official spokesman of the AFL-CIO for nearly a quarter century, died of a heart attack Oct. 29 at his Sarasota, Fla., home.

Zack, 63, retired as director of public relations for the AFL-CIO in January 1980, very shortly after George Meany stepped down as AFL-CIO president. Zack and his wife Jane had lived in Florida and Washington since his retirement.

IN A LETTER to his widow, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue expressed the shock and sadness felt by federation officers and staff members on learning of Zack's death.

"Al's extraordinary powers, personal and professional, were a tremendous asset to the labor movement, they said, noting that since his retirement, the AFL-CIO had continued to draw on his experience and judgment in a wide range of matters.

"The high standards of truth and accuracy that made Al a news source of unquestioned reliability to generations of labor reporters brought honor to the federation he served, as well as to himself," Kirkland and Donahue said.

BEFORE HIS appointment as AFL-CIO public relations director in 1957, Zack served as assistant director and, prior to the 1955 merger, was assistant publicity director of the CIO. From 1947 to 1952, he was publicity director of the Ohio CIO Council and for much of that time served as executive secretary of the Columbus CIO Council.

A long-time member of the Newspaper Guild, Zack played a major role in one of the longest Guild strikes on record, the 16-month strike against the Springfield (Mass.) newspapers in 1946 and 1947. At the time of the strike, he was news editor of the Springfield Daily News.

Earlier he had been a reporter and copy desk editor on New England dailies and had radio news experience as well. He was a native of Holyoke, Mass.

Besides his wife of 41 years, the former Jane Nesworthy, Zack is survived by two children and five grandchildren. His children are Linda Tarr-Whelan, director of government relations for the National Education Association, and Allen Y. Zack, a former AFL-CIO public relations staff member and now a senior associate with the Kamber Group, a Washington, D.C., public relations firm. Also surviving are a brother, Eugene C. Zack of Herndon, Va., and three sisters, Ruth Fuller of Norwell, Mass., Madeline Noll of West Haven, Conn., and Carol Bouchard of Enfield, Conn.

Funeral services in Florida were private. A memorial service will be held at 11 a.m., Monday, Nov. 2, at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md.

Hearing Set On Hobbs Act Amendment

A Senate Judiciary subcommittee has scheduled a Nov. 4 hearing on a bill that seeks to transform a 35-year-old federal anti-racketeering law into a bludgeon against union members engaged in lawful strikes for legitimate goals.

The Hobbs Act amendment is sponsored by Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) and 15 other right-wing Republicans. The push for its enactment comes chiefly from the National Right to Work Committee, which has long sought to link unions to acts of violence.

AT THE SENATE hearings, the anti-union "work" committee will argue the case for the Thurmond bill, and AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland is scheduled to testify in opposition.

At issue is whether Congress will rewrite the Hobbs Act in order to nullify a 1973 Supreme Court decision.

In that landmark case, the Supreme Court found that Congress had intended in the 1946 law to deal with extortion in the guise of union action, not with misconduct in pursuit of lawful ends. Thus, a racketeer who threatened an employer with a strike or picket line if he didn't pay protection money could be prosecuted under the Hobbs Act.

But the Supreme Court majority ruled that the anti-racketeering law, with its potential penalty of 20 years in prison and heavy fines, couldn't be used to prosecute "the worker who threw a punch on a picket line or the striker who deflated the tires on his employer's trucks."

THERE ARE laws—local, state and federal—to deal with specific offenses, the court noted. But it found no evidence in the language or legislative history of the Hobbs Act to support the conclusion "that Congress intended to put the federal government in the business of policing the orderly conduct of strikes."

That's what Thurmond and his co-sponsors are trying to change.

Senate Approves Radar Plane Sale To Saudi Arabia

the first funding bill to reach the Senate floor since Reagan called for a new 12 percent budget slash on top of the heavy cuts Congress had already adopted.

The Senate would have had to slash $1 billion from the Interior Dept. bill to meet the Administration's goals, but it backed its Appropriation Committee's decision to trim only $160 million.

Sen. Mack Mattingly (R-Ga.) sought to cut back the funding by another $380 million—still well below the White House demands. But the Senate rejected his amendment by a 61-35 vote.

Meanwhile, the Appropriations Committee cleared for the Senate floor a $10.6 billion money bill for the Dept. of Transportation, which is in line with the President's original budget request but is $637 million below his new budget target.

In the area of social programs, a sharper test will come when the Senate Appropriations Committee completes its markup of the House-passed bill carrying funds for the Labor Dept., the Education Dept. and the Dept. of Health & Human Services.

The House, early in October, rejected the Administration's call for a further 12 percent reduction in non-mandatory programs. Its bill was nearly $4 billion over the President's revised request.

In the Labor Dept. segment of the funding bill, the Senate committee will be making decisions involving job health and safety enforcement, coverage under the mine safety law, and the wholesale layoffs of experienced Labor Dept. staff that would be required under the Reagan budget.

Kirkland Scores Shift On CPI Housing Costs

past year require that the time schedule for improving the housing component of the CPI be shortened."

Norwood said the revision was being made sooner to have the new CPI-U index in place by the time it determines the tax brackets under an indexing provision of the new tax law which takes effect in 1985. She said that a Senate Finance Committee report estimated that the tax bracket indexing will cut federal revenues by nearly $13 billion.

BECAUSE SOME major labor contracts which use the CPI-W run for as long as three years, Norwood said, substantial advance notice of the change is needed so that these users will have adequate time to adjust to the new indexes.

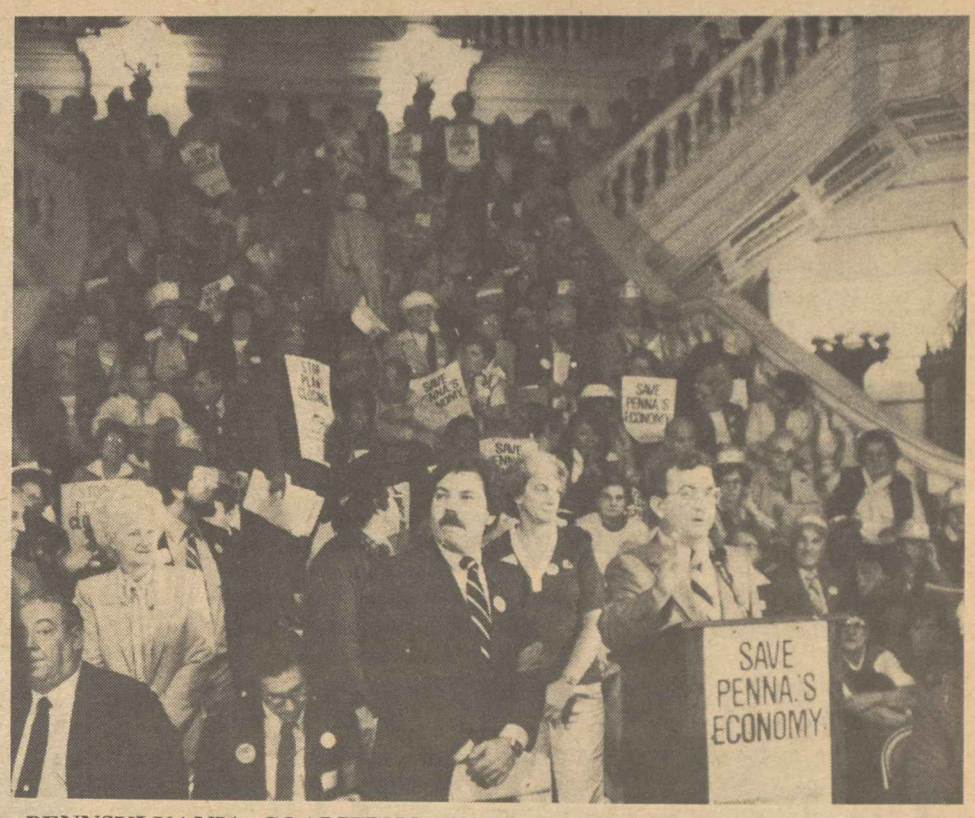
The new method of calculating the housing component will be based on the concept currently employed in BLS's experimental CPI with its built-in "rental equivalence" measure—in BLS's technical parlance, the CPI-U X-1. Home ownership costs under CPI-U and CPI-W are determined by combining house prices and mortgage interest rates, both of which have been highly volatile in recent years. Under the rental equivalence measure, BLS tries to figure out how much it costs homeowners to rent their houses.

KIRKLAND POINTED out that the shift is being made at a time when interest rates have pushed home-buying costs out of reach for most Americans and in spite of the fact that two-thirds of all families are buying homes rather than renting.

"It is true that high interest rates are squeezing out prospective home-buyers, but dropping this component from the CPI will not help these Americans buy a house," he said.

Norwood stressed that the new rental equivalence measure "won't be exactly like the experimental X-1 measure but the X-1 is the closest to it."

She said that BLS has no way of knowing whether the new system will mean a higher or lower CPI, but that the experimental measure using the rental equivalence method resulted in figures almost always lower than either of the two current indexes. In September, for example, CPI-U would have dropped from 11 to 9.2 percent at an annual rate and from 1.2 to eight-tenths of 1 percent on a monthly basis.



Some of the sharpest criticism of the proposed changes in the CPI was expressed by groups representing retired persons. The National Council of Senior Citizens said that it was concerned over the timing of the new calculations.

"THE BLS DECISION was made unexpectedly and at a time when the government is preoccupied with cutting the cost of federal programs," the council said in a statement. "Although we have never stood in the way of honest improvements in the CPI, the National Council of Senior Citizens fears that the proposed changes could reduce benefits in several social programs, including social security.

"We therefore have serious reservations about the new formula, and intend to carefully examine its impact on the elderly and on others who will be affected by the change."

Norwood insisted at her news conference that the decision to change the CPI was not political nor was it influenced by projected federal deficits.

"It is a technical decision, a professional decision that I made, and I will accept responsibility for it," she said.

Relaxed S&L Controls Seen Aggravating Housing Slump

Legislation proposed to help savings institutions out of a financial squeeze would worsen the already severe depression in the nation's homebuilding industry, the AFL-CIO warned at Senate hearings.

Bills being considered by the Senate Banking Committee would allow savings and loan associations and other federally charted thrift institutions to take on many of the characteristics of commercial banks.

THRIFT INSTITUTIONS are a major source of mortgage funds, Henry B. Schechter, director of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, stressed. Allowing alternate and more lucrative investments would result in "an even more restricted flow of funds for residential financing at affordable rates than presently exists."

Further, he suggested, "increased competition for savings will keep interest rates high," to the further detriment of the housing market.

Schechter cited the experience with state-chartered mutual savings banks, which originally were primarily residential mortgage lenders. After they were allowed to invest a greater portion of their assets in commercial loans, the percentage of assets in residential mortgages dropped from 63 percent in 1970 to 48 percent in 1980.

The tight-money policy enforced by the Federal Reserve Board has increased unemployment, forced home-buying costs out of reach of most families and failed to curb inflation, Schechter stressed.

He reiterated the AFL-CIO's call for the use of selective credit controls to make funds available for the most productive uses and "bring interest rates down to affordable housing levels."

If this were done, Schechter suggested, "it might then be possible for many of the thrift institutions to remain primarily in the business of making mortgage loans at affordable rates instead of being merged, becoming commercial banks, or closing their doors."

ON OTHER issues before the committee, Schechter expressed the AFL-CIO's opposition to federal preemption of state consumer credit interest ceilings and urged "a reasonable cap" on the increase in interest rates allowed under adjustable rate mortgages.

He noted that Canada, which has used adjustable rate or rollover mortgages for many years "currently faces the prospect of large numbers of home foreclosures because many mortgagors will have to renew their mortgages at such high interest rates that they will not be able to make required payments."

'Real' Earnings of Workers Down Sharply over Month

from a drop of nine-tenths of 1 percent in average weekly hours and no change in average hourly earnings accompanied by the 1.1-percent rise in consumer prices.

The rise in the government's consumer price index last month was mostly due to another jump in mortgage interest rates, but BLS reported higher prices across the board. Food, transportation, and health costs rose at substantially higher rates than in previous months.

MORTGAGE RATES were up 2.5 percent over the month and are now above 17 percent on a national average. BLS said overall housing costs rose 1.3 percent and accounted for about half of the September CPI increase. Other shelter costs that rose last month were house prices, up six-tenths of 1 percent; rents, up eight-tenths of 1 percent, and fuel and other utilities, up 1.1 percent.

Over the past 12 months, prices have risen 10.8 percent as measured by the consumer price index. Inflation jumped at an annual rate of 13.2 percent during the July-September quarter, compared with 7.4 percent in the second.

"September's CPI emphasizes that inflation continues to be a serious problem," said Chairman Murray L. Weidenbaum of the President's Council of Economic Advisers in a statement.

LOOKING AT actual price performance for the year so far, the CPI has risen at an annual rate of 10.1 percent from January to September. The Administration has forecast a 9.9 percent increase in the index for all of 1981.

Consumer food costs, which had been keeping the CPI down in the spring and early summer, rose nine-tenths of 1 percent in September and were up at an annual rate of 9.9 percent in the third quarter. BLS reported sharp increases for beef, pork, eggs, fresh fruits and vegetables.

Medical care costs continued to surge, rising nine-tenths of 1 percent after an increase of 1 percent in August. Medical care costs have been rising at high rates for the past nine months.

Transportation costs rose 1.2 percent, the largest increase since February, as used car prices went up sharply for the fourth consecutive month. New car prices, even after accounting for rebate programs, were up also.

D.C. Coalition Hits Tuition Tax Credit Bid

Tuition tax credits will do more harm than good to the District of Columbia's residents, a coalition of labor, religious, business and civic organizations charged as it closed ranks in the fight to defeat a proposal for such credits on the city's Nov. 3 ballot.

The scheme would allow District residents to take up to $1,200 off their city income taxes for a child attending private school.

THE BALLOT measure has drawn national attention because it is one of the first local tests of the tax credit concept, which has the backing of the Reagan Administration and conservative organizations including the right-wing National Taxpayers' Union.

The American Federation of Teachers strongly opposes tuition tax credits, and the AFL-CIO has joined the union in testifying against a national tax credit bill introduced in Congress this year.

Opposition to the D.C. ballot question has been led by the Greater Washington Central Labor Council, the Washington Teachers Union, an affiliate of AFT, as well as the Government Employees and the State, County & Municipal Employees.

THE CENTRAL labor council and the unions stress that adoption of the tax credit would seriously damage free public education, drain the city's already hard-pressed treasury, force up other taxes for all D.C. residents and destroy jobs held by teachers, school workers and other city employees.

No reduced costs to public education would result from the plan, the coalition points out, because fixed costs of operating the schools will remain the same even if there is an exodus of children to private schools. Instead, there will be less money for books and supplies, reduced opportunities for students needing remedial, special or accelerated education, and drastic cuts in funds for after-school activities and sports.

"Our system of universal public education" could be "destroyed" if children flock to private schools, leaving public schools "to our poorest citizens only," the coalition stresses.

ALL CITY services will feel the loss of tax revenue, since the bite could be as much as $75 million in the first year alone if the tax credit scheme is approved. Public services such as fire and police protection, trash collection and transportation would have to be cut back, the coalition predicts. Thousands of city workers could be fired, and the coalition estimates that for every two public employees laid off, at least one private sector worker would lose a job as well.

The tax credit would benefit mostly taxpayers who need it least, since the amount of the credit is linked to income. To qualify for the full $1,200, a family of four would need an annual income of $25,300. As much as 75 percent of the benefit, the coalition says, would go to families with incomes over $40,000.

Although the initiative would give D.C. businesses the right to take a credit for up to 50 percent of their tax liability by providing "scholarships" to send children to private schools, the measure is opposed by the city's Board of Trade and other business groups on the ground that it will not only undermine the public education system where many workers are taught, but also erode the tax base and force up taxes on property and business to make up for lost revenues.

In the Name of Freedom

DEMAGOGUES who demand in the name of freedom that government get off "our" backs have no concern for anybody's freedom but their own. They are contemptuous of the freedom and opportunity that vital government programs have brought to school children and old people, the unemployed, the disabled and the disadvantaged.

They have no desire to lift any burdens from the backs of workers. They energetically support compulsory open-shop laws, the imposition of tougher penalties under the Hobbs Act, court injunctions and all of the other restrictions on the activities of workers and their unions.

In the name of fighting inflation, the enemies of Davis-Bacon tell us the lowest bidder on any government construction project should be free to auction off jobs to the lowest bidders among workers—that is, those with the lowest skills and the least bargaining power, the most desperate workers in a depressed industry.

THE ARGUMENT that this would boost productivity and open new opportunities for deserving contractors is cynical nonsense.

There are other proposals to improve productivity and fight inflation at the expense of workers. One is to repeal the eight-hour day, the first and oldest labor standard on the books, so as to relieve employers of overtime pay. Another is to remove minimum-wage protection from youngsters at the bottom of the economic ladder. A third is the return of industrial processes to the home, so that employers can exploit helpless workers—and their children—without paying the rent, or worrying about hours and overtime, or health and safety, or minimum wages, or fringe benefits, or unions.

THERE ARE PROPOSALS to remove the restrictions that restrain industry from polluting the air and water, or from stripping the natural resources that the government holds in trust for the people, and a continuing effort to dismantle the Occupational Safety & Health Act.

These are elements of a general assault on the whole body of laws and regulations through which the government carries out its responsibilities to the people.

Throwing out and destroying that machinery for the ostensible purpose of "getting the government off our backs" has a certain appeal—but only to those who believe that the function of government is to look out for the rich and powerful and to look the other way when ordinary people are injured.

WHAT LIFTED burdens from the backs of the American people was a government that stood at the side of the people, carrying out the plain duty prescribed for government in the Constitution—the duty to "promote the general welfare" and "provide for the common defense."

We in the labor movement take those words at face value. We have spent a hundred years in the struggle to make them real. All our experience reinforces our conviction that, to promote the general welfare requires government to protect the interests of the poor and weak. The rich and powerful can look out for themselves, and they do that extremely well.

Higher Local Taxes

Federal Budget-Balancing Act Dumps Burden on States, Cities

By Gus Tyler

IN 1981, 30 states in the United States raised their taxes by $2.5 billion a year. They did so because the federal government in its drive to balance the budget in Washington is unbalancing the budget in the states. The states have to get more from their taxpayers, because less comes from Washington.

What is true of the states is equally true for the cities, towns and counties. They, too, are raising their taxes and for the same reason—to make up for the federal funds they are losing.

THE PRESSURES on local governments are piling up to the breaking point. Thus, the National Association of Counties, through its executive director, Bernard F. Hillenbrand, warns of a coming collapse of the counties. Referring to President Reagan's recent request for a second round of budget cuts, Hillenbrand said: "If these proposed cuts become reality you may soon read about dozens of counties going bankrupt. We will be lucky to have limited fire and police protection."

Counties—like all local government—will be caught in a squeeze play. As Washington cuts off funds for job training and education programs, more "people will have to go on welfare." At just that time, there will be fewer funds from Washington to cover welfare or anything else.

That leaves local government with no alternative but higher taxes. So the taxes are going up and will continue to do so.

FOR THE AVERAGE taxpayer, this means that any tax benefits from Washington will be cancelled by consequent tax increases locally. This will not apply with equal validity to all taxpayers, however.

The hardest hit will be the poor and the middle-income people, because the kind of taxes levied by local government fall heaviest on these classes. For instance, of the $2.5 billion in added taxes levied by 30 states in 1981, almost all of it consists of general sales taxes, or of specific consumer taxes on gasoline, tobacco, alcoholic beverages. Since the "average" family spends the bulk of its earnings on consumer goods, the bulk of its spendable income is taxed. Those families that put the bulk of their income into investment find the bulk of their spendable dollars untaxed.

As a consequence, the shift in the burden of taxation from Washington to the localities is also a shift in the burden of taxation from the more affluent to the less affluent and to the poor.

IRONICALLY, however, this dumping the dirty job on local government could work out to the political advantage of the President. He looks like an efficient, prudent, business-like statesman who is cutting taxes and cutting expenditures. By contrast, the local governments look like inefficient, improvident wastrels, imposing oppressive new taxes on their citizens in a time of hardship.

As a result, public protest is very likely to be directed at county executives, city mayors, and state governors who will be asked why they don't do like Reagan does. These local officials could reply, of course, that the whole mess is due to Reagan. But will the people understand?

Fed's Tight Money Cure Making Inflation Worse

The record of recent decades shows that reliance on the Federal Reserve's policy of tightening up the money supply to control inflation is ineffective.

It is ineffective because the resultant high interest rates add to inflation both directly and indirectly.

The cost of goods and services that must be financed rises as interest expenses are directly rolled into prices. The skyrocketing cost of purchasing a home is perhaps the most striking example of this process.

Because high interest rates discourage demand, the manufacturing capacity utilization rate declines, and businesses can't operate at levels of peak efficiency. This increases the cost of production.

A longer-run effect results from the increased unemployment of men and machines. Hundreds of billions of dollars of national product and income are foregone. The economy is left with less adequate stocks of housing and industrial equipment than could have been produced and is more susceptible to the next round of inflation.

—From AFL-CIO testimony at Senate Baning Committee hearings, Oct. 28, 1981.

A Modest Proposal

Inflation-Fighting Made Easy

The following commentary was broadcast on CBS Radio's "Newsbreak," Oct. 27, 1981.

By Charles Osgood

THE GOVERNMENT would like to get the consumer price index down for a change, so would a lot of other people. But how can you, when interest rates are so high that hardly anybody can afford a mortgage to buy a house anymore? Well, where there's a will, there's a way and the government has come up with an ingenious plan.

What they're going to do is—and they're announcing it today—they're going to remove the cost of buying a house from the index. It's as simple as that. With mortgage interest rates no longer a factor in computing the index, the index will go down and everybody will be happy. Now, why didn't you and I think of that?

The reasoning behind this might well be applied to some other things, too. Then, you'd really see an improvement in the old CPI. A modest proposal, in just a moment.

WHEN I SAY that hardly anybody can afford to buy a house anymore, I'm not just talking through my hat. At a mortgage interest rate of 17.5 percent, which is the going rate, a modest $60,000 mortgage will run you $880 a month. That's about double what it would have cost you two years ago. And, who can afford that?

Facing reality, then, the consumer price index will, effective in 1983, simply assume that everybody is renting and take house-buying out of the index because house-buying has gotten so expensive.

It's such a terrific idea, why not go all the way? Food, clothing and shelter are the three basic necessities. If we're going to remove shelter, why not remove food and clothing too? Food and clothing prices are up, too, as anybody knows who's bought a pork chop or a new pair of shoes lately.

Once we have taken food, clothing and shelter off the consumer price index, we ought to see inflation, as measured by the CPI, come way down. See what I mean?

In fact, if we pretend that we don't need to eat, don't need anything to wear or any place to live, we can pretend we've got this inflation thing licked for once and for all.

Why stop there? In addition to removing things that have been going up from the consumer price formula, why not add a few things that are going down?

IF WE'RE going to take the price of buying a house out of the inflation indicator for the simple reason buying a house is so much more expensive than it used to be, well, why not do the other things? Why not throw in there something that is cheaper than it used to be? Like what, you may ask? What in the world is cheaper than it used to be? Well, why not tie the consumer price index to the stock market, say? We all know that the prices of stocks on the stock market tend to go down when interest rates go up. And, sure enough, they have been going down.

Tie the consumer price index to the Dow Jones industrial average instead of such frivolous stuff as food, clothing and shelter, and inflation as we know it will be a thing of the past.

To End Exploitation

Opportunity for Citizenship

From AFL-CIO testimony at Senate hearings:

THE AFL-CIO supports a fair and generous program to legalize the status of illegal immigrants who have become part of the American community, but that program must operate in tandem with an effective program for cutting off the further flow of illegal immigration. Conditions consistent with a compassionate regard for the families involved should be set with a minimum of formality to make citizenship possible for individuals who presently have a strong attachment to this country.

We have serious reservations about the Administration's proposal for "temporary resident status for illegal aliens." There would be a 10-year waiting period of continuous residence before this "temporary" status, renewed every three years, could be converted to permanent resident status after a demonstration of English language proficiency.

Under the Administration proposal, an alien with "temporary resident status" could not bring his spouse or children to the U.S.A. and would not be eligible for a variety of social programs, including unemployment compensation.

We believe citizenship should be possible for individuals who presently have a strong attachment to this country. Under the Administration's proposal, no such hope is held out to illegal residents, who, therefore will be far less likely to register, far more likely to continue in an illegal work status and to undermine the wages and working conditions and job opportunities for U.S. citizen workers.

Curbing future illegal immigration—including stronger border controls and interior enforcement, and more support for the Immigration and Naturalization Service—must be accomplished before any legalization program is put into effect. There is a need to absorb the full effect of a decade of large-scale legal immigration and refugee flow and to regularize the status of illegal alien residents and their relatives before increasing the present levels of legal immigration.

Reagan's Budget Knife

Education Aid Still Threatened

ALTHOUGH CONGRESS turned down some of the massive education program cuts sought by the Reagan Administration, the battle to save the nation's public school system from catastrophic budget slashes is far from over, AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields warned.

"We're not out of the woods yet," Shields stressed, pointing out that the Administration is still calling on education for further "sacrifices to the Office of Management & Budget to make things balance." She said the support for public education shown in the Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington helped persuade Congress to reject the President's appeal to convert categorical aid for disabled and disadvantaged children into block grants that could be used for any purpose.

Questioned by reporters on the network radio interview Labor News Conference, Shields said that the Administration is persisting in its "long-term plans to fold all of the major education aid programs into block grants."

She warned that without a federal leadership role in directing aid to severe problem areas that may not speak with a "strong political voice," many children most desperately in need of assistance would lose "vital help" they now get because the federal funds are earmarked for such specific purposes.

SHIELDS SCORED the tuition tax credit scheme that is now before Congress and a similar proposal that is at issue in a Nov. 3 referendum in the District of Columbia. She said that the Reagan Administration has "made it clear that if the national bill passes," the revenue loss "will be taken from other programs in public education that are funded at the federal level."

She said that the District of Columbia tuition tax credit bill would be "very, very detrimental to a public school system that already is having problems," and would force a tax increase. The real effect, she said, would be to create an "opportunity for the affluent families in the District of Columbia to wipe out their tax liability by claiming credits for children already enrolled in private schools." But it would not help "a family that does not already have money."

THE LIST OF social programs—schools lunches, food stamps, extended jobless benefits, health services, student loans and many more—isn't the only thing the Reagan Administration is cutting back.

Less visible, but no less alarming, has been a cutback of the federal commitment to hard-won civil rights protections for minority groups and women.

In a number of areas of government efforts to help victims of past discrimination improve their lives, or at least hold their own, the Administration is backtracking. These areas include affirmative action, school desegregation, the right to vote, and the Equal Rights Amendment.

The Labor Dept. in August unveiled a new set of department rules which will weaken anti-discrimination requirements for federal contractors.

UNDER THE proposed rules, which the department plans to put into effect later this year following the standard period for public comment, written affirmative action programs would be required only from government contractors having 250 or more employees and contracts worth at least $1 million. The current thresholds are 50 employees and a $50,000 contract.

Labor Dept. officials, unfurling the Reagan banner of "deregulation," say the new rules aim to lesson the paperwork "burden" on smaller businesses.

But civil rights experts note that a large majority of job and job training opportunities are available in the smaller companies—the same ones to be released from the requirement of showing a plan to hire minorities and women.

The new rules would slash by 75 percent the number of companies covered by an affirmative action program—145,000 companies employing nearly 7 million people would be excluded.

ALSO, THEY would cut back the definition of the appropriate number of minority members and women for which contractors set hiring goals and timetables in different areas of the country.

But the new rules, say civil rights advocates, are important not only for their details and possible effects on hiring patterns, but also for what they symbolize. They are viewed as a reversal of a bipartisan government anti-discrimination policy going back to Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Since Roosevelt in 1941 issued an Executive Order barring discrimination by military contractors, seven Presidents—up to the current one—have extended and strengthened the "contract compliance" program.

As for the question of extending the Voting Rights Act, Reagan has slowly backed away from his longstanding outright opposition, but a recent newspaper report said the President will support moves to significantly weaken the act when the Senate takes it up next year.

The 1965 Act, which has dramatically increased the percentage of blacks registered to vote in the South and of registered Hispanics in the Southwest and elsewhere, has been called the most successful civil rights law in the nation's history.

On Oct. 5, the House of Representatives rejected several amendments aimed at weakening the Voting Rights Act and voted by a resounding 389 to 24 margin to extend its key provisions for 10 years.

The House did the right thing. The Senate should follow. And so should the Reagan Administration on voting rights and the other civil rights issues.

The government ought to lead the way against discrimination, not sound a retreat.

THE BATTLE to save public schools from an unfair burden in the drive to balance the budget is far from over, despite the refusal of Congress to go along with some of the massive program cuts the Administration has demanded, AFL-CIO Education Director Dorothy Shields, center, warned on Labor News Conference. She was questioned by Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc., and Ann McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired on the Mutual radio network.

PATCO Families Express Thanks for the Help

"This past weekend I did not know how I was going to survive for the month of October," the letter read. "However, as I opened my mail Monday I found the assistance check to relieve some of my financial burden.

"I only wish I could describe my feelings at that moment, and that I will have the rest of my life for organized labor."

THE LETTER is from only one of scores of striking air traffic controllers and their families who have written the AFL-CIO thanking the American labor movement for the emergency help they've received since the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization struck over wages and working conditions Aug. 3.

To date, the PATCO Family Fund has disbursed over $600,000 contributed by AFL-CIO affiliates and ordinary citizens. Director Walter G. Davis of the federation's Dept. of Community Services, which has handled the fund, reported this week that a total of 1,264 claims averaging between $200 and $450 were processed. Even more have been distributed in the field by community service representatives, he said.

"ONCE AGAIN, the American labor movement has risen to the occasion, and come to the aid of its own," said Davis.

Letters have come in to Davis, in care of the Family Fund, from contributing unions and individuals as well as recipients. This one from Furniture Workers Local 136 in Poultney, Vt., reflects the empathy shared by donors with the striking controllers:

"We know what it's like to be out on strike and how grateful it is for each strike donation," wrote Sec.-Treas. Josephine Quinn. "This is known as 'solidarity,' and we must stick together and help each other." A check for $25 was enclosed.

A SAMPLING of Davis's mail shows how welcome the checks were, and how relieved the recipients were knowing that they were not alone in the struggle.

"Things are really rough," wrote a PATCO member in Swantz Creek, Mich. "It seems like the whole world is against us for doing something we so strongly think we have the right to do. I may end up broke, but I'll be able to hold my head high knowing I had to do it and I'd do it again. I cannot express in words our thanks for your help at this time."

Another wrote: "As you can imagine, these are very difficult times for us and our families. But we have not lost faith in the strength of our country and its people. We all refuse to believe that they can forget that America was built by the sheer power of its labor and not its management. Whatever happens to PATCO, the ideals for which it stands will remain intact, we promise you that."

A PATCO member in Mendota Heights, Minn., wrote that "since this is my first strike, the past two and a half months have seemed very long. Since I've received the check, I've found that old spring in my step as I walk the sidewalk carrying my picket sign, holding my head high, and keeping my creditors happy."

From Grand Island, Neb., a PATCO member wrote that "being on strike in a small, anti-union, farming community, I was feeling very much alone in my fight. The AFL-CIO support of PATCO shows me I was wrong."

Union contributions ranged from $100,000 each from the Steelworkers, Communications Workers, and Auto Workers to $1 per member from Furniture Workers Local 376 in Athens, Tex.

Other recent donations have included $10,000 each from the Clothing & Textile Workers, Letter Carriers, New York State United Teachers, Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers and the unaffiliated United Electrical Workers. The State, County & Municipal Employees gave $15,000.

Of individuals, the letter from Jay Morgan in La Jolla, Calif., was representative: "Enclosed is a check for $5. Wish it could be much more but I am a retiree on a fixed income, the same since 1961. Yours is the good fight against a heartless and anti-labor Administration."

Administration Urged to Rehire Air Controllers

Haughton said he would concur in the decision if the union failed to call off the walkout within five days and to pledge that it would abide by legal strictures against federal strikes.

Following a meeting in Baltimore, PATCO's executive board said it is willing to end the strike but would not declare it officially over until the FAA ended its lockout of the 11,500 strikers.

"The only way we could comply (with Haughton's request) is to order our members to return to work," the board said in a two-page statement. "However, PATCO's members have been locked out by their former employer and could not return even if so ordered."

PATCO's executive board sent a letter to Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis urging him to accept the union members back on the job.

"In the interests of restoring the air traffic control system to its former efficient operation, all of our members are ready, willing and able to return to their facilities immediately," the letter read.

PATCO PRESIDENT Robert Poli, in announcing the union's decision to appeal the decertification order, said the union should not yet be counted out.

"I don't think PATCO will ever be dead," he said. "We are in a situation right now where the American public and the Congress are going to decide when this thing is over."

Poli said PATCO will argue to the appeals court that the FLRA, in decertifying the union for striking against the Federal Aviation Administration on Aug. 3, did not consider using lesser penalties imposed in past cases of walkouts by federal workers.

Meanwhile, Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis forwarded to Congress the government's proposed pay package for controllers now working in airport towers and air traffic control centers.

The package calls for an increase of 11.4 percent in wages and benefits, including a 4.8-percent rise granted all fedtral employees on Oct. 1—the same overall increase contained in the proposal the Administration offered PATCO before the strike.

REP. WILLIAM D. Ford (D-Mich.), who chairs the House Post Office & Civil Service Committee that has jurisdiction over the pay package, expressed disappointment over the government's decertification of the union.

"It is unfortunate that the FLRA did not reach a solution that would have left room for a just resolution of the dispute between the government and the air traffic controllers," Ford said.

MARYLAND LABOR DELEGATION marches at the White House to protest Reagan Administration attacks on job safety and environmental protections. The group was headed by President Thomas M. Bradley, second from left, of the Maryland-District of Columbia AFL-CIO. The rally was part of a series of demonstrations sponsored by the federation's Industrial Union Dept.

Colorado Delegates Explore Alternatives to Reagan Cuts

Colorado Springs, Colo.—Problems facing Colorado labor as a result of Reagan Administration actions occupied the 300-plus delegates at the State AFL-CIO's 14th biennial convention here.

President Robert Goss of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers lashed out at the Administration for "dismantling social and health programs, school lunches, social security, and all the other things he's wrecking."

"NONE OF US mandated him to do all the damage he's doing," said Goss. He warned that there exists today "the greatest concentration of anti-labor forces ever in this country," adding:

"Big money is massing in Colorado, and is in the hands of anti-union interests."

Earlier, convention keynoter Victor Bussie, president of the Louisiana AFL-CIO, warned that the Reagan Administration's anti-union stance bodes ill for all workers, especially those belonging to unions.

Bussie spoke of the "unfairness of balancing the budget at the expense of those least able to afford the sacrifice, and recapped the plight of striking air traffic controllers fired by President Reagan after endorsing his candidacy last year.

During the three-day meeting, delegates approved a number of resolutions and constitutional changes to deal more effectively with the problems facing Colorado labor. Among the major issues in the state are redistricting — Colorado was awarded an additional House seat in Congress—and attempts by the Republican majority in the state legislature to gerrymander state districts; development of new energy sources, including oil, oil-shale and solar energy, and renewed attempts to impose open shop conditions on state employees.

The delegates also voted to expand the Denver-based labor community agency, transforming it to a statewide operation from its present four-county operation.

State AFL-CIO President Norman Pledger and Sec.-Treas. Zelda Bransted were unanimously re-elected, and 29 vice presidents were named.

OTHER CONVENTION speakers included Gov. Richard Lamm; Rep. Ray Kogovsek (D-Colo.); Esther Foster, national representative for the Coalition of Labor Union Women, and Jane Adams, western director of COPE VIP.

President John Haggerty of Local 501, Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization, in Longmont, brought delegates up to date on the PATCO strike and thanked them for their moral and financial support. Contributions of more than $1,000 were collected for the PATCO Family Fund.

Canada's Jobless Rate Surges to 8.2 Percent

Ottawa — Canada's unemployment rate took its sharpest jump ever, rising to 8.2 percent in September from 7 percent in August.

Statistics Canada, a federal agency, said the 1.2-percent increase brought the jobless rate to its highest level since November 1978, when it also was 8.2 percent. The agency also reported a sharp drop in employment.

Telegraph Union Delegates Adopt Increased Dues

Lake Buena Vista, Fla.—Delegates to the Telegraph Workers convention voted increases in per capita payments, called for stepped-up organizing activities, established a study committee on restructuring the union and re-elected top officers.

After approving a constitutional change transferring per capita tax authority from membership referendum to convention action, the 170 delegates voted to raise monthly payments for UTW locals to $7.75 from the current $4.75. For the union's autonomous divisions—composed of members employed by the Associated Press, United Press International and the Canadian Pacific Railroad—the per capita was increased to $2.60 from $1.60.

THE UNION'S leadership sought the increased funding to meet higher operating expenses and to offset debts incurred after the 1979 convention adopted a deficit budget.

One of the major considerations that the union's restructuring committee will undertake is the possible consolidation of the UTW's regional operations.

Re-elected to new two-year terms were President Richard C. Brockert, Sec.-Treas. Jerry Grim and Vice President Reva Kociolek.

In other action, the convention called for expanded voluntary political action contributions through payroll deductions and urged Congress to repeal sections of the Communications Act that prohibit Western Union from entering the international market. Delegates turned down a proposal to hold conventions every four years rather than biennially.

Stevens Settles Pay Claims for Nearly $400,000

New York—J. P. Stevens & Co. has paid nearly $400,000 in settlement of 47 backpay cases arising out of charges filed against the company in 1979 by the Clothing & Textile Workers.

At that time, ACTWU charged that the company had instituted major unilateral changes in working conditions and other policies at its West Boylston, Ala., plant without negotiating with the union. ACTWU had been designated by the National Labor Relations Board as the bargaining representative at the plant.

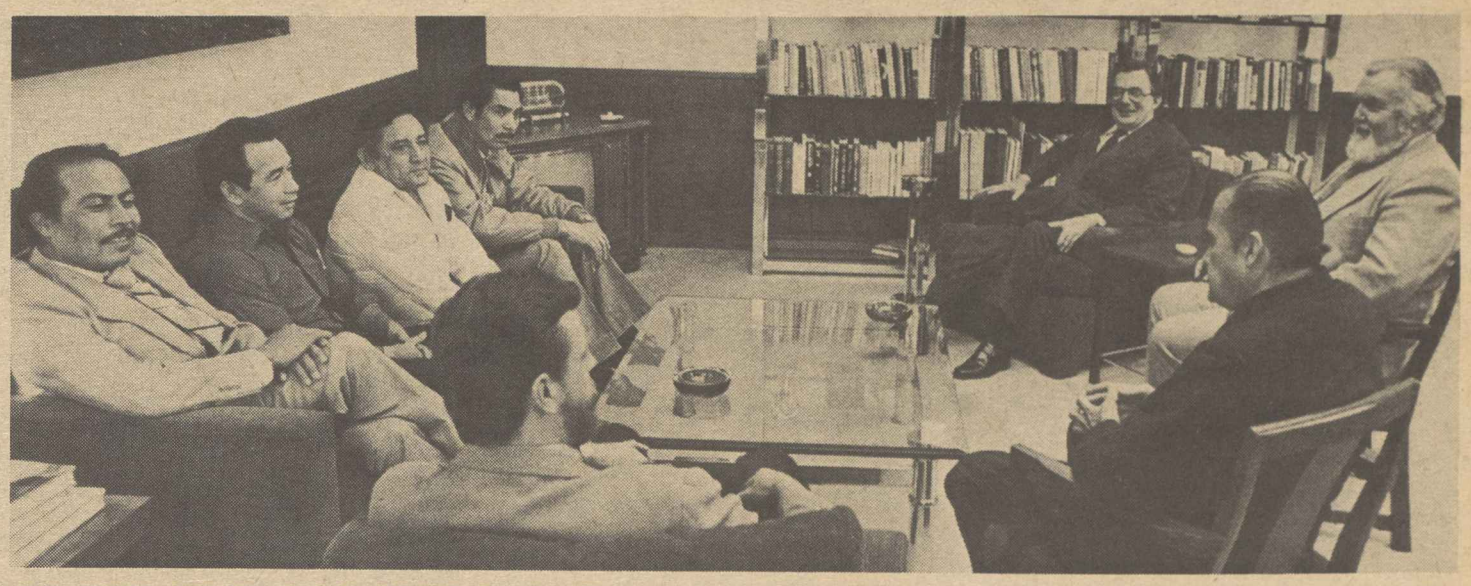
In the national settlement agreement reached by the union and the company on Oct. 19, 1980, the West Boylston case was reserved for further negotiations. As a result, 47 workers have received awards, many exceeding $10,000 each.

Suit Seeks to Keep Ban on Homework

Unions and employers in the apparel industry have asked a federal court to stop the Labor Dept. from lifting a 40-year ban on industrial homework in the knitted outwear industry.

Joining in the request for an injunction were the Ladies' Garment Workers, two ILGWU locals representing workers directly affected, the Clothing & Textile Workers, employer associations representing knitted outerwear manufacturers and a number of individual companies.

The union-industry complaint, filed in federal district court in the District of Columbia, cites adverse effects on both workers and manufacturers.



It warns that allowing commercial knitting to be done in the homes of workers will make it impossible to enforce the Fair Labor Standards Act, resulting in payment of substandard wages, violations of hours limitations and probable violations of child labor laws.

Manufacturers will lose business to competitors using low-paid home workers and may be forced to lay off employees or close down, it asserts.

LABOR SEC. Raymond J. Donovan ordered the lifting of homework restrictions, effective Nov. 9, even though the bulk of comments the Labor Dept. had received were opposed to relaxing existing prohibitions. The ban on work at home will remain for six other covered industries.

The AFL-CIO protested at the time that the exemption for knitted outerwear "reopens the door to exploitation" of homeworkers that led to the original sanctions against kitchen sweatshops.

The union-industry suit contends that the administrative record does not support the Labor Dept. action.

LEADERS OF EL SALVADOR'S Popular Democratic Unity coalition, an alliance of moderate organizations including trade unions representing the majority of that country's urban and rural workers, discuss their goals with AFL-CIO leaders. Joining Federation President Lane Kirkland were William C. Doherty Jr., executive director of the American Institute for Free Labor Development, and Michael Boggs, assistant director of the AFL-CIO's Dept. of International Affairs. The Salvadoran trade unionists, who are seeking free elections and continued land reform, are Francisco Zaldana, Jose Luis Grande, Gabriel Pilona, Jose Nicolas Orellana, and Salvador Carazo.

Houston Project Teams 30 Unions For Organizing

unions the organizing resources of their affiliation with international unions, plus 20 staff organizers on the project itself, seven division coordinators, research and public relations services, and advanced word processing technology. The staff and international organizers come from diverse unions and backgrounds. The coordinators are mostly AFL-CIO field representatives.

Robert Comeaux, AFL-CIO Region IV assistant director and coordinator of the Houston Project, told reporters at a news conference that "this is a program to come head-to-head with the growth of this city and secure the right of collective bargaining against the design of business, management and industry in Houston. Local unions sought this coordinated effort because they have wanted and needed it."

HARRIS COUNTY AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Don Horn was joined by Texas State AFL-CIO President Harry Hubbard in emphasizing the role of local unions in initiating the project.

"We worked five years for this kind of program," Horn said. "Houston is among the most oragnized cities in Texas, but it is also the home of three of the top labor management consultants in the country. They spend their time, and the money of management, to destroy unions. We have sought this organizing project to preserve the rights of collective bargaining for the workers of our area, including those not now organized."

Kistler said the Houston Project will seek to emulate the successful Los Angeles campaign, which developed more than 400,000 new union members, and continues to function today. It will also draw on the experience gained during campaigns against "right-to-work" legislation.

Rehirings End Teachers Strike In Philadelphia

Philadelphia—The city's 22,000 public school teachers and other employees who went out on strike Sept. 8 returned to their jobs after a court ruled the school district must rehire 3,500 laid-off teachers.

The court decision came as Philadelphia labor leaders prepared for a citywide strike in support of the teachers. President John Murray of the Philadelphia Federation of Teachers, following the court ruling, announced cancellation of the citywide walkout, scheduled for Oct. 28.

THE PFT CALLED the strike after the school board laid off the teachers, cancelled a 10-percent pay raise that had been negotiated a year earlier, and imposed other economies to balance its 1981-82 budget as required under state law.

Commonwealth Court Judge James Crumlish ruled that the school district must honor provisions promised in the first year of its two-year contract with the teachers, but could legally negate certain economic provisions of the pact without terminating the agreement.

The court ruling meant that the school district must rehire the laid-off employees, but need not implement the 10-percent pay increase it promised at the start of the second year.

"We are teachers and our primary concern is the children," said Joe Pizzo, a member of PFT's executive board. "We brought back the programs we said the children needed. We won our battle."

Cargo Preference Included In Seaport Improvement Bill

The House Merchant Marine Committee has voted bipartisan approval of a union-supported port development bill that includes a cargo preference clause for U.S.-built, American-flag vessels.

If enacted, the legislation would spur upgrading of U.S. ports to end the bottlenecks that have held coal exports substantially below the potential market.

KEY PROVISIONS of the bill are along lines that were urged by maritime unions and by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland last August in a letter to Committee Chairman Mario Biaggi (D-N.Y.).

The bill, which reportedly was approved by a unanimous voice vote of the committee, would speed the granting of permits for port improvements and provide for federal-local cost-sharing.

It envisions bilateral agreements between the United States and its trading partners that would assure a gradually rising share of all dry bulk cargo for U.S. vessels. The dry bulk cargo preference would not be limited to coal shipments.

INITIALLY, the U.S. share would be set at 4 percent of the two-nation trade, rising by 4 percent a year to reach the goal of 40 percent within 10 years. That would bring the division in line with what is becoming a norm for international trade of 40 percent carried in the ships of each of the trading nations, with 20 percent allowed for vessels of other nations.

While the Administration has not taken a formal position on the measure, Biaggi said he had been informed that the cargo preference provision adopted by the committee would be acceptable to the Dept. of Transportation. Bulk cargo carriers for the preferencee trade would be built in U.S. shipyards without construction subsidies and would not be eligible for government operating subsidies.

Less certain is the Administration's position on federal expenditures for harbor improvement and maintenance.

IN THE HOUSE, the Public Works Committee shares jurisdiction over port development and will be shaping its own bill. There is likely to be an effort by both panels to join in bringing a single measure to the House floor, possibly before the end of this first session of Congress.

Previous cargo-preference battles in Congress have been over efforts to assure a share of oil imports into the United States for American-flag tankers. President Ford vetoed one such bill in 1974 and another measure was defeated in the House in 1977, despite Administration endorsement.

George Pierson, Stove Workers President, Dies

St. Louis—George E. Pierson, president of the Stove Workers for the past seven years, died Oct. 27 after a heart attack while attending a union conference in Columbia, Tenn. He was 54.

Pierson, who began his career with Stove Workers Local 32 in Kankakee, Ill., was chairman of the local's executive committee before being made an international representative. He was elected to the union's executive board in 1971 as a vice president. He was first elected president of the union in 1974.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, in a letter to Pierson's widow, praised him as an "effective officer truly dedicated to the interests of his union and its members." His loss, Kirkland said, "will be deeply felt by the labor movement which he loved and served so well."

Survivors include Pierson's wife, Irene, and three children. Services were held Oct. 30 in Bradley, Ill.

Labor Asks Stricter Limit On Formaldehyde Exposure

The AFL-CIO and 11 federation affiliates have petitioned OSHA to reduce worker exposure to formaldehyde "to the lowest feasible levels" because of new findings that the chemical poses a serious cancer risk to humans.

Citing laboratory studies conducted over the past several months, the petitioners called on the federal job safety agency to issue an emergency temporary standard to upgrade workplace protections.

THE EXISTING OSHA standard does not adequately protect workers from the cancer hazard, the petition said, noting that an estimated 1.6 million workers are exposed to the chemical in more than 60 industrial categories.

OSHA currently limits exposure to three parts of formaldehyde to one million parts of air (3 ppm) over an eight-hour shift, but allows a maximum peak surge of 10 ppm.

In citing the results of the new scientific studies, the petitioners noted that laboratory animals developed nasal cancer after being exposed to formaldehyde vapors comparable to workplace levels.

The petition, initiated by the Auto Workers, also pointed out that as far back as 1976, the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health had recommended lowering the formaldehyde exposure limit to 1 ppm.

Joining in the petition, in addition to the UAW and the AFL-CIO, are the Industrial Union Dept., Allied Industrial Workers, Clothing & Textile Workers, the State, County & Municipal Employees, Machinists, Chemical Workers, Molders, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Carpenters, Rubber Workers and Steelworkers.

United Way Appoints Creque to Key Labor Post

Alexandria, Va.—Bobbie J. Creque has been named assistant director of the Labor Participation Dept. of the United Way of America. The appointment was announced by Jordan L. Biscardo, director of the United Way department, and AFL-CIO Community Services Director Walter G. Davis.

Creque began her career with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services in 1968 and became an AFL-CIO intern in 1970 after completing the staff development program at the George Meany Center for Labor Studies. She joined the United Way as a representative in 1972 after serving as labor liaison representative with the National Center for Voluntary Action.

A specialist in child care and consumer affairs, Creque organized the AFL-CIO Dept. of Community Services' first child care conference in 1970. She is a member of the Office & Professional Employees.

GOP Political Ploy

Poll on Aging Parley Draws Sharp Protest

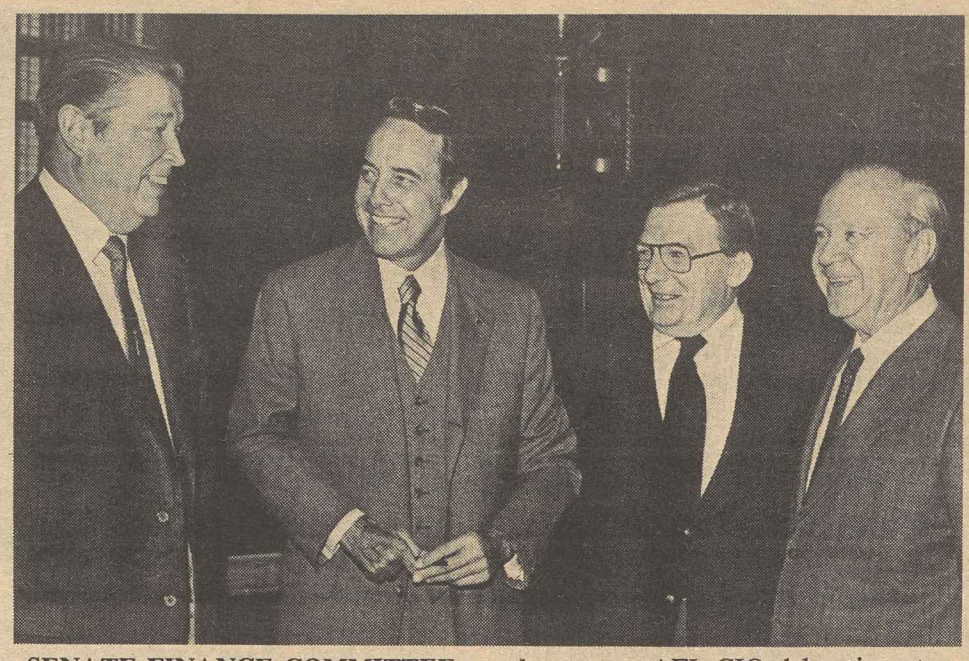
A Republican-sponsored poll of delegates to a White House Conference on Aging drew sharp protests on Capitol Hill and was assailed by the National Council of Senior Citizens as part of an attempt to "politicize" a traditionally non-partisan event.

Hearings by the House Select Committee on Aging revealed that the chairman of the Republican National Committee had received a list of conference delegates from Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker after having been turned down by conference officials. Requests by other organizations for delegate lists had all been rejected.

More than 900 delegates were interviewed by phone, the hearings disclosed, by persons asserting they were calling in regard to the conference, but not revealing the connection with the Republican National Committee.

Witnesses testified that they were asked what they thought of President Reagan and his performance in office, what organizations they belonged to, whether they thought the infirm aged should be cared for by government or by their immediate families, whether people should be responsible for their own financial support in their older years, and their views on what sort of social security cuts people would accept.

Committee Chairman Claude Pepper (D-Fla.) expressed concern that the poll results would be used to stack key committees to avoid criticism of the Administration's efforts to cut back social security.



THE CONFERENCE is scheduled to open Nov. 30. In addition to delegates previously appointed by governors and members of Congress, the Administration has authorized the appointment of additional delegates chosen by the White House.

A statement adopted by the general board of the National Council of Senior Citizens cited other examples of Administration efforts to "manipulate and control" the conference, including:

- Removal of the executive director of the conference, David A. Rust, less than six weeks before the conference was to begin. Rust, a Republican who served for a number of years as minority counsel of the Senate Special Committee on Aging, was "promoted" to another HEW post after he had recommended against turning over the delegate list to the Republican National Committee.
- A voting procedure adopted by an Administration-controlled advisory committee that will allow delegates only a single "up-or-down" vote on a package of 14 committee reports.

The Senior Citizens statement charged that this would deny the majority of delegates "any voice in most of the important decisions made during the conference."

The NCSC board said it will urge delegates to resist attempts to use the conference as a "political football" and instead to carry out the original goals of the gathering—"to fully explore the problems of older Americans and to make appropriate recommendations for solving those problems."

SENATE FINANCE COMMITTEE was host to an AFL-CIO delegation at a breakfast meeting to discuss legislative issues. Shown here, from left, AFL-CIO Vice President John H. Lyons, Committee Chairman Robert Dole (R-Kan.), AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sen. Russell B. Long (D-La.), ranking minority member. The AFL-CIO group included Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, Vice Presidents Kenneth T. Blaylock and William Konyha and state federation officials from New York and Virginia. Twelve other senators attended.

Mediation Agency Reports Decline In Strike Rate

The rate of strikes and contract rejections in labor-management disputes handled by the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service dropped to its lowest level in several years during the 1980 fiscal year, the agency said in its most recent annual report.

Only 12.9 percent of the dispute mediation cases handled by the agency during the period involved strikes, down from 14.2 percent in fiscal 1979 and the lowest percentage since the 11.4 percent rate of 1973. Also, the number of cases involving strikes—2,764—was lower than in four of the last six years.

THE PERCENTAGE of joint meeting cases involving contract rejections was the lowest since 1976 and the second lowest since 1973. Only 1,101, or 10.7 percent, of these cases involved rejections, down from 1,219 and 11.9 percent last year.

The agency also reported that it handled its second highest number of contract negotiation cases in a decade. The total of 21,505 was 5 percent higher than the previous year. Most of the increase was in nonjoint meeting cases, which require only informal mediation.

Wages continued to head the list of issues involved in FMCS joint meeting cases, followed by pensions and insurance, contract duration, and vacations and holidays. The number of joint mediation cases rose only 1 percent, and the continuing increase in public sector cases accounted for all of the rise.

PUBLIC SECTOR cases have grown from 47 in 1970 to 1,010 last year, and now account for 10 percent of its caseload, FMCS said.

The agency's arbitration activity increased during fiscal 1980, with a 10 percent rise in requests for arbitration panels. There were a total of 7,539 arbitration awards, and the overwhelming majority involved disputes over interpretation or application of existing contracts. The average elapsed time in arbitration cases was 243.7 days, a slight decrease from the previous year.

Inequities Assailed in Slashes Of Jobless Pay for Retirees

Workers entitled to unemployment compensation should not have their benefits reduced because they are receiving a pension from their previous employer or are drawing social security payments, the AFL-CIO urged at House hearings.

That's one of a number of inequities in the unemployment insurance program that Congress should remedy, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman told a House Ways & Means subcommittee headed by Rep. Harold E. Ford (D-Tenn.).

SEIDMAN, accompanied by Associate Legislative Director Robert McGlotten, also protested denial of unemployment compensation to persons leaving the armed services after completion of an enlistment. That's one of the restrictions Congress imposed earlier this year as part of its budget-cutting package.

On the pension offset issue, Congress last year modified a harsh provision that was to have taken effect Mar. 31, 1980. But major inequities remain, Seidman said.

Persons whose pensions are paid by their last employer for work during the "base period" on which the unemployment compensation benefit is computed have their entitlement reduced dollar-for-dollar by the amount of their pension. In the case of a contributory plan, states may make an allowance for the worker's payment into the pension plan, but do not have to do so.

SEIDMAN PROTESTED that the offset provision imposes a "means test" for unemployment insurance that applies only to pension income and not to other non-wage income.

"It does not recognize that retirement, in many cases, is involuntary," he stressed. Workers who are forced to retire for such reasons as plant closings, plant relocation or layoffs should receive full unemployment benefits while seeking other employment, Seidman said. At the least, he urged, states should be required, not merely allowed, to take into account contributions workers made to their pension benefits.

In another area, Seidman protested a provision that exempts farm employers from paying unemployment insurance tax on the wages of alien workers admitted to the country for temporary employment.

"THIS EXEMPTION has created a competitive disadvantage for U.S. agricultural workers by providing an incentive to hire aliens when thousands of domestic farmworkers are unemployed," he noted. Employers can avoid both the unemployment and social security taxes by switching to alien workers, Seidman pointed out.

Other inequities the AFL-CIO urged be corrected include exclusion from unemployment compensation coverage of workers on fishing boats who receive a share of the proceeds of the catch instead of wages, and the exclusion of students over 21 whose employment is part of a work-study program.

Halting Flow of Illegal Aliens Called Vital to Amnesty Plan

The AFL-CIO called for "effective action to stop illegal immigration" as a prelude to a "generous" amnesty policy that would make U.S. citizenship possible for undocumented aliens "who have become part of the American community."

In testimony at Senate hearings, Federation Economist Markley Roberts expressed the labor movement's understanding of the desire for a better life that has brought so many people across America's loosely controlled borders, and its concern for the impact on the U.S. economy.

"TOO OFTEN," he noted, "unscrupulous employers prey upon these newcomers, forcing low wages and substandard working conditions upon them in an atmosphere of fear and intimidation with the threat of deportation. Such exploitation undermines wages, working conditions and job opportunities for U.S. citizen workers."

Roberts said the AFL-CIO rejects the concept of "mass deportations" and favors citizenship opportunities, with fewer obstacles than the Administration plan would impose, "for individuals who presently have a strong attachment to this country."

Under the uncertain second-class status offered by the Administration plan, he cautioned, illegals "will be far less likely to register with the Immigration & Naturalization Service, will be far more likely to continue in an illegal work status, and thus will be far more likely to continue to undermine . . . working conditions and opportunities."

Roberts stressed, however, that "the legalization process should not begin until the massive flow of illegal aliens into the United States has been stopped. Otherwise, the legalization process would simply encourage additional flows of illegal aliens."

THE AFL-CIO favors reunification of families, a humanitarian policy toward refugees and safeguards for American workers as "essential components" of a long-term immigration policy, he testified.

"There is a need to absorb the full effect of a decade of large-scale legal immigration and refugee flow and to regularize the status of illegal alien residents and their relatives before increasing the present levels of legal immigration," he urged.

In separate testimony before a House subcommittee, Roberts expressed the AFL-CIO's opposition to any weakening of the present requirement for Labor Dept. certification that persons admitted into the United States to work, either temporarily or permanently, will not adversely affect wages and working conditions of American workers.

Warning Served Against Trading Jobs for Exports

Discrimination by foreign countries against services provided by U.S. firms should be dealt with on a bilateral case-by-case basis, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald told a Senate panel.

Multinational negotiations, involving broad tradeoffs and concessions, are inappropriate and could result in losses of U.S. jobs in return for concessions to American firms operating overseas, he warned.

Oswald's testimony came on a bill calling for a government study on steps to promote export opportunities for U.S. service industries.

"The United States cannot and should not negotiate away the jobs of service employees or let them be exported, as manufacturing jobs and service jobs in the past have been exported," Oswald said.

Reagan's Policy Failure Cited as Slump Deepens

THE AFL-CIO SUPPORTS legislation to impose tougher penalties on corrupt union officials who betray the trust of workers, Federation President Lane Kirkland testifies at Senate hearings. With him are Legislative Director Ray Denison, left, and AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold.

Signs Point To Further Weakening

By James M. Shevis

The sharp 2.7-percent drop in the government's September index of leading economic indicators, a measure of future economic activity, confirms that the nation is in a recession and that conditions will worsen, the AFL-CIO warned.

"More ominous, however, is the fact that the Administration has nothing in the works—or even on the drawing board—to stop the downturn and prevent high interest rates from continuing to undermine the economy and destroy jobs," observed Rudy Oswald, director of the federation's Dept. of Economic Research.

"THE ADMINISTRATION'S policies are a failure and must be overturned and replaced by a direct attack on unemployment and inflation," Oswald declared.

President Reagan has endorsed the Federal Reserve Board's tight-money policy, which is ostensibly designed to reduce inflation but has instead resulted in the country's eighth business-cycle recession since the end of World War II.

The day after the Commerce Dept. announced the plunge in the index of leading indicators, the steepest since a 4-percent drop in April 1980, the Federal Reserve cut its discount rate from 14 to 13 percent in a move that could accelerate the slide in short-term interest rates. The discount rate is the interest rate the Fed charges member banks for loans.

THE DISCOUNT rate cut marked the first significant easing of credit in over a year and was expected to lead to lower prime rates in the banking industry.

Kirkland Cites Betrayal of Trust

Stiffer Penalties Backed To Combat Corruption

By David L. Perlman

The AFL-CIO endorsed legislation to toughen federal penalties against corrupt union officials as both good for the nation and in the "best interests" of the trade union movement.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland went before the Senate's Permanent Subcommittee on investigations to give high marks to a bill introduced by Sen. Sam Nunn (D-Ga.) which would crack down harder on union officials who take employer payoffs and on employers who bribe union officials.

AS FAR AS the trade union movement is concerned, Kirkland made clear, betrayal of the trust workers put in their unions is a heinous wrong. Racketeers who prey on unions "are our natural enemies," he said.

Kirkland endorsed, "with two narrow exceptions," provisions in the Nunn bill that would strengthen the existing disqualification from union or pension fund responsibility of persons who have abused their posts for personal gain. A section of the bill which the AFL-CIO does support would require removal from union or pension office after conviction of a serious crime instead of waiting until all appeals have been exhausted. If a conviction is reversed, reinstatement to office would include lost pay.

Disqualification provisions in existing law already go beyond penalties against comparable offenses in the business world, Kirkland noted. But "the morals of the marketplace will not suffice" for the trade union movement, he stressed.

"UNION OFFICE is a calling, not a business," he insisted, and those who enter it "are, and should be, held to a higher standard."

A union officer who "takes an employer payoff for a substandard contract" or "pilfers from the union treasury" tarnishes the entire trade union movement, he testified.

In fact, Kirkland noted, "every measure shows that the integrity and dedication of union officers, as a group, is superior to that of other groups."

But "the labor movement is not perfect," and "can only be strengthened" by getting rid of crooks.

KIRKLAND SPOKE frankly of the AFL-CIO's "perplexing problem" of whether, to avoid government interference with an autonomous trade union structure, "we should attempt to run a full scale private law enforcement scheme parallel to

Speakers Set On Key Issues At Convention

The AFL-CIO's centennial convention will be addressed by political and civil rights leaders, by public figures from a variety of fields, and by representatives of the Free World's trade union movement.

Delegates will represent some 15 million members of 102 affiliated unions, and the AFL-CIO's state and local central bodies. The convention will open at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in New York at 10 a.m. on Nov. 16, just 100 years and one day after the Pittsburgh convention that gave birth to the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions.

FROM THE political sector, convention speakers will include former Vice President Walter F. Mondale, House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy.

Benjamin L. Hooks, executive director of the NAACP, will address the convention, as will Eleanor Smeal, president of the National Organization for Women, and Henry Lacayo, president of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement. The Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, the University of Notre Dame president whose most recent government role was chairman of the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy, will also be a speaker.

Entertainer Danny Thomas will appear as the recipient of the AFL-CIO's Murray-Green-Meany Award for community service.

INTERNATIONAL speakers will include Otto Kersten, general secretary of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions; Canadian Labor Congress President Dennis McDermott, and Tom Jackson, fraternal delegate from the British Trades Union Congress.

The call to the AFL-CIO's 14th constitutional convention stresses the challenge the nation's labor movement faces from "a business-oriented Administration" that is seeking to impose "radical changes in America's social and economic structure."

The task of the delegates, the call declares, is to shape "programs and policies around which workers and all Americans who believe in freedom, democracy and the public interest can rally in the hard struggle that lies ahead."

It's up to the trade union movement to provide leadership, the convention call affirms.

Lech Walesa, the leader of the Solidarity labor federation in Poland since its inception 14 months ago, had been invited to accept labor's first George Meany Human Rights Award on behalf of Solidarity at the AFL-CIO convention. But, in a cable to Federation President Lane Kirkland, Walesa said he was forced to cancel his visit.

"I have much counted on the possibility of our mutual talks," Walesa said. "In the present situation, I find it impossible to leave Poland even if only for a very short period."

Labor Dept. to Eliminate Reports on Real Earnings

The outlook for an improved system of collecting and processing labor force data dimmed following Labor Sec. Raymond Donovan's rejection of several key proposals recommended by the AFL-CIO and a blue-ribbon federal panel.

Citing budgetary restraints as the controlling factor in postponing or ruling out some revisions of data, Donovan contended in a report to Congress that while some recommendations of the nine-member National Commission on Employment & Unemployment Statistics were meritorious, others were not feasible at this time.

AMONG THE programs caught in the Reagan Administration's budget squeeze is the Bureau of Labor Statistics' monthly report on "real" spendable earnings, which Donovan proposes to eliminate altogether. The presidentially-appointed panel had recommended a new quarterly earnings series based on an expanded survey. Real spendable earnings, or income stripped of taxes and the impact of inflation, measure purchasing power.

In turning down the NCEUS's recommendation, Donovan cited problems in achieving the appropriate sample size and adjustments for tax deductions that are compatible with earnings data.

The decision to eliminate the series reverses the stand taken by former Labor Sec. Ray Marshall who, in an interim report on NCEUS's recommendations, proposed changes in the data base and directed BLS to develop a new real spendable earnings index.

1981 Settlements Produce Average Pay Gain of 11.5%

Major collective bargaining contracts negotiated in the first nine months of 1981 provided for wage increases averaging 11.5 percent in the first year of the agreement and 9.3 percent a year when averaged over the term of the agreements, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The increases compared with boosts of 9.2 percent in the first contract year and 7.8 percent over the life of the contract when the same parties previously bargained—on average, about 32 months ago.

THE SETTLEMENTS reached during the first nine months of 1981 covered 1.5 million workers in 418 bargaining units of at least 1,000 workers. The settlement data exclude possible wage adjustments under cost-of-living provisions.

Agreements in the construction industry covered 38 percent of all workers un-

Labor Dept. to Scrap Reports on Real Earnings

The study commission reported its recommendations on Labor Day 1979. The law that established the panel required the Labor Secretary to comment on disposition of its recommendations within two years. Other major proposals ruled out by Donovan included one that would have doubled the size of the government's monthly sampling of households to improve the accuracy of state and local jobless statistics.

The panel, whose members included AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald, was chaired by Sar A. Levitan of George Washington University's Center for Social Policy Studies, who warned that by refusing to implement the commission recommendations Donovan "places public trust in labor force statistics in jeopardy." Levitan added:

"Our labor force data system appears to be in for some tough times. There is a major difference between rational budget constraints and the starvation diet offered by Sec. Donovan. The irony is that the latter in the long run will wind up costing us more money than the former."

IN THE PANEL'S 1979 report, Oswald argued that one important reason for continuing the spendable earnings series is to maintain the historic continuity of gross and spendable average weekly earnings of private-sector workers in current and constant dollars going back to 1947.

"Real spendable earnings provide useful and reasonable measures of trends in earnings-related welfare after deduction of federal income and social security taxes," he said.

Furthermore, the current series uses "hard" payroll data which are easily and quickly calculated monthly "and thus are available on a more timely basis" than the quarterly earnings report that the panel had proposed, Oswald said.

One of the panel's 88 formal recommendations accepted by Donovan was a proposal to include military personnel in the labor force for the first time. Their inclusion—limited to armed forces stationed in the United States—will begin early in calendar year 1983, the Labor Dept. said.

THE DRAFT was the primary reason for excluding the military from the nation's jobs data. With the change to a volunteer system, however, the panel reasoned that armed forces members should no longer be excluded from the labor force since they compete in the same labor market as other workers. "Individuals are free to choose between employment in the military or the civilian sector," the NCEUS said two years ago.

At the time, Levitan said that counting the 1.4 million U.S.-based military personnel in the labor force total would reduce the national jobless rate by about one-tenth of 1 percent.

Donovan also accepted the panel's recommendation on the designation of "discouraged" workers—those who have given up looking for work because they believe that employment for them does not exist. The panel urged, and Donovan agreed, that criteria for the number of discouraged workers should be changed to add the stipulation that they must have looked for work sometime during the preceding six months.

BLS PUBLISHES the figures on discouraged workers quarterly and will continue to exclude them from the official jobless count.

Oswald disagreed with the NCEUS recommendation on discouraged workers, saying that their inclusion in the labor force count would "shed real light on many labor market related events."

Volkswagen Pact Sets Parity With General Motors

New Stanton, Pa. — Workers at the Volkswagen of America car assembly plant here approved a new 16-month contract that will bring the company's pay scale into basic conformity with that of General Motors Corp.

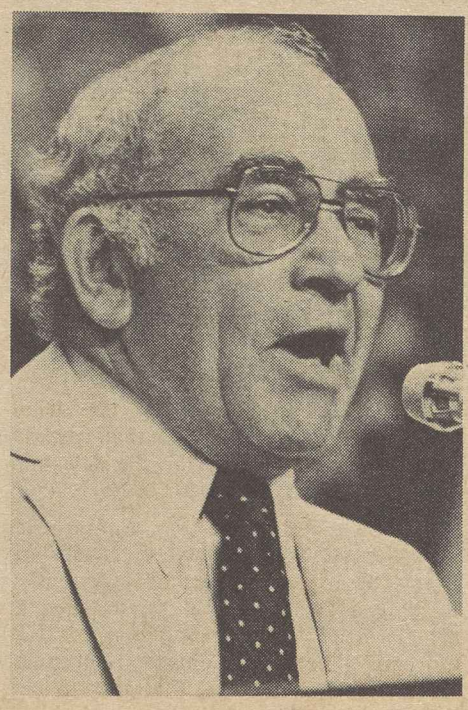
Ratified by a vote of 1,981 to 1,502 among members of Auto Workers Local 2055, the pact increases the average assembler's wages by 50 cents an hour, bringing it to $11.26 immediately. An additional 10-cent-an-hour increase will be paid next June.

VOLKSWAGEN ALSO agreed to continue making quarterly cost-of-living adjustments and, beginning in March 1982, to revise the COL formula to provide higher payments later on. Adjustments currently follow the formula of one cent an hour for each rise of three-tenths of a point in the consumer price index. The new formula will provide one cent for each .26-point rise in the CPI.

The firm also agreed to raise wages by an amount equal to any annual improvement factor negotiated by the Auto Workers at General Motors. The GM contract is up for renegotiation next September.

Local 2055 President Richard Ferchak said "we're satisfied with the agreement. We've gained parity with most of the General Motors plants with the new hourly wage." About 4,600 workers are covered by the contract, the second agreement ever negotiated at the VW assembly plant.

VW ALSO agreed to add $1 million to the UAW fund that pays supplemental unemployment benefits to laid-off workers and improved health and life insurance benefits to employees. There is no pension plan at the Volkswagen plant.



Workers will gain two new paid holidays under the contract—the first day of the deer hunting season, Dec. 1, and one other day during the season.

The short contract duration—the pact expires on Mar. 7, 1983—is designed to enable the parties to negotiate a master contract in 1983 for all three VW plants in the United States.

CLUW Convention Postponed to 1982

New York—The Coalition of Labor Union Women postponed its Nov. 5-8 convention in Los Angeles rather than ask delegates to use the airlines during the air traffic controllers' strike.

CLUW President Joyce Miller, an AFL-CIO vice president, said she hoped President Reagan would realize that his "stubborn refusal to bend" in the dispute between the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization and the Federal Aviation Administration has led to economic hardships for PATCO members and airline industry workers.

EDWARD ASNER

Screen Actors Elect Ed Asner New President

Hollywood, Calif.—The Screen Actors Guild elected Edward Asner president of the 50,000-member union over incumbent William Schallert in national mail balloting.

Asner, the star of the "Lou Grant" weekly television series, received 9,689 of the 18,632 votes cast in the three-way contest, according to final results released by SAG election auditors.

SCHALLERT, who was seeking reelection to a second two-year term, received 7,188 votes and Morgan Paull garnered 1,197.

Asner will begin his two-year term Nov. 9. He has not previously held office in the union. An issue in the contest was the current SAG contract with motion picture producers, which was negotiated last year to end a 13-week strike. Asner had opposed ratification of the settlement, which Schallert had endorsed as president.

Although losing the SAG presidency, Schallert was elected to a three-year term on the union's executive board representing the Los Angeles area.

Board members are elected on a local or regional basis. Forty-five candidates were vying for the 14 board seats open for election this year.

IN CONTESTS for two other national offices, Sumi Haru was elected recording secretary over incumbent Philip Sterling by a vote of 8,799 to 8,109, and Peter Haskell defeated Yale Summers for treasurer, 9,321 to 7,190. Haru and Summers were on Asner's slate.

SAG reported that partial returns from branches showed that Kent McCord was elected first vice president, Ron Soble third vice president, Marvin Kaplan ninth vice president and Jessica Walter eleventh vice president.

Building Trades Pledge Fight On Davis-Bacon Tampering

The Reagan Administration is counting on the regulatory changes it has initiated to lower prevailing wage levels on government-funded construction and is not seeking outright repeal of the Davis-Bacon Act.

That's the gist of the response by President Reagan and Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan to a letter sent to the President last month by leaders of building trades unions.

THE LETTER to Reagan was part of a continuing effort by the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. to counter attacks on the 50-year-old Davis-Bacon Act, which employer groups and conservatives in Congress have tried to paint as inflationary.

It reminded Reagan of his election campaign commitment to oppose repeal or weakening of the Davis-Bacon Act and protested "penny-wise and pound-foolish" administrative changes that the Labor Dept. has proposed.

"Tell your leaders in Congress, the Labor Dept., and the Office of Management & Budget that Ronald Reagan is an honorable man who keeps his word," the letter urged. "Tell them to stop tampering with Davis-Bacon."

Its signers included BCTD President Robert A. Georgine, Sec.-Treas. Joseph F. Maloney and presidents of the department's 15 affiliated unions.

REAGAN WROTE Georgine that Donovan would "respond directly" to the letter. But Reagan added that he could assure the building trades leaders "that I will continue to support my campaign pledge to not seek repeal" of the Davis-Bacon Act.

A few days later, speaking to the board of directors of the Associated General Contractors, Donovan made clear that the Administration was not backing down on regulatory changes that building trades unions charged would "gut" the prevailing wage law.

Donovan told the employer group that the proposed changes will bring down wage costs on government contracts and urged that both contractors and unions accept that "compromise."

Although the phrase was not in his prepared speech, a Bureau of National Affairs report on the meeting quoted Donovan as telling the contractors that the Davis-Bacon Act will not be repealed "during the first Administration."

In an Oct. 21 speech to the Building & Construction Trades Dept. convention, Donovan further defended the changes in Davis-Bacon regulations and added, "We had to fight hard just to hold the line against repealing the law in toto."

THE LABOR DEPT. has received comments on its proposed changes in Davis-Bacon Act regulations from interested parties, but has not yet issued the regulations in final form.

Meanwhile, the open-shop segment of the construction industry has been conducting a major lobbying campaign for Senate approval of a military construction bill that would exclude all defense construction from the prevailing wage requirement.

The public relations campaign launched by the building trades, including press kits and broadcast material, seeks to "clear up confusion" about the nature of the law, Georgine said, and demonstrate its value to both the construction industry and the nation.

Article XX Sanctions Placed On Broadcast Employees

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland has notified all affiliates that the National Association of Broadcast Employees & Technicians has been found to be in non-compliance with the decision of an impartial umpire under the AFL-CIO's internal disputes procedures and is therefore subject to sanctions under the federation's constitution.

The finding was reached by a subcommittee of the AFL-CIO Executive Council consisting of Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Vice Presidents Kenneth T. Blaylock and Dan V. Maroney.

The finding, Kirkland said, followed the refusal of NABET "to withdraw from a raid at NBC."

IN HIS notification to affiliates, Kirkland said the union, effective Oct. 27, 1981, would be subject to the following provisions of Section 15 of Article XX of the AFL-CIO Constitution:

"1. The non-complying affiliate shall not be entitled to file any complaint or appear in a complaining capacity in any proceeding under this article until such non-compliance is remedied or excused as provided in Section 16;

"2. The federation shall, upon request, supply every appropriate assistance and aid to any organization resisting the action determined to be violation of this article;

"3. The federation shall appropriately publicize the fact that the affiliate is not in compliance with the constitution;

"4. No affiliate shall support or render assistance to the action determined to be in violation of this article."

In addition to NABET, the following unions are currently in non-compliance with an impartial umpire's decision: the International Typographical Union and the Graphic Arts International Union.

Index Points To Deepening Of Recession

But the high rates have already taken their toll on the economy, particularly the housing and auto industries. The Commerce Dept. reported that sales of new single-family houses plunged by 12.6 percent in September to their lowest level on record, and sales of domestically produced cars are scraping the bottom.

The decline in the leading indicators index was the fourth in the last five months. White House spokesman David Gergen said Reagan's aides agree that the latest figures are "further evidence of a recession," but continue to believe that the recession will be "mild."

THE INDEX'S decline was paced by a sharp drop in the length of the average workweek and negative readings in seven other categories. The others were the layoff rate, new orders, vendor performance, contracts and orders for plant and equipment, building permits, stock prices, and the money supply. The change in crude-materials prices was the only indicator that increased. Total liquid asset levels remained unchanged.

Evidence of the economic slump also appeared in a series of other Commerce Dept. reports. Durable goods orders, a bedrock of employment, were down 1.8 percent in September. Construction expenditures for September were down four-tenths of 1 percent, and without government construction included the decline would have been 1.5 percent.

Inventories which grow fatter when demand falls, went up 1.1 percent in September, the most since February. And capital spending outside of defense-related business fell 8 percent over the month, the most since February and the fourth month of decline this year.

THE NEW-HOME sales figures for September were the latest in a long line of increasingly dismal statistics on the housing industry, which is in its longest and deepest slide of the postwar era. The annualized rate of sales for September was 312,000 homes, significantly below the previous low point in April 1980, and a 45-percent drop from the year-earlier.

Meanwhile, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported that productivity in the nation's businesses, excluding farms, dropped at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 2.2 percent in the July-September quarter, after rising 1.4 percent in the previous quarter.

Steel Union Curb On Outside Funds Slated for Review

The Supreme Court has agreed to review an appellate court decision nullifying a section of the Steelworkers constitution that deals with funding of union election campaigns.

At issue is the provision adopted by the USWA's 1978 convention prohibiting candidates for union office from obtaining campaign contributions from outside groups and from individuals not members of the union.

The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia held last April that the curb on contributions violated Landrum-Griffin Act guarantees of rights of union members.

USWA President Lloyd McBride welcomed the Supreme Court's granting of the union's petition for review. McBride said the 1978 amendment had been adopted to assure that union officers "are beholden only to the members of the union and not to corporations and wealthy contributors."

The legal challenge was brought by Edward Sadlowski, who ran unsuccessfully for president in 1977, losing to McBride. Contributions to the Sadlowski campaign from outside groups and individuals were an issue in the election.

CONTINUING REVIEW of conditions in the world's iron and steel industry aimed at reducing work time and improving safety was endorsed at a 10-day International Labor Organization conference in Geneva. U.S. worker delegation included, from left, Steelworkers Legislative Director John J. Sheehan, Vice President Joseph Odorcich and District 28 Director Frank Valenta. President Carl W. Studenroth of the Molders and USWA International Affairs Director Francis X. Lunney were also in the delegation.

ILO Steel Panel Focuses On Work Hours, Training

Geneva—A continuing review of the possibility of further cutbacks in working hours in the iron and steel industry was urged at a conference here of the International Labor Organization.

Industry as well as government representatives joined trade unionists from industrialized and developing countries in calling for the "periodic examination" of possible reductions in the normal workweek as well as longer paid vacations.

THE IMPROVEMENT of working conditions in the iron and steel industry generally and the assurance of adequate training for workers in developing countries where this industry is at an early stage were the main subjects of the 10-day session.

The 27 nations represented by tripartite delegations of worker, employer and government representatives account for 85 percent of the industry's world output, according to the ILO.

The calls by the conference for reductions in workloads and for the use of modern techniques to promote job safety and a better working environment were "two important steps," Joseph Odorcich, vice president of the Steelworkers, said of the discussions.

ODORCICH AND Carl Studenroth, president of the Molders & Allied Workers, were the U.S. worker delegates at the session, the 10th of the ILO's iron and steel committee. They were backed up by the Steelworkers' International Affairs director Francis X. Lunney, Legislative Director John Sheehan, and District 28 Director Frank Valenta.

Studenroth, who was a member of the committee on worker training in the developing countries, said trade unionists from the industrialized states stressed the importance of union, employer and government cooperation at all levels to assure that workers can attain the skills required for the jobs to be filled.

"The problems we discussed were not of direct concern to us," Studenroth observed, "but we gave the developing countries the benefit of our experience so that they can learn from our mistakes."

On the questions of safety and health, the conference noted that automation and mechanization have reduced some of the industry's hazards, but have introduced at the same time new threats to the well-being of workers.

FOR THIS reason one of the unanimous recommendations was that continuing emphasis be placed "on the detection, analysis and elimination of hazards."

Odorcich, who was the worker vice chairman of the committee on health and safety, described the recommendations as forming a "code" to be disseminated by the ILO. While this represented forward movement, he said, "continuous pushing" would be required to see that governments and employers live up to the moral obligations they have accepted.

"Free collective bargaining," the conference said in a resolution, should be used to "attain better, safer and healthier working and living conditions."

California Student Group Endorses Coors Boycott

Riverside, Calif.—The Graduate Student Council of the University of California's Riverside campus has endorsed labor's boycott of Coors beer.

Ron Balestrieri, president of the 1,300-member student association, said the GSC voted to boycott all products made by Adolph Coors Co. and urged student associations at other University of California campuses to do likewise.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council sanctioned the Coors boycott in April 1977 after members of the Brewery Workers Directly Affiliated Local Union 366 struck the Golden, Colo., brewery.

House Panel Rejects New Pension Cuts

The House Ways & Means Committee rejected a subcommittee proposal that would have cut back future social security benefits and pushed up the "normal" retirement age.

It then cleared the way for a conference with the Senate on restoration of the minimum social security benefit of $122 a month, which Congress eliminated earlier this year by adopting intact a Reagan Administration budget proposal.

SINCE THEN, the House voted overwhelmingly to restore the minimum benefit. The Senate voted to restore the minimum for some, but not all, beneficiaries. The Senate bill also provides for shifting revenue among the various social security trust funds to alleviate short-range funding problems.

A Ways & Means subcommittee headed by Rep. J. J. Pickle (D-Tex.) had advanced a less drastic reduction of future social security benefits than the Administration had initially sought as a means of averting a funding crunch. Republicans on the committee supported the measure, but House Democratic leaders made clear their opposition and it was beaten on an 18-14 vote.

It would have pushed the normal retirement age from 65 to 66, with an incentive to wait until a later age. It also would have lowered the benefit formula for future retirees and reduced future cost-of-living increases.

EARLIER IN the week, Senate Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.), obtained a 72-0 vote for a resolution declaring the opposition of Congress to any taxation of social security benefits.

Byrd said the Republican staff of the Senate Budget Committee had included such a plan as an option for raising revenue.

The resolution was attached to a bill extending the Older Americans Act for another three years, which the Senate passed unanimously.

State Compensation Systems Neglecting Disease Victims

State compensation programs should be reconstructed "from the ground up" to meet the needs of occupational disease victims, the Workers' Institute for Occupational Safety & Health told a House Labor Standards subcommittee.

Warren J. Smith, secretary-treasurer of the Ohio AFL-CIO and chairman of the Workers' Institute, charged that the programs are severely shortchanging workers who have been disabled by toxic substances on the job.

"THERE IS NOT now, and never has been, a system of compensation in this country for occupational disease victims," Smith said in calling for a complete overhaul of the system. He said existing state programs can't be adequately patched up to make them workable.

Most of the heavy cost of occupational disease—running into billions of dollars each year—now must be borne by the social security system and workers themselves, Smith observed.

Using data compiled by the Labor Dept. for a report to Congress, the Workers' Institute estimated that the social security system expended $2.4 billion for victims of job-related disease in 1980. Of that amount, $1.9 billion came from the Social Security Disability Insurance fund and an additional $500 million was paid out for medical care.

Subcommittee Chairman George Miller (D-Calif.) said that social security's costs for occupational disease could approach $3 billion a year.

EVEN BY conservative estimates, Miller said, the amount social security paid disabled workers last year far exceeded the system's $1.1 billion shortfall in revenues.

Rather than charging the costs to employer-paid compensation programs, Miller observed, other sources of funds are used. The result, he said, is that taxpayers must subsidize hazardous industries.

About half the workers disabled by occupational disease rely on social security as a major source of income, Smith said.

While payments for victims of occupational disease are virtually nonexistent, Smith charged that the insurance industry has been reaping huge profits from workers' compensation premiums.

Another problem victims of occupational disease encounter is discrimination in hiring when they try to find a new job, Smith testified. He told the panel that some employers are using computer service firms to screen out workers who had been disabled by job-related diseases.

WHILE THE labor movement is vitally interested in assuring compensation for victims of industrial disease, its primary goal is to prevent the job-related illnesses from occurring, Smith said. And it views "with great alarm" recent actions of the Reagan Administration aimed at weakening safety and health standards.

One of the victims of the Administration's policies is the Workers' Institute itself, which had its Labor Dept. project grant funds abruptly cut off in August.

The institute was set up in 1979 by the AFL-CIO, the Industrial Union Dept., several state federations and a number of unions as a demonstration project to assist disabled workers in filing for workers' compensation benefits.

Dodging Ballot Bullets

GOVERNMENT BY referendum, in states that allow legislative issues to be put on the ballot through petitions, is a high-risk system of lawmaking.

Granted, an occasional good piece of legislation may result. But more often a proposal considered and rejected by the legislature will be put before the voters in a deceptive package, backed by a media advertising blitz.

Too often, such tactics have been successful.

That was the danger, this year, in a proposed amendment to the state constitution that had been put on the Ohio ballot by a group calling itself the Committee for Free Enterprise Constitution. Its "free enterprise" proposal was to abolish the state's economical and impartial exclusive workers' compensation insurance system and throw the business open to private firms. The insurance companies that would profit liked the idea so much that they put up a multi-million dollar campaign kitty.

THERE WAS EVEN graver danger in a proposal on the District of Columbia ballot—courtesy of the local affiliate of the right-wing National Taxpayers Union.

It offered the seemingly irresistible lure of an education tax credit of up to $1,200 per pupil that could be used for the private school of one's choice. It would have meant the demise of public education in the nation's capital. Apart from the many other sound arguments against such a scheme, the fact is that the city simply could not afford to give away huge sums in tax credits and still fund a viable public school system.

Fortunately, the attacks were turned back in both D.C. and Ohio, thanks in large part to a massive effort by labor and its allies.

All this is good news, and a tribute to the trade union movement. But legislating by referendum is still no way to run a government.

Truly Gritty

A RECENT ISSUE of the Wall Street Journal brought home vividly the human impact of the Reagan Administration's savage budget cuts.

It told of the case of "Mary D.," identified as a store clerk who was the sole support of her two children, and who had been getting a $169-a-month welfare check to supplement earnings of $520 a month.

On Oct. 1, the Journal related, the welfare supplement was ended—"a casualty of federal budget cuts sought by President Reagan and approved by Congress last summer."

But "Mary D. has grit," and the news story relates that to avoid becoming a full-time "welfare mother," she is prepared to take a second job as a waitress.

"IT WILL MEAN leaving home at 8:15 a.m., as usual, but not returning until midnight; it will also mean hiring a baby sitter," the article continues. Then it adds:

"The Reagan Administration is hoping that most working mothers will share Mary's determination to stay on the job and get along without federal-state Aid to Families with Dependent Children."

So much for the Administration's promised "safety net."

Growth Lag Started in '70s

Current 'Certified' Recession Continues Decade-Long Slump

By Gus Tyler

SO NOW WE ARE officially in a recession. It is "official" not only because the President of the United States says that we are in a "slight recession," but because the slump in the third quarter of 1981 fits into the certified definition of a "recession."

Formally, a recession exists when the gross national product (the sum of all goods and services in the country) goes down in two successive quarter years. By the count, the GNP went down 1.6 percent in the second quarter (April-June) and then sank by another .6 percent in the third-quarter (July-September).

NOW, JUST WHY two bad quarters—not one, not three or four, but two—should constitute a recession, nobody knows. Somebody somewhere at sometime made up the definition and now it is officialese.

The truth is that we have been in a "recession" through the entire 1970s, although only the period 1974-75 was so designated officially. From 1969 to 1979, the average annual growth rate was under 3 percent.

That's a "recession" when stacked up against what our growth rate could have been and would have been if we had not decided that it was desirable to check growth. To take an example from the world of baseball: if a man has a batting average of .300 for a season and then runs into a couple of weeks when he is batting only .150, we say he is in a slump, even if he does get a hit now and then.

LIKEWISE, WHEN the American economy, which was hitting a growth rate of about 5 percent a year under Truman and about 5.5 under Kennedy and Johnson, drops to less than 3 in the 1970s, the economy is in a slump. We are not living up to our potential.

The White House is distressed, of course. There is an election coming up exactly a year from now. The Administration promised an economy that was up and up, and now it seems to be going down and down.

But not everybody around the President is unhappy. The Secretary of Commerce, Malcolm Baldrige, says that he thinks a recession may have its virtues, despite the pain. "A slight recession, I think, is almost necessary now," he told the press.

THE THEORY behind this thinking—if that's what it is—is precisely what put us in our present predicament to begin with. The notion is that a recession brings down prices, checks inflation.

But if Baldrige just looked at what happened to prices in the two recession quarters, he would have found that as the GNP shrunk, prices did not fall, they rose—at an accelerated rate: from 7.2 percent in the first quarter to 7.9 in the second and to 9.2 (nearly double-digit) in the third.

The lesson of history is clear from the last two quarters and from all of the '70s: Recessions do not make for lower prices. But as Heinrich Heine said: "We learn from history that we don't learn from history."

Black Unionism Best Hope for South Africa

Apartheid negates the fundamental principles on which our society is based. It denies basic rights to tens of millions of people purely on the basis of their color. It seeks to deprive the worker of the rewards of his labor. It perpetuates the unmitigated tyranny of a minority over a majority. It has posed a long standing challenge to free societies everywhere and the time has come for us to say: "no more."

The AFL-CIO sees the development of a viable black labor movement as practically the only chance remaining to effect peaceful change in South Africa. . . .

We believe that a massive infusion of skills-training to black workers and the introduction of a more hopeful view of the quality of life in store for them will avert the final bloody confrontation which most right-thinking people wish to avert. To implement this program, however, will require the cooperation of all who wish to give peaceful change a chance.

Charity Alone Not Enough

Nobel Peace Prize Puts Focus On Shocking Plight of Refugees

By Bayard Rustin

THE AWARDING OF the 1981 Nobel Peace Prize to the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is an act that should be heartily applauded. The award will serve to focus world attention on an international problem which has reached epidemic proportions: the plight of the world's refugees.

It is estimated that this year there are between 14 million and 18 million refugees in the world. These millions upon millions of men, women, and children have been forced to flee their homelands as a consequence of war, disease, and poverty. Since 1980, well over one million people have fled Ethiopia as a consequence of war and the policies of a barbaric Leninist regime. Refugees from Afghanistan now number over 1.4 million.

THESE FIGURES are shocking and horrible. And yet they are dwarfed by the number of refugees from Indochina. These total over six million and include approximately four million displaced Cambodians who have been forced to abandon their towns and villages as a direct result of the Pol Pot regime's barbarism, and as a consequence of a Vietnamese and Soviet-backed invasion.

Organizations such as CARE, the International Rescue Committee, and the French-based Physicians Across Borders have exhibited remarkable skill in coordinating support for refugees the world over. Many such organizations have addressed the refugee problem without regard to political considerations and have provided charitable aid to Haitian refugees fleeing dictatorial oppression, Soviet Jews fleeing Kremlin-inspired anti-Semitism, Vietnamese boat people, and Cuban refugees fleeing Castro's prison island.

Yet the flood of refugees cannot be dealt with by charity alone. The problem must also be resolved by attacking it at its roots—the absence of democracy, the expansion of totalitarianism, and the upsurge in war. War, much of it a consequence of Soviet expansionism, and a large part of it a consequence of ultra-nationalism and chauvinism is one of the great scourges of our times. Clearly, the efforts of charitable organizations must be complemented by an American foreign policy which has as its aim the limiting of Soviet aggression and the construction of a stable and peaceful world.

THE PLIGHT OF refugees has not been alleviated by the economic difficulties that have afflicted Western Europe and the United States. It is these countries which have supplied the bulk of assistance to the poor of the world. Yet at a time when their own populations are feeling the serious effects of an economic downturn which is eroding their own standard of living, it is often difficult for many Americans and their West European counterparts to understand why massive aid to refugees is of vital importance.

Black Americans disproportionately suffer from unemployment and poverty. And some blacks have argued that we should take care of our own problems first and not worry about those of the rest of the world. Yet this, in my judgment, is a remarkably short-sighted and narrow point of view. For if America is not willing to help in relieving the plight of those refugees who are starving and near death, how can we be sure it will be compassionate enough to solve the problems which afflict our own nation's poor and working poor? It is important for blacks and all Americans to realize that suffering knows no boundaries.

Our country has historically provided a haven for the world's refugees. In part, it is their contribution which has helped to make our country great. American policy must continue to reflect this tradition. This policy must reflect the spirit of the Nobel Committee's award statement.

"REFUGEES WHO DARE not return to their native land must be given an opportunity to start a fresh life in their host country. Still more important in the long run is the work of insuring that people are not compelled to save their lives by escaping from their native land with no prospect of ever returning."

America can continue to help alleviate the plight of the world's most unfortunate. Yet America will only do so if its leaders recognize that compassion knows no boundaries and the government must play a vital role in alleviating suffering both at home and abroad.

Pressure on Delegates

GOP Scored on Bid to Control Direction of Aging Conference

AFL-CIO SOCIAL SECURITY Director Bert Seidman charged in a network radio interview that Administration operatives are putting political pressures on delegates to the 1981 White House Conference on Aging to support and promote President Reagan's policies.

Seidman, a member of the Conference Advisory Committee, cited a recent telephone survey commissioned by the Republican National Committee in which delegates were quizzed about "their political views, which political party they support, and whether they agree with President Reagan's budget cuts." He said the survey was part of a "last-ditch effort to intimidate the delegates" into supporting the policies of the Reagan Administration.

SEIDMAN SAID the Secretary of Health & Human Services had turned the delegates list over to the Republican National Committee but had refused the same information to the National Council of Senior Citizens and other organizations that represent elderly Americans who wanted to inform the delegates of thier organizations' views on issues that will come before the conference. He made these charges on Labor News Conference, the AFL-CIO public affairs program.

Seidman branded such tactics "outrageous and unprecedented" in the 30-year history of White House Conferences. These sessions have been held during both Republican and Democratic Administrations to recommend legislation and other steps to improve the lives of elderly Americans. Attempts to "manipulate the conference are entirely inappropriate," he declared.

Previous White House Conferences on Aging have made important contributions to the welfare of the nation's elderly, Seidman noted. The last conference, for example, took up the question of discrimination against the aging in employment. Earlier meetings made significant recommendations for instituting Medicare and improving social security and the Older Americans Act.

He said he had hoped that this year's conference would continue that pattern, but White House preparations for the meeting thus far have inspired little confidence.

"It just isn't being efficiently organized," Seidman said. "No information has been sent out to delegates, despite the fact that a great deal of information has been assembled by various technical committees on issues that the conference will be dealing with—retirement income, health, housing, employment, and the role of the elderly in society."

ALSO, AT THE very last minute, the conference's executive director—a Reagan appointee—has been fired and replaced by a person who did not participate in the early planning of the meeting, he noted.

Reporters questioning Seidman on Labor News Conference were Stephenie Overman of the National Catholic News Service and Robert Cooney of Press Associates, Inc. The program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

WHY WOULD THE Reagan Administration want to rig and stack a national conference of elderly citizens to make it as predictable as a Soviet party congress? What would it gain by resorting to "dirty tricks?"

Those were the questions that baffled observers after the Republican National Committee admitted it financed a private telephone poll of half the 1,700 delegates to the White House Conference on Aging, which opens Nov. 30.

At a tumultuous meeting of Rep. Claude Pepper's Select Committee on Aging, RNC Chairman Richard Richards testified he obtained a list of delegates after meeting with Health & Human Services Sec. Richard Schweiker. The conference had gotten some 300 requests for the list and rejected them all, but Schweiker sprung the names for Richards.

Witnesses at the Pepper hearing said the pollsters represented themselves as calling on behalf of the White House Conference on Aging.

THE QUESTIONS were designed to learn the delegate's specific interests, degree of activism and membership in organizations. A typical question: "Concerning the budget cuts enacted by Congress earlier this year—do you think, on the whole, these cuts had to be made or not?"

Another question: "For older people who cannot care for themselves, do you think the primary responsibility for their care should rest with (a) the federal government; (b) state and local government; (c) their immediate family?"

Then this question: "Generally speaking, do you think social security benefits should be reduced the same as other government programs are being reduced, should be reduced somewhat but not by as much as other programs, or should not be reduced in any way?

Then the delegate was asked whether he or she feels "things in this country" are "going in the right direction" or "have pretty seriously gotten off on the wrong track?"

THE REACTION of delegates to these questions, according to testimony before the Pepper committee, ranged "from confusion to shock to outrage to intimidation and fear."

RNC Chairman Richards claimed the goal of his poll was to determine whether Reagan's position on elderly issues was understood by the delegates, but some delegates saw more sinister motives. They suspected the real reason was to stack committee assignments, prevent caucuses, and mute criticism of the Administration, especially on social security.

Adding to the suspicion were reports that the White House was selecting about 400 more delegates, bringing the total to about 2,200. The aim is to "pack" the conference with Reagan supporters, witnesses charged.

What is the Reagan Administration afraid of? The grassroots character of hundreds of meetings, involving many thousands of responsible elderly citizens, is so thoroughly American that it can strike terror only in the hearts of Reagan ideologues who distrust democracy.

The 1981 conference promised to be the scene for debate and recommendations on social security, health care and housing.

Apparently it was these emerging issues which caused the Reagan ideologues to panic and over react. As Chairman Pepper angrily shouted at GOP Chairman Richards: "What you were afraid of was the delegates would criticize the Reagan Administration."

Eleanor Litwak, a New York delegate who also speaks for retirees of the State, County & Municipal Employees, expressed "livid anger" at the GOP tactics. The delegates want open debate and "we do not want to be a rubber stamp," she declared.

AN OPINION SURVEY by the Republican National Committee of delegates to the White House Conference on Aging is nothing more than a blatant attempt at political manipulation, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman charged. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Stephenie Overman of the National Catholic News Service and Robert Cooney, right, of Press Associates, Inc. The program is produced by the AFL-CIO as a public service and is aired weekly on the Mutual radio network.

Kirkland Testimony:

'Marketplace Morals' Not for Labor

The following is from the testimony of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland before the Senate Subcommittee on Investigations, Nov. 3, 1981.

UNION OFFICE IS a calling, not a business. The morals of the marketplace will not suffice. Those who enter that calling are, and should be, held to a higher standard. If a person holding union office takes an employer payoff for a substandard contract, misuses the right to strike for his own benefit or pilfers from the union treasury, that person does not simply stain his own honor. He tarnishes the bright efforts of the scores of men and women who have labored to create and maintain organizations worthy of the members we are privileged to represent and of society's good judgment.

There is much in theory to be said for internal union discipline as the proper response to misconduct by union officers. Democracy requires free trade unions not state dominated unions. Thus, one of our paramount responsibilities is protecting our institutional autonomy. Permitting the government to set the terms of union office is a substantial threat to that autonomy. But, the interest in preventing government interference is not our only interest, nor is every threat to that interest of the same gravity.

PASSAGE OF THE Landrum-Griffin Act marked a new stage in the federal government's regulation of unions. That act granted the Labor and Justice Depts. far-reaching authority to supervise internal union affairs. Not only is the applicable federal criminal law wide-ranging, it has been vigorously enforced. Thousands of hours and millions of taxpayer dollars have been spent looking into every aspect of union affairs. The FBI, the Justice Dept., the U.S. Attorneys, the Strike Forces and the Labor Dept. have pushed both the laws I have enumerated and the investigatory powers those laws created to their very extremes. That has been true in Democratic and Republican Administrations alike.

Indeed, every national union at which a finger of suspicion has been pointed has been subjected to thorough grand jury investigation. Those investigations normally cover every book and record, every expenditure, every voucher or the lack thereof, every meeting, every trip, and every other aspect of the union's affairs. The federal prosecutorial forces have immense authority to get at the facts.

For the past 20 years, the AFL-CIO has sought to orient itself to a course that takes proper account of the new order. The most perplexing problem has been whether we should attempt to run a full-scale private law enforcement system parallel to that run by the federal government.

SO LONG AS there was little or no applicable law, we had a plain obligation to do the best we could in this regard, no matter what our doubts on the efficacy of our efforts, an obligaiton we strove to fulfill. But Congress's judgment to turn the full power of the federal investigators and prosecutors to defining, ferreting out and bringing to book wrongdoing by union officers has brought our own limitations into sharp focus.

We simply do not have the resouces—the trained manpower, the subpoena, the grand jury, the authority to uncover and punish perjury, the due-process trial procedures that settle with authority questions of innocence and guilt, and the effective sanctions to punish the guilty. We have learned through hard experience that the allegations of criminal wrongdoing everyone supposes to be well founded do not always stand up when all the facts are brought out. We have also learned that occasionally the union officer one would unhesitantly vouch for can suddenly plead guilty to a serious crime. Neither the adage that where there is smoke there is fire nor its converse—that where there is no smoke there is no fire—has proved a sound guide for our efforts at internal regulation.

THE LESSON we draw from the foregoing is the one that George Meany stated during the debate on the proposal eventually enacted as the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The question he addressed was whether Title VII of that Act should make unlawful discrimination by unions as well as discrimination by employers. His unequivocal answer was:

The leadership of the AFL-CIO, and of the separate federations before merger, has been working ceaselessly to eliminate prejudices. . . . We have come a long way in the last 20 years—a long way farther, I might say, than any comparable organization. . . .

But we have said repeatedly that to finish the job we need the help of the U.S. government.

We are idealists enough to wish there was no such need, but we are realists enough to know that in an imperfect world, there are occasions that call for use of the criminal law. One such occasion is corrupt action by union officers.

The trade union movement can only be strengthened by law enforcement that dislodges those with a criminal bent who may find a toehold in our structure. One of the benefits government provides is the protection of the law. As spokesman for organized labor, the AFL-CIO asks for that protection, emphasizes that the trade union movement sees such protection as a benefit, and pledges its cooperation in a joint endeavor with the federal government to maintain the hard-earned honor of our institutions.

IT IS SIMPLE enough to state support for good morals and opposition to wrongdoing. But we do not content ourselves with these easy pieties. The consequence of recognizing that the government has a legitimate police role to play is the obligation to support fair-minded legislation that provides the authorities the wherewithal to do the necessary job. We do not shrink from that obligation. I have already outlined S.1785's provisions. By and large, the proposals fill recognized gaps in the present law and do so in a rational manner. The bill deserves and has the AFL-CIO's support.

By far the most problematic step S.1785 takes is to provide that disqualification from union or benefit fund office or employment takes effect on the trial court's judgment that the defendant is guilty of one of the enumerated crimes rather than after the appeals from that judgment have run their course.

The Federal Reporter shows that such appeals may be meritorious. And it is not a small matter for an individual who has over the years been a colleague in arms and who continues to maintain his innocence to be turned out of his position. But the disqualification issue is, we have come to believe, distinct from the ultimate issue of guilt or innocence. There is no infallible procedure for recapturing a past event and applying a general rule of conduct to the participants. Not even our elaborate system of appeals is foolproof.

NONETHELESS, with full recognition of the perils, at a certain point the information available requires a prudent person to act. We cannot gainsay that a jury or trial court verdict, reached after a full trial, that the defendant is guilty of a serious crime—particularly of a crime involving a breach of union or benefit fund trust—is sufficiently reliable information to justify removal from union or benefit fund office. There is force in the contention that in determining how to act in the world of practical affairs, such a verdict tilts the balance against the presumption of innocence.

This is a hard rule; one which may be unjust in particular applications and which raises troubling civil liberties issues. The alternative, however, raises even more troubling questions for the continued good health of the trade union movement. Torn as we are between these concerns, we believe that our obligation to the membership and the integrity of our organizations must be put first. The sponsor's decision to provide that the convicted defendant's salary will be held in escrow and paid to him if his appeal succeeds does tend to alleviate the harshest consequence of this suggested change in the law.

So that there is no misunderstanding, I wish to stress that we accept the most stringent regulation not because on a comparative basis there is a case for such regulation, but because the rules comport with our own sense of what is right. Human weaknesses and the corruption of the spirit are constants. The labor movement is not perfect, neither are those who serve it. The same may accurately be said of every other sector of our society and of their leadership.

INDEED, EVERY measure shows that the integrity and the dedication of union officers, as a group, is superior to that of other groups. There are over 100 AFL-CIO national and international unions and over 50,000 local unions. With very rare exceptions, the men and women who staff these organizations are of the highest character. They sometimes must operate in milieus in which it is not easy to maintain one's standards; there are communities and callings in which keeping to the straight and narrow is an heroic enterprise. It is no wonder that a few succumb to temptation.

I would be less than candid if I did not also stress that we approach any increase in federal prosecutorial power with trepidation. The criminal law is the government's most stringent power over the citizen; such power should be used in a fair and balanced manner, with due respect for the principles of free association. That is not what we in the trade union movement find. I am told that the laws regulating unions are being used to bring indictments based on the prosecutor's theory of what the union's constitutions should say or what types of expenditures union members should be permitted to authorize. Such approaches strain the law beyond wise, reasonable or intended limits.

There are several reasons, having nothing to do with the merits, that explain why the issue labeled "union corruption" or "labor racketeering" is treated in a manner that suggests that the law addressing the subject is inadequate or that the law is not being enforced.

FIRST, THE inference is fostered that wrongdoing by a union officer is not evidence of an individual's weakness but an attribute of the labor movement. While bankers, businessmen, government officials and others are judged on their individual merits, union officers are judged according to the worst examples. I believe I speak for all my brothers and sisters when I say that I deeply resent being treated in that fashion. Corruption is always and inevitably individual, not institutional.

Second, there are politicians and businessmen who have no use for the labor movement because free, vigorous and aggressive unions threaten their privileged position or profits. These individuals seek to beat us about the head with any stick that is handy. They view wrongdoing by a union officer as a public relations opportunity and exploit it accordingly.

Third, there are law enforcement officials whose authority and budget depend on sustaining the illusion that the union movement is corrupt. That is a convenient allegation because it does not require proof in a court of law, but only repetition in congressional budget hearings and in off-the-record session with journalists.

NONETHELESS, we are willing to run the risks entailed in broadening the present law as proposed in S.1785. Failing to do so would be to tempt even graver risks. We do so in the hope that, in this instance, and contrary to the norm, the grant of greater power will induce a greater sense of responsibility in the exercise of power.

There are, as I have noted, two aspects of S.1785 that we believe should be reconsidered. The first concerns the proposed amendment to Section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act; the second is the proposal to increase the period of disqualification from five years to 10 years.

Section 302 goes considerably beyond the prohibition of employer "payoffs" to union officers. That provision also regulates, in detail, a myriad of perfectly proper transactions having principally to do with the financing of joint labor-management employee benefit funds. The web of rules that has emerged is both technical and complex, and those rules are also in a constant state of flux. For example, this term, thirty-five years after the provision became law, the Supreme Court will decide whether the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals was correct in deciding that Section 302 sets limits on the pension eligibility rules employers and unions may set through collective bargaining. Plainly an error in making one's way through this legal labyrinth that has nothing to do with undertable employer payments, should not be treated as a felony. The intended scope of the bill in that regard is not clear. We would hope that the sponsors would include language that draws a rational line between the matters covered by Section 302 that are to be dealt with through the criminal law and those matters that are to be dealt with through the civil law.

WE BELIEVE that the proposed uniform 10-year disqualification period goes too far. If it were certain that the provision would apply only to those who, on an objective measure, deserve the epithet "racketeer" there would be no cause for just concern. But that is not the case. There are situations that come to my mind in which I would agree that a five-year disqualification would be insufficient. But I suggest that both reason and human feeling support the view that there are also situations in which a 10-year disqualification is too severe. It is, therefore, our view that the statute should provide a necessary measure of flexibility authorizing the trial judge on conviction of one of the enumerated crimes to set an appropriate disqualification period of not more than 10 years.

Throughout organized labor's history, there have been racketeers who have sought to prey upon, and to misuse, unions for their own benefit. They are not part of the trade union movement. They are our natural enemies.

Kirkland Cites Betrayal of Trust

Stiffer Penalties Asked To Fight Corruption that run by the federal government."

He reminded the subcommittee that before there was a body of federal laws regulating internal union conduct the AFL-CIO sought to enforce its high standards of ethical conduct. "We had a plain obligation to do the best we could . . . an obligation we strove to fulfill," he said.

But since passage of the Landrum-Griffin Act in 1959, he noted, both the Labor Dept. and the Justice Dept. were granted and have used extensive federal powers to supervise internal union affairs and to ferret out and prosecute wrongdoing.

Kirkland testified that the AFL-CIO simply doesn't have the resources or legal powers to uncover perjury, to conduct a trial that settles with authority and without violation of due process questions of innocence and guilt.

CRIMINAL allegations are properly matters for government action, he testified.

"We have learned through hard experience," Kirkland said, "that the allegations of criminal wrongdoing everyone supposes to be well founded do not always stand up when all the facts are brought out. We have also learned that occasionally the union officer one would unhesitantly vouch for can suddenly plead guilty to a serious crime."

Kirkland suggested an analogy to the position taken by the AFL-CIO's first president, George Meany, when Congress was considering whether Title VII of the Civil Rights Act—the equal employment opportunity section—should outlaw discrimination by unions as well as by employers.

MEANY TESTIFIED to the ceaseless effort by the labor movement to eliminate prejudice and discrimination—and to the substantial progress made. Nevertheless, Meany went on to say, "to finish the job, we need the help of the U.S. government."

Point by point, Kirkland went over the provisions of the Nunn bill, which is cosponsored by Sen. Warren B. Rudman (R-N.H.).

"By and large," he said, the bill would "fill recognized gaps in the present law and do so in a rational manner." While there are those who seize upon every isolated misdeed to smear all unions, "the trade union movement can only be strengthened by law enforcement that dislodges those with a criminal bent who may find a toehold in our structure."

A benefit of government is protection of the law, Kirkland testified. The AFL-CIO "asks for that protection . . . and pledges its cooperation in a joint endeavor with the federal government to maintain the hard-earned honor of our institutions."

KIRKLAND acknowledged that there are "perils" in the decision to provide for removal of an office-holder on conviction rather than after the appeals process. This could on occasion lead to unfairness, he noted. But he stressed that allowing persons convicted of crimes involving breach of trust to stay in their posts pending lengthy appeals "raises even more troubling questions," and "our obligation to the membership . . . must be put first." Reimbursement of lost pay if the appeal succeeds helps "alleviate the harshest consequence," he noted.

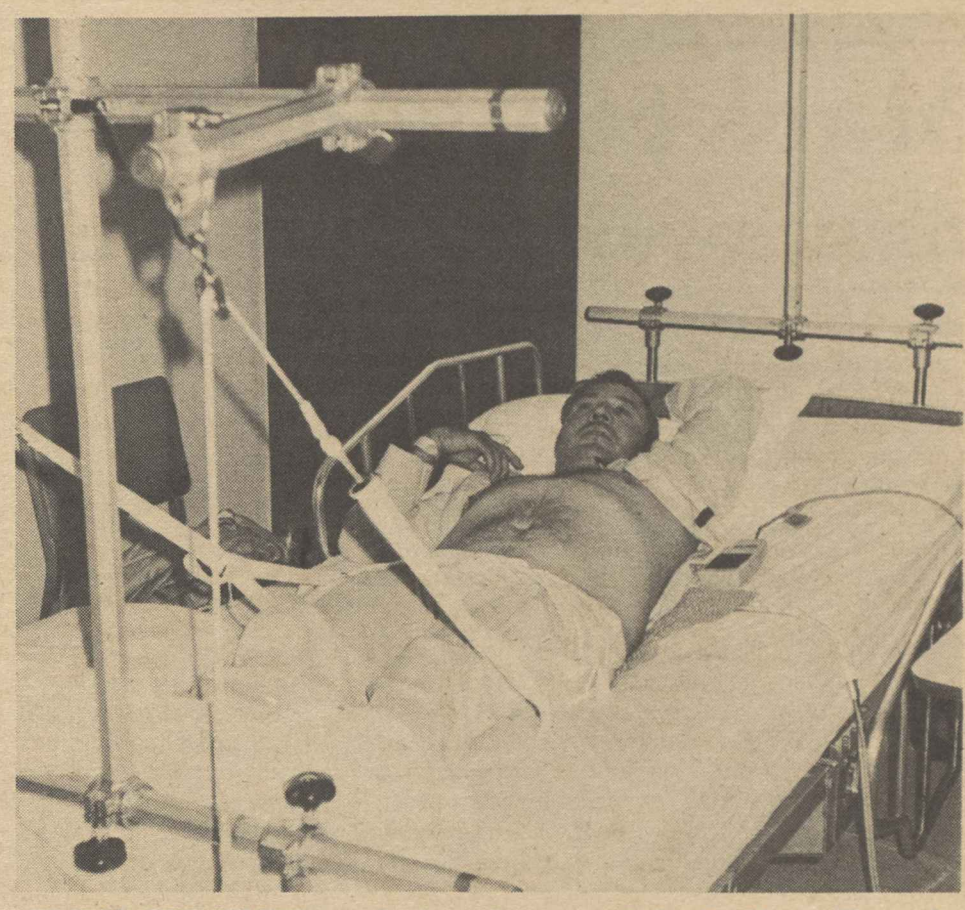
Two sections of the bill should be amended, Kirkland urged.

One section attempts to regulate in detail the myriad transactions involved in the financing of joint labor-management employee benefit funds.

"Plainly an error in making one's way through this legal labyrinth, that has nothing to do with under-table employer payments, should not be treated as a felony," Kirkland said.

HE URGED that the language of the bill be clarified to draw "a rational line" between matters that are to be dealt with through the criminal law and those dealt with through civil law.

Kirkland also suggested that the proposed mandatory 10-year period of disqualification—up from the present five years—is too rigid.



There are cases, where the epithet of "racketeer" is clearly justified, where a five-year disqualification would be insufficient, Kirkland acknowledged.

But there are other cases, often involving an individual with a previously unblemished record who gave in to a moment of temptation, where the proposed 10-year term would be too severe.

THE AFL-CIO'S view, Kirkland said, is that the law should provide some flexibility by "authorizing the trial judge, on conviction of one of the enumerated crimes, to set an appropriate disqualification period of not more than 10 years."

Kirkland's concerns on these points were well-founded and would be given serious consideration, subcommittee members agreed.

The Nunn bill will also be the subject of hearings before the Senate Labor subcommittee. Sen. Don Nickles (R-Okla.), the subcommittee chairman, set Jan. 26 and 28 as the hearing dates.

By Susan Dunlop

John Bristol, a 44-year-old roofer from Rockford, Ill., didn't work for four years after a 1964 accident on the job left him with a crushed spinal disc and constant pain.

A series of operations, and massive doses of painkillers and aspirin helped him to return to work, but a severe and still unhealed intestinal ulcer linked to the medication forced him back into the hospital. In 1973, he was hospitalized again for burns over most of his upper body suffered when he fell into hot asphalt after his injured back gave way on the job.

HE HAS since been frequently hospitalized for treatment, but his doctors recommend against further spinal surgery because of a risk of paralysis.

Bristol, who completed only three grades of school, has been relying on social security disability insurance payments to help support his wife and two children.

But now he faces the loss of that income because, the Social Security Administration informed him, a review of his case finds him ineligible for further disability payments. He is capable of work "that does not require bending, stooping or lifting," the government says.

Bristol's predicament grows out of a new federal budget-cutting drive aimed at trimming back the number of persons on the Social Security disability insurance rolls and discouraging new applications.

THE AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security estimates that the stiff new standards of review being applied to disability cases could mean that as many as 20 percent of those receiving disability benefits could be cut off.

The Social Security Administration, operating under a 1980 law authorizing the review procedure, has said it will review nearly all current non-permanent disability and many permanent disability cases. Reviews will be conducted by designated agencies within the states that will forward their recommendations to the federal agency.

Most disabled beneficiaries are unaware that the reviews are in progress, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman said, expressing the federation's concern that the stepped-up review program appears to be linked to the Administration's budget-balancing goals.

LOCAL COMMUNITY services representatives helping Bristol with the appeal of his case anticipate a growing volume of disabled workers facing a sudden end to payments on which they have been depending for subsistence.

The review of disability cases was begun under the Carter Administration, but was intensified shortly after President Reagan took office. The Social Security Administration said it has already sent about 220,000 cases to states for action, and plans to send back about 500,000 more in 1982.

Under the social security disability insurance program, benefits are provided to persons who cannot "engage in substantial gainful activity" for at least 12 months, generally as a result of medical problems. Monthly payments average about $413 nationwide.

THE 1980 LAW establishing the review system requires that most non-permanent disability cases be reviewed at least once every three years. Permanent cases are also subject to review but without a timetable. The program was slated to begin in January 1982, but was moved up to August 1980 and accelerated in March 1981 by the current Administration.

Illinois officials report a backlog of roughly 22,000 cases to review and the turn-down rate for existing and new applications may run as high as 60 percent, according to AFL-CIO community services representatives in the state.

New Jersey Social Services Commissioner Timothy L. Garden says benefits are being terminated in that state in about a third of all cases being reviewed.

Union officials also are concerned that medical cases are being reviewed by doctors who are not specialists in the type of disability under scrutiny.

BENEFICIARIES are given only 10 days to appeal a cut-off of payments before the state's decision is sent to Washington. Once that happens, only two more checks will be mailed to the recipient.

Both the disability insurance program, which aids some 4.9 million individuals and their dependents, and the Supplemental Security Income program, which affects about 2.3 million disabled persons, are subject to the review program.

The disability insurance program would face further cutbacks under proposals being pressed by the Reagan Administration. These include a stricter definition of disability so as to rule out consideration of age, education or work experience; a longer waiting period for benefits, and tighter standards of eligibility.

Stronger U.S. Action Urged On South Africa's Apartheid

American companies operating in South Africa should be required to provide equal job opportunities and equal pay to black workers, the AFL-CIO urged.

Legislative Director Ray Denison, in a statement submitted to a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee, stressed the AFL-CIO's long and continuing hostility to apartheid, the South African government's doctrine of racial separation to perpetuate white minority rule.

THE OPPORTUNITY for achieving non-violent change is rapidly disappearing, Denison warned. As of now, he said, the AFL-CIO sees "development of a viable black labor movement as practically the only chance to effect peaceful change in South Africa."

Yet, he noted, "contrary to all rational thinking, South Africa has chosen the path of confrontation. It has embarked on a massive campaign of intimidation, detention and arrest of hundreds of black trade union leaders in an attempt to cripple the embryonic black labor movement."

The subcommittee has before it a bill by Rep. Stephen J. Solarz (D-N.Y.) that would require U.S. firms operating in South Africa to adopt fair employment policies, integrate employment facilities, end racial wage distinctions and recognize and deal with unions freely chosen by workers. Penalties for violation would include denial of U.S. tax credits for taxes paid to South Africa and export curbs.

A SEPARATE BILL by Rep. William H. Gray (D-Pa.) would bar U.S. financial institutions from making loans to South Africa until the President certifies the country has made "substantial progress" toward eliminating discrimination throughout the society.

Denison said the AFL-CIO supports the intent of both measures.

He reiterated the AFL-CIO position that if such steps prove inadequate, the United States should move toward a selective ban on the importation of South African products—and to a full boycott if necessary.

But "experience has shown that such a boycott can only be effective if taken in concert with our allies," Denison added.

D.C., Ohio Ballot Issues

Tuition Tax Credit Plan, Insurance Grab, Beaten

Voters in the District of Columbia trounced a labor-opposed tuition tax credit initiative in the Nov. 3 elections and Ohio citizens followed labor's lead in rejecting a constitutional amendment that would have let private insurance companies sell workers' compensation plans to employers in place of the state-run program.

The tuition tax credit fight spurred a heavy turnout of D.C. voters for an off-year election. Some 89 percent rejected the measure in a hot contest both sides saw as the first major test of the idea at the polls.

THE OPPOSITION was led by a coalition that included the Greater Washington AFL-CIO, the American Federation of Teachers and its Washington local, the Government Employees and the State, County & Municipal Employees. The coalition was supported also by D.C. officials, the business community, civic organizations, area ministers, senior citizens and civil rights organizations.

The tuition tax credit proposal, spearheaded by the National Taxpayers Union, would have allowed District residents to deduct up to $1,200 from their D.C. taxes for each child attending private school. City businesses could have cut their tax liability up to 50 percent for contributions to the tuition of D.C. students.

The labor-led coalition pointed out that the measure would undermine public education, deeply erode the city's tax base and destroy thousands of jobs for teachers and other workers. The sharp drop in revenues, the coalition stressed, would force up property, sales and other taxes in the District.

ALTHOUGH THE coalition successfully persuaded voters that the initiative favored the wealthy, election results also showed heavy opposition to the scheme in the city's most affluent wards.

AFT President Albert Shanker, commenting on the 9-1 rejection of the plan, noted that "this was the first chance the people have had to say whether they wanted tax credits—and they turned it down overwhelmingly."

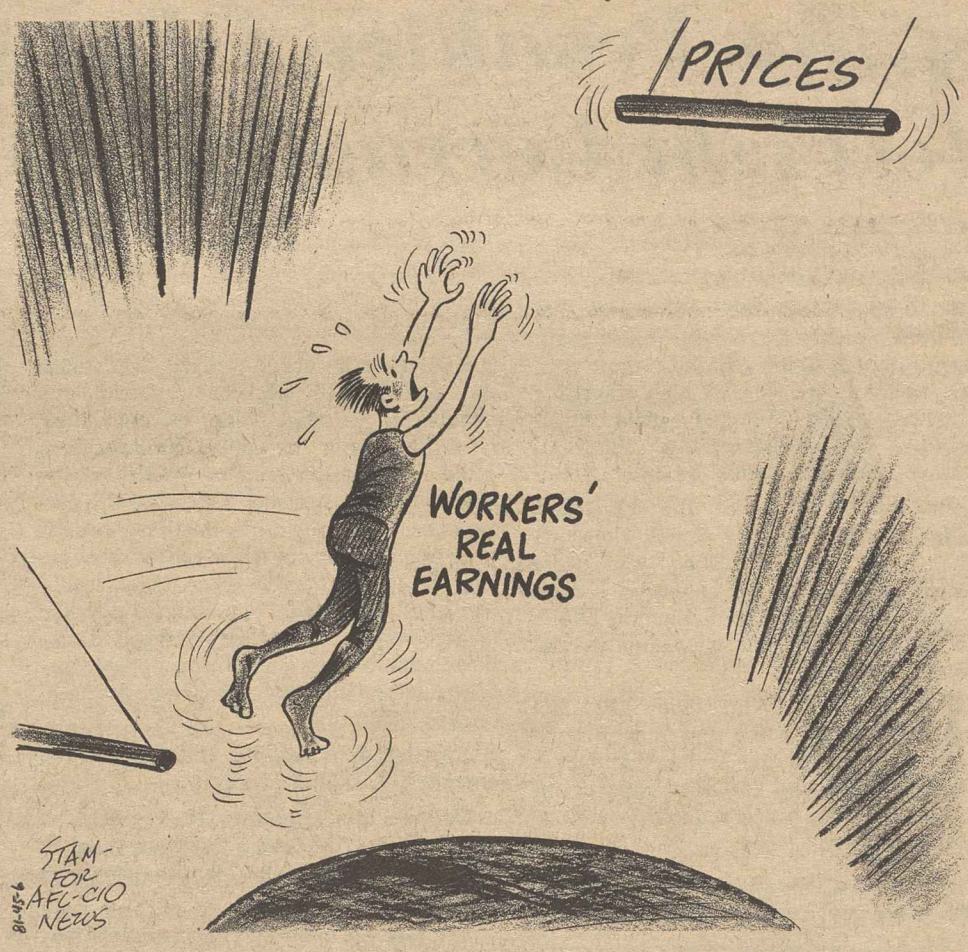
In Ohio, the State AFL-CIO led the effort that beat back by a 4-to-1 margin a measure that would have allowed private insurance firms to replace the present state-operated workers' compensation system. The federation was joined by a coalition that included business, farm, civic, consumer, civil rights and church groups.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council last summer urged all AFL-CIO affiliates to work for defeat of the proposal. Under the existing plan, it noted, investment income from employer premiums is retained by the state fund to pay benefits and lower costs.

Ohio is the largest of six states that have exclusive state funds to provide workers' compensation coverage. Its system dates from a 1913 law sponsored by then-Sen. William Green, who later was to succeed Samuel Gompers as president of the American Federation of Labor.

State AFL-CIO President Milan Marsh called defeat of the issue "a victory for workers who saw through the multi-million dollar media campaign that stressed 'free enterprise and competition.' "

THE AMENDMENT'S supporters poured more than $6 million into the campaign, much of it contributed by insurance companies, the state federation said. Marsh praised the efforts of Ohio unions to raise funds for the opposition campaign urging voters to reject the amendment.



In another victory for labor-supported positions in Ohio, voters turned down 3-to-2 a Republican proposal for a constitutional amendment to change the formula for state legislative and congressional districts.

Washington state citizens passed an initiative requiring voter approval of the state utility system's construction budget and financing plans.

KENTUCKY VOTERS turned down a proposal to allow state officers, including incumbent Gov. John Y. Brown, Jr., to succeed themselves in office, and in another surprise loss, West Virginia rejected a $750-billion road bond issue that had statewide business and labor support. The state AFL-CIO attributed the defeat to a fear of higher taxes and economic uncertainty.

Elsewhere, voters picked and chose among ballot issues. In New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania bond issues to improve public facilities were cleared. But Rhode Island turned down spending proposals for road and bridge repair and senior citizens transportation, and Texas voters rejected a local water projects issue. In Maine, bond issues for park improvements and public broadcasting equipment were voted down, but a $15-million issue to aid Bath Iron Works won approval.

der pacts reached during the first nine months of the year. The soft-coal mining settlement covered 11 percent of the workers, and settlements in retail food stores covered 10 percent.

BLS noted that the average first-year wage boost was 13.9 percent in the construction industry. In other industries, the first-year average was 10.1 percent. Other highlights of the report:

- Manufacturing industry settlements covering 312,000 workers provided for an average first-year wage increase of 9 percent and an average annual raise of 7 when measured over the life of the pacts.
- Settlements in nonmanufacturing industries covering 1.1 million workers provided for an average first-year increase of 12.2 percent and an average 9.9 percent annual increase over term.
- Construction pacts covering 49,000 workers provided for an average 11.4 percent annual increase over the life of the contracts.
- Contracts negotiated during the nine-month period had an average duration of 31.2 months.
- Key contracts—those covering bargaining units of 5,000 or more workers—provided an average 11.8 percent first-year increase in combined wage and fringe-benefit improvements.

FIRST-YEAR negotiated increases in contracts with COL clauses averaged 7.9 percent, compared with 12.4 percent in those without such clauses, BLS said. Annual wage adjustments over the life of the agreements averaged 6.4 and 10 percent, respectively.

COL clauses covered 306,000 workers or 21 percent of those under settlements concluded during the first nine months of 1981. About 45,000 workers were covered by seven agreements which introduced COL clauses for the first time or re-established a COL provision that had been dropped earlier. COL clauses were dropped in nine agreements.

About 7.7 million of the 9 million workers included in BLS's major collective bargaining series received "effective" wage increases averaging 8.4 percent during the first nine months of 1981, while 1.3 million workers had no change during the period.

EFFECTIVE WAGE increases result from settlements reached during the period, deferred raises paid under agreements negotiated earlier, and increases under cost-of-living clauses. When prorated over all 9 million workers under major agreements, the wage adjustments put into effect during the nine-month period averaged 7.1 percent.

In the current quarters, 108 major agreements covering 285,000 workers are due to expire or may be reopened for wage negotiations, BLS said.

Virginia, New Jersey Elect New Governors

President Reagan's personal campaigning failed to keep Virginia in the Republican column, and a Democrat was elected governor for the first time since 1965.

In New Jersey, the only other state to elect a governor this year, Republican Thomas H. Kean, a millionaire businessman, held a paper-thin lead over James J. Florio, a labor-backed Democratic Congressman.

Reagan had carried both states handily last November and personally campaigned for the Republican gubernatorial candidates.

In Virginia, Democrat Charles S. Robb took 54 percent of the vote to defeat Reagan-endorsed J. Marshall Coleman.

Robb, the son-in-law of former President Lyndon B. Johnson, campaigned as a "moderate conservative." But black voters and other groups hard hit by Reagan budget slashes turned out in large numbers to give him strong support. Robb had the backing of a number of unions. The Virginia State AFL-CIO refrained from an endorsement of either candidate.

THE NEW JERSEY campaign was hard-fought from the start, with Florio urging voters to send "a message across the nation" of opposition to the Reagan program and Kean urging a "time-for-a-change" after two terms of retiring Democratic Gov. Brendan T. Byrne.

With more than 2.3 million votes cast, the lead shifted repeatedly during the long count and tally of absentee ballots. Kean eventually wound up with a lead of only 1,158 votes, subject to the official canvass and a possible recount.

Local issues dominated most mayoral elections, with incumbents generally winning re-election.

New York Mayor Edward Koch, who ran with both Democratic and Republican endorsement, was an easy winner. Buffalo's Mayor James Griffin also had two-party support. Both were first elected as Democrats.

Cleveland Mayor George Voinovich, a Republican, won re-election with a record-high 76.5 percent of the vote. In Minneapolis, liberal Democrat Don Fraser won an easy 2-1 re-election, and Democrat Coleman Young won his third term as mayor of Detroit.

DEMOCRAT RICHARD Caliguiri was easily re-elected in Pittsburgh and Republican Margaret Hance continues as mayor of Phoenix.

In Albany, Democrat Erastus Corning was elected to an 11th term. He has been mayor for 40 years. And in Hartford, Democrat Thirman L. Milner became the first black mayor of a major New England city.

In Houston, where the mayor gets $82,000 a year, incumbent Jim McConn finished fourth, and a runoff will decide between City Controller Kathy Whitmere and Sheriff Jack Heard. In Miami, a runoff will pit incumbent Maurice Ferre, a native of Puerto Rico, against Manola Rebosa, a native of Cuba.

California State Units Pick AFL-CIO Unions

The Communications Workers and the State, County & Municipal Employees scored major victories in runoff elections against the unaffiliated California State Employees Association to represent more than 11,000 state health service employees.

CWA Local 11555 won representation rights for 8,000 psychiatric technicians in state hospitals by gaining 57 percent of the vote over the CSEA in an election conducted by California's Public Employment Relations Board.

AFSCME Local 2620 also defeated the CSEA for a 3,100-member unit of health and social service professionals by gaining a majority of the vote in a tight election.

Council Pledges Renewed Fight For Social, Economic Progress

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI | Saturday, November 14, 1981 | No. 46

Donahue Hits Wage-Busting On Standards

The AFL-CIO and unions representing workers whose pay and benefits are threatened accused the Reagan Administration of abusing the regulatory process to cut back coverage of the Service Contract Act.

AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue told the House Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations that the Labor Dept. has subordinated enforcement of worker protection laws to the Administration's goal of cutting wage costs.

"WE WANT to see the Dept. of Labor rededicate itself to the protection of the American worker," Donahue testified.

The Service Contract Act, passed in 1965 and twice strengthened by Congress, was intended to assure that workers employed by firms that provide services to the government receive locally prevailing wages and benefits. It is comparable to Davis-Bacon Act protections for construction workers.

New regulations proposed by the Labor Dept. last August would exempt from the law many contracts now covered, and unions have charged it would lead to a renewal of the wage-cutting that led to passage of the law. The department has not yet made the regulations final and will hold its own hearings later this month to supplement written comments by interested parties.

SUBCOMMITTEE Chairman Philip Burton (D-Calif.) termed the proposed regulations cause for "serious concerns," and union officials who testified during two days of hearings clearly shared these concerns.

AFL-CIO witnesses included:

- Service Employees President John Sweeney, who said the Labor Dept. should be working to improve the often lax enforcement of the law instead of seeking

Price of Reaganomics

'Engineered Recession' Brings 8% Jobless Rate

By James M. Shevis

American workers, hobbled by persistent inflation and an unemployment rate of 8 percent that is likely to climb higher as the economy declines, are now paying the price for what the AFL-CIO saw nine months ago as President Reagan's "high-risk gamble" with the nation's future, Federation President Lane Kirkland declared.

The Administration's budget cuts and tight-money policies "have not produced a flourishing economy as Reagan promised, but rather are the major factors in the rapid increase in unemployment," Kirkland said in a statement on the half-percent jump in the October national jobless rate.

INSTEAD OF addressing the problems of a badly slumping economy, the Administration offers no alternatives to its "engineered recession"—"just more of the same," Kirkland said.

"It is time to undo some of the damage resulting from the budget cuts, the tax giveaways, and the monetary squeeze on the housing and auto industries," he warned.

The increase of five-tenths of 1 percent in the unemployment rate in October was the largest one-month jump since the rise from 6.9 to 7.6 percent in May 1980, near the end of last year's recession.

The number of jobless workers is now more than 8,520,000, a rise of over one million in three months.

LAST MONTH'S unemployment increase was felt most by blue-collar workers. Their jobless rate soared from 10.2 to 11 percent while white-collar unemployment remained unchanged at 4.1 percent. The jobless rate for construction workers leaped from 16.3 to 18 percent over the month.

The suffering of blacks and other minorities was particularly severe as their unemployment level as a whole rose from 15.1 percent in September to 15.5 percent in October, a post-World War II record. The rate for black teenagers shot up from 37.5 to 42.9 percent.

Kirkland noted, though, that there is no shading of distinction in the percentages of unemployed groups among the

Centennial Keys Report To Delegates

By David L. Perlman

New York—America's trade union federation enters its second century committed to a ceaseless struggle for social and economic justice—and to the search for more effective ways to advance labor's cause.

That's the thrust of the Executive Council's report to the AFL-CIO's 14th convention, covering the nearly two years since the retirement and death of George Meany.

IT WAS A period of new leadership for the nation as well as for its labor movement. But while the AFL-CIO moved ahead under new leaders, the Reagan Administration brought a drastic turnabout in the direction of government.

In the opening section of the Executive Council report, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland refers to the "counter-revolution" launched by the Administration to dismantle government programs that "protect society."

The AFL-CIO, he said, has emerged as "the strongest and most coherent voice" against Reagan policies.

WHEN THE President challenged his critics to come up with an alternative program, Kirkland noted, "we did just that."

He cited labor's insistence that defense needs "be met by fair taxation, not by dismantling vital social programs, and the AFL-CIO's proposal for tax incentives targeted for revitalization of essential industries instead of "throwing tax money at business in a wholesale fashion."

And labor warned, as the nation now realizes, "that the Administration's high-interest, tight-money policies would encourage both inflation and unemployment," Kirkland noted.

The labor movement lost "a towering world figure" with the death of George Meany, Kirkland said. "But the institution he shaped remains strong, rooted in the needs and aspirations of working men and women."

HE CITED the influx of new leadership at all levels to replenish the trade union movement, including the addition of the first woman to the AFL-CIO Ex-

Tentative Railroad Accord Sets Gains for Half-Million

Seven AFL-CIO unions representing nearly a half-million workers on major railroads tentatively approved new 39-month agreements providing wage increases of 32.5 percent plus fringe benefit improvements.

The accord, announced at a news conference by President Richard Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks, the largest of the seven unions, retains the previous contract's cost-of-living clause with its formula for pay increases of one cent an hour for each rise of three-tenths of 1 percent in the consumer price index.

THE AGREEMENT also calls for improvements in health and welfare plans, pension benefits, and vacations, and gives workers another paid holiday, the day after Thanksgiving Day.

Kilroy, who became BRAC president on the death of Fred Kroll earlier this year, described the settlement as "an excellent agreement" given today's economic conditions, and predicted its overwhelming ratification by the union's members, who will be voting on it in the next four weeks. Results of the balloting will be known by Dec. 11, he said.

KILROY SAID the new agreement was "a significant step forward," marking one of the few times in railroad negotiations that the union and the National Railway Labor Conference, negotiating for management, had been able to reach an accord without recourse to mediation, arbitration or a threatened or actual strike under the Railway Labor Act.

Davis-Bacon Act Rules Preserved By Senate Vote

The Senate upheld the Davis-Bacon Act on a key 55-42 vote that preserved prevailing wage protections for workers employed on military construction contracts.

Open-shop employers had sought to use the military construction bill as a springboard toward outright repeal of the Davis-Bacon Act, which since 1931 has required federal contractors to meet local pay scales and conditions.

THEY HAD WON an initial victory when the Senate Armed Services Committee wrote an exemption from Davis-Bacon coverage into the $6.5 billion military construction authorization bill.

On the Senate floor, the burden was on labor's friends to amend the bill so as to delete the Davis-Bacon Act exemption.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) introduced the amendment to restore Davis-

KEYNOTING the Metal Trades Dept.'s 60th convention, President Paul J. Burnsky cited the critical condition of the U.S. naval and merchant fleets and scored the Administration for retreating from its commitment to shipbuilding.

Metal Trades Spur Federal Action To Reverse Naval, Maritime Decline

By John R. Oravec

New York—Overdue federal support of domestic ship construction projects to reverse the shrinkages of U.S. naval and maritime fleets is critical to the nation's security, the industry and the jobs of thousands of shipyard workers, the 60th Metal Trades Dept. convention warned.

Delegates also stressed the need for stepping up departmental organizing efforts as they endorsed a six-point program drafted by a convention committee.

THE CONVENTION called on Congress to restore funding for construction differential subsidies (CDS) which had been deferred by the House Merchant Marine & Fisheries Committee under pressure from the Reagan Administration.

At the same time, delegates pressed Congress to eliminate an amendment in the Budget Reconcilliation bill that would provide operating subsidies for U.S. firms having ships built or reconstructed in foreign yards.

In his keynote address to the convention, MTD President Paul J. Burnsky cited the critical condition of the U.S. naval and merchant fleets.

NOTING THAT in a dozen years the Navy's active fleet has shrunk from 926 to 446 ships, Burnsky observed that "if a war started tomorrow, the Navy would be worse off than it was on the morning after the attack on Pearl Harbor."

The merchant marine is in even worse shape, he said. "Thirty years ago nearly 4,000 American-flag ships carried 60 percent of the nation's import-export cargo. Fewer than 600 ships remain, carrying only 4 percent of it," he said, and merely a "handful would be fit for duty as military transports."

Burnsky charged that the Administration has retreated on its commitment to rebuild the naval and merchant fleets.

"THE FIRST to go was assistance for cargo carriers," he said. "The long-standing construction subsidy program was scorned. The obvious preference is for foreign-built vessels—even warships, according to the Secretary of the Navy."

Burnsky warned that U.S.-owned runaway vessels that fly foreign flags and are operated by foreign crews can't be depended upon in an emergency.

But neither Congress nor the White House has been able to determine if a U.S.-flag fleet is worth having, he said. The Navy isn't sure about it either, he added.

"UNLESS THERE is a continuing flow of merchant ship construction in the nation's commercial shipyards during the next five years," Burnsky cautioned, "there won't be enough shipyards, enough specialty suppliers and, worst of all, enough skilled workers to build the warships the Navy will be ready to order."

The department represents more than 650,000 workers in 22 affiliated unions under contracts negotiated by MTD councils with private industry and at federal facilities.

Burnsky noted that there are only 24 private U.S. shipyards remaining that are capable of handling naval construction and with the withdrawal of merchant ship construction subsidies others may soon close.

A NUMBER of convention speakers voiced similar concerns over the deterioration of shipping and naval strength.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told delegates that "your goal of rebuilding your industry and restoring America's shipping and shipbuilding capacity is not yours alone. It is a goal of the entire labor movement, because there is no way this country can guarantee its own survival, let alone reach its potential without it."

Kirkland said the labor movement is entering its second century during a period of severe economic dislocation and is faced with an Administration whose social philosophy is a throwback to the big business barons of 100 years ago.

"AS WE CROSS the threshhold of our second century, the labor movement stands as the strongest, most unified force defending the rights of the American people, and we have a fight on our hands," he stressed.

Kirkland noted that hundreds of thousands of workers responded on the Sept. 19 Solidarity Day demonstration "to President Reagan's claim that he, not the labor movement speaks for American workers . . . showing that they have lost none of their desire to speak for themselves through the democratic institutions they created for the purpose."

He said the trade union movement and its allies are working for another demonstration of solidarity on Election Day 1982 when "we intend to do everything in our power to elect a Congress that will reverse Mr. Reagan's program and restore the human equation to the process of government providing for the general welfare."

THE CONVENTION'S endorsement of an expanded organizing effort includes a recommendation for the department to establish a pilot program that will be used as a model by Metal Trades Councils across the country in future organizing activities.

The department's major organizing gain since its last biennial convention came in a representation election in Panama earlier this year for 8,000 professional employees. The campaign was coordinated by an AFL-CIO Maritime/Metal Trades coalition.

Delegates also approved a 2-cent increase in the per capita tax that was recommended by the convention's audit committee. Monthly payments by the MTD's affiliated unions and councils will rise to 12 cents per member effective next July 1.

Other key resolutions adopted at the two-day convention call for:

- Affiliates and councils to establish voluntary COPE check-off contributions by members.
- Strong opposition to Administration attempts to place tight limits on the wages of federal workers.
- Rejection of proposals to slash coverage and benefits through amendments to the Federal Employee Compensation Act.
- Extending full OSHA protections to federal workers.
- Continued opposition to proposals to tax workers' fringe benefits.
- Improvements to inland waterway transportation facilities, development of bilateral coal shipping agreements, and rejection of new attempts to export Alaskan oil.

Convention speakers in addition to Kirkland included President Frank Drozak of the Maritime Trades Dept.; Sec.-Treas. Earl McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.; retired Admiral Isaac C. Kidd who headed the Navy's Atlantic fleet and NATO naval forces; Admiral E. B. Fowler, commander of the Naval Sea Systems Command, and Robert E. King, industrial relations director of the Energy Dept. and NASA.

Senate Votes To Preserve Davis-Bacon

Bacon coverage, with Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) as co-sponsor. It passed with the votes of 39 Democrats and 16 Republicans, including Majority Leader Howard H. Baker. Only seven Democrats joined 35 Republicans in voting against Davis-Bacon.

A factor in the battle for Republican votes was the Reagan Administration's position on the issue.

SEN. STROM THURMOND (R-S.C.), author of the Davis-Bacon exemption clause, told the Senate that it was his "understanding" that the White House took no position on the issue.

But other senators interpreted a letter from Office of Management & Budget Director David A. Stockman as signalling Administration opposition to piecemeal repeal of Davis-Bacon.

Stockman said the Administration's policy "of not seeking repeal of Davis-Bacon" also applies to the military construction controversy. Stockman noted that "the Dept. of Labor, at the President's direction, has developed and proposed administrative changes, designed to improve the administration of the Davis-Bacton Act and reduce costs."

Thurmond told the Senate that the new regulations "will take too long to implement" and argued that the military construction bill could be used as a "marketplace" test of operating without Davis-Bacon coverage.

JACKSON RETORTED that the Davis-Bacon Act has been "a stabilizing force in the cyclical construction industry and continues to serve a valid purpose of preventing the development of unfair wage-busting tactics.

Kennedy warned that exemption from prevailing wage protection would lower the quality of workmanship.

Senate Rollcall to Restore Davis-Bacon Act Coverage

The Davis-Bacon Act assures payment of prevailing wages and benefits on federal construction contracts. A military construction bill before the Senate would exclude contracts totaling billions of dollars from Davis-Bacon coverage.

The Senate on Nov. 5 voted 55-42 for a labor-supported amendment by Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) restoring Davis-Bacon coverage.

Keyed to Corporate Strategies

Food, Beverage Trades Press Organizing Goals

New York—Delegates to the Food & Beverage Trades Dept. convention called for continued development of new organizing techniques keyed to the department's corporate strategies program.

The convention stressed the need to develop imaginative tools and techniques to combat the effects of "open government hostility toward unions" which it said is encouraging many employers to attack labor through the use of union-busting consultants.

THE FBTD corporate strategies program is designed to ferret out the strengths and weaknesses of targeted firms through extensive research before specific tactics are developed to meet a union's organizing and collective bargaining goals.

In his keynote address to the convention, FBTD President Robert F. Harbrant said organizing is the most serious challenge facing the trade union movement. He noted that "80 million unorganized workers are already out there in the workforce without a voice, without a vote, without a grievance system."

Harbrant underlined the need to upgrade the organizing approach to reverse the decline in membership of some unions and bring representation to the unorganized.

"WE NEED to collectively examine specific industries or certain conglomerates and decide as a department to target such concerns for concentrated, coordinated campaigns," he said. "Locals, even internationals, cannot effectively confront these giants who stare us in the face and want only to deny workers their most fundamental rights."

New organizing strategies are particularly essential in making maximum use of the limited resources of unions and in the face of a government that "is unabashedly antagonistic toward workers, not just unions," he declared.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland expanded on that theme in his address to the convention, noting that the Reagan Administration espouses a social philosophy developed by business leaders 100 years ago, and which the labor movement has struggled to refute ever since.

"THEY BELIEVE that the job of government is to help accumulate more capital at the expense of all who are not rich," Kirkland said. "They object to any government efforts to reduce inequality among the American people and to prevent the exploitation of the weak by the strong."

The same forces object to all government programs that labor has fought to establish, including health care, housing, education, jobs creation, social security, occupational safety and consumer protections, he pointed out.

"It is ironic," Kirkland observed, "that those who complain the most about government on their backs are the first to applaud when government is used to break the back of a union."

THE CONVENTION re-elected Harbrant to a new two-year term by acclamation and elected Rhonda Allgaier to her first full term as secretary-treasurer. Allgaier, who also is secretary-treasurer of Hotel Employees-Restaurant Employees Local 8 in Seattle, filled the unexpired term of Harry R. Poole, who retired in August.

Delegates also voted to raise the monthly per capita tax affiliates pay the department to 5 cents, a 1½-cent increase.

To give delegates a broader perspective on the department's corporate strategy, a panel of specialists outlined various approaches to conduct research on targeted companies.

THEY EXPLORED avenues for acquiring vast amounts of information through the examination of proxy statements and shareholder reports, interlocking directorships, credit sources, real estate holdings, pension fund investments, stock purchases in other companies, as well as records filed with numerous government agencies, including the Securities & Exchange Commission, Federal Trade Commission, Labor Dept., NLRB, OSHA, ERISA, Justice Dept.'s Antitrust Division and EEOC.

A prototype of the FBTD's approach was used successfully by the Clothing & Textile Workers in its J. P. Stevens campaign. It was instituted after the company flouted numerous decisions for violations of federal labor law.

Jeffrey Fiedler, director of the FBTD program, noted in summing up the panel discussion that corporate strategies provide unions with alternative approaches to organizing and collective bargaining efforts. When combined with the traditional tools of strike, boycott and NLRB elections, the odds of winning are vastly improved. Other panelists were Ray Rogers, ACTWU consultant; FBTD Counsel Ron Rosenberg and John Wilhelm of HERE.

KEY RESOLUTIONS adopted at the two-day convention called for:

- Opposition to Administration efforts to weaken the Freedom of Information Act, a vital means of acquiring information for the department.
- Safeguards against attempts by the SEC to relax regulations governing corporate reports.
- Stronger federal legislation protecting workers from the use of "lie-detector" tests by employers.
- Improved federal safeguards against pesticides and other toxic hazards facing workers.
- Stricter OSHA standards to better protect workers against explosions at grain elevators and mills.
- Opposition to the Administration's "guest worker" program and implementation of an effective, but compassionate, immigration policy.
- Reversal of the Administration's economic policies that are having a disastrous impact on workers and their families.
- A congressional investigation into the practices, control and cross-ownership of commercial media and expansion of the public's voice in the Corporation for Public Broadcasting.

Convention speakers included Msgr. George G. Higgins, who gave delegates a comprehensive report on Poland's Solidarity convention, which he attended; Sen. Dennis DeConcini (D-Ariz.), Sen. Paul Tsongas (D-Mass.), Rep. David Obey (D-Wis.), occupational health experts Dr. Irving Selikoff and Dr. Jeanne Stollman, Sec.-Treas. Earl McDavid of the Union Label & Service Trades Dept. and Teamster organizer Vicky Saporta.

MSGR. GEORGE G. HIGGINS, addressing the Food & Beverage Trades Dept. convention in New York, gave delegates a firsthand report on the recent national congress held by Poland's Solidarity trade union federation. Higgins, of Catholic University in Washington, spoke at the historic congress, Solidarity's first since its creation a year ago.

Workers Defense League Honors SEIU's Sweeney

New York—AFL-CIO Vice President John J. Sweeney told more than 500 labor and liberal leaders at a Workers Defense League dinner in his honor that the impetus so dramatically produced by Solidarity Day must be "only the first shot" in a continuing campaign to defeat the Reagan Administration's program of "benefits for the truly greedy, not the truly needy."

Sweeney, who is president of the Service Employees, stressed that labor begins its second century much as it did its first—"battling injustice and prejudice and fighting for the rights of working men and women everywhere."

He cited Hubert Humphrey's "moral test" of how government treats children, the aged, the sick, the needy and the handicapped. After almost ten months of the Reagan presidency, Sweeney charged, "the Administration fails such a test miserably on all counts."

Joyce D. Miller, president of the Coalition of Labor Union Women, presented the WDL's 1981 David L. Clendenin Award for distinguished service to labor's rights to Sweeney, lauding his achievements in both "bringing women workers into the labor movement and bringing the labor movement to women workers."

She said the SEIU has worked unceasingly "to include the neglected women and minority workers of the service economy, household workers, health care workers and clerical workers, into the movement of free and united labor."

DINNER CHAIRMAN Albert Shanker, president of the American Federation of Teachers, hailed the 45th anniversary of the WDL and reminded the audience that he had testified in 1971 before the WDL Commission of Inquiry into the use of the injunction and jail sentences against public employees. The WDL, he said, worked hard then to call attention to the discrepancies between the rights the nation grants to some workers and not to others.

Today, Shanker said, "we still face a world of double standards: the same arguments that are used against public employees here, such as air traffic controllers, are used by the Soviets against Polish workers."

Bayard Rustin, chairman of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, hailed the role of the Workers Defense League in initiating the Joint Apprenticeship Project, which later blossomed into the Recruitment & Training Program (RTP). That succeeded in bringing more than 20,000 black and Hispanic youngsters into union apprenticeship programs in construction and other unions.

THE RECURRING theme of peonage and forced labor was broached by Harry Fleischman, chairman of the WDL's executive committee. Back in 1950, he reported, the WDL testified before a United Nations committee on forced labor among black sharecroppers in the South, while denouncing forced labor in the Soviet Union, its satellites, and in South Africa.

But it's happening again, said Fleischman. Last month, two migrant crew leaders were arrested for conspiring to kidnap and enslave eight migrant workers and causing the death of one man. Thousands of undocumented aliens have been held in virtual slavery in the United States, he said.

The Workers Defense League, Fleischman reported, has responded to this cruel situation by bringing together more than 170 prominent Americans who are calling upon President Reagan to order the Justice Dept. and the Immigration & Naturalization Service to enforce the nation's anti-peonage statutes, and help wipe out the blight of peonage in America.

Other projects were detailed by Philip van Buren, the WDL's new executive director. They include: building a system of private litigation to fight violations of minimum wage and maximum hour laws, providing new voluntary avenues of internal union dispute settlements, and a program to help bust the union-busters.

Textile Industry Reports Joblessness of 12 Percent

Unemployment in the textile industry rose to 12 percent in October, compared to 8 percent for the nation as a whole, the American Textile Manufacturers Institute reported.

The October jobless rate for the industry was the highest since the 1974-75 recession. Labor Dept. statistics show that, in addition to those unemployed, 8 percent of the nation's 835,000 textile workers were working less than 35 hours per week for lack of full-time work.

Rail Carriers, Unions Reach National Pact

The six other unions that tentatively agreed to the same settlement are the Machinists, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Maintenance of Way Employees, the Carmen, the Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, and the Sheet Metal Workers. BRAC represents over 100,000 workers affected by the agreement, and the others about 140,000.

Meanwhile, six other unions with members employed by the country's big railroads are at various stages of negotiations with management. Representing a total of about 200,000 workers, the six are the Locomotive Engineers, Signalmen, Firemen & Oilers, Yardmasters, United Transportation Union, and the American Train Dispatchers Association.

KILROY SAID the new pact, reached after nearly three months of negotiations, is fully retroactive to Apr. 1, when the previous agreement expired, and will run through June 30, 1984. The estimated 32.5 percent pay raise assumes an inflation rate of 10 percent this year, 8 percent in 1982, and again in 1983, he said.

The agreement calls for a 2-percent wage increase retroactive to Apr. 1. Another retroactive 3-percent wage increase dates back to Oct. 1. Next July, a 3-percent pay raise will be added, and another 3-percent increase will become effective in July 1983.

Cost-of-living adjustments include one of 32 cents, retroactive to July 1, to be added to the 58-cent-per-hour COL allowance in effect at that time. A second COL allowance of 35 cents an hour would be added Jan. 1, 1982. COL payments thereafter would be made semi-annually.

VACATIONS ARE improved to three weeks a year for workers with eight years of seniority and to four weeks for those with 17 years or more of service.

Kilroy said that in addition to improvements in the industry's health and welfare plan, the parties agreed to set up a joint labor-management committee to look into "other alternatives." The objective, he explained, would be to get better coverage and protection for employees at lower cost to them.

Workers employed by Conrail, the federally subsidized freight line in the Northeast and Midwest, are covered by the new agreement but not those employed by Amtrak, the quasi-public passenger service.

NEW RAIL AGREEMENT is discussed by President Richard Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks at a Washington news conference. BRAC and six other unions representing workers employed by the nation's major railroads have tentatively agreed to a pact providing wage increases of 32.5 percent over a 39-month period.

South Carolina Fed Elects First Full-Time President

Myrtle Beach, S.C.—Delegates to the 25th convention of the South Carolina AFL-CIO elected Randall Kiser of Columbia as the first full-time president of the state federation, scored the "destructive direction of the Reagan Administration's social and economic policies," and pledged to maintain the momentum of Solidarity Day by designating the 1982 general election, Solidarity Day II.

Kiser, 26, a member of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers Union, has been the state federation's political director since 1978. The oath of office was administered by his father, George Kiser, an AFL-CIO Region V field representative since 1963.

KISER SUCCEEDS James A. Johnson of Andrews, a vice president of the Clothing & Textile Workers and manager of its South Carolina Coastal Joint Board. Johnson did not seek the full-time state federation position. He has held the part-time presidency for the last three years.

In opening remarks to the 350 delegates, Johnson pointed to increased union impact on the state legislature, reinstitution of the combined North and South Carolina Labor School and "development of a mature and effective COPE program in a fiercely right-wing atmosphere" as among "your proudest accomplishments during the last three years."

Sec.-Treas. Harold Reynolds reported that affiliations have grown substantially since the 1980 convention, with membership now standing at more than 33,000. He said the record-high membership was achieved largely through the new resources made available by the two-step per capita increase voted by the 1980 convention.

REYNOLDS, a member of the Communications Workers and president of CWA's Florence local, did not seek reelection to the post that he has held since 1978. Delegates chose R. H. Harmon, a member of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, to succeed him.

ACTWU Sec.-Treas. Jacob Sheinkman delivered a stinging attack on Reaganomics in his keynote address to the convention. He charged that although the Administration had promised that its budget-cutting and program-slashing would not force more suffering on the poor and the disadvantaged, what it actually delivered were protections for the rich and powerful, with no effective safeguards for those at or near the bottom of the economic scale.

Sheinkman called upon working people to "hunker down, persist in unity" to stem inflation, cut unemployment, lower interest rates, protect human rights and "overcome the catastrophe of Reaganomics."

AFTER HEARING a status report from PATCO negotiator Dennis Reardon, the delegates shouted approval of a resolution calling on the Administration and the Dept. of Transportation to rehire the 12,000 experienced air traffic controllers fired in August, and to "end the union-busting vendetta against their union, PATCO."

The delegates also spelled out policy in a series of resolutions and heard from a number of other speakers.

Among these were Steelworkers District Director Bruce Thrasher; AFL-CIO Region V Director James Sala; Regional COPE Director Clement Dowler, Rep. Butler Derrick (D-S.C.); Jean B. Savoy, United Way Southern Region labor liaison representative; E. T. Kehrer, AFL-CIO Southern Area civil rights director, Norman Hill, president of the A. Philip Randolph Institute and attorney James Bell.

Georgia Convention Slates State Solidarity Day Rally

Savannah, Ga.—The 400 delegates to the Georgia AFL-CIO's annual convention adopted an eight-point legislative program that will serve as a rallying point for Georgia Solidarity Day.

Modeled after the Sept. 19 national Solidarity Day in the nation's capital, the statewide observance is set for January 1982, when the Georgia General Assembly convenes. State AFL-CIO President Herbert H. Mabry said that labor would demand on that day that state legislators take a stand on the eight key issues debated at the convention.

THE STATE AFL-CIO seeks passage of legislation to give public employees the right to bargain collectively, increase consumer protection, improve workers' and unemployment compensation benefits, ratify the Equal Rights Amendment, permit voter registration by mail and carry out tax reforms.

Mabry noted that more than 3,000 Georgians made the trip to Washington in September for the national Solidarity Day and called for even broader participation in the state rally "so there will be no doubt in the minds of politicians about where Georgia's workers stand on these issues."

Breaking with a long-standing policy of not inviting political figures to address the convention, Mabry asked Rep. Wyche Fowler (D) of Georgia's 5th District to speak because he was the only member of the state's congressional delegation to vote "right" in labor's view on President Reagan's budget reductions. Fowler attacked Reagan's economic plan as unfair to workers.

OTHER SPEAKERS at the three-day convention included Machinists President William W. Winpisinger; AFL-CIO Region V Director James Sala; Tim Ryles, administrator of the Georgia Consumer Affairs Dept.; Sherry Schulman, president of ERA Georgia; Area COPE Director Clem Dowler, and Chester Dunham, president of the state A. Philip Randolph Institute.

Delegates re-elected the federation's top three executive officers — Mabry, Sec.-Treas. Martha True, and Executive Vice President H. F. Ellington—without opposition. In addition, they elected 10 district vice presidents, four of them new, and honored Michael J. Counihan, executive vice president of the Georgia AFL-CIO for the past 19 years, who left office a few months before the convention for personal reasons.

Container Deposit Bill Sets High Cost in Jobs

The cost in lost jobs is too high a price to pay for the uncertain benefits of a mandatory deposit on beverage containers, the AFL-CIO testified at Senate hearings.

Legislative Rep. Kenneth Peterson acknowledged "the good intentions" of sponsors of mandatory deposit bills, but stressed that disposal of beverage cans and bottles is only part of the overall problem of solid waste disposal and increased recycling of discarded packaging.

Congress has already directed a comprehensive study of resource conservation issues, Peterson noted. Consideration of mandatory deposit legislation should await the study's findings, he suggested.

Price Climb At Wholesale Level Persists

Wholesale prices rose six-tenths of 1 percent in October, largely the result of the higher cost of 1982 model passenger cars, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The increase in BLS's producer price index for finished goods followed smaller rises of two-tenths of 1 percent in September and three-tenths of 1 percent in August.

Farther back in the supply pipeline, the prices for intermediate goods showed no change, and prices for raw materials fell 1.7 percent over the month, the third consecutive monthly decrease.

DESPITE CHEAPER energy and food bills, the October wholesale price increase was the highest since a jump of eight-tenths of 1 percent last April. The government's producer price index was 7.3 percent higher than 12 months earlier.

Besides new cars, higher prices were posted for newspapers, periodicals, books, tobacco products, costume jewelry, drugs and cutlery. In contrast, prices declined for cosmetics and sterling flatware.

Prices for finished consumer food items edged down two-tenths of 1 percent, following no change in September. Beef and veal prices declined after rising in the previous month. Prices also fell sharply for fresh and dried vegetables, peanut butter, and milled rice. On the other hand, prices advanced for fresh fruits, eggs, soft drinks, fish, roasted coffee, vegetable oil end products, and refined sugar.

THE COST OF home heating oil for dealers fell 1.4 percent, the fourth consecutive monthly decline. Gasoline prices moved up four-tenths of 1 percent, however, after falling in each of the previous five months.

Capital equipment costs rose nine-tenths of 1 percent after showing no change in September. Most of the upturn was due to higher motor vehicles prices. Among other capital goods, machinery prices were higher last month in construction, printing, the bakery industry, and mining.

Prices fell for aircraft, railroad equipment, office machinery, and industrial material handling equipment.

Emmet Andrews Dies at 64; Led Postal Workers

Walnut Creek, Calif.—Emmet Andrews, former president of the Postal Workers and a vice president of the AFL-CIO until his retirement last August, died here at the age of 65 after a stroke.

In a letter to his wife, Elizabeth, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue quoted from the resolution adopted by the Executive Council when Andrews retired. It cited his steadfast "devotion to the cause of democracy and human rights" and a lifetime of "service to American workers."

ANDREWS BECAME a union member when he went to work as a postal clerk in San Francisco. He moved through the ranks to become president of his local, was elected a full-time regional vice president in 1962 and came to the union's Washington headquarters in 1966 in the elected post of executive aide. He was the APWU's director of industrial relations when he was chosen by the union's executive board in 1977 to fill the unexpired term of President Francis S. Filbey, who died in office.

At the AFL-CIO convention later that year, Andrews was elected a vice president of the federation. He won election to a full two-year term as president of the APWU in 1978, but lost his bid for reelection in a four-way contest last year.

Contributions in his memory may be made to the union's E. C. Hallbeck Foundation, the Andrews family advised.

Convention Caps Celebration

Centennial Observance Highlights Labor's Role

New York—The celebration of the modern labor movement's 100th anniversary has given labor an opportunity to highlight its role in a democratic society, the Executive Council report points out.

The AFL-CIO convention that opens Nov. 16 in New York will cap a year-long observance of the modern trade union movement's first century of service to working people, the council report said, emphasizing that the centennial celebration has been linked to labor's present-day activities and future goals while using the lessons of the past to illustrate the importance of organized labor in protecting workers' rights and interests.

THE AFL-CIO is the direct descendant of the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions, launched Nov. 15, 1881, in Pittsburgh by 107 delegates representing unions and local labor assemblies. Its founding established the first continuing national trade union organization in American history.

The council report emphasizes that the centennial has been a vehicle for increasing public understanding of the role and functions of unions at a time when labor's programs are under attack and its gains threatened.

CENTENNIAL materials prepared for the observance include major films and books describing labor history, a centennial emblem and slogan, posters, press materials, brochures and pamphlets, fact sheets and television spot announcements.

Special events include the publication of a new biography of the late AFL-CIO president, George Meany, as well as inauguration of the AFL-CIO's new Human Rights Award established in his memory. The award will go to Solidarity, the Polish labor movement.

Federation President Lane Kirkland issued the call for a centennial observance in December 1980, the 25th anniversary of the merger of the AFL and CIO.

A centennial subcommittee of the Executive Council was established, the report notes, and members include AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and Vice President Frederick O'Neal, Charles Pillard, Sol C. Chaikin, Albert Shanker and Glenn E. Watts.

GUIDELINES approved at the August 1980 meeting of the council stressed that the year-long program would emphasize labor's future challenges as well as its past accomplishments, explore new means to serve workers and increase public understanding of labor's role in strengthening American democatic society.

Union members and their families were urged to plan and participate in anniversary events, the council report notes, adding that emphasis was placed on linking some activities to Labor Day.

Centennial activities spotlighted by the council report include:

- Design and distribution of a centennial emblem that incorporates the clasped hands symbol used by the AFL-CIO since the founding of the first federation in a modern format.
- Creation of a slogan, "A Century of Achievement/A Challenge for the Future," for use on bumper stickers, posters, banners, postal indicia and in printed materials.
- Posters for use in schools and union halls based on Samuel Gompers' 1893 "More" quote, and an original lithograph and poster designed by American artist Robert Rauschenberg.
- A new, concise illustrated history of the American labor movement in both a 36-page, color format and a condensed version reproduced in the American Federationist. Additional centennial articles in the Federationist included histories of the Carpenters and the Boilermakers, also observing centennials, as well as the history of the use of the union label and biographies of the presidents of the AFL and the CIO.
- "A Time of Challenge," a 27-minute color film with a soundtrack featuring labor songs, which traces the growth of the American trade union movement, and a 12-minute color presentation, "Achievement and Challenge," for use in schools and union halls and available in film, videotape and filmstrip.
- Six "Centennial Moment" television spots, each featuring a significant event in labor history, which have been distributed to television networks and stations.

The council report points out that centennial events at the convention will include distribution of a new biography by Archie Robinson, published by Simon & Schuster, Inc., titled "George Meany and His Times."

SOLIDARITY POSTER widely distributed by the Food & Beverage Trades Dept. this year is displayed by FBTD Sec.-Treas. Rhonda Allgaier, right, and New York City Councilwoman Carol Bellamy, who addressed the department's convention. The poster was designed by Peter Allstrom, research and communications director of the department.

Japan Labor Backed on Call For Soviet Return of Islands

Nosappu Point, Japan—The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its support for the return of the disputed "northern territories" to Japanese sovereignty and control at a rally here sponsored by the Japanese Confederation of Labor (Domei).

"It is time for the Soviet Union to return these islands to Japan," Federation President Lane Kirkland said in a message delivered by AFL-CIO International Affairs Rep. James Ellenberger.

"IT IS TIME for the USSR to negotiate a treaty with Japan formally establishing peace between your two countries. It is time to end this shameful chapter in relations between countries," Kirkland's message stressed.

Close to 1,000 trade unionists from all parts of Japan attended the rally following a seminar on the territorial issue at Nemuro, the closest city to the northern islands. From Nosappu Point, all but one of the islands were visible to the crowd.

The northern territories, comprising Etorofu, Kunashiri, Shikotan and Habomai, have always belonged to Japan. At the close of World War II, however, the Soviet Union occupied the islands and expelled more than 16,000 Japanese. Meanwhile, the USSR has refused to negotiate a treaty with Japan formally ending the war and since 1978 has built up its military forces on the islands.

DOMEI, WHICH has been at the forefront of efforts to get the Soviets to return the northern territories, sets aside August and September each year to campaign intensively for a settlement of the issue. The AFL-CIO has consistently supported its efforts.

"These islands are part of Japan, and that fact cannot be changed by the illegal actions and occupation by the Soviet Union," Kirkland said. "This issue is not only one of national pride over the ownership and control of land. It involves the fundamental question of human rights and human dignity."

KIRKLAND SAID that Soviet seizure of the northern territories in 1945 established "an imperialistic pattern of expansionism" which Moscow has manifested time and again in Eastern Europe and most recently in western Asia. He questioned Soviet intentions toward Japan and other Asian countries, noting the military buildup over the past four years on the Japanese islands.

In addition, Soviet naval strength in the Far East today totals a million and a half tons, an increase of 270,000 tons in the past three years, he pointed out.

Stepped-Up Organizing Produces Gains

New York—A number of significant organizing achievements have been made by AFL-CIO affiliates since the federation's last convention, despite the stepped-up activities of management "consultants" seeking to thwart workers' efforts to form unions and bargain collectively, the Executive Council reported.

"Perhaps even more important than the gains actually registered in the past few years is the fact that the AFL-CIO and its affiliates are increasing the amount of resources devoted to organizing, including programs aimed at improving organizing effectiveness," the council observed.

ORGANIZING statistics for private sector representation provided by the National Labor Relations Board revealed significant improvement over the two years prior to the last convention. And statistics for the 1979 fiscal year and the first three quarters of the 1980 fiscal year show an even greater rate of gain, with AFL-CIO affiliates organizing 209,682 employees.

"Assuming that this level of growth continues through the final quarter of fiscal year 1980, when all of the figures are in," the council said, "a total membership representation increase for the two-year period in excess of 230,000 will occur."

One of the most successful organizing strategies developed in recent years has been the concept of cooperative organizing, the council said. Such strategies over the years have proved highly successful in the Los Angeles area, in Florida, Puerto Rico, Cincinnati, Indiana, and Arkansas.

RECENTLY, the New England AFL-CIO regional office established a New England Organizing Committee involving regional vice presidents and directors of organization from 22 international unions. The formation of this program signals a determination by union leaders in New England to reverse the downward organizing trend in that region in the past few years, the report observed.

The Houston cooperative organizing program will be the most ambitious program to date, the council said. A report of the council's Committee on Organization & Field Services in February 1980 noted that there were more than 700,000 organizable employees in the metropolitan area.

A well-developed media campaign will be an integral part of the Houston drive, along with involvement of community support groups and the use of polling and computers, the council said.

LABOR'S continued organizing gains are all the more remarkable considering the intensified activity of labor-management consultants who "skirt, and frequently violate, the law in an unbridled effort" to prevent workers from unionizing, the council observed.

"Available information indicates that labor-management consultants are involved in two of every three elections. In larger units their involvement is even greater," said the council. One study showed that in 65 percent of the cases, consultants remain involved long after the election is won to thwart attempts to gain a contract.

"Even where there has been a long established and mutually satisfactory collective bargaining relationship," the council pointed out, "consultants are being employed to destroy that relationship and break the union."

A DISTURBING trend has been the labor-management consultants' involvement with Japanese firms operating in the United States, the report noted. Such firms have turned increasingly to union-busting consultants to block efforts to their U.S. employees to organize, it said.

The AFL-CIO has initiated a number of programs and special projects to expose and limit the effectiveness of management consultants, and state and local central bodies have been active on the local level in responding to the threats posed by them.

On the legal front, the NLRB, at the urging of the Teachers, has proceeded against the biggest union-busting firm, Modern Management, Inc., by issuing a complaint against it for its role in an AFT organizing campaign. If the firm is found in violation, it should have a substantial impact on its tactics in future campaigns involving other employers, the council noted.

NLRB Bars Boycott Of Cargoes to Russia

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled against the Longshoremen's 1980 boycott of goods destined for or originating in the Soviet Union, rejecting an NLRB administrative law judge's finding that the boycott was a political dispute outside the board's jurisdiction.

The boycott began on Jan. 9, 1980, two weeks after the USSR invaded Afghanistan.

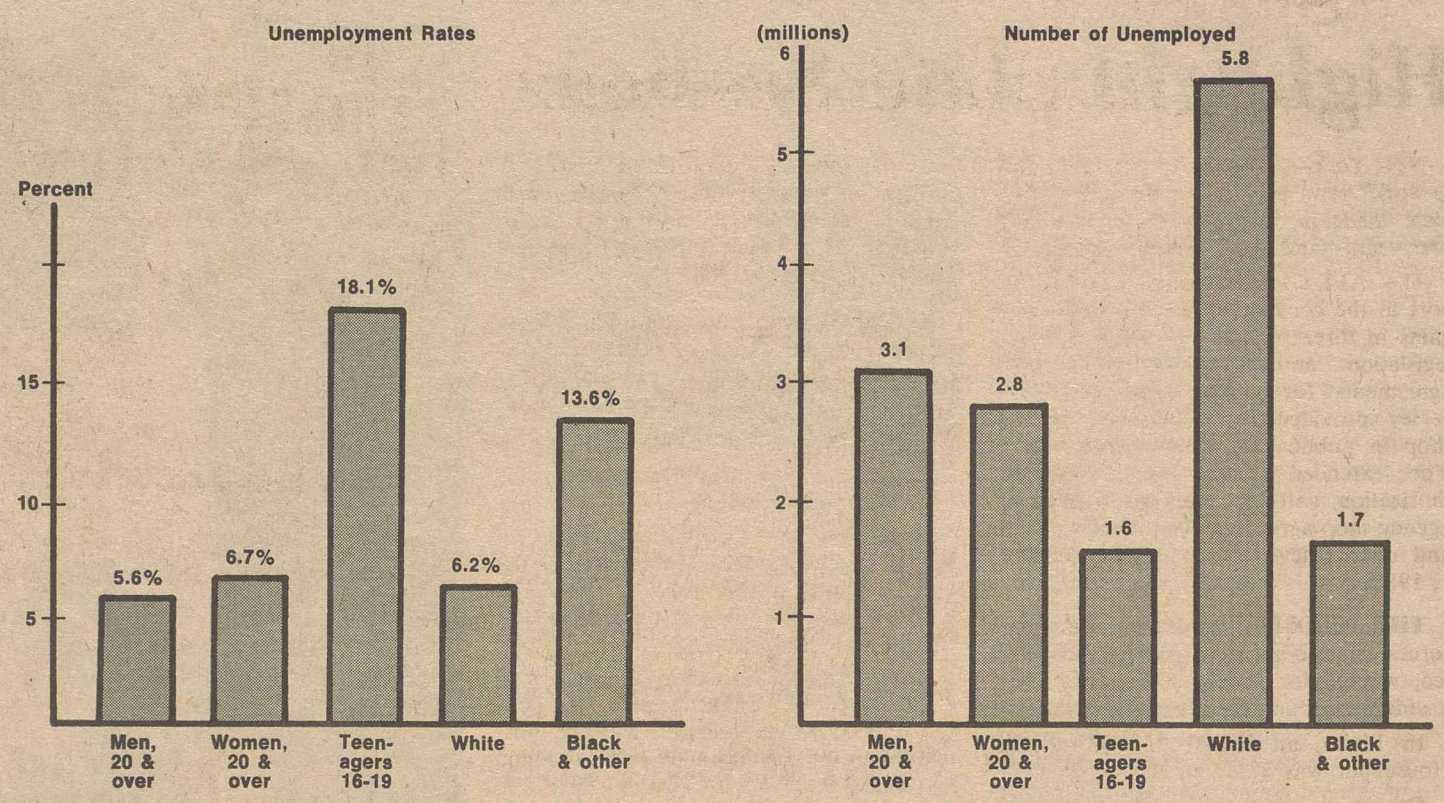
White House Policies Spur Anti-Unionism

New York—The collective bargaining climate "is becoming polluted by growing anti-union smog" fed in part by the Reagan Administration's position on the air controllers strike, the Executive Council warned in its report to the convention.

Members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization, failing to achieve a satisfactory contract, struck last August for shorter hours, earlier retirement and better salaries. The Administration's response was to fire the 11,500 striking controllers, and take steps to destroy the union, the council noted.

MEANWHILE, it said employers—taking their cue from the Administration—are seeking to undercut existing bargaining relationships and to roll back many hard-won contract terms and conditions. Despite this strategy, the council said, unions are showing strength and resiliency in improving contract terms.

American workers over the last 10 years have been forced to shoulder unfair burdens, the council declared. Average hourly earnings increased between May 1979 and May 1981 from $6.08 to $7.17 but due to inflation, the real value of those earnings represented a net loss of 7 percent.



Union members have done better than the average worker in facing up to inflation. Wages and salaries of non-union workers increased 8.5 percent between 1978 and 1979 while the union members' wages rose 9 percent. The same comparison for 1980 is 8 percent for the unrepresented worker and 10.9 percent for the worker under union contract.

THE AVERAGE union wage increase taking effect in major agreements during 1980 was 9.9 percent, up modestly from 9.1 percent in 1979 and 8.2 percent in 1978. However, these wage increases fell short of the increases in prices of 12.5 percent in 1980, 13.4 percent in 1979, and 9 percent in 1978.

Federal employee pay continues to be used for political purposes, the council charged, and pay increases have been less than for comparable private sector jobs even though the 1970 Pay Comparability Act requires such comparability. Major state and local government settlements also have lagged behind in living costs.

JOB SECURITY and income protection remain matters of major concern, the council said, but the methods of dealing with the prospect of layoff and plant relocation have differed widely.

The report cited the Food & Commercial Workers' agreement with A&P covering 12,000 workers in 265 supermarkets which provides a lump-sum payment of $300 for each consecutive year of employment for the long-term employee in the event the store is closed.

Job Losses, Social Program Cuts Products of Reagan Budget Drive

New York—Drastic job losses and deep cuts in the nation's basic social and public investment programs will result from Administration cuts in the federal budget for the 1982 fiscal year, the Executive Council warned in its report on the state of the economy.

Direct job losses from the cuts will amount to well over one million, the council predicted. And additional jobs will be lost from the secondary or "ripple" effects of the program slashes.

THE 1982 CUTS total $40 billion and are concentrated in social programs. The reductions are key parts of the Administration's reallocation of income and wealth from low and middle-income families to the rich and to the big corporations, the council observed.

"The federal spending reductions will devastate programs that build up the nation's economic infrastructure through public investment," the report warned. "In essence, workers, children, retirees, students, the unemployed, and the sick are the ones who are forced to sacrifice.

"At a time when the after-tax incomes of the wealthy are being increased, there is no justification for the devastation of social security, Medicare, Medicaid, unemployment insurance, trade adjustment assistance, Comprehensive Employment & Training Administration programs, student loans, food stamps, Aid to Families with Dependent Children, and housing assistance."

THE 1982 BUDGET cuts are only the beginning. In fiscal 1983, there are proposals for additional, as yet unspecified, reductions of $30 billion, cuts of $44 billion in 1984, additional cuts of $39 billion in 1985, and more cuts totaling $42 billion in 1986.

The negative effects of the budget cuts are magnified by inflation, which at double-digit levels during the last two years robbed workers' paychecks of almost 10 percent in real buying power, the council observed.

Meanwhile, the economic expansion that brought the country back from the severe 1974-75 recession came to a halt last year as real gross national product—the economy's total output of goods and services—dropped at an annual rate of 9.9 percent during the second quarter. This was the largest quarterly decline recorded since the end of World War II. Growth over the next few quarters offset the sharp decline, but the economy again turned down in the second quarter of 1981, as real GNP fell by 2.4 percent.

Layoffs and the inadequate increase in job opportunities produced a sharp increase in the number of jobless workers. Unemployment soared from 5.6 to 7.6 percent between July 1979 and July 1980, and was still at 7 percent a year later. Since the period covered by the council report, the jobless rate has climbed to 8 percent.

Since the 1974-75 recession, joblessness never has dropped below 5.6 percent, compared to unemployment rates of less than 5 percent prior to that recession and less than 4 percent in the 1960s, the council noted. The figures are monthly averages. The total number of men and women unemployed during the course of a year is substantially higher, generally three or four times the number of jobless persons in any month.

Thus, in 1980, there were 25 to 30 million workers who suffered periods of joblessness, the council pointed out. Unemployment has worsened critically for blacks and other minorities, but jobless rates also rose sharply for white adult males.

THE INCREASE in unemployment resulted from direct layoffs and a failure of jobs to increase in line with the growing labor force. Between July 1979 and July 1981, the total number of jobs increased by 1.9 million, the smallest rate of growth over any similar period in the past 25 years except for the deep recession of 1974-75.

Inflation, the other scourge of workers in recent years, has made workers and their families, retired persons, and low-income groups particularly vulnerable, the council observed. Increases in the prices of the necessities of life have been especially serious during the last two years.

Consumer prices rose by 12.5 percent in 1980, slightly slower than the 13.4 percent rate of 1979, and by 10 percent in the 12 months ending in July 1981. Energy prices rose 14 percent, reflecting the oil decontrol early in 1981.

RISING PRICES have washed away the value of dollar gains in paychecks during the past two years so that workers and their families have suffered deep cuts in purchasing power and in their standard of living, the council said. After inflation and taxes, the buying power of the average wage and salary earner's paycheck in July 1981 was 9.7 percent below the July 1979 level.

20 Local Unions Shift Affiliation To Internationals

New York—Twenty local unions directly affiliated with the AFL-CIO chose during the past two years to become affiliated with national or international unions, the Executive Council reported to the convention.

The transfers, the council noted, were carried out in accordance with established policies and procedures, and reflected the desires of the members of the locals for active participation in the affairs of national or international unions with similar concerns.

Since the last convention two years ago, three directly affiliated local unions with a membership of 106 were disbanded and one with membership of 96 merged.

As of June 30, 1981, there were 78 directly affiliated locals with a membership of 23,839. This compares with 102 locals with 27,057 members at the start of the two-year period.

Mediation Proves Success In Resolving Most Disputes

New York—The AFL-CIO Internal Disputes Plan, adopted at the 1961 convention, continues to serve as the primary mechanism for resolving disputes between affiliates, the Executive Council said in a report to the 14th biennial convention here.

Since the plan went into effect, 1,219—or 57 percent—of the 2,129 complaints filed with the AFL-CIO president's office have been settled through discussions and mediation between the organizations involved, the council said.

IN THE TWO-YEAR period through June 30, 1981, 90 cases were settled and 21 were still pending at the end of the period.

In cases not resolved in mediation, which is the first step of the internal disputes machinery, three impartial umpires hear the parties and issue determinations. Since the program began, 904 umpires' determinations have been issued. In the past two years, determinations by umpires resulted in violations being found in 53 cases and not found in 25. Justification reports were issued in three instances and three cases remained pending.

Appeals from the decisions of umpires are considered by a rotating three-member subcommittee of the Executive Council. In the two-year period since the last convention, umpires' determinations were sustained in 26 appeals, eight appeals were withdrawn, 10 were submitted to the full council where the determinations were affirmed, set aside or modified, and six were pending at the end of the period.

THE COUNCIL reported that since the beginning of the plan through last June 30, 15 affiliates were found to have failed to comply with decisions of impartial umpires or directions of subcommittees in 26 cases. Compliance was later achieved in most instances.

At the time of the report, two unions remained in noncompliance and subject to sanctions required by the AFL-CIO constitution: the International Typographical Union and the Graphic Arts International Union.

Legislative Roundup

'Right-to-Work' Defeats Highlight State Sessions

New York—Attempts to impose "right-to-work" laws prohibiting the union shop were made in 11 states during the past two years—and were unsuccessful in all.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council report to the convention noted also positive gains in three other states which adopted legislation authorizing union security agreements for public employees. New Jersey provided for a modified agency shop in public employee contracts; New York extended existing agency shop authorization, and a California law allowing agency shop agreements at the city, county and district level becomes effective Jan. 1, 1982.

THE CLOSEST the "right-to-work" forces came to a victory was in New Mexico, where Gov. Bruce King's veto kept a union shop ban from becoming law.

In Idaho, an R-T-W bill passed the House but was killed in the Senate.

Otherwise, "right-to-work" bills were soundly beaten in votes of one or both houses of the legislatures of Illinois, Maine, Montana, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, and Vermont.

The anti-union bills were killed in committee in Maryland and West Virginia, and an initiative petition in Colorado seeking a constitutional ban on union security for public employees failed to get the signatures needed to get on the ballot.

AS IN PAST campaigns, the Executive Council notes, "state labor councils were able to muster support from all segments of the labor movement."

The past two years also saw a strong employer-pressed attack on prevailing wage statutes—so-called "little Davis-Bacon Acts." Here, the results were mixed.

State prevailing wage laws were repealed in Alabama and Utah and killed by an unfavorable court decision in Arizona, the council report noted. A veto was necessary to prevent repeal in Colorado and New Mexico.

ON THE PLUS side, efforts to weaken or repeal prevailing wage laws were defeated in the legislatures of Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Idaho, Illinois, Kansas, Kentucky, Louisiana, Minnesota, Nevada, New Hampshire, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania and Texas.

In other areas, there were modest gains although generally short of what the labor movement had sought.

Major improvements in unemployment benefits were reported in Illinois and Michigan, and in a number of states the ceilings on unemployment insurance and workers' compensation moved up automatically as a result of higher average weekly wages in the states.

THESE GAINS were more than offset, however, by the sharp curtailment of the extended unemployment insurance program and other regressive steps adopted by Congress at the urging of the Reagan Administration.

A separate section of the council report dealing with unemployment compensation contrasts the backward actions taken with the ignored recommendations of the National Commission on Unemployment Compensation, which last year recommended federal minimum benefit standards and other improvements.

Likewise, in the area of workers' compensation, not a single state is yet in compliance with all of the recommendations made by a national commission nearly 10 years ago.

THE COUNCIL noted that the 1972 report recommended that the states be given until mid-1975 to comply with the essential recommendations, and that Congress should then act to impose federal standards that would assure compliance.

"Rather than requiring states to correct deficiencies in their laws," the council reported, "both the Reagan Administration and some members of Congress are proposing changes in the Longshoremen's & Harbor Workers' Compensation Act and the Federal Employees' Compensation Act . . . that would slash benefits and reduce coverage."

On the positive side, the council noted that California has established a special state fund to assist victims of asbestosis and has required employers to post warnings to workers of any exposure to toxic substances.

NEW JERSEY adopted legislation allowing payroll deductions for public employees for voluntary contributions to union welfare, political action, charity, legal defense and educational funds. The council report also cited a constitutional amendment in Minnesota placing campaign spending limits on candidates in state elections who accept public funds.

The council reported active union support for efforts, still unsuccessful, to get the Equal Rights Amendment ratified in additional states. It also noted success in turning back attempts in seven states to rescind previous ratifications.

CEMENT, LIME & GYPSUM workers involved in a bitter dispute with the union-busting Moore-McCormack Co., picket the firm's Kosmosdale, Ky., plant. Among other demands, the company wants to wipe out job security, cut holidays, and impose overtime. Workers have been on strike since May.

Labor's Community Services Confront Test of Recession

New York—A challenge to the quality of community life must be met by the expanded involvement of organized labor in community services, the Executive Council stressed in its report to the convention.

The council pointed out that the Reagan Administration's budget cuts "will have a negative impact on local voluntary agencies" and that there is "little hope" they can make up losses in federal funds from private contributions.

THE AFL-CIO can play an important role in aiding those agencies, it noted.

There are now 262 full-time AFL-CIO community services representatives who conduct union counseling training programs, organize fund-raising drives and operate referral services. The total includes 72 who have been designated to work with the federation's Dept. of Community Services since the 1979 convention, the report noted.

As the economy turns down, the council observed, more community services labor representatives will be needed to provide services to workers facing a variety of needs and hardships.

ONE OF THE major concerns, the council report emphasized, is preparations to ease the harsh impact of plant closings on workers and their communities, a growing problem as more companies close or relocate both in the United States and overseas.

The report also calls for greater development of employee assistance programs as part of collective bargaining agreements. These benefits, which began as alcoholism counseling programs, have grown in recent years to include help for workers with many other family and personal problems, the council noted.

The council reported that 30 local central bodies and two AFL-CIO state federations provide community services programs to union members through United Labor Agencies.

THE COUNCIL stressed the strong relationship between the United Way of America, the American Red Cross and other voluntary charitable agencies.

The report pointed out that American workers through payroll checkoffs provide $841,999,246 of the United Way funds, 62.4 percent of the total and double the amount of corporate giving.

Since 1979, the council noted, a memorandum of understanding has existed between the AFL-CIO and United Way which pledges labor's cooperation with the agency's programs and encouragement of giving and participation among union members.

THE COUNCIL noted, however, that some United Way agencies have attempted to prevent their employees from organizing unions or have ignored other provisions of the memorandum. It urged local unions to report violations of the agreement to the federation's Dept. of Community Services.

The AFL-CIO and the American Red Cross have enjoyed close relations since 1923 when Samuel Gompers joined the agency's governing board, the council report said.

Labor's cooperative programs with the ARC, which is also celebrating its centennial in 1981, include bloodbanking, safety programs, disaster relief, first aid training, help for the unemployed and other volunteer services.

THREE UNIONS, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, the Clothing & Textile Workers and the American Federation of Teachers, have signed agreements with the agency to step up participation in the blood bank program. Similar agreements have been signed by state federations in Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, Florida, Arkansas and Maryland, the council reported, and the Machinists and ACTWU each set aside a month in 1981 as blood donor recognition month for their members.

A new agreement will expand the use of union halls by the Red Cross for disaster relief services, with the IBEW, Communications Workers, Plumbers and Carpenters already participating in the program.

Anti-Union Climate Spurs Attack on Wage Standards

New York—Long-established labor standards that provide workers basic protections on wages and hours have come under increasing attack by conservatives and business groups since the 1980 elections, the Executive Council noted in its report to the convention.

The Davis-Bacon Act, which requires that construction workers be paid the prevailing local wage on government-funded projects, is the target of legislation in Congress ranging from outright repeal to extensive cutbacks in coverage.

THE COUNCIL noted that protections are also being eroded by actions of the Reagan Administration affecting the coverage of both the Davis-Bacon and Service Contract Acts.

The council's report also cited attempts by conservatives to enact a reduced minimum wage for teenagers through amendments to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

This campaign for a subminimum wage is based on the false premise that the high rate of unemployment among minority youth is justification for paying lower wages, the council noted.

Warning that a subminimum wage would destroy the law, the council charged that "the true goal of advocates of a subminimum wage is lower wages and high profits, not a reduction in unemployment."

IT ALSO pointed out that the existing minimum wage has not kept pace with the rate of inflation, with the current $3.35 an hour minimum yielding far less in purchasing power than the $1.40 an hour provided in 1967.

Another prime concern of the council is Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan's move to rescind a 40-year-old federal restriction on industrial homework, which would roll back worker protections on wages, hours and child labor. Last month, Donovan lifted the ban on homework in the knitted outerwear industry.

The convention report also warned that one of the oldest labor standards—the eight-hour day—is being threatened by legislation now before Congress that would allow a 10-hour day, four-day workweek without the payment of overtime under the Walsh-Healey and Contract Work Hours & Safety Standards Acts.

Fair, Humane Policy Backed On Immigration

New York—The nation's immigration policy should be fair and humane yet protect the "well-being of American workers," the AFL-CIO Executive Council said in its report to the convention.

The council report praised the findings of the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy, appointed under the Carter Administration. Many of the commission's recommendations parallel AFL-CIO positions, the council observed. It said the Reagan Administration's proposals, released in July, provide "a framework for action" but include several segnificantly negative features."

The commission's report made public in March offered "a positive step toward establishing a fair and comprehensive approach to immigration reform," the council said.

The commission, headed by Rev. Theodore M. Hesburgh, president of Notre Dame University, included among its 16 members Vice President J. F. Otero of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Our Second Century

WE BEGIN our second century at a time of severe economic dislocation, facing an Administration whose social philosophy shows no advance from the thinking of business leaders of a hundred years ago.

They believe that the job of government is to help the rich to accumulate more capital at the expense of all who are not rich.

They object, in the name of freedom, to any efforts by government that tend to reduce inequality among the American people and to prevent the exploitation of the weak by the strong.

THEY OBJECT to the use of public resources to heal the sick, to feed the hungry, and to house the homeless.

They object to federal programs that help educate children, train the unskilled, create useful jobs for the unemployed and stave off destitution among the aged and the disabled.

They object to federal health and safety regulations that protect workers.

All of these programs, labor fought for.

This year, as we cross the threshold into our second century, the labor movement stands as the strongest, most unified force defending the rights of the American people—and we have a fight on our hands.

There's nothing new in that. There has never been a time when our gains were safe or secure.

WE HAVE FOUGHT against entrenched and determined opposition for a hundred years, many times against greater odds than we face today, and we are certainly not about to abandon the struggle now.

On Sept. 19—Solidarity Day—American workers gave their response to President Reagan's claim that he, and not the labor movement, speaks for American workers.

Hundreds of thousands of trade unionists and their allies marched in the largest protest demonstration ever held in the nation's capital to show that they have lost none of their desire to speak for themselves through the democratic institutions they created for that purpose a hundred years ago.

NO ONE demonstration, however massive and spirited, can reverse the course of this Administration. But Solidarity Day 1981 was only the beginning.

In the months ahead, the trade union movement and its friends will be working together for a successful Solidarity Day 1982—which falls on Nov. 2.

On that day, Election Day, in every state and congressional district, we intend to do everything in our power to elect a Congress that will reverse Mr. Reagan's program and restore government to its constitutional purpose of promoting the general welfare and providing for the common defense.

We have exactly 51 weeks. I have every confidence that the affiliates will do their part—and more.

Political Party Smorgasbord Offers All Things to All Voters

By Gus Tyler

POLITICIANS are Crooks. That is not my opinion, necessarily. It is the name of a political party that ran its candidates in the recent elections. The initials for the outfit are, of course, PAC—an acronym that usually stands for Political Action Committee.

"Politicians Are Crooks" is not the only party with an exotic name to run candidates this year. There are, literally, dozens of such organizations, offering up to Americans an extensive smorgasbord for all those who are fed up with the usual two-party diet.

CONSIDER, for example, the names of the parties that appeared on the ballot in the New York, New Jersey, Connecticut area this last Election Day.

There are the "down-with-them" folk who proclaim their dissatisfaction with institutions. "Politicians Are Crooks" falls into this category. Then there are the DWL—Down with Lawyers—and the even more irreverent CC—"Contempt of Court"—with its open assault on the judiciary.

Several parties take sharp aim at specifically oppressive circumstances. Over in Bergen County, N.J., there is the BHR—the Bergen Home Rule Party—that seeks liberation from the tyranny imposed by the State of New Jersey. The UT comes right to the point by translating its initials into the Upset Taxpayers Party. Even more specific in its anger is the STI—the Stop Transit Increases Party.

NOT ALL WRATH is as focused as in the examples just cited. There is TSM, for instance, that expresses a sort of diffuse malaise in the name of The Suffering Majority Party. That negative mood has its positive counterpart in the EQA, an obvious play on the ERA (Equal Rights Amendment) by calling itself the Equality for All Party.

Then there are the righteous parties, wearing their bleeding hearts on their sleeves, reminding us of good old-fashioned American virtues. There is LEE, for instance, standing for Leadership By Example—a noble posture. There is IHA, Independent-Honest-Available—a rara avis in the world of realpolitik.

LO speaks forthrightly for the Law and Order Party—the basis of any solid civilization. In line with the ancient American belief in things forever going forward and upward and betterward, there is CFP—Citizens for Progress. A pragmatic modification of that theme is repeated by FNC, the For Needed Change Party.

ONE PARTY goes by one initial, F, standing for the Federalist Party, which we thought had gone out of business around 1812. Then there is a party that is a non-party called NP—the Non-Partisan Party.

We have omitted more obvious names that appeared on the ballot, like Conservative, Liberal, Right to Life, Libertarian, Free Libertarian, Socialist Workers, Socialist Labor—and several lesser-known like Coalition, Independent Taxpayers, Taxpayers, Middle Class Candidate parties.

All in all, this is quite a multi-flavored menu, enough to suit the taste of even the most fussy. But if it doesn't please you, then you may—in this multiparty tradition—simply organize yourself into an FU—Forever Unsatisfied.

Wage Standards Tied To Broader Issues

The basic purpose of remedial labor standards is to protect workers' wages, job security, benefits, and working conditions in the competitive process for government contracts.

Without these remedial labor standards, the competition for government contracts places workers on the horns of a dilemma—reduced wages or loss of jobs. They don't have even that option if the work moves to a new locality or a new employer.

The issue is much broader than simply wage-busting. It involves job security and the waste of our basic national resource—the skill and training of our citizens. It involves community disruption by the movement of contract performance to low-wage areas. It encourages management to compete for government contracts through wage-busting and job-poaching rather than sound management techniques and innovation.

Labor and Civil Rights Leaders Deplore Proposals to Cut Major Social Programs

News Analysis

WASHINGTON, Sept. 20 — The A.F.L.-C.I.O. and the 200 organizations that yesterday turned out a stunningly large crowd for Solidarity Day now face an even more difficult problem: organizing a movement, keeping it together, and bringing pressure on the Reagan Administration and Congress.

Little indication exists that leaders of the groups involved in the Solidarity Day protest had given extensive thought to what lies ahead. The question that Lane Kirkland, the merged labor movement's president and chief organizer of the demonstration, was musing is, "What do we do for an encore?"

The giant crowd stretched from the Washington Monument to a speakers' stand at the West Front of the Capitol was estimated by the National Park Service at 260,000 people and may have been larger. None of the speakers who

'Reagan says cut back; we say fight back!'

WASHINGTON—With suppressed anger, 300,000 Americans streamed into the capital Saturday to warn President Reagan and Congress they are being bled by budget cuts.

Reagan relaxed at Camp David, Md., as a vivid cross-section of citizens maintained that he does not represent them, marching peacefully to an area spanning a mile between the Capitol and the Washington Monument.

"Reagan says cut back—we say fight back," the marchers shouted. Their words and songs were not new, but the marchers reflected an unmistakable dignity in an ancient rite, a protest against the established order, pitting the concerned against the comfortable.

250,000 March to Protest Reagan's Policies

Crowd Proclaims Labor's Solidarity

By Eric Pianin and Warren Brown
Washington Post Staff Writers

A massive wave of more than 250,000 persons gathered around the Washington Monument and marched to the Capitol yesterday to protest President Reagan's budget cuts and tax policies and to reaffirm the solidarity of the nation's labor movement behind its leaders.

Yesterday's Solidarity Day demonstration, organized by the AFL-CIO and civil rights groups and partly inspired by the successful workers' movement in Poland, was unprecedented in modern labor history and perhaps the largest political protest in Washington during the past 20 years. City officials reported only two arrests, both for minor incidents of disorderly conduct. In another incident,a CBS reporter was injured when he was ejected from a restricted area.

The crowd was a broad slice of America — a 38-year-old tool maker from Cincinnati who complained that only the rich were getting a break; a fourth-grade school teacher from Mahopac, N.Y., wearing a long flowing black cape bedecked with protest buttons, angry over cutbacks in the school lunch program.

There were ironworkers from New Jersey, sipping beer while they lamented the shortage of

"As Solidarity Day ended, it proved at least one thing about the unions: they still know how to organize. From start to finish the march was orchestrated with near perfection. Buses and the subway system, which was chartered by the AFL-CIO, moved the thousands with few major hitches. Will rally restore labor's influence?

By Richard L. Strout

The Christian Science Monitor
Washington

There could be no doubt after seeing perhaps a quarter-million anti-Reagan protesters assembled over the weekend on the grassy Washington Mall by Lane Kirkland, president of the AFL-CIO, that the eight-month-old Reagan administration has domestic trouble on its hands.

President Reagan promises more of the same in his fight against inflation, and charges that labor leaders don't represent the rank and file.

Mr. Kirkland and fellow leaders of the spectacular outdoor solidarity rally here Sept. 19 retort that the President has no mandate for cutting social programs to make way for tax cuts and increases in defense.

On both sides it is an unusual kind of confrontation. The physical success of Nearly everybody seemed to feel the great meeting was somehow historic, but it was uncertain for what. Statements from political leaders followed: Mr. Reagan from Camp David – placatory; Vice-President George Bush in Denver questioning again labor leaders' authority; Democrats charging that the administration is out of touch.

Trade unions now have membership of around 15 million. Membership hasn't kept pace with population and today four out of five US workers are outside unions. Inflation has been shrinking purchasing power. There is a shift from blue-collar to white-collar jobs, and the growth of multinational conglomerates makes it possible to shift jobs abroad. When the auto workers helped bail out Chrysler, the union gave up an estimated billion dollars worth of promised wages and benefits.

Unions have another problem – corruption. Some charge this is growing. US organized labor is alone among Western democracies in its nonideological character and the upholder of established values within the capitalist system. Most past leaders from Samuel Gompers down, eschewed radical social reform and identification with particular parties. This may be changing.

The unions' political influence seems at the lowest ebb since its high water mark after World War II. Leaders have seen a conservative administration take over the White House; there is no insider there with whom they can talk things over and ameliorate disagreements; relations with Labor Secretary Raymond J. Donovan are frigid, and the administration's program of budget cuts weakens programs for which unions have fought for years.

Marchers fly union banner; say Reagan favors the rich

It was huge. The sea of people, banners, and balloons flowed from the Washington Monument almost to the door of the Capitol. With an estimated 250,000 protesters, it was the largest demonstration since the Vietnam War era. It may be the biggest crowd – and maybe the most diverse – ever to march on Washington.

Civil rights marches had brought thousands of black people and their supporters. War protests had brought young people. But Solidarity Day Sept. 19 brought blacks from South Carolina, white union men in hard hats from Arkansas, middle-aged women in pantsuits, and young couples with children. It brought New Jersey teachers, members of the Actors Guild, and environmentalists from the Clean Air Coalition.

They came peacefully and almost festively to tell the President and Congress that they don't like the direction the their economic policy has taken.

Labor's Masses Rake Reagan

WASHINGTON (AP) — Organized labor massed more than a quarter of a million people within sight of the White House on Saturday to proclaim their disgust with federal budget cuts and characterize the Reagan administration as "cold-hearted" and "callous."

The AFL-CIO borrowed from the Polish union movement and called its rank-and-file protest "Solidarity Day."

President Reagan, spending the weekend 65 miles away at Camp David, Md., received telephone reports on the demonstration.

"The president recognizes and appreciates the frustration that comes because there are no instant miracles and he also appreciates that the medicine is hardly sweet," said White House spokesman David Gergen, adding that Reagan believes that "the true enemy of working men and women is a sick economy."

Addressing the huge throng, labor federation president Lane Kirkland referred to Reagan's contention that labor leaders are out of touch with the rank and file and said, "We are out of step with none but the cold-hearted, the callous, the avaricious and the indifferent."

U.S. Park police estimated the crowd at about 260,000. As the demonstrators began to disperse, AFL-CIO officials quoted Sam Jordan, deputy director of the city's Office of Emergency Preparedness, as having estimated it at 400,000.

The AFL-CIO abandoned its traditional disdain of mass protest in hopes of impressing President Reagan and his congressional allies with the depth of opposition to his domestic policies.

Though Reagan had defeated labor and its allies in every budget battle in Congress, Kirkland said, "The winter's chill is approaching and the bloom is fading from fall's mandates."

Labor leaders interpreted the size of the crowd — it rivaled the numbers who came to the city in the 1960s — as sign of growing disenchantment with the Reagan administration.

The rally began under sunny skies that later became overcast. People ate picnic lunches and lined up to buy ice cream and soft drinks. The expressions of anger and protest were limited to signs and speeches and balloons.

Shortly after noon, marchers moved up the mall from the Washington Monument grounds. At the Capitol, more than 14 speakers addressed the crowd in a program lasting more than two hours. Toward the end, the crowd slowly began to drift away.

It was a protest without politicians. The march and rally had the support of the Democratic National Committee, but pols were invited to listen to the speeches, not make them.

Democratic Party chairman Charles T. Manatt sent a telegram saying the turnout demonstrated "strong disapproval of the Reagan administration's anti-labor, anti-family, anti-elderly, and anti-middle class policies."

Other political voices heard were former Vice President Walter F. Mondale and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, expected to be rivals for the 1984 Democratic presidential nomination.

200,000 Crowd into Washington For Union 'Solidarity' Rally

WASHINGTON (UPI) — Masses of demonstrators — carrying signs and wearing union buttons — streamed into Washington today for a huge labor rally against Reagan administration social and economic policies. It promised to be the capital's biggest protest since the angry days of the Vietnam War.

The crowd — 100,000 strong at noontime and expected to swell to more than twice that — began arriving at dawn for the "Solidarity Day" demonstration. The rally was organized by the AFL-CIO, which has been stung by President Reagan's victories in cutting federal spending for social programs and his harsh reaction to the air traffic controllers' strike.

Union members jammed Washington subways and streets on their way to the grassy Mall area, where they sang "Solidarity Forever" as they assembled for their march down Constitution Avenue to the foot of the Capitol.

"We are America's sinew, muscle, blood, heart, and bone," actor Ossie Davis told the burgeoning crowd. "We are the people."

On the city streets, groups of protestors, many wearing flag-decked hard hats and colorful union jackets and shirts to ward off the morning chill, streamed toward the Washington Monument gathering area.

"Ironworkers for Solidarity," said the blue - and - white sweatshirts sported by some in the tens of thousands gathering on the Mall. Others carried green - and - white placards reading "Jobs, Justice and Compassion."

260,000 in labor protest

While the President worked on even further budget cuts at his Camp David retreat, leaders of labor, civil rights and women's groups took turns denouncing his administration as "cold-hearted," "callous" and "malicious."

The rally, termed Solidarity Day by its sponsor, the AFL-CIO, drew 260,000 people by estimate of the U.S. Park Service police and 400,000 by estimate of city officials. By either count, it was the largest protest demonstration in the modern history of the capital.

Coretta Scott King, whose lat. husband led a similar march here 18 years ago, echoed: "Let this demonstration be a clear signal to the lawmakers that American working people of all races will not suffer in silence while the architects of reaction seek to shatter the hard-won social and economic gains of the last 50 years."

Washington meets the nation—and discovers the people are us

By Anne Keegan

WASHINGTON—Even the people of Washington were impressed.

And they've gotten so very used to these things—marches, rallies, and protests in their town.

But the one over the weekend that brought a quarter of a million people from all over the United States—and that was no mean feat considering none of them would cross PATCO picket lines and fly—this one impressed them.

It was not the size of the crowd that impressed them. It was who was in that crowd.

One did not have to look at the signs in their hands or the placards on their backs to know. A long, steady gaze at them gathering on the Mall told every Washingtonian who these people were.

They were a cluster of Slavic women from New York gabbing merrily in their own language, members of the International Ladies Garment Workers Union.

THEY WERE three silver-haired black women hiding in the shade from the sun —a common-sensical Southern tradition —up from the land of cotton and tobacco.

They were suburban-looking ladies in pastel pantsuits, teachers down from New England.

They were five mustachioed Detroit auto workers in hard hats and parka vests watching the girls saunter by.

They were clumps of bronze-skinned families with slick black hair picnicking on the grass, farmworkers up from Texas.

Anne Keegan

They were bearded miners from West Virginia, steelworkers from Chicago, electrical workers from Michigan, chemical workers from Rhode Island.

They were bricklayers, carpenters, engineers, crane operators, government employes, butchers, television writers, teachers' aides, checkout clerks, aluminum workers, and dock loaders.

SOME HAD COLLEGE educations, others never finished high school. Some had thick foreign accents, others spoke perfect English.

They were black, white, and every other possible color of human skin. They were old and they were young. Some had just gotten their first jobs. Others had been retired for years.

They were from the Deep South, the West Coast, the cold North, the vast Midwest, and the East.

They were Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish. They were Republicans and Democrats.

They were the people Washingtonians too often forget about and seldom see, the ones scattered out there for thousands of miles beyond the Potomac. The ones who make Washington, with its genteel life, possible.

THEY ARE THE ones who do not often come to Washington—perhaps once in a lifetime, when their kids are old enough, and then only to look through the fence bars at the White House and to climb the Washington Monument.

They are the ones who couldn't give you the home address of one influential man in Washington. But they are the ones everyone in Washington courts every four years. Who suddenly meet important politicians at their plant gates every four years or at a construction site or maybe even a union retirement party.

They were well-dressed. They stayed sober. There was no odor of marijuana along the Mall. They respected the law.

They met for one day in Washington, looked around at each other, and liked what they saw. And then, after giving each other strength, they climbed aboard their 15,000 buses and left, happy to have come yet happier still to be going back to their homes.

They were not a violent mob. They were not even an angry crowd.

No wonder Washingtonians were impressed. Impressed not by the numbers that were there but WHO was there. For they don't see them very often.

WHO WAS IT that was so impressive? It was Middle America. It was the people that built this country and want to keep on doing it. It was the meat-and-potatoes people, the ones who put in eight hours and have no company expense account. The ones who fight our wars. The ones who pay our taxes and have no loopholes.

It was the working class. And they came to Washington because they want to stay that way.

Labor Fights Back

American organized labor is one of those contrary institutions—the Catholic Church may be another—that seem to thrive in adversity and to decline in prosperity. In recent times, the proudest triumphs of labor have been recorded among the shipyard and texile workers of the anti-union South, where labor's organizers overcame threats, the entire establishment and worse.

The leadership of organized labor has determined the present time to be a period of great adversity for the labor movement. To get that message out to trade unionists and others, organized labor is putting together a giant rally here tomorrow in support of "a fair and humane America." The event is called Solidarity Day, and its sponsors are confident enough of the turnout to predict that 100,000 will participate. By the rules of low-balling crowd predictions, that means the event's sponsors expect at least twice as many. All of this should be very good news for the political allies of organized labor and especially for the Democrats, who can use any and all encouraging news.

To say that labor has been, politically speaking, alternately petulant and sullen in its dealings with the Democrats is not to deny the validity of labor's beefs. For some irrational reason, labor has been consistently held to higher standards of nobility and altruism than any other private institution. The historic civil rights bills never would have become law without the savvy, the clout and the all-out support of American labor. Yet, there are those who falsely and cruelly indict laboring people for alleged racism. It never occurs to these careless individuals to inquire as to the role of the Fortune 500 in the civil rights struggles in Congress. Apparently, only labor is expected to have a legislative and social agenda larger than its own interests. And virtually alone among our political and private institutions, labor does have just such an agenda.

Labor and its friends now find themselves answering over and over again the question of whether labor may have simply outlived its usefulness. These same people are never sufficiently curious to inquire about the relevance of football half-time shows or the Dow-Jones 30 industrials (which, by the way, have not been accused lately of being defenders of the status quo, another charge against labor). Do the Democrats—or somebody else?—have some long progressive program they now want enacted that we missed? Lately, defending the status quo in budget items in health and welfare seems to be more a liberal than a conservative political act.

But the long labor record has not helped the current labor reputation. In spite of much of the unfairness of the criticism, a lot of it has obviously stuck. In statewide surveys conducted this year, organized labor did not get good reviews. When asked whether labor was "a positive or negative force" in the life of their state, voters in state after state (including labor states) rated labor as a negative influence by more than two-to-one. Among others, the women's movement and environmentalists rated ahead of labor, winning positive scores in most cases. In fact, there were only two groups that the voters consistently ranked lower than labor: major oil companies and welfare recipients. Labor has a large image problem to attend to before it can be an effective messenger for its message.

None of this prevented the AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education from jumping totally into 1981 special house races in Maryland, Mississippi, Ohio and Pennsylvania. In all but Ohio, the COPE-backed candidate won, and in Mississippi that victory may have stopped a stampede to the GOP. In fact, in the 1981 special House elections, labor has a better won-lost record than either the Democrats or the Republicans.

Now American labor, which came within a few thousand votes of electing Hubert Humphrey to the White House in 1968, is determined to get politically active once again. Its numbers are reduced, its ranks thinned. In 1958 one of three non-farm workers belonged to a union; today it's one out of five. But labor can be awfully effective in the political foxhole. Take it from someone who's seen it in action; labor can be tough in adversity.

Solidarity American Style

TAKING A PAGE out of recent Polish history, the AFL-CIO organized its own solidarity day last week. The march and speeches in Washington Saturday were aimed not so much at sending a message to President Reagan, but at revitalizing America's seemingly moribund labor movement while simultaneously reminding other politicians of labor's disenchantment with Reaganomics.

The sheer size of the turnout, estimated by the National Park Service at 260,000 with some estimates going even higher, surpassed even the AFL-CIO's most optimistic projections. The crowd perhaps added a further illustration that the president's honeymoon has come to an end.

From his Camp David retreat, President Reagan sent out the word that he could understand the concerns of working people in the current economy but that his programs were needed and would be continued. There is little reason to be surprised at the president's response. No gathering, not even one that drew more people than the civil rights and anti-war rallies of the 1960s, is going to turn policy perspectives around 180 degrees.

Expressing anger over a range of administration policies (from Social Security cuts and high interest rates to shrinking school lunch programs), the crowd reflected ideas that went beyond any form of narrow single issue politics. The president is fond of pointing out that while labor leaders may have opposed him, the people they supposedly represented were among his constituents. These constituents were to be an important part of America's new majority, not a group of transient supporters.

But Saturday's rally, at the very least, calls into question the easy emergence of this new majority. Actions taken by the administration have exposed the cracks in the new majority and stimulated the solidarity outpouring. Those cracks may be resealed. Labor may not be able to build on solidarity day in any meaningful way. Yet those cracks can neither be ignored nor wished away.

It's Only Just Begun

More than a quarter-million Americans, a larger crowd than even the optimistic predictions of the event's sponsors, crowded to the AFL-CIO-sponsored "Solidarity Day" protest in sight of the White House last Saturday.

The large turnout was organized labor's visible showing of its rejection of the tax-cut, budget-cut medicine of Reaganomics.

The message of Solidarity Day

Philadelphia Tribune

Several hundred thousands union members, union sympathizers, social service activists and senior citizens converged on Washington, D.C., last Saturday (Sept. 19) in support of the AFL-CIO Solidarity Day march.

The message these thousands of concerned citizens took to the nation's seat of government was clearcut — they were totally displeased with Reaganomics.

Reaganomics, they argued is anti-union, anti-poor and anti-people. They wanted President Reagan and his conservative backers in the United States Congress to know that they have no intentions of taking the brutality of Reaganomics lying down.

Those folks who trod on down to Washington from every corner of this country had been forewarned prior to last November's general

Senior citizens across this nation identified with candidate Reagan because they believed he would represent their interests for the obvious reason that he is an elderly gentleman himself and understood what it meant to be on social security. They, too, are now feeling the shockwaves of his anti-senior citizen axe-wielding moves.

The battle lines have become more pronounced, and now that everyone or group knows where they stand with Reagan, maybe a more consistent effort can be made to stop him — if it isn't already too late.

The Solidarity Day march should be only the beginning of a consistent onslaught to stop the right-wing conservative elements whose only goal is to take this country into another war to prove America's greatness.

Cutback in Federal Information Conceals Program Destruction

The following is from an address by John W. Leslie, who served as information director of the Labor Dept. during six Administrations, to the National Association of Government Communicators.

I HAD A CALL from a reporter for a national magazine asking me to comment on rumors that government career employees were sabotaging the programs of the Reagan Administration, and asking whether I had seen evidence of this while I was in the Labor Dept.

I replied that my experience was just the opposite. You have dedicated men and women waiting and wanting to serve who are without leadership or direction. They go through the motions of keeping the machinery running, but are aware that their efforts are ineffective and useless—that their programs are slowly being turned off.

And there are those—the real heroes in my book—who carry on day after day doing the public's business, when they know in their own hearts that some computer somewhere is printing their names on pink slips.

IN SIX MONTHS as director of information for the Labor Dept. during this Administration, I watched programs to serve and protect working people, which I had helped develop and promote, be slowly strangled.

I sat for six months and watched a department in which I had worked most of my adult life be systematically dismantled. I watched programs to serve and protect working people, which I had helped develop and promote, be slowly strangled or gutted.

And I decided, finally, I could no longer sit idly by and do nothing to stop the destruction of the department and its effectiveness as a guardian and protector of the working people of this country.

Rather than explain why I survived so long, I would like to tell why I left when I did.

The details are simple. The facts uncomplicated.

I was not mistreated. I was not asked to do anything with which I disagreed. I was just ignored.

Since I could do nothing constructive inside the government to change what was happening, I left.

THIS PRESENT Administration would have us believe that government has no business protecting the weak, aiding the poor or defending the disfranchised.

Government has no business, we are told, to police the marketplace too closely, to protect workers and consumers.

We are told the poor will be protected by the wealthy. We are told that business, through its own good nature, will look to the safety and health of its employees, assuring them of a living wage, the right to organize and bargain collectively, and equality of opportunity.

They would have us believe that the predators of the marketplace have changed their stripes and no longer need to be restrained and controlled.

If you believe all this, you should also believe that pigs will grow wings and fly.

THE AMERICAN people are being told that their government is somehow their enemy. . . . This is not the message of those who would improve the function of government. It is clearly a call for the deliberate destruction of government as a defender of the rights of the people against the privileged few.

The efforts throughout government to cut public information and public affairs activities are a cynical attempt by this Administration to cover up efforts to destroy programs and services the people want and need.

"Out of sight, out of mind" is this Administration's battle plan of action.

Recent newspaper headlines make this point most clearly: "Administration Calls the Freedom of Information Act Overrated and Seeks Wide-Ranging Restrictions on It," one proclaims. Another heralds "Reagan Proposals to Broaden Secrecy Powers."

AND WHERE, I might ask, during this attack on the government's means of communicating with the public, are the so-called defenders of the public's right to know—the press, television, radio and other media of mass communication?

They have, for the most part, joined in the attack on the government public information system.

They, who were originally responsible for the creation of a public information network in government, have now joined its enemies in an attempt to degrade and destroy it.

How more hypocritical can anyone get, than to editorially support an attack on "flicks and flacks" in the government, yet decry the lack of the public's access to information on government actions critical to the public's welfare?

Less Protection, Higher Cost

'Competition' Health Plans Hit As Poor Value for Consumers

ADMINISTRATION-BACKED proposals to convert the U.S. health insurance system to a so-called competition system would force many Americans to pay more for even less protection than they now have, Auto Workers health care consultant Melvin Glasser warned in a network radio interview.

Glasser labeled the competition proposals "have-less insurance programs that take us nowhere." He said that the idea has little or no support beyond "a small handful of politicians and a few medical economists." Glasser, who is executive director of the Committee for National Health Insurance, appeared on the AFL-CIO public affairs program, Labor News Conference, broadcast weekly by Mutual Radio.

The various competition plans now before Congress, Glasser said, all have the same basic approach:

- They limit the amount of employer-paid health insurance premiums that would be tax exempt.
- They give tax credits to individuals who have little or no health insurance.
- They put the burden of choosing among various competing health insurance plans on individual consumers rather than groups, as is now the practice.

He also pointed out that some of the proposals would give "cash rebates to individuals who elect limited-protection, low-benefit health insurance plans."

GLASSER SAID the bill favored by President Reagan's Budget Director, David Stockman, calls for individual plans rather than group plans, which would drive the costs to consumers substantially higher than they now are. He noted that the cost of administering group insurance programs is about 9 percent of the premium, while administration of individual insurance programs is about 45 percent.

Glasser said the labor movement remains solidly committed to "a decent national health insurance program," but acknowledged that with the Administration and Congress putting such heavy stress on budget-cutting, the main battle "in the present climate" is to preserve the present health care system.

Reporters questioning Glasser on Labor News Conference were Judith Randal of the New York Daily News and Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

IF SOMEONE WERE to make a bona fide offer to sell the Brooklyn Bridge for a bargain basement price, it might be an offer which one could refuse—considering the cost of repairs.

Bridges, roads, highways, mass transit systems, water and sewer systems and other nuts and bolts elements of the nation's "infrastructure" have been wearing out at a much faster rate than they are being repaired or replaced.

This deterioration of basic capital facilities in most communities across the land is a problem which has been chronicled by studies and congressional hearings over the past decade.

But government inaction, coupled with a lack of media and public attention to this vital, although undramatic, subject has permitted a problem to grow into a major crisis for the nation's cities.

THIS HAS occurred, unfortunately, at a time when cities are more financially strapped than ever because of revenue losses, when the Reagan Administration and Congress have cut federal aid, and when high interest rates have made local borrowing much costlier and more difficult. Municipal bonds have been a main source of financing capital projects by cities and states.

Testifying recently before the House Subcommittee on Economic Stabilization, Pat Choate, co-author of "America in Ruins" and a senior policy analyst for the TRW company, said serious deterioration of vital public facilities "afflicts three of every four American communities."

"Today," said Choate, "one of every five bridges requires major rehabilitation or total reconstruction. The nation's interstate highway system has deteriorated to the point that almost one of every four miles requires replacement. Conrail faces the prospect of abandoning half its lines."

He added that "one-half of the water lines are so decrepit that they need to be replaced." New York City, for example, loses about 100 million gallons of water every day because of leaks.

DESPITE THE nation's pressing need for reindustrialization and economic growth, Choate estimated that half the cities could not allow substantial industrial expansion because of inadequate water and sewage systems. He said another quarter of the cities couldn't improve their economies because their roads, streets and bridges are worn out, obsolete or already used to capacity.

Over the past 15 years—when more, not less, was needed—Choate said funds for public works repair and maintenance dropped 28 percent because of tight budgets, inflation and bad public policy. When public facilities are allowed to run down, of course, it costs much more to fix or replace them later on.

Picking some examples of cities which have been studied:

- New York City needs to invest $5 billion in mass transit to rebuild its dilapidated and unsafe rail and bus systems and prevent further erosion of jobs and population. The city also needs to spend $40 billion to repair and rebuild its pothole-studded streets, its leaking water and sewer systems, and its bridges.
- Chicago needs $3.3 billion over the next five years to rehabilitate its aging facilities—roads, bridges, sewers and mass-transit. The city's sewer system often overflows raw sewage into houses, lakes and rivers.
- Baltimore must spend nearly $1.5 billion, or $1,880 per capita, to get its sewers and waste treatment system in shape.
- Cleveland needs $124 million to rehabilitate more than 40 of its crumbling bridges.
- Houston needs to invest heavily in mass transit or new freeways to prevent the traffic congestion that could strangle its growth.

WORKERS WOULD PAY more for health insurance and get even less protection than they now have if Congress goes along with Administration plans to convert the health insurance system to a so-called competition system, Auto Workers health care consultant Melvin Glasser, center, warned on Labor News Conference. Glasser, who is director of the Committee for National Health Insurance, was questioned by Judith Randal of the New York Daily News and Jerome Brazda of Washington Report on Medicine & Health. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Social Cuts Threaten Support for Strong Defense

New York—The Reagan Administration's posture on national defense reflects a myopic view that actually threatens the nation's welfare, the AFL-CIO Executive Council reported to the federation's 14th convention.

"Popular support for a strong defense and foreign policy cannot be sustained by unjust social and economic policies which generate social tension and political polarization," the council stressed.

WHILE THE AFL-CIO remains steadfast in its support for a strong national defense—not as a source of jobs, but as a necessary precondition to the survival of democratic institutions including free trade unions—it holds that government has a constitutional responsibility to "promote the general welfare" as well as "provide for the common defense," the council observed.

"The Administration fails to see that increasing defense spending while sharply decreasing spending for vital social programs will result in lack of support for a strong defense," the council said.

It attacked wasteful spending, huge cost overruns and poor management of defense resources as "indefensible and intolerable"—particularly at a time when the defense burden is being shifted more and more to workers and the poor.

"NOR CAN VAST increases in defense spending be justified without having resolved, in the face of the Soviet build-up, important issues of strategy, and having decided what weapons systems are required to implement that strategy," the council added.

"A vast increase in military appropriations will not in itself strengthen the U.S. military position in the areas required."

The council warned that Soviet actions against Afghanistan must be weighed in the context of the USSR's strategy against the "rimlands" of the Middle East oil-producing countries.

THE CULMINATION of years of subversive activity against Afghanistan, the Soviet invasion of that country must be considered together with the establishment of Soviet influence, if not hegemony, in Ethiopia, South Yemen, Angola, and Mozambique, the council said.

"The Soviet Union is thus almost in the position of being able to deny through military means the West's access to its major energy source," the council warned.

"Control over Afghanistan is an extension of Soviet influence over the northern rimlands of the Middle East's oil fields. Angola and Mozambique straddle the Cape oil route, and Soviet air capability was impressively demonstrated by the airlift ferrying Cuban troops and Soviet equipment to Angola."

ELSEWHERE IN its report, the council traced labor's interest and involvement in American foreign policy since the founding convention of the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions in 1881 to the present.

One of its major concerns has been the furtherance of free trade unionism throughout the world, the report notes, and the AFL-CIO's support of the new trade union federation in Poland is consistent with this belief. The American labor movement, through the Polish Workers Aid Fund, has contributed over $250,000 to Solidarity, the first free and independent trade union movement in the communist world.

The council stressed that the federation's support for free labor movements means also having nothing to do with so-called unions in dictatorship countries. Over the years, the council noted, the AFL-CIO has refused contacts with the state unions in the Soviet Union, Franco's Spain, the People's Republic of China, and other totalitarian countries.

REPORTING ON other AFL-CIO actions since the last convention, the council said that since rejoining the International Labor Organization in February 1980, after an absence of two and a half years, the federation has participated in two ILO conferences as well as sessions of the Governing Body and other meetings of the ILO. The AFL-CIO's European representative, Irving Brown, who took part in this year's conference, reported that the meeting came close to accomplishing the true purposes of the organization.

"Attempts to inject political issues were handled in such a way that the conference was able to devote most of its time to those technical questions on which the future welfare of workers so largely depends," the council said. The federation's reason for leaving the ILO in 1977 was the ILO's growing politicization.

THE COUNCIL also reported that a committee of its members appointed by President Kirkland met with a delegation from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in June to discuss the question of AFL-CIO reaffiliation with that body, and found the meeting "useful."

On other foreign policy matters, the council focused attention on the plight of refugees throughout the world, reiterated its support of the land-reform program in El Salvador, and denounced the South African government's suppression of unions of black workers.

The council report also contained a summary of activities of the AFL-CIO's overseas arms, the American Institute for Free Labor Development, the African-American Labor Center, and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

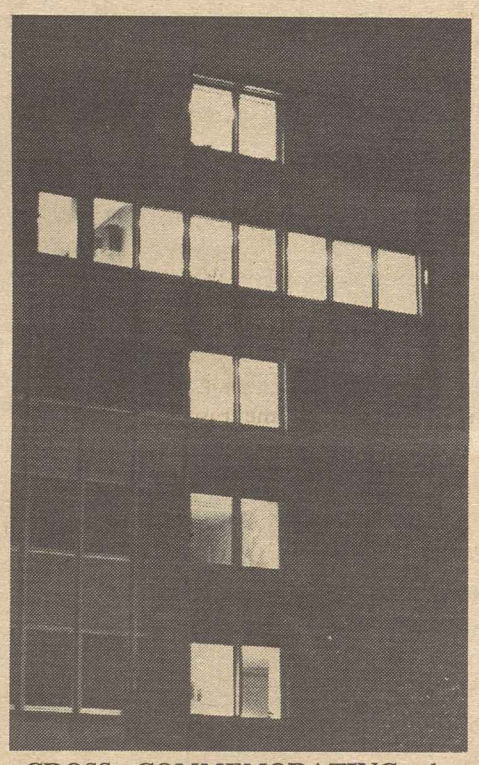
Central Bodies Continue to Show Rise in Members

New York—State and local central bodies over the past two years added to their total membership, but the level of affiliation still remained far below the optimum, the Executive Council said in its report to the convention.

Total membership in AFL-CIO central bodies at the end of last year was 7,673,-989, an increase of 280,770 over the total reported at the 1979 convention. But, even with the slight increase, the total represented only about 56 percent of the potential number of members.

"SINCE THE ability of central bodies to respond to the needs of the federation and their own affiliates is directly related to the level of affiliation, it is vitally important to continue and improve upon the upward trend in affiliation that started in 1978," the council said.

"The federation's field staff has directed its attention to this problem in recent years and will continue to do so in the future," the council's report said.



State and local central bodies' activities were the focus of a series of regional conferences held from March through June of this year. The conferences dwelt on current problems and explored new directions in pursuit of the federation's goals.

While central bodies remain active in traditional programs, there appears to have been an increase in legislative activities at the local, state, and national levels, the council said, noting the larger volume of legislation in recent years.

AS IN PREVIOUS periods, central bodies have responded very favorably to requests for assistance in special projects over the past two years, the council observed. These projects included the annual program of the President's Committee for Employment of the Handicapped, rallies and demonstrations conducted by international unions, boycotts, and organizing campaigns.

As of last June, there were 50 state central bodies, one commonwealth body, and 746 local central bodies. In the past two years, seven new central bodies were chartered, three were dissolved, and three mergers were completed.

"In view of the vital role of central bodies in advancing the programs and goals of the federation and its affiliates and the direct services which they provide to local unions," the council said, "every possible effort should be made to add to their resources by strongly encouraging full support and participation from all affiliates."

Consumer Aid Consigned to Back Burner

New York—Consumer safeguards are very much on the back burner in the Reagan Administration, the AFL-CIO Executive Council made clear in its report to the convention.

Labor helped protect the Federal Trade Commission from the most drastic proposals made in the 96th Congress to curtail its authority, the council noted. The attack on the FTC had been led by business groups.

This year, the Administration has used the budget-cutting weapon, as well as its appointive powers, to weaken consumer protection agencies.

The council noted that the initial Administration proposal "included a near phaseout of the Consumer Product Safety Commission and an end to antitrust activities by the Federal Trade Commission." The National Consumer Cooperative Bank, set up in 1978 to provide loans and technical aid to consumer cooperatives, was to be abolished by next year.

Administration Raises Bar To Effective Energy Policy

New York—The Reagan Administration is undermining the progress that America has made since 1972 in efforts toward an effective national energy policy, the Executive Council charged.

"The Administration's action has cut back programs that foster development of new energy sources, energy conservation and energy efficiency standards," the council's report to the convention declared.

IT SAID White House policies "have abandoned a cogent, carefully developed national program in favor of outmoded theories that will yield high profits to oil companies and result in hardship for the American people."

Much of the damage, the report noted, has resulted from a $2.8-billion budget cut for energy programs. These include:

- A 50-percent reduction in research and development funds for fossil fuels, including projects in coal gassification and liquefaction.
- Elimination of nearly all direct subsidies for development of synfuels.
- A 45-percent reduction in solar energy research and development funds.
- A 17-percent reduction of fusion energy research.
- Fund slashes of 50 percent in programs for geothermal, hydropower and electric energy systems, as well as in low-income weatherization programs.
- Elimination of standards for new construction.

THESE BUDGET cuts will not only jeopardize the country's energy security, the council warned, but will also eliminate about 110,000 jobs needed to make the programs work.

"Job security for Americans depends on secure energy supplies," the council stressed. "And solving the nation's energy problems means putting hundreds of thousands of people to work to conserve energy and to develop new supplies."

The council cited the need for workers for construction of new energy production facilities and the manufacture of energy machinery and equipment as well as weatherization, conservation and solar equipment.

IT ALSO reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's opposition to decontrol of energy prices even though the Administration completely lifted controls on oil earlier this year. The council stressed the need to continue full controls on natural gas prices.

New proposals to remove the controls "would quickly double home heating bills for those who heat with natural gas," the council warned.

The report stressed continued support for national efforts to protect and restore the country's environment and cited considerable progress in cleaning up water and air pollution.

These gains have created thousands of jobs in the construction of state and local water treatment plants and in the manufacture of water and air pollution equipment, the council observed.

Tax Equity Drive Hits Roadblock, Burden Shifts

New York—Tax justice appeared an achievable goal at the time of the last AFL-CIO convention, but all the movement since then has been in the other direction, the Executive Council said.

When the Reagan Administration unveiled its tax proposals last February, the Executive Council charged they would "require more sacrifice from those who have little, to give more to those who already have much."

Instead, the AFL-CIO urged an alternative "which would have been about half as costly, while providing more tax relief in the first year to the great majority of working people and spurring business investment through specifically targeted business tax reductions."

AT CONGRESSIONAL hearings, the council noted, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland warned that the Reagan tax package "would add to inflation, exaggerate fundamental economic problems and dissipate funds needed for their resolution."

The Democratic "alternative" was only "marginally less inequitable than the Administration version."

Congress went on to pass the Administration bill, the more inequitable of the alternatives, which the council said will:

- "Shift hundreds of billions of dollars from the paychecks and programs that sustain working Americans to the rich and the corporations.
- "Add to the economic problems and social tensions that are the inevitable result of shoestring budgets financed by inequitable tax structures.
- "Assure a continuance of inflation and skyhigh interest rates."

Conservatives in Saddle

Legislative Progress Stifled by '80 Election

The Executive Council's report on labor's legislative efforts over the past two years points up the watershed nature of the election that turned the Executive Branch of government over to the Reagan Administration and put control of Congress in the hands of a conservative coalition.

In 1980, the final year of the 96th Congress and of the Carter Administration, legislative attacks on labor's gains were turned back and some slight progress was made.

A THREAT TO the Occupational Safety & Health Act was blocked after an intensive grass-roots campaign eroded the initial support for the labor-opposed Schweiker bill. Attacks on the Davis-Bacon Act were turned back in both the House and Senate.

A windfall profits tax, although short of what labor and the Carter Administration had urged, did soak up some of the oil industry's gains from decontrol of prices and replenished federal revenues.

The Musicians won a long campaign to repeal the long-irrelevant but clearly anti-union Lea Act, which restricted the bargaining area in negotiations with broadcasters. And the Senate broke two filibusters, making possible the confirmation of William A. Lubbers as general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board and Donald A. Zimmerman as a member of the NLRB. Business lobbies and congressional right-wingers had fought both nominations.

IN WHAT the Executive Council termed "the most significant environmental achievement of the 96th Congress," a labor-supported bill was enacted just before adjournment establishing an industry-financed "superfund" to clean up chemical toxic waste dump sites.

There were disappointments, too, in the 1980 legislative year. There was no progress made toward comprehensive national health insurance or labor law reform. Imports continued to erode U.S. jobs, and a House-passed bill to expand trade adjustment assistance to cover supplier firms died with adjournment. The end-of-the-session renomination of John Truesdale to the NLRB was blocked by a filibuster threat and withdrawn after the change of administration.

The council report documents the savaging of labor-supported programs in the first months of the Reagan Administration, primarily through a twisting of the budget-setting procedure into a vehicle for rewriting legislation and wiping out government functions.

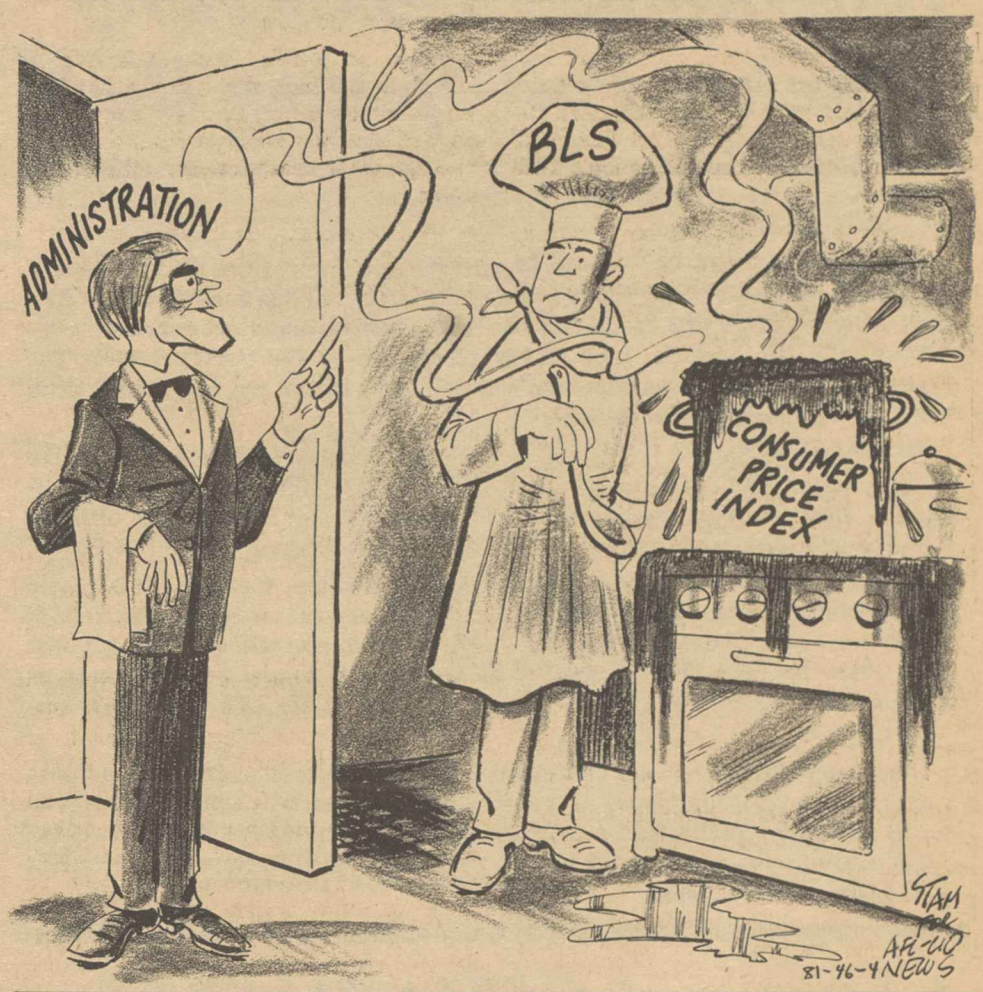
IT RELATES the virtual elimination of the public service employment program—the nation's key anti-recession "safety net"—and the gutting of the trade adjustment program.

Also achieved through the budget reconciliation shortcut, the council noted, was the rewriting of unemployment compensation and the reduction of the extended benefits program, despite continuing high unemployment. The food stamp program, public housing, health programs and energy development were other budget victims.

The tax cut bill enacted over labor's protests tilts the lion's share of benefits to the wealthiest individuals and the most profitable corporations.

IT REVERSES the action of the previous Congress by wiping out a substantial part of the oil industry's tax obligations.

In an action that the council said "defies logic," the 97th Congress "reduced taxes by $12 billion for oil interests, despite their continuing record profits, but rejected a Democratic proposal of tax credits for six distressed American industries: autos, steel, paper, railroads, mining and airlines."



The modest achievements labor can point to in the first year of the 97th Congress are along the lines of keeping the roof from falling in completely.

THUS, CONGRESS balked at the sweeping cutbacks the Administration initially sought in social security protections and has had some second thoughts about the elimination of the $122-a-month minimum social security benefit mandated by the budget reconciliation bill it passed into law. Also, some programs that President Reagan wanted to eliminate by lumping heavily reduced funding for them into "block grants" to the states will remain on the statute books as federal programs.

The Executive Council report takes note of the new round of the budget battle brought on by Reagan's demand for additional spending cuts and his use of spending "deferrals" to push funding for programs below even the heavily-cut level that Congress has decreed.

But it cites increased resistance from Congress, which has already rejected some of the Administration's latest round of cutbacks.

'Keep Cooking 'Til We Get Fudge!'

Urban Areas Face Crunch From Tax, Budget Slashes

New York—Many cities, states and most larger urban areas face a severe financial crunch and neglect of important services due to "tax-cut fever," high interest rates, and the Reagan Administration's budget cuts, the Executive Council noted in its convention report.

The council cited a recent congressional study, Trends in the Fiscal Condition of Cities: 1979-81, showing that more than 30 percent of cities surveyed had operating deficits in both 1979 and 1980. For 1981, the survey found 86 percent of the cities anticipated deficits.

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS in particular cities have been highly exacerbated by the downturns that have resulted in hard times for certain major industries such as steel and autos.

"Federal budget cutbacks—threatened and actual—feed into the trouble mixture, threatening the well-being of states and communities which depend on federal assistance to meet the needs of citizens and to create and maintain public facilities necessary for job creation, economic growth and development," the council observed.

"Such assistance, now targeted for reduction, runs the gamut from revenue community and regional development," the Executive Council report noted.

Many cities this year experienced serious fiscal problems, the council noted. There were threatened school shutdowns in Boston and, in April, the closing of fire companies and police substations. Detroit, whose budget is heavily dependent on federal programs, faced a crisis that would be worsened by the reduction of government activities.

UNEMPLOYMENT in the nation's metropolitan areas reflects the continuing economic problems of major urban centers. Last June, when the U.S. jobless rate was 7.3 percent, there were 67 metropolitan areas with 8.5 percent or higher unemployment.

"The revitalization of urban areas is essential to the economic well-being of the nation," the council said. "Urban poverty and unemployment result in lost output and lower tax revenues, and a greater need for public expenditures in social services, welfare and unemployment assistance—a vicious cycle that must be interrupted by a federally financed, comprehensive urban economic development program," the report declared.

The Reagan Administration, as part of its budget-cutting policies, has urged the elimination, cutting back and consolidation of community development programs. Last June, it ordered a rescission of $188 million in Economic Development Administration project funds, already approved for fiscal 1981.

For the 1982 fiscal year, the budget reconciliation process further reduced EDA to a program level of $290 million, down from a projected level of over $650 million the council noted.

Federal support for urban mass transit is another critical element of urban development which the Reagan Administration proposes to cut back.

The council report also dealt with the pressing needs of the nation's entire transportation system—shipping, railroads, airports, and the interstate highway system.

Steady Enrollment Growth Reported for Studies Center

New York—Facilities at the 12-year-old George Meany Center for Labor Studies are operating at capacity, providing quality training for union leaders and staff members, the Executive Council reported.

Since the last AFL-CIO convention, enrollment at the 47-acre residential campus in Silver Spring, Md., has risen to 4,000 a year. Programs conducted at the center include weeklong courses in such areas as arbitration, organizing, collective bargaining, labor law, psychology for union leaders, computers, economics, public speaking, union publications, issues for working women, and other labor subjects.

THE ORGANIZING institute has been particularly well attended, so much so that a three-week advanced organizing workshop is now offered in cooperation with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Unions also use the center's facilities to conduct their own staff programs or hold executive board meetings.

Several new projects have been completed at the center since the last AFL-CIO convention, including an oral history funded by the National Endowment for the Humanities. The project involved taped interviews of 49 persons who had a role in the 1955 merger of the AFL and the CIO. The transcripts of the interviews soon will be available to scholars.

Work is virtually completed on a federally funded program leading to an associate degree in labor studies, and several labor textbooks are being compiled under the Tripartite Program for Apprenticeship.

ANOTHER NEW project has been a series of two-day briefing sessions on union pension fund investments cosponsored with the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security.

Despite an end to previous support from the National Endowment for the Arts, the center's art activities are continuing, the council report notes. Gifts and loans make the art displays and exhibits at the campus possible.

The center's college degree program continues to be an important part of its operations, the council reported. The program, conducted with Antioch University, has enrolled 213 full-time union staffers, and 30 have already graduated.

Report Details Four Mergers, Return of UAW

New York—The AFL-CIO Executive Council approved the re-affiliation of the Auto Workers, four mergers involving eight affiliates and name changes by two unions during 1980 and 1981, the council's convention report notes.

The UAW had been an affiliate of the federation from 1955, when the AFL and CIO merged, but had disaffiliated in 1968. The council approved the issuance of a new charter July 1, 1981, following a favorable vote on reaffiliation by delegates to the previous convention of the Auto Workers.

The four mergers approved by the council involved the Jewelry Workers and the Service Employees as of July 1, 1980; the Railway Supervisors and the Railway Clerks, Aug. 6, 1980; the Barbers & Beauticians and the Food & Commercial Workers, Sept. 1, 1980, and the Aluminum Workers and the Brick & Clay Workers, Sept. 1, 1981.

The council approved the requests by the United Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers to change the union's name to United Cement, Lime, Gypsum & Allied Workers International Union and by the Hotel & Restaurant Employees & Bartenders International Union to change its name to Hotel Employees & Restaurant Employees International Union.

In both cases the union's jurisdiction remains unchanged.

Federation's Membership Reaches Post-Merger High

New York—Membership in AFL-CIO unions rose to about 15 million with reaffiliation of the Auto Workers, the highest since the merger of the AFL and the CIO in 1955.

In terms of the two-year average of per-capita payments since the last convention, the Executive Council report showed the total as of last June 30 at 13,602,000, a decline of 19,000 in the face of rising unemployment and depressed conditions in many industries and not fully reflective of the UAW's return. The figures reflect U.S. membership only, since affiliates do not pay per capita tax to the AFL-CIO on Canadian members.

In another section of the report, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue noted an increase in the AFL-CIO's net worth of $4,469,945 in the two-year period ending last June 30. This represents the difference between total income of $61,934,913 and total expenses of $57,464,968. Net worth stood at $25,544,708.

During the two-year period since the last convention, the AFL-CIO repaid the remaining balance of $1,250,000 on a note payable under a bank line of credit, increased current investments by $2,660,000, and disbursed $1,150,000 more than was received on behalf of the defense and special purpose funds, as well as funds for the Hubert H. Humphrey Chair and the AFL-CIO Legal Services Center.

The report details income and expenses for the defense and special purpose funds and presents summaries of the activities in connection with special assessments and contributions for funds established for a chair at the Hubert H. Humphrey Institute for Public Affairs at the University of Minnesota and the AFL-CIO Legal Services Center.

Redistricting Clouds Prospects

Right-Wing PACs Pose '82 Election Challenge

New York—Well-heeled corporate and right-wing political action committees will pose a serious challenge for labor-backed candidates in the 1982 Senate and House elections—just as they did in 1980, the Executive Council warned.

Noting that campaign contributions by conservatives and business PACs last year ran five times higher than those of unions, the council said the financial margins must be substantially narrowed.

"THERE IS NO available method for labor to match opposition PACs dollar for dollar, nor is there a need to," the council said, pointing out that the PACs lack a broad constituency.

"Unions can increase funding sufficiently to keep endorsed candidates competitive with their opponents through all-out efforts toward voluntary political check-offs by members," the report suggested.

And when the additional funds are combined with labor's improving registration, education and get-out-the-vote programs, parity with opposition PACs can be achieved or even exceeded, the council said.

ON THE 1982 congressional elections, the council observed that prospects for gains for progressives are clouded by arithmetic and redistricting.

In the Senate there will be 20 Democratic seats and only 12 Republican seats contested. Only a handful of GOP seats appear vulnerable, and some of these are held by moderates.

The real impact of redistricting on the House is still unknown, although the shift of 17 seats from the Northeast and Midwest to the Sunbelt could enhance opportunities for conservatives, the report noted.

Labor's overall outlook for the 1982 elections is much brighter than the setbacks suffered last year when conservatives captured the White House and Senate, as well as ideological control of the House, the council observed.

"THERE WERE, nevertheless, encouraging victories in a generally disappointing year. Overall, COPE was able to help elect 59.5 percent of all endorsed candidates for Congress. While several long-time Senate friends fell to reactionary challengers, COPE helped the successful re-election battles of at least four who were under concentrated attack—Thomas Eagleton, Patrick Leahy, Alan Cranston and Gary Hart.

The council report traced the setbacks to weakness at the top of the ticket, which was beset by the twin plagues of mounting inflation and high unemployment—"issues traditionally most influential among our own members and large segments of the electorate at-large."

Despite that impact, the council noted that COPE motivated union members to participate in the election by a larger percentage than the overall electorate.

"NEARLY 65 percent of union members voted; less than 53 percent of all voters cast ballots," the council said.

A COPE post-election survey also showed that about 58 percent of voting union members supported President Carter, although he received only 41 percent of the popular vote.

4 Years of OSHA Progress Undermined by Labor Dept.

New York—The Reagan Administration is attempting to reverse four years of steady improvement in the administra- of the federal job safety law, the Executive Council charged.

The council said in its convention report that the Administration's policies and programs are calculated to wipe out or frustrate gains in OSHA and constitute a serious threat to worker protections.

"IN CARRYING out the anti-OSHA thrust of the Reagan Administration, the Dept. of Labor has instituted retrogressive changes in the act's administration," the council said.

It cited the impact of President Reagan's Executive Order requiring federal agencies to clear proposed rules with the Office of Management & Budget. The order requires that all proposals be put to a cost-benefit analysis and that regulations least costly to employers be adopted.

"Key health standards proposed or promulgated by the previous Administration have been victims either of the President's 60-day freeze on regulations or other subsequent actions by the Dept. of Labor," the council said. It charged that requirements of the Executive Order "will stagnate OSHA rulemaking, particularly as it involves the development of health standards."

THE ONLY significant gains in worker protections since Reagan took office came in Supreme Court decisions that upheld the labor movement's position on the cotton dust standard and key sections of the lead standard.

Even so, the council observed, OSHA has sided with the lead industry in efforts to block certain provisions of the standard and has twice delayed regulations requiring the removal of workers from exposure to high levels of lead.

Other setbacks in worker protections ordered by the Labor Dept. include:

- Withdrawal of a proposed rule requiring employers to identify toxic substances in the workplace.
- Revocation of a rule for payment of full wages to workers accompanying OSHA compliance officers on inspections.
- Postponement of key provisions of a hearing conservation program.
- Withdrawal of an OSHA policy designed to conform to the Supreme Court's decision on the benzene cancer hazard.
- Reduction in the OSHA compliance staff and a 10 percent cut in inspections.
- Destruction of brochures on cotton dust hazards and halting the distribution of other OSHA information.

THE COUNCIL cited further attempts to undermine worker protections through the firing of the former director of the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health and efforts to dismantle NIOSH's headquarters operations.

A 39-percent slash in NIOSH's 1982 budget and renewed attempts in Congress to reduce coverage of OSHA and Mine Safety & Health Act also pose threats to worker safeguards, the council said.

HRDI Forced to Regroup By Training Fund Cutback

New York—The AFL-CIO and its affiliates have a strong interest in employment and training opportunities for jobless and disadvantaged workers, and the Executive Council report on the federation's Human Resources Development Institute stresses labor's commitment to continue this effort despite cuts in the budgets of federal job and training programs.

During 1980, HRDI had stepped up its assistance to labor organizations to help them use programs such as the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act to train workers and place them in jobs while continuing its own job services.

BUT SHARP reductions in the federal budget for national employment and training programs resulted in a 37 percent slash in HRDI's 1981 Labor Dept. contract. This forced the institute to reorganize its structure and reduce its staff in order to maintain a national program and as many services as possible.

HRDI and AFL-CIO affiliates developed 23,408 jobs and placed 7,857 people in jobs between January 1980 and April 1981, including 1,325 out-of-work union members, the council report said. The average starting wage for all HRDI placements in union jobs was $5.30 an hour.

In 1981, HRDI stepped up its development and placement efforts to help workers who were losing their jobs as a result of the dismantling of CETA's public service jobs program. The institute helped labor organizations obtain funds for 396 programs to provide skill-training and jobs for 7,674 workers.

AMONG THE special HRDI programs, the council report notes that in the period from January 1980 to April 1981:

- 1,143 women and minorities were assisted in entering apprenticeship programs by 26 Targeted Outreach Programs. Budget cuts have since forced the closing of nine TOPs.
- The Navajo Construction Industry Manpower Program, in which 13 unions participate, had provided training in 21 occupations to 783 Navajos as of July 1981. As part of the program, 415 trainees became apprentices or were placed in jobs. HRDI's Native American Apprenticeship Outreach Program, ended in March 1981, placed 237 Native Americans in apprenticeship programs.
- 662 disabled persons were placed in jobs under the Handicapped Placement Program.

OTHER PROGRAMS included a demonstration youth program to introduce young people to careers; a demonstration apprenticeship opportunity center in Houston, ended in March, and the nonclosed HRDI Veterans' Assistance Program in Oakland, Calif., which had counseled more than 75,000 veterans since 1971.

Basic Protections Periled By Regulatory 'Reforms'

New York—The AFL-CIO Executive Council report indicts the Reagan Administration for abusing the regulatory process "in a massive campaign to eliminate worker, consumer and environmental protections."

It has done this, the council charged, by emasculating regulations already in effect, delaying or abandoning standards that had been scheduled to go into effect, and cutting back on enforcement "so that employers may violate standards without fear of sanction."

THE COUNCIL noted with concern the effective shift of regulatory decision-making from the specialized agencies responsible for their enforcement to the Office of Management & Budget.

Such a shift of power, the report suggested, conflicts with the intent of Congress in the Administrative Procedure Act.

The drive for a "regulation-free, pro-business environment," the council noted, "ignores the fact that regulations were established at the public's insistence to address serious abuses."

It warned that "with regulations being gutted, there will be an inevitable resurgence in abuses against workers, consumers and the environment."

The direct attack on regulatory protections isn't the only way the Administration has sought to weaken law enforcement, the council report pointed out.

The Administration's anti-regulation campaign is reflected also in the officials appointed to administer the regulatory agencies. "Many appointees have little or no knowledge or experience and only limited interest in determining the purpose of the regulations and situations they were designed to correct," the report charged.

IT SCORED the Reagan Administration also for curtailing enforcement through budget cuts that reduce the number of compliance officials.

The chief targets of the Administration's efforts, the report noted, "are precisely those that protect workers and consumers."

Former Stevens Mill Signs ACTWU Pact

New Milford, Conn.—A textile plant formerly owned by J. P. Stevens & Co. has signed a contract with the Clothing & Textile Workers.

The plant—sold in July while litigation involving Stevens and the union still was in progress—was purchased by the New Milford Non-Woven Corp., which has had harmonious relations with ACTWU at other textile mills.

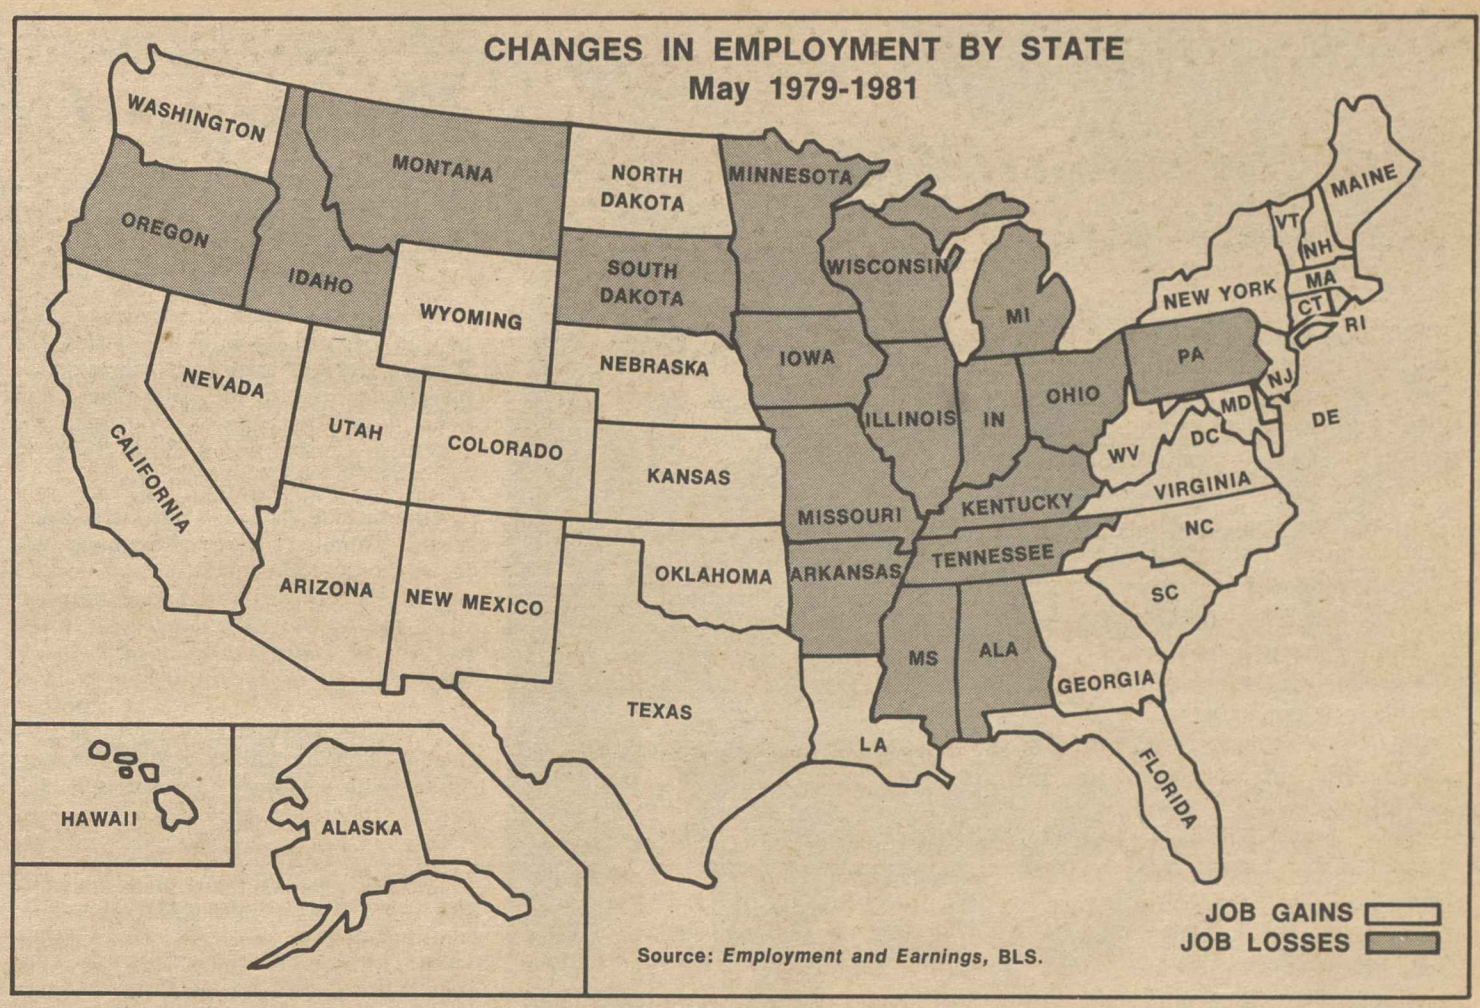
The union's agreement with New Milford provides for 9 percent wage increases in each of the three years of the contract period.

Federal Cuts Stymie Goals For Education

New York—The labor movement's goal of quality education for workers and their families is being sharply challenged by the policies of the Reagan Administration, the Executive Council said.

"At a time when education in America was beginning to reflect the benefits of the categorical programs funded in the last two decades, this Administration has misread an election victory as an overwhelming mandate to ease federal responsibility for educational services to workers and their children," the council charged in its report to the convention.

IT SAID the Administration's budget cuts and spending decisions have put an unfair burden on public education that is discouraging to working people hoping for a "quality education program from kindergarten through college for themselves and their children."



The council report emphasized that the labor movement, as it has for the past century, "must be prepared to marshal its forces to sustain the gains" of the past 100 years and offer a program that responds to crucial education needs.

Among the important educational areas threatened by Administration policies, the council cited:

- Elementary and secondary school systems which will suffer from the virtual repeal of the federal aid law of 1965 and the folding of 28 categorical aid programs into block grants.
- Impact aid to school districts with heavy concentrations of federal workers and armed forces, already cut by 50 percent and facing further cuts that will add to the burden of communities hard-pressed for adequate tax revenues.
- Career education aid, cut 50 percent and made part of the block grant plan.
- Vocational education programs that provide essential job skills to some three million students. The Administration has cut funds by $49 million and is asking for another 30 percent reduction in these programs.
- Higher education programs, for which Administration cutbacks include the phasing out of social security benefits for orphaned students and severe limitations on the availability of student loans.

THE AFL-CIO believes the federal government should play a leading role in education, the council said.

The AFL-CIO Education Dept., the council report observed, has stepped up its efforts to introduce more and improved labor education into school curricula. Efforts now under way include successful programs in California, Michigan, Maryland and Wyoming.

Victories on OSHA Enforcement Highlight Record Before Courts

New York—In terms of labor's concern, the most significant Supreme Court decisions since the last AFL-CIO convention were those supporting the federal government's power to provide safety and health protection in the workplace.

The "Labor and the Law" section of the Executive Council report cites these cases as "one of the few areas in which decisions favorable to labor have given affirmative protection to employees' interests."

OVERALL, unions fared well on a won-and-lost "scorecard" of 52 labor-related cases decided by the Supreme Court. But most of the "wins" came in staving off attacks on union rights and worker protections, the council noted. There was less success in cases where unions were seeking to assert legal and constitutional rights.

The cases decided in accord with labor's position, the council report suggested, are symptomatic of the Supreme Court's present tendency "to discourage resort to legal remedies rather than of any sympathy for labor's goals and concerns."

In the occupational safety and health areas, the Supreme Court spoke with rare unanimity in upholding an OSHA regulation prohibiting employers from punishing a worker who refuses a task because of a "reasonable" fear of death or serious injury."

ANOTHER PLUS was the Supreme Court's holding that a search warrant wasn't necessary for mine inspections under the Federal Mine Safety & Health Act. The court made a distinction between the hazardous nature of mines, which by law must be regularly inspected, and routine OSHA inspections which it had previously held required a warrant if an employer refused access.

The court was more divided on the issue of occupational health standards.

It split three ways in dealing with an OSHA standard that sought to reduce exposure to benzene, a cancer-causing toxic substance, to the lowest level feasible. The prevailing decision invalidated the standard because, it held, OSHA has not proved that the levels of benzene exposure previously allowed constituted a "significant risk" to the health of workers.

THE OUTCOME was more to labor's liking in a 5-4 decision upholding OSHA's standard regulating cotton dust exposure. The majority rejected the contention that OSHA must justify its standards by a "cost-benefit" test.

Instead, the court majority held, it need only show that a standard is economically and technically feasible.

The council report noted apparent contradictions in decisions involving "free speech" constitutional rights that suggest a double-standard on the right to picket.

It found in the Supreme Court decisions a "profoundly dispiriting message" that "organized labor cannot expect to be accorded the very same constitutional protection accorded other groups."

ON FREE SPEECH issues, labor's view is most likely to prevail "when the position of the opposing party will lead to more court access, more litigation, and more interference with the right of state governments to act free from federal oversight."

In contrast to previous periods, there was a dropoff in cases involving discrimination in employment—perhaps because past decisions have dealt with most of the central issues.

But "in the yeasty area of affirmative action . . . the court continues with its cautious, indeterminate, step-by-step approach."

A series of decisions affirmed, as labor had urged, the enforceability of collective bargaining agreements in federal court. Another decision, clearly supported by evidence of the intent of Congress, affirmed that a union may bargain to impasse and strike if necessary to compel an employer's participation in an existing pension and welfare trust fund.

IN RECENT YEARS, unions have frequently been faced with dubious but potentially destructive lawsuits seeking huge sums in damages, and three Supreme Court decisions rejecting such suits may help discourage others.

The council report suggested that in this area, "the general predilection of the present court to avoid expanding the remedies available in federal court has worked in favor of organized labor."

Two important cases involving the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA), more commonly known as the pension reform law, were decided in accord with labor's views.

The decisions, the Executive Council noted, "show a favorable attitude toward the federal law, which is designed to protect the interests of employees under private pension plans."

Public Affairs Institute Termed Vital Resource

New York—Creation of a Labor Institute for Public Affairs "would provide a realistic and effective resource" for getting across organized labor's viewpoint to union members and the general public, the Executive Council reported.

Establishment of the institute was approved by the council this summer, following adoption of a proposal by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland. The nonprofit body would be governed by the council, and its staff recruited from experts in the electronic media field.

The institute would provide expertise on media technology, coordinate public relations programs, produce programs advancing labor's views, assist AFL-CIO affiliates upon request, and carry out other functions.

The council's Committee on Public Relations, re-established in February, said that a federation per capita increase should be considered to fund the institute.

New Alliance Opens Drive Against High Interest Rates

More than a dozen consumer, business, labor, agricultural and citizen action groups have created a national organization to fight high interest rates and reform the Federal Reserve Board.

The new National Council for Low Interest Rates announced it will lead a campaign against high interest rates and to achieve targeted Federal Reserve Board policies. It also will campaign to get more non-bankers on the board.

"THE ADMINISTRATION and the Congress have conspired to plunge us into economic chaos by recklessly cutting expenditures and taxes," said J. C. Turner, president of the Operating Engineers and chairman of the council. "Now we want them to apply some of that same zeal toward cutting interest rates so we can rescue this country financially."

The council has two objectives, Turner said. The first is to pressure the Federal Reserve to make less money available for corporate take-overs, commodity speculation and condominium conversions and therefore more money and credit available, at lower interest rates, for housing, construction and manufacturing.

The second aim is to democratize the board, which at present, he said, is controlled "by financial and academic types" whose "narrow viewpoints and experience have created the current unwise policies."

TURNER NOTED that high interest rates are keeping the construction industry depressed and have caused residential housing starts to dwindle to an annual rate of 918,000, half the 1978 rate. He said nearly 10 months of 20 percent-range interest rates have "dealt body blows" to auto and auto parts manufacturing, steel, iron, utilities and agriculture.

Members of the council include representatives of the National Farmers Union, Full Employment Action Council, National Housing Conference, NAACP, General Contractors of New York, Auto Workers, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., Carpenters, U.S. Conference of Mayors and American Public Power Association.

MONUMENT HONORING fire fighters who died in the line of duty was dedicated at the National Emergency Training Center at Emmitsburg, Md., by Fire Fighters President John Gannon. Gannon said the memorial represents welcome national recognition of the hazards of the firefighting profession. About 150 fire fighters die each year as a result of fires.

Stronger Labor, Rights Ties Pressed to Preserve Gains

New York—The labor movement and organizations concerned with civil and human rights "need each other as never before" in the face of growing assaults on affirmative action, equal opportunity and equal employment, the Executive Council stressed in its report to the convention.

Labor will continue to build coalitions with civil rights groups, women's organizations, religious organizations and others concerned with "human rights, equal opportunity and social and economic justice," the report said.

THE COUNCIL said it was "alarmed by what appears to be a low ebb in the nation's commitment to civil rights" and noted that "the strident voices of the radical right" are urging those who already oppose organized labor to "grow more and more anti-labor and anti-civil rights."

The need to end discrimination in the workplace remains acute, the council said, adding that civil rights enforcement by the federal government, relegated "to the back burner" by the Reagan Administration, is essential. The council pointed to "disabling" budget cuts by the Administration that have hurt civil rights programs as well as social programs that aided minorities, women and the poor.

THE VOTING RIGHTS Act, which resulted in a dramatic rise in black voter registration and helped in the election of more black public officials, will be up for renewal in 1982, the council noted, and vital provisions of the act should be renewed to remove all remaining barriers to black voter participation.

Other areas of civil rights concern cited by the council report include:

- The need to expand affirmative action plans including the increased recruitment and preparation of women and minorities for jobs, training programs and promotion, particularly through the collective bargaining process.
- Greater commitment of public resources for job development and training programs, such as the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act now slashed by the Administration's budget. "The likelihood of minority youth never holding a job spells deep trouble in many central cities," the council stressed.
- Effective enforcement of civil rights laws that are being weakened by changes in procedures and practices in some federal rights agencies.

THE COUNCIL praised the civil rights activities of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, the Coalition of Labor Union Women and the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, all active in community programs such as voter registration.

APRI, CLUW and LCLAA also provide a bridge between the labor movement and minorities and women, encouraging them to take an active role in their unions, participate in political activities and work for passage of the Equal Rights Amendment as well as in organizing efforts, the council said.

It cited also the strong ties the labor movement maintains with organizations such as the NAACP, the Urban League, the National Urban Coalition, the Martin Luther King Center for Nonviolent Change, and Southern Regional Council.

Delegates Shape Legislative Goals In West Virginia

Charleston, W.Va.—The West Virginia AFL-CIO convention adopted a state legislative program that includes collective bargaining rights for public employees.

The 450 convention delegates also called on the legislature to:

- Raise the ceiling on workers' compensation and make other improvements.
- Add a dependents' benefit to unemployment insurance, raise the formula for determining the maximum benefit and increase the amount of incidental earnings allowed before payments are reduced.
- Bar polygraph tests in employment.
- Preserve the state's prevailing wage law on construction contracts.

The convention re-elected President Joseph W. Powell and Sec.-Treas. Jack R. McComas to four-year terms.

On national issues, delegates firmly opposed any reduction in social security benefits. And they gave strong applause to Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), the Senate's minority leader, who denounced the Reagan Administration's slashing of budgets for programs to assist workers, students, the aged and the needy.

Gov. John D. Rockefeller IV addressed the convention as did a number of other public figures and state officials.

'A Force for Stagflation'

Housing Crisis Fuels Inflation, Joblessness

New York—High interest rates fostered by the Federal Reserve Board and the Reagan Administration have depressed the housing industry to the point where millions of families cannot buy homes, the Executive Council noted in its report to the AFL-CIO convention.

The startling decline in new home starts means continued joblessness in a weakening economy, the council said. Almost 17 percent of construction workers were unemployed in August, along with many workers in construction material industries.

"IN THE ABSENCE of increased production, housing will be a force for stagflation, with continued shortages and high prices," the report predicted.

"The housing industry is being squeezed in a vise of high interest rates and declining starts that is certain to aggravate inflation in housing costs for many years. Home buyers and other housing consumers are the victims of these forces."

In another section of its report, the council charged that the Reagan Administration has encouraged the Federal Reserve Board to maintain tight monetary policies to provide the semblance of an anti-inflation program. The result has been mortgage interest rates of 17 percent or more that have devastated the housing industry and its consumers.

TO THE EXTENT that the inflation rate has declined this year, the council said, it is due to a change in the demand-supply situation in the world oil and food markets rather than the Fed's tight-money policies.

The council noted that in 1980 the brief implementation of credit controls proved to be helpful in bringing down interest rates significantly and reversing the preceding decline in home building and general economic activity.

Today, in the mortgage financing market, financial institutions and regulators are vigorously promoting use of variable rate and renegotiable mortgages that shift the risk of higher interest rates from lenders to homeowners, making home ownership more difficult to attain for workers.

HOUSING STARTS in the first half of 1981 averaged 1.3 million at an annual rate, the level of the previous year, but since then have averaged only about 1 million.

"The acute housing shortage, reflected in a second-quarter 1981 national rental vacancy rate of 5 percent and a 1.3 percent homeowner vacancy rate, is both an economic and a social problem," the council observed. "It contributes to inflation in the sale and rental of housing and, at the same time, traps families in substandard housing or poor neighborhoods."

The poor suffer especially in a housing shortage, the council said. The tight rental housing situation continues as construction starts of structures of five or more units lag below the levels needed. While low-income families have the greatest need for rental housing, there was little relief promised in the low rate of total housing construction starts in 1981.

THE REAGAN Administration's proposed budget authority revisions for the current fiscal year were intended to reduce the number of added low-income rental units that could be supported by the U.S. Dept. of Housing & Urban Development from 260,000 to 175,000 units. This was further reduced by Congress in the budget reconciliation process to about 154,000, the council noted. The HUD homeownership assistance program had no Administration support at all.

Also, the council noted, the budget reconciliation bill for 1982 raised the required tenant rent payment for subsidized housing over a period of five years from 25 to 30 percent of income.

"This directly affects the poor, who are least able to cope with today's high prices," the council pointed out.

Industrial Base Threatened By Unfair Trade Practices

New York—Unfair trade practices, including dumping and foreign government subsidies, continue to erode the U.S. industrial base and destroy American jobs, the Executive Council said in its report to the convention.

At the same time, the council noted, budget slashes pushed through Congress by the Reagan Administration have virtually wrecked the trade adjustment assistance program for workers injured by imports.

WHILE THE dollar volume of both imports and exports rose substantially in the past two years, the nation's deficit in merchandise trade exceeded $32 billion in 1980 and increased to an annual rate of $38 billion in the first half of 1981, the report observed.

Problems stemming from foreign trade have affected more than just basic domestic industries such as steel, autos and textiles, hitting many smaller industries and parts of industries as well.

The council noted that trade in manufactured goods exceeds the total U.S. output of these items by as much as 30 percent. As a result, it said, America must depend either partially or wholly on other countries for such items as aircraft parts, autos and auto parts, bearings, industrial fasteners, forgings, castings, steel and electrical products.

THE RAPID spread of multinational firms and banks is also causing problems for U.S. service industries, affecting such areas as broadcasting, shipping, and air travel, the report noted.

The council charged that the mechanism for relief for industries and workers threatened or injured by imports "has become a mockery." It pointed out that relief was granted in only nine of 45 cases brought before the International Trade Commission since 1974.

"Relief for the auto industry was not even recommended by the International Trade Commission, despite import injury affecting close to one million jobs in autos, parts and services," the council said. "Some temporary action was taken by Japan in 1981 to restrain minimally auto exports, but no help was forthcoming for parts producers."

THE COUNCIL noted that when the ITC found that the leather apparel and shoe industries had been injured by imports, the President failed to grant relief in either case.

And the minimal relief granted to the color television, specialty steel and fastener industries was subsequently phased out or reduced.

A major problem afflicting U.S. industries and workers, the report noted, is that the burden of proof falls upon the injured party.

"FOREIGN governments increasingly subsidize microprocessing devices, robots and telecommunications development and production," the report said. Countervailing duty actions have been taken against subsidized imports of construction castings and industrial fasteners from India, but such actions have been few.

The council also pointed out that the codes of conduct established in the 1979 Multilateral Trade Negotiations have not produced substantive results since most nations have not endorsed the action.

Council Presses Struggle for Justice

Convention Report Renews Century-Old Commitment

ecutive Council "and a renewed commitment to strengthen minority participation on the council and at every level of the trade union movement."

Reaffiliation of the Auto Workers brings back "a union with an outstanding tradition of struggle for social and economic justice, and advances the cause of labor unity," he said.

Kirkland reported enthusiastically on the series of AFL-CIO regional conferences held last spring which brought officers and national staff of the AFL-CIO into a "free-flowing and candid" interchange of views with grass-roots union leaders throughout the country.

The AFL-CIO "has met the challenge of transition," Kirkland said.

HE NOTED organizing achievements and the launching of a coordinated organizing drive in Houston involving more than 30 international unions.

But "the most memorable event of our centennial year was Solidarity Day," Kirkland said.

That mammoth demonstration "was a powerful answer to the President's charge that American labor is out of step with its rank-and-file," he observed.

While "no single demonstration can reverse the Administration's course," Solidarity Day sent a message that was followed by a partial retreat by Reagan on social security and school lunch cuts, and signs of stiffening resistance by Congress to Administration policies, Kirkland noted.

THE FINANCIAL section of the Executive Council report, by Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue, cited an increase in the federation's net worth over the past two years and includes detailed, audited financial statements covering AFL-CIO income and expenditures.

Despite the impact of the recession, membership averaged over the past two years was virtually unchanged from the previous record—at 13.6 million. If the full membership of the newly reaffiliated UAW were included, the total would rise to about 15 million. Mergers involving eight unions since the last convention leave the number of AFL-CIO affiliated national and international unions at 102.

The 35-member Executive Council includes 13 vice presidents elected since 1977, eight of them since the opening of the 1979 convention.

A SPECIAL section of the Executive Council report deals with the AFL-CIO's centennial year program, stressing that the anniversary "has provided a golden opportunity for labor to present its story to the American public, as well as to its own members."

The opening of the AFL-CIO's 14th convention on Nov. 16 comes 100 years and one day after 107 delegates met in Pittsburgh to establish the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Assemblies, which evolved into the American Federation of Labor and then the AFL-CIO.

Sections of the council report deal with activities of AFL-CIO headquarters departments, the George Meany Center for Labor Studies, the federation's Human Resources Development Institute and other specialized functions.

LABOR'S international role is spotlighted in a 20-page section that points up the AFL-CIO's staunch commitment to human rights everywhere in the world. It reports on the federation's assistance to the Solidarity trade union federation of Poland, participation in international organizations, and the activities of the AFL-CIO's own American Institute for Free Labor Development, African-American Labor Center and the Asian-American Free Labor Institute.

In the domestic area, the Executive Council report covers 1980 and 1981 developments in Congress and the Supreme Court and examines in substantial detail the shape of the U.S. economy.

It cites the abnormally small growth in jobs and the squeeze on workers' paychecks as wage increases continue to trail living costs.

AFTER INFLATION and tax deductions, the report notes, the average worker's buying power decreased by 9.7 percent over the July 1979 to July 1981 period.

In dozens of specific subject areas covered by the council report, the impact of the Reagan Administration's policies and budget cuts is a recurrent theme.

The report cites the shortchanging of city and state needs through elimination and underfunding of federal grant programs.

It cites the severe decline in housing starts under the battering of tight money and high interest.

ENERGY conservation programs have been discarded, clean air goals virtually abandoned, and transportaiton needs unmet, the council notes.

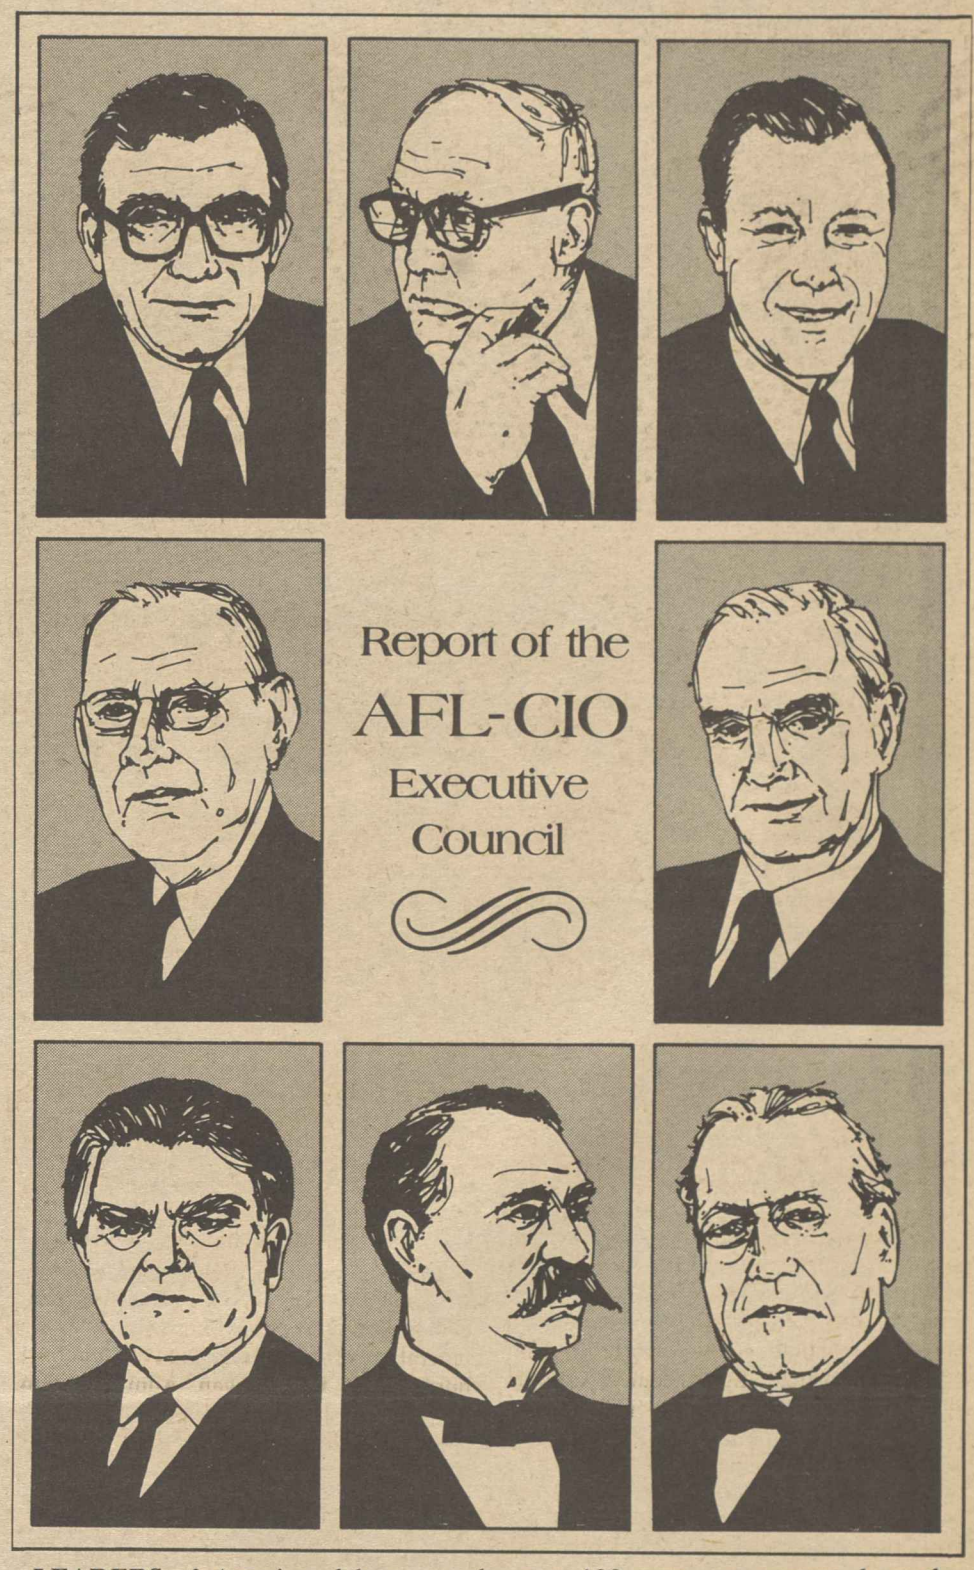
Occupational safety and health progress has been set back, the report details, through retreat on regulations as well as through budget cuts and legislative changes.

The Reagan Administration has "substituted dollar costs for human values," the council charges. "No longer is the safety and health of workers the prime concern, but rather the protection of management from being requested to provide a safe and healthful workplace."

THE REPORT takes note of the virtual abandonment of trade adjustment assistance for workers whose jobs have been wiped out by imports, and the severe cuts in food stamps, social services and welfare for the needy.

All of the government's prevailing wage and labor standards are threatened by administrative changes in regulations as well as legislative attacks, the council reports. At stake is the preservation of "the basic principle that businesses should not compete for government contracts by exploiting workers and endangering their health and safety."

A civil rights section of the Executive Council report points up the fact that progress made over the past quarter-century is endangered by budget actions as well as "by what appears to be a low ebb in the nation's commitment to civil rights."



IT NOTES that "the Reagan Administration's meat-axe slashing of employment and training funds falls heaviest on minority, women and disadvantaged young workers." And with unemployment "at dangerously high levels," black joblessness is more than twice the rate of whites.

A political activities section of the Executive Council report cited the nation's economic ills and "weakness at the top of the ticket" as factors contributing to the conservative takeover in the 1980 elections. And "the Democratic Party, nationally and in most states, was at its weakest level in many years."

Nevertheless, the report points out that COPE helped bring a 65 percent turnout of union members—compared with less than 53 percent for the nation as a whole. Key precinct checks gave President Carter 58 percent of support from union members compared with his 41 percent overall vote.

CONSIDERING the record of the Reagan Administration since taking office, Kirkland wrote in the introduction to the council report, "the labor movement can be proud of COPE's efforts."

In opposing Reagan's candidacy, "we were right a year ago," Kirkland said, and "we are still right."

LEADERS of American labor over the past 100 years are portrayed on the cover of the Executive Council's report to the 14th convention of the AFL-CIO. Top row, left to right, are Lane Kirkland and George Meany, the only ones to serve as president of the AFL-CIO since its formation in 1955, and Walter P. Reuther. Center row, are William Green, left, and Philip Murray. Bottom row, left to right, depicts John L. Lewis, John McBride, and Samuel Gompers. Reuther, Murray, and Lewis headed the CIO while Gompers, Green and McBride were heads of the AFL.

Unions Take Stronger Role On Pension Fund Investment

New York—Considerable progress has been made at all levels of the labor movement during the past two years on issues involved in the investment of union pension funds, the Executive Council reported.

The council cited the response of AFL-CIO affiliates to the recommendations of its special committee on pensions that member unions take an active role in shaping the investment and management of their funds with the aim of serving the best interests of participants and beneficiaries.

NATIONAL, regional and local labor organizations have undertaken a wide range of actions outlined by the Committee on the Investment of Union Pension Funds, the council noted in its report to the convention. These have included:

- Establishment of investment accounts to target portions of union pension funds toward union-built construction and other enterprises.
- Negotiation of collective bargaining agreements providing for a greater union voice in the management of employer-controlled plans.
- Development of new accounts by state public employee pension funds to provide for low-cost home mortgages, investment in construction and other economic activity aimed at creating jobs.
- Exercise of shareholder rights to advance union interests in collective bargaining, equal employment opportunity, job safety and health, and plant closings.

THE COUNCIL noted that some progress also has been made in the administration of the federal Employee Retirement Income Security Act, but that many problems still exist—largely because administrative duties are split between the Labor and Treasury Departments.

The report welcomed legislation, signed into law last September, strengthening termination insurance provisions on multi-employer pension plans. Another major development in the past two years was a recommendation of a presidential commission calling for a universal pension system for all workers, although the council noted that other proposals of the commission could be detrimental.

The council also reported that the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust is being reorganized to widen investment opportunities for union pension funds.

Donahue Hits Wage-Busting On Standards

changes "that undermine wages, working conditions and quality of work."

A proposed change that would apply the law's protections only to contracts in which the provision of services is the "principal purpose" would exclude more than two-thirds of the men and women employed to clean government-leased facilities, he protested.

OTHER PROPOSED changes, Sweeney testified, in effect "guarantee" that contractors located in low-wage areas will be given preference.

● Machinists Vice President George J. Poulin stressed that Congress demonstrated its support of the prevailing wage principle by enacting amendments in both 1972 and 1976 that enlarged the law's protections. The 1972 amendments required contractors to honor the terms of prior collective bargaining agreements if they successfully bid on a contract, and the 1976 change expanded coverage to include white collar as well as blue collar workers.

Changes sought by the Labor Dept., including exemption of maintenance and repair of high technology equipment, "will practically repeal" portions of the law, he charged.

"Government departments are supposed to carry out, not subvert, congressional intent," Poulin said.

● Laborers Legislative Director John T. Curran said enactment of the Service Contract Act made it possible for "some of the most exploited and some of the most victimized workers" to begin to improve their conditions. Previously, whenever workers organized or obtained a raise, their gains would be wiped out when a competing employer took over the contract on the basis of a substandard wage scale, without fringe benefits.

THE PRINCIPLE of the law remains as valid today as when it was first enacted, Curran insisted. "Quite simply, it is not the role of government to force down wages."

The economic impact analysis on which the Labor Dept. justifies its regulatory proposals, Curran stressed, deals exclusively with the effect on industry and the government agencies contracting for services. "In not one sentence does it examine the economic cost to workers of having their wages cut, of forfeiting their health coverage, of retiring with no pension plan . . . or losing their jobs because of the constant turnover of service contracts."

In the AFL-CIO's testimony, Donahue challenged the Administration's apparent assumption that something must be wrong with a program to protect labor standards if it results in a higher cost to the government.

Federal procurement procedures that bar awarding contracts on the basis of the lowest wages and most substandard conditions "are expected to result in higher costs" than with a lack of standards, Donahue commented. If that were not the case, "there would be no need for them," he said. But a proper regulatory analysis, he suggested, should consider "the benefits which flow to the workers and society as a whole."

CHANGES PROPOSED by the Reagan Administration in regulations governing the Service Contract Act would deprive tens of thousands of workers of the law's prevailing wage guarantees, union witnesses charged at House hearings. Testifying here is Machinists Vice President George J. Poulin. With him are IAM Economist Stanley Wisniewski, left, and Atty. Joseph Manners, right.

Social Programs Victims Of Budget-Cutting Overkill

New York—Social security protections, health programs, welfare reform, social services and food stamp assistance have been among the most visible targets of the Reagan Administration and its allies in Congress.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council report points up the overkill of President Reagan's recommendations for slashing social security benefits to meet funding problems that can be resolved through less drastic means.

PUBLIC UPROAR over the Reagan plan forced the Administration to pull back in what the council termed "a temporary retreat while the President explores social security cuts by other means."

Both Medicare for the elderly and Medicaid for the poor have been cut back as a result of Administration budget pressure, although not quite as heavily as the President had sought.

The council termed the Medicare cuts, which include a requirement that the elderly pay more in out-of-pocket deductibles, a breach of Reagan's "pre-election pledge not to cut social security benefits for the aged."

THE COUNCIL noted also the substantial cutback in the food stamp program, including the dropping of assistance to more than 1 million persons, reduction of help for others, and banning outright food stamps to families of workers who are on strike, even though they are eligible on the basis of need.

Looking at the health care field, the council report cited the continuing escalation of costs, coupled with the Administration's determination to reduce federal programs and shift costs to the states and private sector.

The federal health programs that were continued intact, rather than consolidated into reduced-funding block grants to the states, have had their spending authorizations cut 25 percent as part of the budget process.

WELFARE REFORM proved to be another victim of the Reagan Administration, the council report observed.

Action already taken through the congressional budget process includes:

● Reducing aid to families with dependent children (AFDC), "in some cases to less than 50 percent of the poverty level."

● Slashing payments to the working poor, "thus punishing mothers who under the most adverse circumstances are trying to work their way off the welfare rolls."

● Imposing work-without-pay obligations for persons receiving AFDC assistance.

● Disqualifying the family of a striker from obtaining welfare assistance based on loss of income.

Rail Carriers, Labor Back Safety Plan

For the first time in their long relationship, railroad labor and management have cooperated in working out proposed federal safety rules that promise safer conditions for workers, increased efficiency for the carriers and greater safety and savings for the public.

Chairman Fred Hardin of the Railway Labor Executives Association announced that the RLEA safety committee headed by J. R. Snyder hammered out the safety proposals with the American Association of Railroads.

THE RLEA AND AAR presented to Federal Railroad Administrator Robert W. Blanchette their proposed changes in safety regulations on power brake rules, track standards, and the strict enforcement of penalties for violations.

A significant change calls for a "car inspector" to make a thorough inspection of a train and certify its safety to the engineer before its departure from the initial terminal. The inspector will check the brakes and look for cracked wheels, broken flanges and other unsafe conditions.

The proposed new rule probably would have averted a serious runaway train accident near Kelso, Calif., a year ago which took the lives of three rail workers and caused $1.2 million in damage. Just a few weeks ago, the National Transportation Safety board criticized the Union Pacific Railroad for the faulty braking system on the 20-car work train. The train had gone out of control down a long grade at 120 miles an hour, crashing into a UP freight train which had speeded up to 80 miles an hour to avoid the collision.

TO PUT TEETH in the safety inspection proposal, the RLEA and AAR agreed that penalties for violation of the regulations "will not be compromised." At present, penalties of $250 to $2,500 are assessed for violations, but the practice is to let them accumulate and then bargain them downward.

Another key proposal would strengthen track standards by requiring that a qualified supervisor be on the scene while segments of track are being repaired or renewed.

HARDIN AND Snyder said the proposed changes would substantially improve the safety conditions for rail employees and also save the railroads and the public millions of dollars now lost because of unsafe trains, track and accidents.

Reaganomics Blamed for 8% Jobless Rate victims of the Reagan recession. "For them, the desolation is 100 percent," he said.

AT THE WHITE HOUSE, Deputy Press Sec. Larry Speakes said the President considers the unemployment situation to be a "natural short-term consequence of unwinding the deeply rooted inflation that is embedded in the American economy. . . . We anticipate that the rate could move somewhat higher over the next few months before declining as the economy strengthens in 1982."

But House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill Jr. (D-Mass.), in remarks at a conference of business leaders in New York, said the current recession is a "deliberate and conscious policy" of the Administration.

THE AFL-CIO Executive Council last February warned that Reagan's budget, monetary, and regulatory proposals would require "more sacrifice from those who have little," and make those who are already wealthy the only "sure winners" in a hazardous "high-risk gamble with the future of America."

Reflecting the pervasiveness of the recession throughout the economy, employment gains in October were registered by only one-third of the 172 industries that report monthly to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood, at a congressional Joint Economic Committee hearing, said the October statistics showed a "substantial deterioration" in the labor market. The largest employment decline was in manufacturing, led by transportation equipment, lumber and wood products, and electrical equipment.

NORWOOD NOTED that the number of persons working part time because their hours were cut back or they were unable to find full-time work reached a record 5 million in October. One experimental measure of unemployment, which counts part of these workers as unemployed, put the jobless rate for the month at 10.4 percent, instead of 8 percent.

Most of the increase in joblessness was among workers who lost their jobs and people who had worked previously, then left the labor market and were looking for jobs again, BLS said.

The rise in unemployment among adult males was particularly sharp, from 6.2 to 6.7 percent. Teenage joblessness jumped from 19.3 to 20.6 percent, the highest level in six years. Unemployment among full-time workers rose over the month from 7.2 to 7.7 percent.

THE LAST TIME the overall national jobless rate was as high as 8 percent was in December 1975, when it reached 8.2 percent. The postwar unemployment peak of 9 percent occurred in May 1975. During the 1980 recession, the rate topped off at 7.6 percent.

Total employment was unchanged over the month at 98,217,000 as a decline among adult men and teenagers was offset by an increase among adult women. But nonfarm payroll employment declined significantly, by 200,000.

Two-thirds of the over-the-month decrease in factory employment took place in durable goods industries. The service-producing sector as a whole registered a gain of 90,000 jobs over the month, although the only sizable increases were in the services industry and in retail trade.

Over the last three months, employment in steel has dropped by 35,000 jobs, autos by 80,000, lumber and wood products by 40,000, and state and local government employment by 160,000. Construction over the past year is down by 130,000 jobs.

The next issue of the AFL-CIO News will be published Nov. 28, 1981, because of the convention and Thanksgiving holiday schedules.

That issue will contain detailed coverage of the actions of the AFL-CIO's 100th anniversary convention.

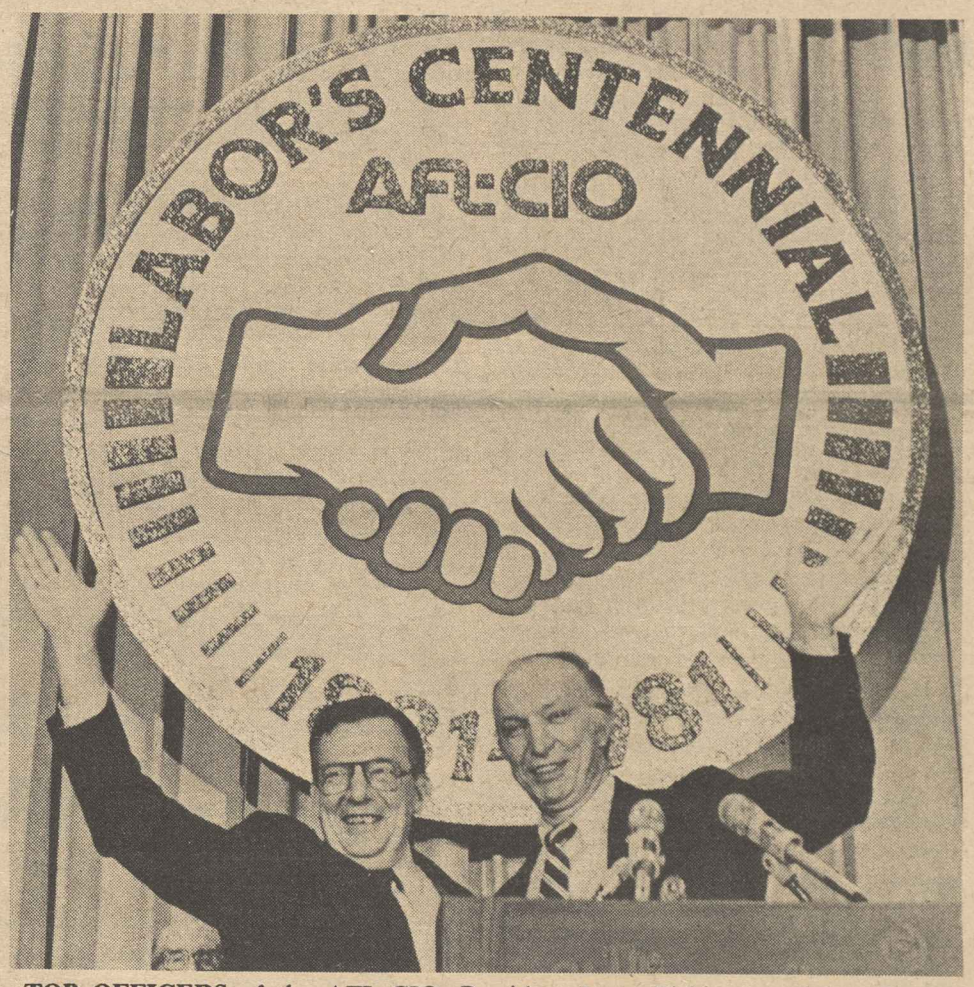
Per Capita Rise Voted to Fund New Programs

New York—Major programs to expand the actvities and services of the AFL-CIO drew the support of the convention with its approval of a two-step increase in the federation's per capita payment to provide the necessary funds.



Beginning with payments for next January, the monthly per capita tax paid by affiliates on their U.S. membership will increase from the present 19 cents to 24 cents. Starting with payments for January 1983, the payment will go up another 3 cents, for a total of 27 cents.

THE CONVENTION unanimously adopted the Executive Council's recommendation for the per capita increase based on a study by the council's finance committee, which projected added costs for the new program at almost $11 million a year.

The council listed five areas of expanded activity and initiatives by the federation:

- Creation of the Institute for Public Affairs, continuation of the regional conferences held for the first time last spring, work with the Budget Coalition and similar special activities, which will require expenditures of about $3 million a year.
- Reaffiliation of the AFL-CIO with the International Confederation of Free Trade unions, just approved by the council and endorsed by the convention, which involves dues of $1.5 to $1.6 million a year plus $175,000 a year in contributions to the ICFTU's Solidarity Fund.
- Construction of the George Meany Memorial Library and Archives at the

New Century Opens on Era Of Challenge

By John M. Barry

New York—The AFL-CIO opened a new century for the organized American labor movement with a program to build on the foundations of its pioneers and surmount the challenges facing the nation's workers and their unions.

The 14th convention was the celebration of a century of achievement since the AFL-CIO's birth in November 1881 as the Federation of Organized Trades & Labor Unions.

BUT THE CONVENTION was much more than a tribute to past victories. Its overriding theme was the determination of the 836 delegates to carry forward the spirit of solidarity with policies and programs to spur union growth, preserve workers' rights and deal with economic and political change.

"We are here in strength and vigor," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland told the delegates, "because those who went before us and built this great instrument of progress did indeed adapt its role and

Kirkland Dissects Reagan Policy Failures

By David L. Perlman

New York—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland keynoted the federation's centennial convention with a sharp-edged dissection of Reagan Administration policies and a summons to the trade union movement to get America back on course.

On the domestic front, Kirkland scored the President's "carrot-and-stick" policy of lavish rewards for the rich and "for the poor, a stick."

HE SPOKE OF the shambles the Reagan Administration has made of the economy and noted that its lauded "mastery of Congress" has pushed unemployment to new heights while depressing the "real wages" of those still employed.

Kirkland contrasted the "amiable" public image of President Reagan with the "cold heart and hard fist" he displayed to the fired air traffic controllers. After having used "the full force of government to break a small union," was it then necessary to "shoot its wounded," Kirkland asked.

Administration foreign policy blunders have dismayed America's allies, Kirkland charged, and its human rights policy seems to be based on a fine distinction "between lice who are totalitarian and lice who are authoritarian." The labor movement still stands for "freedom of association everywhere," Kirkland declared.

DELEGATES repeatedly interrupted Kirkland with applause and especially delighted in his tongue-lashing of David Stockman, the director of the Office of Management & Budget who admitted in a magazine interview that the Administration's "supply-side" theory is merely trickle-down economics in sheep's clothing.

Nothing the Administration's critics could say is even half as devastating as the "fleeting spasms of honesty of its leading hatchet man," Kirkland suggested.

"You don't have to be an old sailor to know what it means when the smartest rat on board heads for the hawsepipe," he said.

KIRKLAND admitted a lack of sympathy for the embarrassment of Stockman, whose "proudest boast" is the destruction of public service employment and trade adjustment assistance programs.

"He was the original interior decorator of this economic house of ill repute," Kirkland said, and now claims "he was only the piano player in the parlor" and "never knew what was going on upstairs."

Kirkland's keynote was more than a biting commentary on an Administration that "promised us a boom and brought us a bust."

He spoke of the drastic changes that have taken place in the nation and its labor movement in the hundred years of the AFL-CIO and its immediate predecessor trade union federations.

THE NEXT century will see equally drastic changes, Kirkland predicted, and the labor movement will meet the challenge.

Labor has sometimes lagged behind and "at times we have surged ahead" of the curve of change, he noted. "Like our na-

Kirkland, Donahue Get New Terms, Five Newcomers Elected to Council

New York—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue were re-elected by acclamation to their second two-year terms at the federation's centennial convention.

They will share leadership with 33 other Executive Council members, the vice presidents of the AFL-CIO.

FIVE NEW members elected to the council are Frank Drozak, president of the Seafarers; James E. Hatfield, president of the Glass Bottle Blowers; Barbara B. Hutchinson, director of women's affairs for the Government Employees; Richard I. Kilroy, president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, and Vincent R. Sombrotto, president of the Letter Carriers.

The 28 incumbent vice presidents re-elected are John H. Lyons, Thomas W. Gleason, Frederick O'Neal, Jerry Wurf, S. Frank Raftery, Martin J. Ward, Murray H. Finley, Albert Shanker, Glenn E. Watts, Sol C. Chaikin, Edward T. Hanley, Angelo Fosco, Charles H. Pillard, J. C. Turner, Lloyd McBride, David J. Fitzmaurice, Kenneth T. Blaylock, Alvin E. Heaps, William W. Winpisinger, William H. Wynn, John J. O'Donnell, John DeConcini, Wayne E. Glenn, Robert F. Goss, William Konyha, Joyce D. Miller, John J. Sweeney and Douglas Fraser.

Kirkland, 59, succeeded George Meany as president of the federation at the 1979 convention shortly before Meany's death. He earned his union card as a merchant marine officer in World War II, in the Masters, Mates & Pilots, which is now an affiliate of the Longshoremen.

HIS APPRENTICESHIP for the AFL-CIO presidency included nine years as executive assistant to Meany, followed by a decade as AFL-CIO secretary-treasurer.

ILA President Thomas W. Gleason placed Kirkland's name in nomination, and the president of the Masters-Mates, Robert Lowen, and Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner seconded it. Retiring AFL-CIO Vice President William H. McClennan, who was presiding, reported no further nominations. Vice President John H. Lyons moved for a unanimous ballot—and the delegates welcomed Kirkland back to the microphone with a standing ovation.

"We have a great deal of work to do together," he told them, "in carrying out the strong mandates of this convention. . . . Let's buckle down to it."

DONAHUE, 53, a former assistant secretary of labor, had been a vice president of the Service Employees before becoming executive assistant to Meany in 1973, and SEIU President John J. Sweeney placed his name in nomination, with New York City Central Labor Council President Harry Van Arsdale seconding it.

Donahue responded to his re-election with a pledge that the federation's leadership team will continue "to advance the interests of the members we serve and to assure for them the kind of decent, militant, progressive, scrupulously honest labor movement they deserve."

Drozak, 53, is president of the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. as well as the Seafarers. In both posts, he succeeded the late Paul Hall. Drozak was born in Alabama, went to work in a Mobile shipyard at 16, went to sea during World War II as a boatswain, and held increasingly important SIU posts during the post-war years.

HATFIELD, 50, has been president of the GBBA since 1977 and previously was the union's secretary-treasurer. He is a native of Pennsylvania, but joined the union when working at the Kimble Glass Co. in Columbus, Ohio. He moved through the ranks to become president of his local, a union organizer and regional director before becoming secretary-treasurer.

Hutchinson, 35, as director of women's affairs for the Government Employees, is one of the four national elected officers of the union. She is an attorney, most recently with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, and started as a shop steward for her AFGE local. She is a graduate of the University of Pittsburgh and the Dickinson School of Law. Her husband is an attorney in private practice, and they are parents of sons aged three and five.

Kilroy, 54, became president of the Railway & Airline Clerks on the death of Fred J. Kroll earlier this year. He became a railroad telegrapher on the Pennsylvania Railroad in Baltimore in 1951 and moved through that union's ranks to become the system general chairman. A merger made the union part of BRAC, and he was elected an international vice president in 1973.

SOMBROTTO, 58, has headed the Letter Carriers since 1979 and previously led the NALC's big New York local. He joined the postal service in 1947 and came to national attention in 1970 as a leader of the New York postal strike that turned out to be a key factor in achieving bargaining rights for postal workers under the Postal Reorganization Act.

The election of Hutchinson to the Executive Council, like the earlier election of Joyce D. Miller, a vice president of the Clothing Workers, was the outgrowth of a mandate from the previous AFL-CIO convention to explore ways to bring the viewpoint of women and minorities to the highest levels of trade union leadership.

Last year, the Executive Council concluded that this could best be done by waiving, for two council seats, the traditions that only a general officer of a union would be considered for the Executive Council and that there would be no more than one representative of any union among the federation's vice presidents.

Both the AFGE and the Clothing & Textile Workers now have two council members.

AT A SESSION immediately after the end of the convention, the new council adopted resolutions praising the record of service of the four members who left the council—Peter Bommarito of the Rubber Workers, Al H. Chesser of the United Transportation Union, William H. McClennan of the Fire Fighters, and Dan V. Maroney of the Amalgamated Transit Union.

The convention itself memorialized the late Fred J. Kroll of BRAC and other union leaders who died since the 1979 convention.

- Full funding from general revenues of the activities of the Committee on Political Education at a level of $3.5 million a year, along with the full assumption by the federation of the grants now being made by a number of affiliates to help finance the activities of such support groups as Frontlash, the A. Philip Randolph Institute and the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

- Operation of the cooperative organizing program recently launched in Houston, with the allocation of $250,000 a year for the next four years as an additional fund for this and subsequent campaigns.

COMMENTING on its projection of nearly $11 million a year in added costs as a result of these activities, the council observed that the federation has been striving to cut expenses and improve efficiency of current operations, but it noted that they are affected "by all of the long-run factors which are pushing up costs for all affiliates."

On the full funding of COPE activities from general revenues, the report said this would replace the past system of direct COPE quota payments by affiliates and help the AFL-CIO develop an even more effective program to insure the political education and encourage the political activism of union members. Affiliates that continue to conduct joint fund-raising drives for voluntary political contributions will receive "a suitable exoneration" of a portion of the per capita payment, with the amount to be decided by the council.

On the Meany Memorial Library and Archives, approved by the council last year as the AFL-CIO's chief tribute to its late president, funds would be set aside for construction costs in the amount of $1 million in 1983 and $2 million in 1984. In addition, administrative costs are anticipated at $125,000 in 1983 and $250,000 a year subsequently.

Amendments to Article XX Refine Disputes Procedures

New York—The AFL-CIO convention moved to improve the federation's internal disputes procedures under Article XX of the constitution through the use of a permanent mediator or mediators and creation of a nine-member Appeals Committee.

The convention adopted the report of its Constitution Committee that Section 8 of Article XX be amended to provide for the appointment by the president of the permanent mediator or mediators and that Section 13 be amended to cover the new Appeals Committee.

THE RECOMMENDATIONS grew out of a study by an Executive Council committee which found that the existing system of naming mediators on an ad hoc basis had not proved entirely satisfactory. The council said the availability of a permanent mediator would speed consideration of internal disputes cases.

The council also found that the present system of dealing with appeals from the rulings of impartial umpires, first through a council subcommittee and then through the full council, cuts too deeply into its meeting time.

The nine-member Appeals Committee approved by the convention will consist of the president, the secretary-treasurer and seven vice presidents drawn from various sectors of the labor movement. The vice presidents on the committee will be nominated by the president for two-year terms and approved by the council. No more than four vice presidents may be nominated for a second term, and no vice president may serve more than two consecutive terms.

While the rulings of the Appeals Committee will be final, the council as a whole will retain authority to issue policy statements "having prospective effect on the implementation of Article XX" for the guidance of umpires, council subcommittees and the Appeals Committee.

IN OTHER constitutional amendments, the convention approved revision of:

- Article IV, Section 8, dealing with the method for computing convention voting strength of affiliates. Henceforth the basis will be average monthly per capita payments for the 24-month period of the AFL-CIO's two fiscal years before the convention.

- Article XI, Sections 3 and 4, to strike references to the Railway Employes' Dept., which has disbanded.

- Article XI, Sections 6 and 7, to provide for annual reports to the AFL-CIO from each of its constitutional departments, rather than quarterly reports, and for the attendance by the chief executive officer of each department at the AFL-CIO Executive Council's regular meetings.

Public TV Series on Labor Endorsed by Delegates

New York—The AFL-CIO convention endorsed a proposed public television series —Made in U.S.A.—that would tell the story of America's workers and their unions.

More than 30 unions have provided seed money and others have pledged production support, the convention noted. Contributions also have been obtained from the National Endowment for the Humanities, Corporation for Public Broadcasting, foundations and other sources.

structure to the needs and demands of their times."

AND AS THE AFL-CIO crosses into its second century, Kirkland said, "solidarity remains the indispensable key to the future."

The convention responded by charting a course based on 87 policy resolutions and the approval of an eight-cent increase in per capita payments to finance expanded programs and new activities.

The delegates re-elected Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue by acclamation and chose a 33-member Executive Council that includes five new vice presidents.

The convention welcomed and supported the decision of the Executive Council to rejoin the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and it saluted Poland's Solidarity union as an inspiration to workers everywhere.

ON DOMESTIC matters, a recurring theme was the devastation being wrought by the Reagan Administration's policies on the nation's programs for social progress, the living standards and job protections of workers and the subsistence of the poor.

Of President Reagan himself, Kirkland observed: "He has shown a cold heart and a hard fist, but where, indeed, is the rest of him?"

Kirkland particularly denounced Reagan's harsh treatment of the striking Air Traffic Controllers in ordering their dismissal and seeking to break their small union, and a convention resolution called on the President to end his "demeaning vendetta" against PATCO.

From the political sphere, sharp and universal condemnation of the Administration's conservative economic and social policies came in addresses to the delegates by former Vice President Walter Mondale, Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., and New York Gov. Hugh Carey.

THE CONVENTION'S economic policy resolution spelled out alternatives to the Reagan Administration's "trickle-down" philosophy and called for its implementation on an emergency basis to halt the snowballing recession and lay a solid foundation for economic growth and full employment.

To spur trade union growth, the convention reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's commitment to organizing the unorganized, employing innovative as well as proven techniques and strategies, with particular emphasis on cooperative drives such as the project recently launched in Houston.

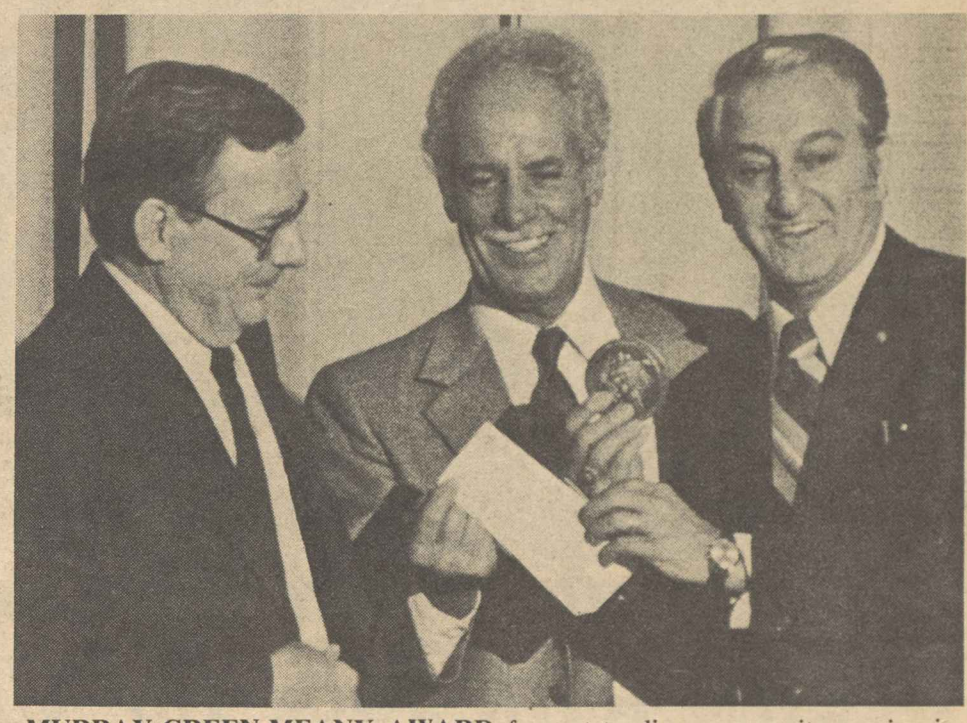
The central convention resolution on foreign affairs addressed problems in the major trouble spots of the world and called on the U.S. government to key its relations with other nations to their human rights policies.

THE DELEGATES also pledged continuing support for Histadrut, Israel's trade union federation, and urged support of a new fund set up by the Executive Council to assist black unions in South Africa.

Detailed stories on the resolutions adopted by the convention appear throughout this issue of the AFL-CIO News.

The per capita tax increase approved by the convention will raise the monthly payment of affiliates, now 19 cents per member, to 24 cents with the payment for next January and to 27 cents a year later. It is designed to meet nearly $11 million in added costs associated with the new Institute for Public Affairs, reaffiliation with the ICFTU, full funding of COPE operations from general revenue, construction of the Meany Memorial Library and Archives, and expanded organizing efforts.

THE NEW council members include four union presidents—Frank Drozak of the Seafarers, James E. Hatfield of the Glass Bottle Blowers, Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks, and Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers. The fifth is Barbara Hutchinson, women's affairs director of the Government Employees.



Women and minorities were strongly represented among speakers at the convention as the delegates heard pledges of continuing solidarity from Eleanor Smeal, president of the National Organization for Women; Henry L. Lacayo, national chairman of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, and Benjamin Hooks, executive director of the NAACP.

Among the nearly 100 foreign trade unionists visiting the convention, major addresses were given by the fraternal delegates from the Canadian Labor Congress, Dennis McDermott, and the British Trades Union Congress, Tom Jackson, along with ICFTU Gen. Sec. Otto Kersten.

Rev. Theodore Hesburgh, president of the University of Notre Dame and head of the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy, also addressed the delegates.

THE CONVENTION witnessed the presentation of the AFL-CIO's highest honor for public service — the Murray-Green-Meany award — to entertainer Danny Thomas in recognition of his work in founding and supporting St. Jude's Children's Hospital in Memphis, Tenn.

Another award, the first George Meany International Human Rights Award, was to have been accepted by Lech Walesa, leader of the Polish Solidarity union, but Walesa was forced to postpone his visit to the United States because of the situation in his country. A film on the formation of Poland's free labor movement prepared to accompany the presentation, was shown to the delegates.

MURRAY-GREEN-MEANY AWARD for outstanding community service is presented at the convention to Danny Thomas by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Vice President Peter Bommarito, chairman of the Executive Council's Community Services Committee. Thomas was honored for his founding and fund-raising support of St. Jude's Children's Research Hospital in Memphis, Tenn.

Award Cites Danny Thomas For Aid to Stricken Children

New York—Entertainer Danny Thomas was presented with the AFL-CIO's Murray-Green-Meany Award at the convention for his efforts to enlist public support for St. Jude's Children's Research Hospital, the non-profit medical center he helped found.

The award, named after the late federation leaders Philip Murray, William Green and George Meany, is presented annually to recognize individual contributions to the health and well-being of the nation and its workers. The prize includes a $5,000 grant.

AFL-CIO VICE PRESIDENT Peter Bommarito, chairman of the federation's Community Services Committee, said in presenting the award that Thomas had been chosen for it as "a man of immense spirituality, a man who loves mankind and has great faith in the goodness of people."

Thomas founded the hospital, Bommarito said, as a shrine to the patron saint of hopeless causes in thanks for his own success in show business. His efforts to raise funds to build the center began in 1946 and the hospital opened in Memphis, Tenn., in 1962.

In accepting the award, Thomas pointed out that the earliest support for the idea of the hospital came from the labor movement, including the Hotel & Restaurant Employees who gave some $250,000 toward the establishment of the center.

ANOTHER EARLY supporter was Bommarito's Rubber Workers, Thomas said, praising the labor movement for its generosity. His early attempts to obtain contributions from corporations and philanthropists were frequently turned down, he noted, because they "did not give to dreamers" or to "an ideal."

Bommarito pointed out that St. Jude's was the first institution established for the sole purpose of conducting basic clinical research in catastrophic childhood illnesses. It is non-sectarian, inter-racial and completely free to patients admitted by a physician for diagnosis.

When the hospital opened, Bommarito said, the survival rate from acute lymphoblastic leukemia was less than 4 percent, but treatment procedures developed at St. Jude's have helped raise the survival percentage to 50 percent.

THE HOSPITAL treats children with leukemia and solid tumor forms of cancer, as well as severe muscular diseases and blood disorders.

It conducts extensive research in biochemistry, cell biology, virology, immunology, pharmacology, hematology, pathology, bacteriology, nutrition and metabolism.

Urging the delegates to encourage contributions to the work of the hospital, Thomas stressed that its philosophy will remain that no one pays for its services. Every penny of contributions, he pledged, "will go to research and clinical care."

His plan, he told the convention, is to raise sufficient money for a trust fund to endow the hospital in perpetuity.

"Let's save the children," he urged, "not my kids, not your kids, they're everybody's kids. Everyone of them is a child of us all, and one child dying before his time is a loss to all of mankind."

tion, we have been compelled to grapple with the consequences of vast technological, social and economic changes."

He acknowledged and rejected criticism of the labor movement for not confining its role to "the most narrow interests of the dues-paying members." The AFL-CIO won't abdicate its "leadership in the struggle for human freedom and human progress," Kirkland reiterated.

KIRKLAND PUT special emphasis on the two-way flow of communication between labor's leadership and the union membership.

At the federation level, he noted the success of the regional conferences which brought the officers and department heads of the AFL-CIO into "face-to-face discussions" with state and local union leaders covering "any and all issues, no holds barred."

From these sessions, Kirkland said, "emerged the concept of Solidarity Day," which evolved into "the greatest protest demonstration in our history." The AFL-CIO leadership came to the conclusion that the spirit required to make the Solidarity Day concept a success was there, "waiting for an opportunity of expression."

THE MEETINGS were so valuable that the AFL-CIO intends to "repeat them next year and in the future," Kirkland said, adding: "I strongly commend such a practice to every constituent organization."

The concept of solidarity applies to the trade union federation, Kirkland said. He welcomed the presence of the Auto Workers at the convention, and the "force and vigor" its reaffiliation brings to the AFL-CIO's "fight for social and economic justice."

Kirkland voiced the hope that all of the nation's unions will be "brought within the fold, to work and move together in solidarity."

HE TOLD the convention that for the trade union movement, "there is no matter of more constant urgency than to organize the unorganized."

He cited important breakthroughs made by affiliates in recent years, spoke of the AFL-CIO's initiation of a multi-union cooperative organizing program in Houston and stressed that "we intend to see it through." Labor's organizing growth, he suggested, has been partly masked by the effects of recession, the decay in the nation's industrial base and the changing nature of the remaining workforce.

"In the face of these trends," he suggested, labor's ability to grow at all "is a remarkable achievement."

THE NEXT big battle in labor's campaign, Kirkland stressed, is the 1982 congressional elections. The Reagan Administration is not labor's first experience with adversity, he noted, and "it shall endure and survive all these afflictions, as we have so many others."

"And now to work," Kirkland concluded, as the hall erupted into applause.

Convention Policies Set by 836 Delegates

The 14th AFL-CIO convention drew 836 delegates representing 91 national and international unions, eight constitutional departments, 43 state bodies, 178 local central bodies, and seven directly affiliated local unions.

The Credentials Committee also reported that some 800 representatives of newspapers, magazines, radio and television, including a large contingent from the labor press, covered the convention as it acted on 209 resolutions.

In addition, 95 foreign trade unionists were visitors at the four-day convention.

Emergency Anti-Recession Plan Begins with Jobs for Unemployed

New York — America's trade union movement proposed an emergency program to halt a snowballing recession and lay a foundation for economic growth and full employment.

The AFL-CIO convention's key economic policy resolution spelled out labor's alternatives to Reagan Administration policies that have pushed workers out of jobs, made housing virtually unobtainable and sapped the nation's industrial strength.

AS A FIRST step, requiring a minimum of legislation, the convention called for full funding of job-creating programs that can put the unemployed to work quickly. It urged Congress to:

- Revive the emergency local public works program that has helped the United States out of past recessions.
- Provide funds for new low-income and middle-income housing.
- Restore the public service jobs program.
- Reinstate nationwide extended unemployment compensation benefits for the long-term jobless.

In matters requiring new legislation, the convention urged:

- Creation of a government agency with power to target loans, loan guarantees, interest rate subsidies and tax benefits to stimulate economic growth, "with special consideration for high unemployment areas."
- Temporary restrictions on job-costing imports.
- Use of credit control authority to offset tight money policy and high interest rates, while channeling funds into productive, job-stimulating uses.

TO PROVIDE revenue for these programs, and to make the tax structure more equitable, the resolution called for:

- Limiting the individual tax cuts for 1982 to a maximum of $700 per taxpayer, approximately the amount scheduled for persons with incomes of $40,000.
- Trimming back the 10-percent investment tax credit to the original 7-percent level.
- Revoking the windfall tax exemption newly awarded to wealthy oil royalty holders.

The economic policy statement adopted by the convention protested that the Reagan economic program "requires more sacrifice from those who have little, to give to those who already have much."

IT INSISTED that economic progress and social justice go together, and termed full employment "a moral, social, political and economic imperative."

It urged targeted anti-inflation policies, public employment and training programs, curtailment of concentration of economic power in the hands of a few corporations, and international trade policies formulated with concern for the impact on American industry and jobs.

A companion resolution on monetary policy challenged the high interest, tight money approach of the Federal Reserve Board as aggravating instead of curtailing inflation.

The Fed's policies are "devastating the housing and auto industries," the convention said.

The resolution urged Congress to expand the membership of the Federal Reserve Board "to include representation of all sectors of the economy, including labor and agriculture."

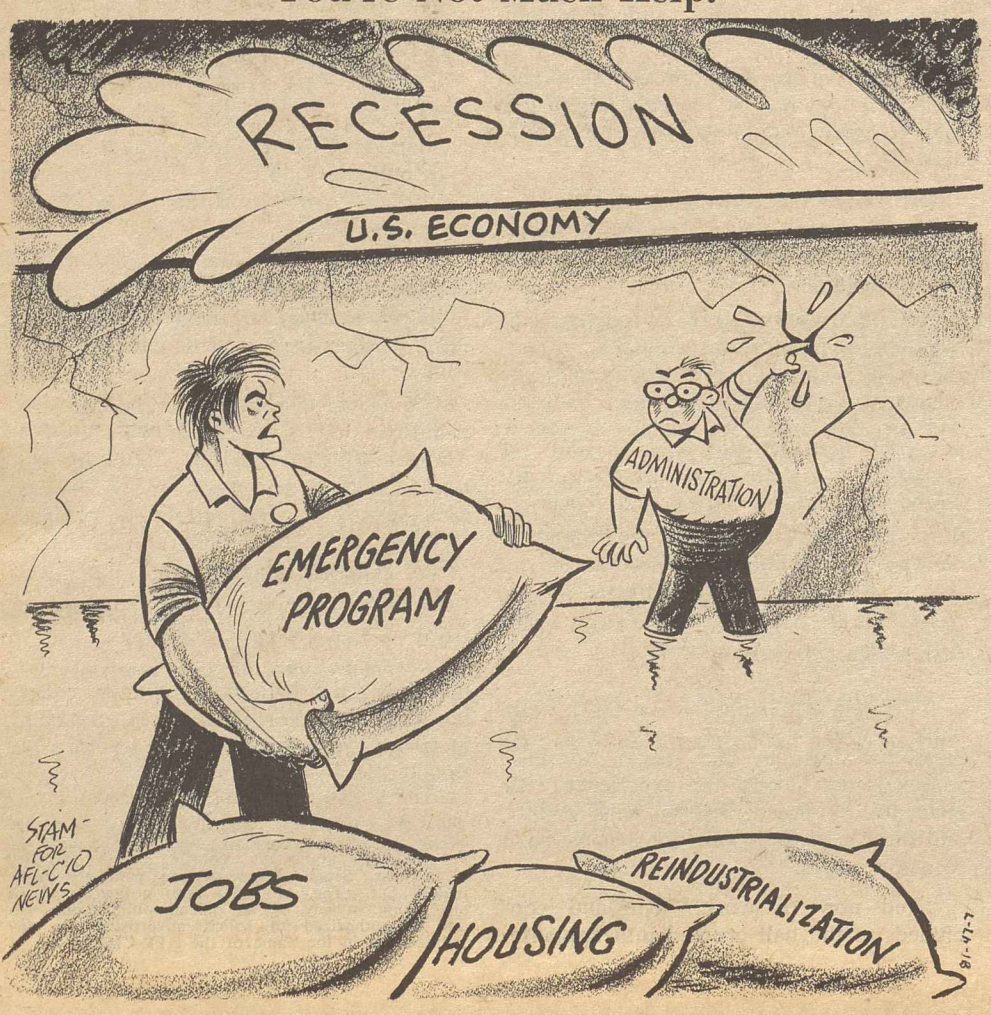
More than a dozen convention delegates took part in the discussion of the economic resolutions. These were among the comments:

Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride complained that the United States has become "an island of free trade" in a world in which other countries use an assortment of restrictions to protect their own industries and national interests. He urged a more "realistic" U.S. trade policy.

CARPENTERS President William Konyha told the convention that the last two recessions had been preceded by "depressions in housing," caused largely by excessive interest rates. Unlike similar periods of sharp downturns in homebuilding, Konyha said, there are no emergency programs to provide below-market mortgage funds.

Service Employees President John J. Sweeney stressed the "huge loss of revenue because of the Reagan tax giveaways to big business and the rich." The funds are needed for public works, public housing and public jobs, he said.

Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser spoke of the impact of "high interest rates and all of the economic problems that flow from that" on the auto industry and UAW members.



The United States is producing 4.5 million fewer cars and trucks than in 1978, he reported. Some 200,000 auto workers are now unemployed and this is "the 28th consecutive month that we've had more than 150,000 unemployed."

PLUMBERS & Pipefitters President Martin J. Ward spoke of the lag in public facilities needed to enable the economy to grow. Private industry requires efficient public facilities to function, and today workers who could be building them are unemployed, he said.

Iron Workers President John H. Lyons compared the Reagan economic program with the disastrous economic policies of the Thatcher government in Great Britain, which it closely resembles.

On the monetary policy resolution, Operating Engineers President J. C. Turner told the convention that the Federal Reserve Board "is throttling us and throttling our economy. It is the cause, not the cure of inflation."

'You're Not Much Help!'

National Holiday Urged On Dr. King's Birthday

New York—Martin Luther King's birthday should be a national holiday, and the AFL-CIO will support federal legislation to set aside Jan. 15 as a day to honor the memory of the slain civil rights leader.

A convention resolution calling for the establishment of the holiday praised Dr. King, a Nobel Peace Prize winner, as "the symbol of non-violent resistance" and of the civil rights movement in America.

Tax Law Tilt Points Nation To Disaster

New York—Tax changes imposed by the Reagan Administration threaten "irreparable damage" to the nation's economy, the AFL-CIO warned.

A convention resolution stressed labor's concern at the loss of revenue for needed public programs, as well as the basic injustice of a tax cut that was rigged against workers and "overloaded with tax avoidance opportunities for corporations and the wealthy."

It cited vast sums needed to create jobs, revitalize cities, provide services and deal with the effects of poverty that are being "siphoned off by the rich and the corporations."

The resolution urged early action by Congress to head off the disaster that the Reagan tax program threatens. It proposed as the key ingredients of such an alternative:

- Restructuring the individual income tax cuts scheduled for 1983 and 1984, and the future indexing of the tax brackets in a manner that reduces the revenue loss. Tax reductions should be limited to the moderate and middle-income households that were shortchanged by the bill Congress enacted.
- Repeal of the 10-percent investment tax credit and enactment of a business depreciation system that would use an accurate accounting of business costs.
- Enactment of a reindustrialization program which would authorize a tripartite board representing business, labor and government to use a combination of tax incentives, grants and loans to target available funds "to revitalize the nation's distressed areas and industrial base."

For the long run, the convention reaffirmed labor's support of a program keyed to closing loopholes and assuring that revenues are adequate to meet the nation's domestic and defense needs.

It called for changes that would:

- End the "double standard which taxes workers' wages and salaries at far higher rates than 'unearned income' on savings, investments and estates of the wealthy."
- Reinstate the corporate income tax as a major source of revenue and eliminate tax "incentives" that encourage corporate takeovers, plant closings and overseas investments.
- Key the tax structure to "fully reflect the principle of ability to pay."

Congress, States Pressed to Meet Needs of Cities

New York—Labor pressed Congress and the states not to allow Reagan Administration program cuts to push the nation's cities into a new, and perhaps irreversible, era of decline.

An AFL-CIO convention resolution urged:

- Funding of economic and community development programs by Congress "to maintain at least the levels of services that existed before 1981." It said the programs should "not be allowed to disappear or lose their national interest purpose through further block grant consolidations."
- Enactment of legislation to deal with dislocations and hardships of plant closing.
- Restoration of funds for mass transit construction and operation.
- Increased state commitment to urban areas, coupled with reforms to make state and local taxation more equitable.

"The cities of America need help and there's no place to turn," Wisconsin State AFL-CIO President John W. Schmitt said in discussion of the resolution. He noted that cuts in federal grants to states leave cities doubly worse off. Their own direct federal grants have been cut, and the states have less federal funds to pass on to cities.

'Vendetta' Condemned

Reagan Urged to Return Air Controllers to Jobs

New York—The AFL-CIO called on President Reagan to end his "demeaning vendetta" against the Air Traffic Controllers and return them to their jobs.

"Mass firings, fines and union decertification will not assure safe and reliable air travel for the American people," a convention resolution declared. "Nor will they save the taxpayers the high cost of training thousands of new controllers."

IN NOTING that the Administration shows no sign of relenting from its brutal treatment of PATCO members, the convention urged federation affiliates to continue assisting the embattled trade unionists. It said they still need help in manning picket lines, meeting family responsibilities and finding jobs.

The convention pledged that continuing aid will be provided by the federation's PATCO Family Assistance Fund, which already has rendered more than $625,000 to PATCO members beset by financial hardships.

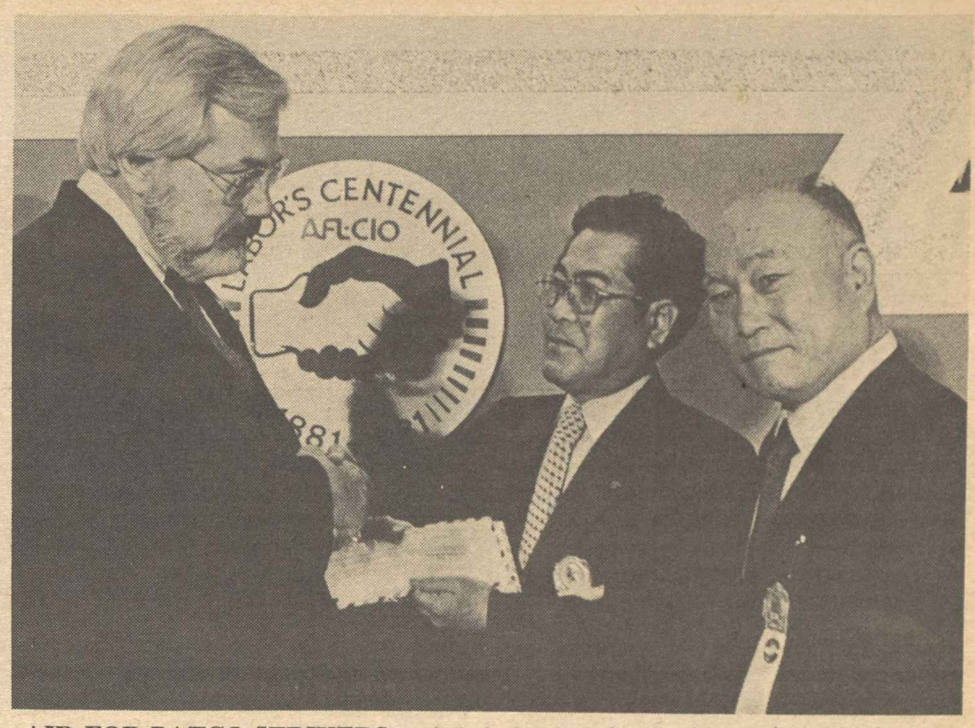
On the opening day of the convention, President Motofumi Makieda of the General Council of Trade Unions of Japan (SOHYO) presented PATCO a $20,000 contribution. Half of the money was raised by SOHYO affiliates through voluntary contributions in shops and at plant gates; the remainder came from the Japanese air traffic controllers union, an affiliate of SOHYO.

PATCO WENT on strike Aug. 3 after the membership overwhelmingly rejected the final management offer for a new contract with the Federal Aviation Administration. Reagan later ordered the FAA to discharge the 12,000 strikers, and the federal government subsequently decertified the union.

PATCO President Robert Poli told delegates in comments from the convention floor that his membership is determined to continue its struggle despite government harassment and intimidation.

He noted that 70 PATCO members have been charged with committing a felony for striking and face sentencing to a year in federal prison if convicted. Some have had their autos impounded for picket line activity, and others face home mortgage foreclosure because of punitive action by the Dept. of Housing & Urban development.

POLI ALSO charged that PATCO strikers have been blacklisted—rejected by employers when seeking another job, or in the case of some, when attempting to return to the military service.



Noting that numerous other unions encountered similar struggles in the 1920s and '30s, Poli said: "Brothers and sisters, the 1920s and the 1930s are here now for PATCO."

John F. Henning, executive secretary-treasurer of the California AFL-CIO, calling for a strong reaffirmation of support for the controllers, said that "we can never surrender the PATCO strikers to our enemies in the White House."

HENNING POINTED out that during Reagan's campaign for the presidency, he pledged to resolve the intolerable conditions air traffic controllers encounter on their jobs. But after President Reagan was elected, "he betrayed the union," Henning charged.

Federation President Lane Kirkland read from Reagan's letter to PATCO in which he pledged: "I will take whatever steps are necessary to provide our air traffic controllers with the most modern equipment available and to adjust staff levels and workdays so that they are commensurate with achieving a maximum level of public safety."

Kirkland's response: "Well, you all know how he adjusted those staff levels."

AID FOR PATCO STRIKERS and their families in checks for $20,000 is presented to Air Traffic Controllers President Robert Poli by Motofumi Makieda, center, president of Japan's General Council of Trade Unions (SOHYO) and Takehiro Ebitani, SOHYO international affairs director. One check for $10,000 came from the Japanese air traffic controllers' union, the other from funds collected in shops and at plant gates by members of SOHYO-affiliated unions. Other contributions will be made to the PATCO fund, Makieda said.

Fight Pledged to Preserve Social Security Benefits

New York—The AFL-CIO will fight all attempts to slash social security protections, whether by the Reagan Administration or any other source.

That was the thrust of a convention resolution insisting that Congress keep its commitment to America's workers and retirees.

THE REAGAN proposals "would have a devastating impact on the program and those protected by it," the resolution said, and it cautioned that the threat isn't ended by the President's decision not to push for his entire package at this time.

Whatever the sponsorship, the AFL-CIO will oppose changes that would:

- Deny social security beneficiaries their full cost-of-living increases.
- Raise the retirement age or tamper with the early retirement provisions of the law.
- Lower the present formula for determining the benefits workers receive when they retire.
- Further reduce disability benefits.
- Reduce total family benefits.
- Increase Medicare premiums and deductibles.

SUCH CUTS aren't needed to deal with the funding problems of the social security system, the convention stressed. It said short-term problems can be met by interfund exchanges and a back-up system of general revenues.

The resolution affirmed opposition to taxation of social security benefits and urged restoration of the minimum benefit for both present and future retirees.

The AFL-CIO reiterated its call for the rejection of some general tax revenue financing to avoid scheduled increases in the payroll tax and to strengthen the system. It urged that social security trust funds be removed from the federal budget so that policy will not be set on the basis of transient budget considerations.

IT ALSO reaffirmed opposition to universal social security coverage for all public employees unless there are strong assurances that the workers involved will not be harmed by the move. But it said employees of hospitals and other non-profit institutions should have existing social security coverage protected by being made mandatory.

Finally, while the present battle is to resist cuts in the program, "the AFL-CIO will not lose sight of the continuing need to improve the law," the convention declared.

In discussing the resolution, Ladies' Garment Workers President Sol C. Chaikin stressed that it is not just the elderly who are threatened by the Reagan Administration's proposals to cut benefits.

Early retirement is an option especially needed by older workers who are left jobless, Chaikin noted. But the Administration plan would slash benefits for those entering the social security rolls at age 62.

Retention of SEC Rules On Corporate Data Urged

New York—Information that companies are required to furnish to the Securities & Exchange Commission as a matter of public record is needed to protect investors against fraud and abuses of corporate power, an AFL-CIO convention resolution noted.

It expressed opposition to "any changes in the regulations which would result in fewer companies reporting basic information to the SEC."

Limit on Health Plan Benefits Called Backward Approach

New York—The AFL-CIO convention took a strong stand against proposals to hold down health care costs by giving low-benefit plans a competitive tax advantage over high-benefit insurance coverage.

Instead, the federation urged "a more rational way to control health care costs," involving area negotiations over hospital charges and physician fees.

THE REAGAN Administration has backed the concept of putting a ceiling on tax-exempt employer payments for health insurance covering workers and their families. Payments above the specified limits would be taxable as income to workers. The argument is that this would make people more "cost conscious" and promote "competition" in the medical care marketplace, the resolution noted.

Any "savings" to employers would be at the expense of workers who would have to pay more out of their own pockets, the resolution stressed. The alternative would be to let health needs go unattended, risking more serious illness later on.

It urged, instead, that AFL-CIO affiliates "promote local area coalitions of purchasers of health care, including employers, unions and health and welfare trusts. Such coalitions could use their purchasing power to negotiate physician fees and hospital charges," the resolution suggested, "while at the same time protecting the wages and working conditions of hospital employees."

SERVICE EMPLOYEES Vice President Walter J. Butler, speaking in favor of the resolution, said the "competitive" plan would "go backward, instead of forward."

The answer to the problem of excessive health care costs isn't to "put more burdens on the workers," he stressed. "The real answer is national health insurance."

A separate resolution expressed concern at the trend toward abandonment of public hospitals, "the only place where everyone is guaranteed care regardless of their ability to pay."

It reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's "support for the survival of public general hospitals" and for "health care financing reforms" that would enable them to stay open.

Congress Urged to Reverse 'Punitive' Welfare Cutbacks

New York—The "punitive welfare legislation" enacted by Congress at the prodding of the Reagan Administration is forcing America's poor "even deeper into poverty" and will make it harder for them to get out, the AFL-CIO charged.

A convention resolution protested the abandonment of welfare reform goals and the further shifting of the burden of public assistance to the states.

IT URGED Congress to resist Administration pressure for still further cutbacks and called for reconsideration of harsh measures already enacted.

Needy families with children have already been forced to reduce their living standards, and any further cuts would be "unconscionable," the convention said.

The resolution called for repeal of changes that "discourage work by slashing payments to those whose jobs pay so little they must resort to welfare as a supplement to inadequate wages."

It questioned the move to require parents receiving public assistance to pay for their allowances in no-wage jobs.

And it criticized denial of public assistance to a needy family headed by a striker.

"Need should be the sole criterion for welfare eligibility," the convention said. "Workers and their families are taxed to pay the cost of welfare. When in need, they should have the same rights as all other citizens to obtain welfare assistance."

ANOTHER RESOLUTION urged restoration of social services funds to the states provided under Title XX of the Social Security Act.

The convention called on Congress "to re-examine these actions which will throw tens of thousands of poor children out of day care, deprive the homeless of needed foster care, cut off services to the elderly and generally make the lives of the poor more miserable."

Convention Backs Quest For Peace in Ireland

New York—The United States should lend its support to the goal of peace and justice in Ireland, the convention urged in a resolution reaffirming AFL-CIO support for the "aspirations of the Irish people for a united nation."

The resolution urged the convening of a special assembly "to draft a charter of human rights in all civil and religious matters which could become part of a basic solution that will recognize the democratic principle that Ireland belongs to the Irish."

Labor Vows Fight to Keep Pay Standard

New York—Prevailing wage laws are a still-needed safeguard for community labor standards, the AFL-CIO insisted.

The convention strongly reiterated labor's opposition to weakening either the Davis-Bacon Act, which has governed federally-funded construction for a half-century, or the comparable Service Contract Act.

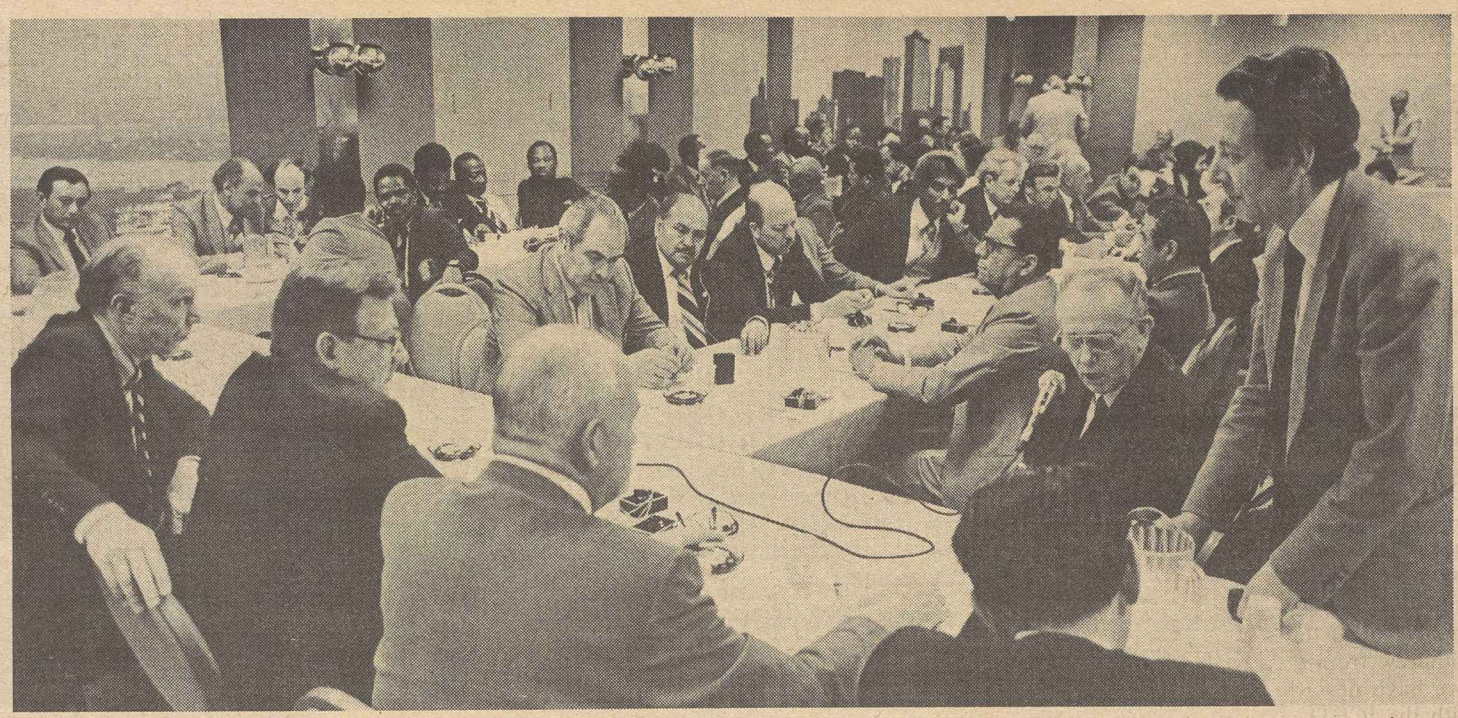
"BUSINESSES should not be permitted to successfully compete for government contracts by exploiting workers," the resolution declared.

The convention made clear that it was opposed both to legislative and regulatory weakening of the two prevailing wage laws. The Labor Dept. has proposed regulatory changes in both laws that the AFL-CIO and the unions whose members are directly affected have strongly opposed.

The convention resolution urged Congress "to closely monitor" proposed changes "to insure that these revisions are not a back-door approach to changing the true intent of laws enacted by Congress."

ON THE SERVICE Contract Act, the AFL-CIO said a Labor Dept. proposal to change coverage of the law from contracts "substantially for services" to "principally for services" would cut in half the number of workers protected.

Changes the Administration is considering in Davis-Bacon Act regulations would affect the method of computing the prevailing wage and handicap enforcement.



A Service Employees delegate, Eugene P. Moats, told the convention that the changes the Labor Dept. proposed in Service Contract Act regulations "would be singling out the lowest paid workers in our society."

BUILDING TRADES delegates spoke of the deterioration of construction standards that would result from weakening Davis-Bacon protections. And President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. took the floor to thank the many unions that lobbied to keep Davis-Bacon coverage in a multi-billion dollar military construction bill. The Senate voted 55-42 for labor's position.

'Fraternal Solidarity' Pledged with Histadrut

New York—The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its "fraternal solidarity" with Histadrut, the trade union federation of Israel.

A convention resolution also expressed continued support for the American Trade Union Council for Histadrut.

INTERNATIONAL EXCHANGE of viewpoints on issues confronting workers is chaired by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland with Sec.-Treas. Thomas D. Donahue. Taking part were representatives of free labor movements from other nations attending the convention as guests. At the microphone is Heinz Oskar Vetter, president of the German Trade Union Federation (DGB), and standing is Erwin Kristoffersen, DGB international affairs director.

Human Rights Concerns Held Basic to U.S. Foreign Policy

New York—Human rights, based on the freedom of association essential to a free trade union movement, should be "the cornerstone of U.S. foreign policy," the AFL-CIO urged.

The human rights theme ran through a broad-ranging convention policy statement on Labor and the World.

IT LINKED the AFL-CIO's support for the free trade union movement in Poland, its backing for the developing black union movement in Africa and the El Salvador peasants' organization struggling to make land reform a reality.

The convention resolution attacked the denial of human rights by the leftist totalitarian regime in Nicaragua, where democratic unions have been branded as "counter-revolutionary."

And it attacked the rightist military dictatorship in Chile that has abolished trade union rights in its efforts "to crush legitimate worker organizations."

THE RESOLUTION made clear, as AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland expressed it in his keynote speech to the convention, that the AFL-CIO does not make a distinction "between lice who are totalitarian and lice who are authoritarian" and insists on "freedom of association everywhere."

On the rocky path toward peace in the Middle East, the AFL-CIO reaffirmed its "unswerving commitment" to Israel's security and termed negotiations between Egypt and Israel, with U.S. support, "the best chance for peace."

It opposed participation of the Palestine Liberation Organization in Middle East negotiations until the PLO "recognizes Israel's existence, forswears terrorism and commits itself to negotiate in good faith."

If the United States is to assist in Saudi Arabia's security, the convention said, "let that country stop its holy war against Israel and its financing of terrorist activities of the PLO."

THE CONVENTION welcomed and endorsed the decision of the AFL-CIO Executive Council to reaffiliate with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions, and welcomed signs of improvements in the conduct of the international Labor Organization's meetings. It urged AFL-CIO unions to cooperate in assuring effective representation of U.S. workers at ILO meetings.

The resolution expressed concern at attempts to have the United Nations Educational, Scientific & Cultural Organization (UNESCO) "embrace an authoritarian doctrine of news control." It backed an AFL-CIO Executive Council position that the United States should withdraw from UNESCO if that body embraces restrictions on press freedom.

The convention urged affiliates to contribute to relief organizations assisting refugees and called on the government to continue to work closely with other nations to assure that the world's refugees will find a home. The United States, as "the traditional refuge for the persecuted," must continue to make "the major effort," the convention said.

IT NOTED and welcomed the new papal encyclical on work in which Pope John Paul II terms unions "indispensable" to modern society as "advocates for social justice" and the rights of workers.

It reiterated the AFL-CIO's "steadfast support" for a strong national defense as necessary "for the survival of democratic institutions, including free trade unions."

But the resolution stressed also that "a strong national defense requires a strong economy," and it is the government's constitutional responsibility to "promote the general welfare" as well as "provide for the common defense."

A VAST INCREASE in military spending will not strengthen the nation unless it is linked to a carefully conceived defense strategy, the resolution contended. It cautioned that "defense problems cannot be solved by blindly throwing money at them."

'Slaughter of Innocents' Condemned in El Salvador

New York — The "frightful slaughter of innocents" must be ended in El Salvader, the AFL-CIO declared in a convention resolution strongly supporting effective land reform and terror-free elections.

"A victory of the totalitarian left or of the privileged few of the right would be a disaster," the resolution warned.

It condemned both "the flow of Soviet weapons to the guerrillas in El Salvador" and "use of U.S. weapons by right-wing forces as instruments of domestic repression."

Military aid to El Salvador's government should be ended, the AFL-CIO said, "unless there is substantial progress toward land reform, free elections, human rights guarantees and control of the death squads."

Two AFL-CIO advisers assisting the peasants' union to achieve land reform that was opposed by both right-wing landholders and the Communist-dominated guerrilla movement were gunned down in a San Salvador hotel last January, the resolution noted.

It urged the U.S. government to "demand that the Salvador armed forces put a stop to the activities of the right wing and its death squads." And it asked that land reform be expanded, not curtailed.

"If the opposition parties of the left agree to parliamentary elections, they should be offered a role in the arrangements for these elections, conditional also on a cease-fire to match the armed forces ending of the death squads' activity," the resolution concluded.

Support Pledged for Great American Flag

New York—The AFL-CIO convention urged union members to join in a fund-raising effort for the display of the Great American Flag, which is scheduled to fly from New York's Verrazano bridge next Fourth of July.

The huge, 21-story-high national banner weighing seven tons has become known as a union-made gift to the American people. Since its dedication on Flag Day in 1980, the flag has been displayed at various patriotic functions. Union volunteers led by the Iron Workers, spread the flag at Andrews Air Force Base near Washington to greet the American hostages returning from Iran.

Iron Workers President John H. Lyons showed the convention a film, "Salute to the Great American Flag," and urged delegates not to let the radical right identify their views with patriotism. "The flag is part and parcel of the free trade union movement in the United States," he stressed.

Fund Launched For Black Unions In South Africa

New York—The AFL-CIO launched a special fund to assist black unions in South Africa, and the convention urged affiliates to contribute to the project.

One aspect of the program is already under way, through a special unit set up within the AFL-CIO's African American Labor Center. The unit has compiled a list of AFL-CIO affiliates having collective bargaining agreements with companies that have subsidiaries in South Africa.

THE INFORMATION compiled has already been used "to provide black unions with information needed in their negotiations with these subsidiaries," the convention noted.

At its mid-winter meeting, the AFL-CIO Executive Council endorsed the concept of assistance to black unions in South Africa, and the pre-convention council meeting launched the fund with a $25,000 AFL-CIO contribution.

The convention statement noted that elements of the program have been discussed with interested groups within and outside South Africa, and development of the project will be undertaken in close coordination with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Curb Sought on Excesses of Waterfront Commission

New York—It's time for the legislatures of New York and New Jersey to take a fresh look at the functions of Waterfront Commission of New York Harbor, an AFL-CIO convention resolution suggested.

The resolution noted that the Waterfront Commission was set up 28 years ago as a temporary agency to correct abuses with respect to the hiring of longshoremen—a process now handled through a computerized union-employer referral system "in strict accordance with seniority."

Convention Welcomes Action

Reaffiliation with ICFTU Ends 12-Year Absence

By John R. Oravec

New York—The AFL-CIO will rejoin the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions next Jan. 1 after an absence of 12 years.

The federation's reaffiliation with the ICFTU will be "useful and productive," the convention said as it welcomed and supported the action of the Executive Council.

In its report to the convention, the council noted that although the AFL-CIO withdrew from the confederation in 1969, "we have nevertheless continued to work with the ICFTU in certain areas," including the International Labor Organization.

THE COUNCIL decision for reaffiliation came a few days before the convention opened, the culmination of meetings conducted by a council committee headed by AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and an ICFTU delegation.

In an address to the convention, ICFTU Gen. Sec. Otto Kersten said the ideals which brought about the confederation in 1949 "still hold us together: freedom, peace and social justice."

Kersten stressed "that to achieve and protect these ideals, we must stand together not only within one union, one trade, one country, but also within one world. That keeps the ICFTU together—despite all divergencies, be they of a political, an economic or a social nature."

KERSTEN POINTED out that workers and their unions throughout the world are facing common problems.

"The prevailing economic crisis with unemployment, inflation, stagnating or backward development, unscrupulous multinationals, is being used by some governments to try to scrape away at the strength of organized labor and to undermine its achievements," he declared. "They try, at the sole costs of the working people, to put their economies in order."

OTTO KERSTEN

Governments must realize that they need strong trade union movements that can participate responsibly in reshaping their economies, Kersten told the delegates.

ECONOMIC AND social progress in developing countries must be pursued in those parts of the world where the day-to-day existence of 800 million people is precarious, he stressed.

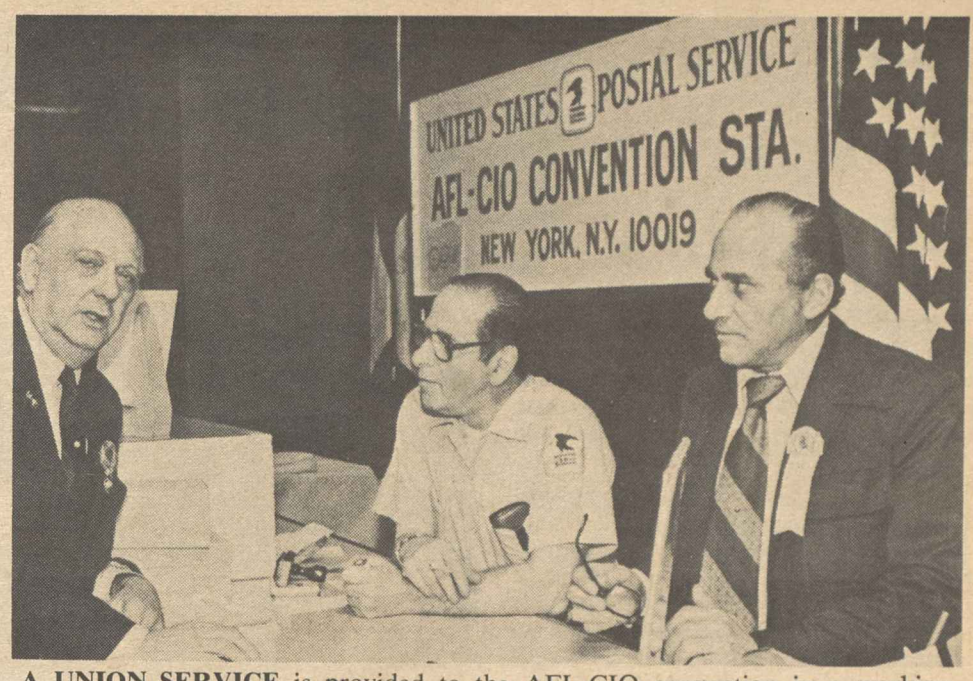
Kersten said the ICFTU has continually led the fight against a wide range of abuses: colonialism, racial discrimination, fascist regimes, military dictatorships, as well as "the repeated violations of human and trade union rights under Communist regimes."

Violations of human and trade rights, are both widespread in both the Eastern and Western Hemispheres, he noted.

"WE ARE confronted," Kersten said, "with an increasing number of attacks on the most fundamental rights: the denial of freedom of association, sometimes marked by assassinations, persecution of trade unionists or abusive internment in psychiatric hospitals—as practiced in the Soviet Union—intervention in trade union affairs, restriction of worker rights to form or join trade unions, to bargain, to strike."

He also cited the plight of American air traffic controllers fired by President Reagan for taking strike action. The ICFTU, in cooperation with the AFL-CIO, submitted a complaint to the ILO against the U.S. government for its denial of trade union rights to PATCO.

Kersten observed that trade unionists around the world can take heart with the achievements of the Solidarity movement in Poland.



"FOR THE first time workers have successfully formed a free trade union organization under a Communist regime," he noted.

Citing the close ties that Solidarity has established with the AFL-CIO and the ICFTU, Kersten said "our Polish friends can count on the solidarity of the international free trade union movement."

The ICFTU comprises labor federations from more than 60 nations with a global membership in excess of 58 million.

NOW HEADQUARTERED in Brussels, the confederation was founded in 1949 in opposition to the Communist-dominated World Federation of Trade Unions. Before the 1955 merger, both the AFL and the CIO were charter members of the ICFTU.

When the AFL-CIO pulled out of the ICFTU in 1969, it expressed dissatisfaction with the confederation's declining role in providing aid to developing countries and its expanding contacts with government-controlled affiliates of Communist bloc countries.

A UNION SERVICE is provided to the AFL-CIO convention in a working post office set up by the U.S. Postal Service and staffed by Postal Workers members. APWU President Moe Biller, left, discusses the special convention cancellation used on all out-going mail. The cancellation was designed by AFL-CIO Reproduction & Mailings Director Edwin Schmidt. Copies of the souvenir cachet with the pictorial cancellation are available from Schmidt.

Federal Workers Backed On Comparable Pay Issue

New York—Federal workers are entitled to full pay comparability with the private sector, the AFL-CIO convention declared.

Since 1977, the resolution noted, federal government employees have been held to artificially low salary and wage increases—despite laws that were intended to assure pay comparability.

THE COMPARABILITY issue is especially important because federal workers can't negotiate pay and most fringe benefits, the resolution noted. It pledged the AFL-CIO's support to federal employee unions fighting the Reagan Administration's attempt to hold down their pay and benefits.

Another convention resolution reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's position on the contracting out of public services to private concerns.

It reiterated "the principle that public work which has traditionally been performed by public employees should continue to be performed by public employees, and that public work which has traditionally been performed by private employees should continue to be performed by private employees."

COMMENTING ON the resolution, Government Employees Vice President Daniel J. Kearney cited the case of a Veterans Administration hospital he said wants to use a private contractor who would hire employees presently doing the work for "about $2 an hour less" than they are now earning.

In another area, the convention renewed its support for legislation that would reduce the workweek of fire fighters employed by the federal government from 72 to 56 hours.

Such a bill was passed in the 95th Congress but vetoed by President Carter. The resolution noted that fire fighters not employed by the federal government work an average of 54 hours a week. It said federal fire fighters earn less than their municipal counterparts despite working longer hours.

THE CONVENTION also adopted a resolution urging amnesty for more than 100 postal workers who were fired in 1978 for participation in a work stoppage. It protested that the penalty imposed "exceeds the alleged infraction" and said reinstatement of the workers would show "that human rights and workers' rights are as important in this country as anywhere else in the world."

6-Point Program Proposed to End Housing Shortage

New York — A six-point program to overcome the nation's shortage of affordable housing was adopted by the AFL-CIO convention. It calls for:

- An increase in federally assisted housing.
- Greater use of "tandem plans" that provide below-market mortgage rates for low- and middle-income buyers and rental projects.
- Credit controls that would assure an adequate supply of mortgage funds at reasonable interest rates.
- Encouragement of union pension fund investments "in long-term, fixed-payment mortgages guaranteed by the government."
- Restrictions on conversion of rental housing to condominiums "in tight housing markets."
- Curbs on exports of logs that create shortages and push up domestic costs.

Charles H. Pillard, chairman of the AFL-CIO Housing Committee and president of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, told the delegates that housing construction has slumped to "depression levels," interest rates make it impossible for most Americans to buy a home, and "rental vacancies are at a record low."

A byproduct, he said, is that while the national unemployment rate is 8 percent, 18 percent of the nation's construction workers are without jobs.

Workers involved in producing and transporting building materials have also been victims of the housing slump, Pillard noted.

Union-Busting Bid Seen in Anti-Picket Bill

New York—Delegates to the AFL-CIO convention made clear labor's determination to prevent a federal anti-racketeering law from being distorted by Congress into a bludgeon against workers striking for lawful goals.

They passed, with a loud shout of approval, a resolution attacking the attempt to amend the Hobbs Act so that a picket line scuffle—or even "threatening" words spoken in anger to a strikebreaker—could subject a union member to federal criminal penalties as high as 20 years in prison and a $250,000 fine.

THE AMENDMENTS are being pushed by the National Right to Work Committee, which has put together a fund-raising film about union "violence."

Delegates repeatedly applauded a speech from the convention floor by AFL-CIO Vice President J. C. Turner, which urged every union and union member to "get active because we've got to win this fight."

Earlier, delegates had interrupted Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) with a standing ovation midway in his address to the convention. They rose to their feet applauding when Kennedy declared: "The criminal code should be used to fight crime; it should never be misused as a tool for union-busting."

THE CONVENTION resolution noted that the Hobbs Act's criminal sanctions are aimed at clearly defined racketeering and that the Supreme Court in 1973 ruled that it was not aimed at misconduct that takes place in the course of a lawful labor dispute.

Offenses committed in the course of a strike are subject to prosecution under state and local laws, and Congress didn't intend to put the federal government in the business of policing strikes, the court held.

Turner, who is president of the Operating Engineers, said the National Right to Work Committee is trying to capitalize on "the present anti-worker climate in Washington" to push through the Hobbs Act changes being sponsored by Sen Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.).

Its tactics include a made-for-television film about strike "violence" and a direct mail campaign aimed at Congress.

"THE ISSUE of picket-line conduct and the policing of any altercations or property damage has always been within the jurisdiction of state and local law enforcement authorities," Turner stressed, and the local laws are "diligently" enforced, "particularly on behalf of the employer."

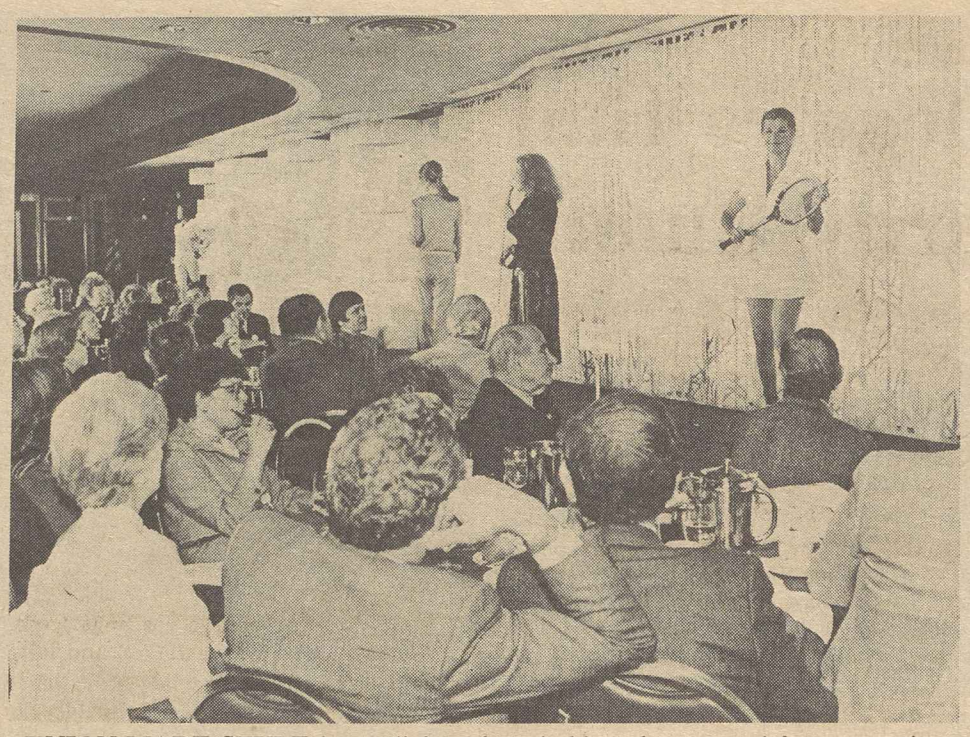
Under the proposed Hobbs Act amendment, he noted, employers charged with violence against strikers would remain subject to local or state law, while workers under comparable circumstances would face federal felony charges.

Turner urged affiliates to use the materials prepared by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation to alert their members to "the dangers of this vicious legislation" and make each member of Congress "aware of our opposition."

Aging Parley Undermined By Politics

New York—The AFL-CIO convention accused the Reagan Administration of political scheming in attempting to manipulate, confuse and intimidate delegates to the coming White House Conference on Aging.

Expressing concern that the machinations may have undermined any chance for an effective conference, the convention called on the President and Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker to take steps to restore confidence and integrity in the sessions by insuring that the democratic process will prevail.



THE CONFERENCE is scheduled to be held in Washington Nov. 30-Dec. 3 with 2,200 delegates expected to attend.

The convention resolution noted that one of the first actions that Schweiker took after taking the HHS post was to pack the conference's advisory committee with Reagan supporters, who now outnumber representatives of senior citizens groups by better than a 2-to-1 margin.

Other actions designed to undermine the conference have included:

- Release of the delegate list by Schweiker to the Republican National Committee, which conducted a "survey" in an apparent effort to swing support to Administration positions on key issues.
- Replacement of the seasoned conference director just weeks before the start of the sessions with a political appointee inexperienced in the field of aging.
- Extraordinary delay in the release of papers to delegates, including reports and recommendations developed months ago.
- Limiting discussion by not separating large committees—consisting of several hundred delegates and observers—into subcommittees.

"THE AFL-CIO deplores these political machinations obviously designed to control conference decisions," the resolution declared. "This effort to manipulate the conference to advance the political goals of the Reagan Administration has so shaken the confidence of the public and delegates that an effective conference may now be all but impossible."

UNION-MADE STYLE is spotlighted in a fashion show staged for convention delegates and guests by the Ladies' Garment Workers. The show featured clothing manufactured by ILG members, all bearing the well-known ILG union label.

Mondale Ties Recession To Failed Reagan Policies

New York—The Reagan Administration is dividing America with its "radical economic program," former Vice President Walter F. Mondale told the AFL-CIO convention.

Rather than working with and cooperating with organized labor as past Republican Administrations have done the Reagan White House has declared war on labor's rights, Mondale charged. He cited as an example the Administration's attacks on the Davis-Bacon and Service Contract Acts that provide prevailing wage protections for workers.

Mondale said organized labor has had a positive role in the growth of America over the past 100 years, with the skills of workers and the efforts of their democratic unions contributing greatly to the nation's wealth.

Mondale charged that mounting unemployment and the deepening recession are the direct result of President Reagan's monetary and fiscal policies that pushed long-term interest rates to a record high in October. He cited particularly the impact of the rates on the plunging housing and auto markets.

MONDALE POINTED out that the 8.5 million unemployed in the United States last month was the highest number of jobless workers since the depression year of 1939. He noted that some economists are expecting the jobless rate to climb to 10 percent, and that even the President's own chief economic adviser has admitted the rate could hit 9 percent.

"We reject the notion that the answer to our problems is to throw millions of people out of work" as an approach to cutting waste, Mondale said.

"THE GREATEST waste occurring in America today is to be found in the lost product of 8.5 million decent Americans who want to work and who cannot find it," he said.

Mondale observed that the Administration has not yet learned that a President needs the help of all sectors. "Instead of aiming for a consensus, they are dividing the American people," he charged. "I have never seen worse relations between labor and its leaders and a President." A President doesn't have to agree with everything the union says, but whoever wants to lead this nation "must respect and involve and listen to the workers of America as expressed through their leadership."

HE SAID the strength of American democracy is reinforced by the values of trade unions. And he cited the founding of the Solidarity movement in Poland as evidence of the need and desire for free unions among the workers of all nations.

Mondale suggested, however, "that it is hypocrisy for national leaders to praise the free union movement in Poland and then turn around and ignore it and try to undermine it in the United States."

He charged that the Administration is working actively to undermine the basic worker protections and essential social programs that the American trade union movement has struggled to establish.

"While creating a safety net for the rich, they're opening a trapdoor for America's poor," he said, citing the Administration's strategies for cutting taxes for the wealthy while slashing the budgets of programs for the less fortunate.

AND AS THE federal deficit threatens to top $100 billion a year, "none of us takes any joy in this economic disaster" because people are hurting, Mondale observed. He noted that even the architect of the Reagan program, David Stockman, director of the Office of Management & Budget, has now admitted his lack of faith in that program.

"The only way to get America going is to let the average person have a job, good pay, a safe job, and a decent home and then America will move," Mondale declared.

Convention Pledges Defense Of Job Safety Enforcement

New York—The AFL-CIO will contest any attempt the Reagan Administration makes to repeal the Occupational Safety & Health Act by administrative action, the convention pledged.

"The labor movement brought OSHA into being, fought for effective implementation and protected it from attacks from without and within," the job safety resolution said. It pledged to "continue to challenge administrative actions in the courts and to stimulate assistance from members of Congress."

IT CALLED on members of all federation affiliates to watch closely for "any valid evidence of failure by OSHA compliance personnel to perform an adequate enforcement job."

The resolution charged that the Labor Dept. is attempting to repeal OSHA administratively "by crippling the compliance program, subverting the rights of workers under the Act, substituting labor-management voluntarism and consultation for vigorous enforcement," as well as failing to provide needed funds for worker training programs.

It also called on unions to expand efforts to negotiate health and safety provisions in contracts, step up safety and health training for members and help locals on cases handled by the Occupational Safety & Health Review Commission.

THE RESOLUTION stressed the need for comprehensive federal and state labeling regulations to alert workers who handle dangerous substances and to keep intact the full force of OSHA's standard of worker access to employer medical and exposure records.

In calling for adoption of the resolution, Vice President Joseph Odorcich of the Steelworkers said OSHA is as essential to the protection of American workers as the Secret Service is to President Reagan.

Noting that many millions of dollars are spent on the Secret Service for the President's personal safety, Odorcich said, "all we ask of this government is to make sure that the workers have this same kind of safety."

In related resolutions, the convention pressed for:

- Legislated OSHA protections for all public employees—federal, postal, and state and local government—now excluded from coverage.
- Re-establishing a maritime operating division in the Labor Dept. to reverse deteriorating safety protections in the shipbuilding industry.
- Stepped-up government activity and development of strong standards for grain elevators and mills against the hazards of grain dust explosions, which have killed 95 workers and seriously injured 240 others since 1977.
- Continuing studies into the potential health hazards facing operators of video display terminals and strong safety provisions in collective bargaining agreements.

Indexing Plan Endorsed for Wage Floor

New York—The federal minimum wage should be raised and permanently indexed to private sector earnings, the AFL-CIO proposed.

Past attempts to keep the Fair Labor Standards Act up to date through periodic step-ups in the minimum wage haven't worked, the resolution noted. Thus, "the real value" of the current $3.35 an hour minimum is "substantially less than the $1.40 minimum wage was worth in February 1967," when it was enacted.

THE CONVENTION credited Congress with an earnest effort to provide for several years in the future when it adopted 1977 amendments to the FLSA. But the increases were eroded by the double-digit inflation which "Congress could not and did not foresee."

The AFL-CIO proposed that the wage floor be adjusted each year at 60 percent of the average hourly earnings in the private sector.

Such a system, the convention said, would allow employers to anticipate their wage costs instead of facing "sporadic and unpredictable" increases in the minimum.

IN A RELATED area, the convention strongly criticized the decision of the Secretary of Labor to lift a 40-year-old prohibition against industrial homework in the knitted outerwear industry.

The ban against industrial homework in specified industries was imposed because it was impossible to enforce federal wage-hour standards otherwise, the resolution noted.

The convention welcomed a legal challenge to the exemption brought by the Ladies' Garment Workers and urged the Labor Dept. to increase its staff assigned to enforcement of the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Speaking on the resolution, ILGWU Vice President Evelyn Dubrow charged that the Secretary of Labor's actions would encourage and legalize "kitchen sweatshops" and a return to child labor.

UNSCRUPULOUS employers, taking advantage of immigrant labor, prefer to have work done at home, she said. "They don't have to pay taxes, they don't have to pay for light or utilities. They don't have to worry about an inspector coming by to see whether health and safety laws are being followed."

Another convention resolution called for "strict enforcement of our nation's labor laws" and urged full funding needed "for the effective protection of American workers."

Convention Cites Role Of Public Hospitals

New York—Public hospitals assure that no one is turned away from needed medical care because of inability to pay, and a wave of closings or private industry takeovers endangers this principle, the AFL-CIO warned.

A convention resolution reaffirmed support for public hospitals and urged health care financing reforms that would preserve their "vital role."

Inspiration to Workers Everywhere

Cheering Delegates Hail Polish Solidarity Union

By Susan Dunlop

New York—Cheers and prolonged applause rang through the AFL-CIO convention hall as delegates rose to their feet to assert the American labor movement's support of Solidarity, the Polish free trade union movement.

The AFL-CIO had planned to present Solidarity with the first George Meany International Human Rights Award. The Polish union's leader, Lech Walesa, had been scheduled to accept the award on behalf of Solidarity and to address the convention, but AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland read the delegates a cable from Walesa regretting that he had to cancel his visit because of the situation in Poland.

WALESA SAID he hopes to come to the United States at a later date and the Meany award will be formally presented to him then.

The convention resolution applauded Solidarity as an inspiration to workers everywhere.

"For the first time in a country ruled by a Communist Party," it noted, "workers have won the right to a union independent of the government, a historic victory with far-reaching implications."

A film shown to the convention traced the growth of Solidarity, created in 1980 when workers at the Gdansk shipyard struck to protest low wages, poor working conditions and Poland's general economic chaos. Twenty-one demands presented by the workers to the Polish government included the right to establish a union free of government domination.

The short color film explained the birth and growth of Solidarity and traced Walesa's emergence as its leader.

THE GDANSK agreement ignited Polish opinion and support for the union which has become a vehicle for workers' demands for more democratic rights throughout Polish society.

The film, prepared as part of the Meany award presentation, pointed out that Kirkland had been invited by Walesa to attend Solidarity's historic first national congress in Gdansk in September.

Kirkland was refused a visa by Poland's Communist government, but his speech was distributed at the congress by Msgr. George G. Higgins of Catholic University, who attended as a fraternal delegate.

The AFL-CIO president's speech was read aloud at the Polish union congress and was greeted with cheers from the delegates, Msgr. Higgins reported.

THE RESOLUTION emphasized that Solidarity faces a number of difficulties including the failure of the Polish government to keep all promises made in the Gdansk agreements and its attempts to blame the union "for the failures of the economic system imposed on Poland by the Soviet Union."

The people of Poland face a winter of shortages of food and medical supplies, the resolution observed, warning that there is a continuing "Soviet campaign of intimidation and threats" against the union.

The AFL-CIO's Polish Workers Aid Fund has already raised some $250,000 to buy office equipment and other supplies for Solidarity, the convention noted. It said the AFL-CIO will work with other organizations to help get food and medical supplies to the Polish people and "urge the U.S. government to provide generous assistance to stave off the prospect of hunger this winter."

THE FEDERATION praised Solidarity as "an affirmation of the universal need of workers, in all social and economic systems, for their own unions."

"All humanity has a stake in its success," the resolution concluded.

Kennedy Scores Democrats Who Vote Like Republicans

New York—Sen. Edward M. Kennedy aligned himself with labor's legislative goals, assailed "the most anti-union" Administration of modern times, and warned his own party that Democrats can't prosper by acting like Republicans.

"The last thing America needs in the 1980s is two Republican parties," Kennedy told the AFL-CIO convention.

THE MASSACHUSETTS senator, greeted with an ovation and repeatedly interrupted with applause, accused the Reagan Administration of summoning America "to selfishness" and replacing "a tradition of compassion with a standard of greed."

The recession, brought on "in record time," must not be allowed to feed on itself until it wrecks the economy, Kennedy insisted.

He urged, as has the AFL-CIO, that Congress revise the tax cut it enacted and "at the very least" repeal the $33 billion in new tax breaks the Administration handed to the major oil and gas producers. They do not need the money, but America needs the revenue," he said.

KENNEDY CITED his co-sponsorship of the Senate amendment that successfully restored Davis-Bacon Act coverage to the military construction bill, attacked "the plan to take jobs from those who already have them by providing a subminimum wage for those who are young."

He brought delegates to their feet with a strong attack on the current right-wing drive to amend the Hobbs Act, which punishes crimes such as extortion, to make picket line scuffles in the course of a legitimate strike subject to federal criminal penalties.

"The criminal code should be used to fight crime," Kennedy insisted. "It should never be misused as a tool for union-busting."

Kennedy cited the "hundreds of thousands who marched on Solidarity Day" as refutation of "those who say that labor does not speak for its members."

He challenged labor's critics to "go to union halls across the nation. They will hear the message that the rank-and-file reject the reactionary program of social security cuts for the elderly, Davis-Bacon cuts for construction workers, endless welfare for the rich—and a recession for the rest of America."

He spoke of the labor movement's heritage, the ideals that continue to make it, "at the dawn of its second century, the surest guardian of progress, and the most powerful force for change in America."

Kennedy brought chuckles from the delegates and many guests at the convention with a quip about the repeated pairing of his name and that of former Vice President Walter F. Mondale as "front-runners for the Democratic presidential nomination in 1984." Mondale had addressed the convention earlier, and Kennedy's comment was that "neither Fritz nor I likes to hear that kind of talk about being front-runners. I don't like to hear it about him, and he doesn't like to hear it about me."

HE CLOSED his address to the convention by invoking the memory of one of the last speeches President John F. Kennedy made before his assassination in 1963, to the AFL-CIO convention the last time it was held in New York City.

The President spoke then of his hopes for the 1980s, a decade that seemed far off. "Now the 1980s have come," Sen. Kennedy said, "and you and I are the keepers of that dream . . . the vision of a better future for our children and a better, stronger, greater America."

SEN. EDWARD M. KENNEDY

All Transportation Elements Called Essential to Nation

New York—Government, business and labor should work together "to ensure that all elements of the nation's transportaiton system remain viable," the AFL-CIO urged.

A section of the omnibus transportation resolution dealing with airline issues protested the failure to enforce, through regulations, provisions of the airline deregulation law that were intended to protect workers adversely affected.

ANOTHER BYPRODUCT of deregulation, the resolution noted, has been the threat to workers and unions from "runaway tactics of 'alter ego' airlines set up by established carriers in an attempt to avoid union contract obligations."

Specifically, it pointed to New York Air, "set up by Texas International through a holding company in order to employ non-union workers" at substandard wages.

The convention also protested a proposal to reduce the minimum number of flight attendants below levels now considered safe.

THE MARITIME section of the resolution termed it vital to restore "this crucial industry" to economic health, with U.S.-built ships flying the American flag and carrying a fair share of U.S. cargoes.

It urged legislation requiring that a share of U.S. coal exports be carried in American vessels and calling for bilateral negotiations with America's trading partners. It stressed the need for a modern merchant fleet as a naval auxiliary and urged repeal of a law that allows owners of vessels built abroad to receive operating subsidies.

The resolution affirmed support for the Jones Act, which limits U.S. coastal trade to American vessels, and laws that require that one-half of cargoes generated by the U.S. government be carried in U.S. ships.

The intercity bus section opposed Administration-backed proposals for deregulation, which it said would result in "a substantial curtailment of service to the public."

It warned that "less profitable routes serving smaller communities would be abandoned while bus companies would saturate the more profitable routes."

On railroads, the resolution scored the failure of private management to upgrade track and equipment and stressed the need for federal action.

It urged restoration of budget cuts for the Amtrak passenger service, said Conrail workers should be compensated for job losses from curtailment of service, and backed a proposal to develop 20 high-speed rail corridors linking major cities.

A SEPARATE resolution protested the Reagan Administration's "total reversal" of the federal government's past support of assistance to urban mass transportation.

It sought:

- Full funding of the Urban Mass Transportation Act and expanded operating assistance.
- Assurance that federal mass transit assistance will not interfere with collective bargaining procedures.
- Continued Labor Dept. administration of the labor protection provisions of the Mass Transit Act, and prevailing wage protection for workers in the construction or operation of transit facilities.
- No-fare transit to encourage ridership and thereby reduce energy consumption.
- A tripling of transit vehicle manufacturing capability so as "to respond to the expanded needs of urban travel as the energy crisis builds up."

Congress Urged To Ban Further Food Stamp Cuts

New York—"The nation's principal defense against hunger," the food stamp program, has been gravely weakened by cutbacks already made and is threatened by new budget attacks, the AFL-CIO warned.

A convention resolution urged Congress "to resist efforts to cause even more suffering" and reconsider early decisions to eliminate or reduce benefits for 2 million persons, prohibit aid to families of strikers regardless of need, and force a delay before workers who lose their jobs can qualify for food stamps. It also protested delay in the cost-of-living adjustment in benefits.

ARNOLD MAYER, legislative director of the Food & Commercial Workers, told the delegates that the Reagan Administration "is bringing hunger back to the United States" through its cuts in food stamps and child nutrition programs.

The cuts, he stressed, are coming at the same time that more people are in need because of Administration slashes in other social programs and higher unemployment.

"Families of murderers and rapists can get food stamps," Mayer noted. "But the families of strikers cannot."

Challenge of the Times

WE ARE HERE in strength and vigor because those who went before us and built this great instrument of progress did indeed adapt its role and structure to the needs and demands of their times.

The makeup of this body bears little resemblance to the Horse Collar Workers, the Architectural Cornice Makers, the Box Sawyers and Nailers and the Umbrella and Walking Stick Makers who gathered into the federation a hundred years ago. This body will bear as little resemblance to those who assemble under our banner a hundred years hence.

Throughout its history, labor has reflected all the trends and events—sometimes harmful, sometimes enriching—of its times, at home and abroad. Like our nation, we have been enriched by refugees from strife and tyranny in other lands. Like our nation, we have been compelled to grapple with the consequences of vast technological, social and economic changes that have taxed our wits and capacities.

LET ME NOTE some of the ways in which we have sought to address the challenge of the times in keeping with our historic mandate.

We have a permanent mandate to seek and preserve unity within the family of labor, and we rejoice in the re-affiliation of a great union, the United Automobile Workers. Our mission will not be completed until all of labor's flock is brought within the fold, to work and move together in solidarity.

We have an enduring mandate to bring all working people the message of trade unionism. There is no matter of more constant urgency than to organize the unorganized. We have initiated an ambitious campaign in the Southwest, with the Houston Cooperative Organizing Program, and we intend to see it through to a solid result.

We have an age-old mandate to educate and agitate and we have over these past months sought to do it justice.

WE CAN SURVIVE adverse public opinion. But we cannot long survive the erosion of support for programs and policies on the part of the membership.

Last spring, through a series of regional conferences extending over several weeks, the officers and department heads of the federation met with state and local trade union leaders for face-to-face discussions on any and all issues, no holds barred.

Some of the steps we have since taken, as well as some that will be proposed to this convention, are the product of those meetings. We found them of such value that we shall repeat them next year and in the future. I strongly commend such a practice to every constituent organization. From those sessions emerged the concept of Solidarity Day and the conviction that the spirit required for its success was there, waiting for an opportunity of expression.

ON THAT DAY, there gathered in Washington the greatest protest demonstration in our history. Over 400,000 members of the mainstream of the trade union movement and their allies spoke with one great voice against the course of their government and for the human values we represent.

As we go forth into our second century, solidarity remains the indispensable key to the future.

Extremes of Poverty, Luxury

Inequality of Income Growing In Reversal of a Long Trend

By Gus Tyler

WHAT REP. HENRY S. Reuss has been saying about the way income is maldistributed in our country deserves much more attention than it is presently getting.

First, because Reuss, a Wisconsin Democrat, is chairman of the Joint Economic Committee of the House and Senate. Second, because he is pointing to a growing economic inequality in the United States that is a threat both to our material well-being and to our political ideals.

WE ARE BECOMING less and less of a nation moving toward prosperity for all and more and more of a country moving toward riches at the top at the expense of all. Reuss says that from 1929 to 1967, we were getting away from the extremes of poverty and luxury in America. He gives a few figures:

If you divide the families in America up into five categories—from the bottom fifth to the top fifth—the middle classes living in the second, third, and fourth fifths all held a larger portion of the national income in 1967 than in 1929.

The upward move was not dramatic, but it was adequate—at least, it pointed in the right direction. For instance, the second fifth moved up from getting 12.5 percent of the total income to 14.2 percent; the third and fourth fifths also eased upward. The top fifth came down a bit from getting 54.4 percent to 43.4 percent.

"THEN ALONG about 1967," Reuss told Congress, "something happened. The distribution of income went into reverse from its egalitarian trend of almost forty years, and headed back toward greater inequality."

The top began to pick up a greater portion; the bottom fifth—that used to get a measly 5 percent of the pie in 1947—got a measlier 3.8 percent in 1978.

Actually, the move toward the extremes is even worse than these figures reveal because the forces at work in the years 1967 to 1978 have accelerated in more recent years, although they are not yet reported in official statistics that run only up to 1978.

Reuss points out that in the years since 1978, while prices rose by 26 percent, weekly earnings rose by only 15 percent (putting such families deeper into a hole) while income from dividends rose 26 percent and from interest 48 percent (putting such families higher on the heap).

Sadly, this polarization of our people is not the trend in the rest of the industrial world. Of the seven leading democracies, the United States stands next to the bottom in the degree of income distribution, behind Japan (the most equal), the United Kingdom, Sweden, Canada, West Germany. Only France suffers from greater maldistribution of income, a fact that is likely to be changed radically under the new Mitterand Administration.

THE GROWING maldistribution of income in the United States is more than a rejection of the nation's historic ideal; maldistribution is an economic and political menace. A top-heavy economy, lacking a broad income base in the lower four-fifths of the nation, has toppled disastrously in the past and will do it again.

The emergence of economic extremes has always been accompanied by the emergence of political extremists—with all the discontent and disorders inherent in such social confrontations.

Seeds of Organizing Ready To Be Sowed

The seeds of organization abound throughout this country. The desire to organize into labor unions exists today.

We have the intelligence, we have the desire, and we have the people to do the job that is necessary to bring organization to workers throughout this country.

We can overcome the loopholes of the National Labor Relations Board procedures. We can overcome the anti-union employers.

If we do that, we will achieve for the workers who are now a part of our organizations and for the workers who will become a part of our organizations a much better life.

—AFL-CIO Vice President William H. Wynn during convention discussion of a resolution on organizing, Nov. 16, 1981.

In Convention Resolution

Reagan Economic Program Hit As 'Class War' Against Poor

The following is from the convention resolution on economic policy:

THE HOLLOW PROMISES of the Reagan economic program are a smokescreen to conceal a massive transfer of wealth and income away from workers, away from low- and middle-income Americans, to the pockets of the wealthy and the profits of big corporations.

The blatant policies of the Reagan Administration are threatening the jobs and the living standards of America's working men and women and endangering the sense of fair play and social justice that binds and unifies America.

These Reagan Administration policies add up to class warfare against the disadvantaged, the poor and the working people of America. They will put more people out of work and aggravate inflation. They will add to inequity, unfairness and divisiveness.

These policies must be exposed, the damage minimized and the course reversed.

THE BASIC PRINCIPLES behind the economic policies supported by the AFL-CIO are simple:

We believe that economic progress and social justice go together.

We believe full employment is a moral, political and economic imperative.

We believe the attack against inflation must focus on the true causes of inflation, on the specific sectors of energy, food, health care, housing and high interest rates.

We believe the nation's economic growth and productivity must be raised by a comprehensive reindustrialization program including effective employment and training programs.

We believe that this nation's international trade and investment policies must give much more weight to U.S. interests.

LIKE A SNOWBALL rolling downhill, the economic recession is gaining momentum. Unemployment has increased by one million in the past three months and each day thousands more are being laid off.

But the Reagan Administration response to rising unemployment is to resurrect Herbert Hoover's economic policies of 50 years ago with additional budget cuts that will further weaken demand, reduce output, and destroy more jobs.

The resulting weakened economy would be even more costly and damaging to the nation in terms of lost production, lost jobs, lost skills, and lost income to producers and workers.

The tragedy of unemployment and the steadily worsening economic situation must be reversed.

THE AFL-CIO calls upon the Congress to pass the following anti-recession, job-creating programs:

A. Programs already on the books must be given sufficient funding to provide jobs rapidly and help lift the economy, specifically:

—Revive the emergency local public works program;

—Provide new low- and middle-income housing units;

—Restore public service jobs for workers not able to find jobs;

—Restore nationwide extended unemployment compensation benefits to protect the long-term unemployed.

B. Stimulate the economy with new legislation, specifically:

—Establish a Reconstruction Finance Corporation to revitalize the economy with loans, loan guarantees, interest rate subsidies and targeted tax benefits for retooling and growth of basic industries with special consideration for high unemployment areas;

—Place temporary restrictions on harmful imports to prevent added penetration of U.S. markets by foreign producers and further weakening of the nation's industrial base.

C. Use credit control authority to offset tight money policy and excessive interest rates and to channel funds into productive uses, including housing, and to stop unproductive credit flows that aggravate the economic situation with speculative excesses and merger activities.

D. Raise revenue for these programs and restore equity by:

—Limiting the individual income tax cuts for 1982 to $700 per taxpayer, roughly the amount scheduled for those with incomes of $40,000;

—Cutting the 10 percent investment tax credit back to its original 7 percent level to preclude subsidizing the same firms and investments as does the huge newly enacted depreciation system;

—Withdrawing oil windfall profits tax giveaways to wealthy oil royalty owners in the 1981 Reagan Tax Act.

Prison for Punches

Intimidating Workers, Unions Goal of Hobbs Act Amendment

BACKERS OF LEGISLATION to subject strikers to federal prosecution and heavy criminal penalties are more interested in intimidating workers and their unions than improved law enforcement, Howard Marlowe, associate legislative director for the AFL-CIO, declared in a network radio interview.

Workers who commit violent or unlawful acts on the picket line "should be prosecuted," and they are, Marlowe stressed. He said state and local law enforcement officials "are carrying out their responsibilities"—perhaps, even too vigorously at times—and "there is absolutely no reason to impose an extra layer of law enforcement" on them.

Questioned by reporters on the AFL-CIO public affairs program, Labor News Conference, Marlowe said most state and local officials are firmly opposed to "federal intervention" in picket line disputes. He said the National Right to Work Committee and other anti-union groups have exaggerated and distorted the facts, painting a picture of widespread picket line violence.

In reality, strike-related violence occurs so seldom that "the FBI does not even publish statistics in that category," Marlowe pointed out.

He said the proposal now before Congress, sponsored by Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), would wipe out the 1973 Supreme Court ruling that incidents related to legitimate strike objectives do not fall within the purview of the federal extortion law—the Hobbs Act. Supporters of the Thurmond measure to amend the law to include workers "want to bust unions, and they see this as a stifling measure," Marlowe declared.

"WORKERS WHO know that they will be subjected, conceivably, to 20-year prison terms and $250,000 fines for not only assault, but for the threat of assault, would be very reluctant to exercise their right under the collective bargaining laws of this country to go out on strike," he said.

Reporters questioning Marlowe on Labor News Conference were Michael Posner of Reuters and Drew Von Bergen of United Press International. The interview is aired weekly over the Mutual Broadcasting System.

UNION LABEL AND SERVICE TRADES DEPT., AFL-CIO

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

THERE ARE many millions of people—the unemployed, the poor, the elderly, schoolchildren—who will suffer some deprivation and perhaps misery this winter and on into next year.

Their benefits are being cut and they have been told it is necessary to control "runaway" government spending.

Since it is unlikely they will read the lengthy Atlantic Monthly article on David Stockman, President Reagan's budget chief, they may not realize how they've been victimized.

The article, based on 18 interviews with Stockman going back to last January, is a devastating indictment of the Reagan Administration. It shows the President invested enormous power in an inexperienced 34-year-old man with changeable and immature notions about "how the world works."

Stockman was an early believer in supply-side economics, explaining: "The whole thing is premised on faith. On a belief about how the world works." He predicted that Reagan's program of a three-year tax cut and tight money would bring a boom "in '81, after April, of historic proportions."

WHEN THE COMPUTER showed the Reagan program would produce huge deficits, Stockman put in more optimistic data and got the results he wanted.

When the boom failed to arrive, Stockman shifted his production to later in the year, as did the President.

Stockman, who was described as contemptuous of government, went after social programs in search of $40 billion in budget cuts so Reagan could balance the budget, a goal now abandoned.

Stockman said he listed 20 social programs he wanted to abolish, like Job Corps, Head Start, women and children's feeding programs and manpower training. "And then huge bites that would have to be taken out of social security," he said. "I mean really fierce, blood-and-guts stuff—widows' benefits and orphans' benefits, things like that."

The turning point came in May, the article said, when Stockman went after social security. He got Reagan to propose drastic cuts in benefits for those retiring at age 62. Stockman thought this was a privilege for the elderly which they could be forced to give up. But he is so ignorant of the real world that he doesn't realize that when 64 percent of those eligible retire early, it says something—probably that people are plain worn out after working in factories and mills all their lives.

THE SENATE voted 96-0 in rejecting any action to cut benefits for early retirees. Stockman persisted. Hungry for social security cuts to help his budget, he said action to "save" social security would enable politicians to look like they were doing something for beneficiaries when actually they were doing something to them.

The storm of protest in Congress and across the nation caused a major problem for the President. Finally, in September, Reagan went on national TV and disowned the Stockman reform plan.

Nevertheless, Stockman is quoted in the magazine as saying: "The President was very interested (in the reform package) and he believed it was the right thing to do."

So that is one question that remains: Does the President want to cut back social security, as Stockman says, or does he support social security, as he tells the public?

The problem with the Reagan Administration is now one of credibility. Besides social security, there is economic policy. Now Stockman reveals that "the supply-side formula was the only way to get a tax policy that was really "trickle-down."

Power corrupts; absolute power corrupts absolutely, runs the old dictum. It appears David Stockman was given too much power and Reagan must be held responsible.

INTIMIDATING WORKERS from striking, not better law enforcement, is the aim of the National Right to Work Committee and other backers of Sen. Strom Thurmond's bill to subject strikers to the federal extortion law, Howard Marlowe, center, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Legislation, declared on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Drew Von Bergen, left, of United Press International and Michael Posner of Reuters. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Firm Commitment Pledged to Wipe Out Job Bias

New York — The AFL-CIO remains firmly committed to vigorous, positive measures to end discrimination in the workplace.

A convention resolution called for continued labor involvement in affirmative action plans to eliminate race and sex inequities on the job as well as strong enforcement of federal anti-discrimination orders.

The AFL-CIO opposes dismantling of non-discriminatory seniority systems that protect all union members and is deeply concerned over budget cuts that have slashed the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act and other training and jobs programs, particularly those directed toward youth, the convention said.

THE RESOLUTION called on affiliates to redouble efforts toward ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment.

Another resolution called on the Senate to adopt—and the President to sign—the Voting Rights Act extension bill passed by the House in October.

Despite enactment of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the convention pointed out, minorities and women continue to experience discrimination in hiring and initial placement, job upgrading and promotion.

The federation urged affiliates to increase support of programs for full employment and expansion of the economy to create the "atmosphere" in which affirmative action has its greatest impact.

POSITIVE STEPS can be taken through labor's involvement in and support of affirmative action programs, particularly through the collective bargaining process, the convention said.

Non-discriminatory seniority systems that protect all members should be maintained, it continued, and these should be as broad as possible "so that all members will receive the full value and protection of their length of service with an employer."

The resolution called on the federal government for vigorous enforcement of the Executive Order banning discrimination by federal contractors. It said the Labor Dept.'s Office of Federal Contract Compliance should recognize "the necessity for union input" throughout the investigation of alleged violations, especially where changes in collective bargaining agreements are proposed.

LABOR'S CONCERN over cuts in CETA and other employment and training programs grows out of its concern for equal employment opportunity, the convention noted, and it cited the need, too, for employment programs for the handicapped.

The federation strongly opposes attempts to weaken the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, either by reduced funding or restrictions that would slow down enforcement, the resolution stressed.

The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its support of the ERA, and of continued efforts to end race or sex discrimination in wages, fringe benefits, and access to jobs. It called for adoption of the concept of equal pay for work of comparable value in organizing and bargaining and for protection against sexual harassment.

The convention pledged that the AFL-CIO will strengthen its coalition with civil rights organizations and maintain its support for the activities of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, the Coalition of Labor Union Women, Frontlash and the National Council of Senior Citizens.

IT UNDERSCORED the AFL-CIO's opposition to the growth of "the violence-prone, anti-democratic KKK, the American Nazi Party and other front groups."

In addition, the resolution called on affiliates to encourage full participation in union activities by women trade unionists, as well as participation with CLUW in its efforts to increase the involvement of women in unions and political action.

The convention termed the Voting Rights Act of 1965 "one of the most meaningful, far-reaching and successful actions in the long history of the struggle for racial equality and justice in America."

It commended the House for passing legislation to extend the act and strengthen its enforcement provisions.

Expanded Efforts Urged to Fill Gap In Social Services

New York—The labor movement's local community services activities and fund-raising must expand to meet the impact of the Reagan budget cuts on social services, the AFL-CIO declared.

A convention resolution called on affiliates to urge local unions to organize community services committees. The network of community services liaison professionals should be used to train members of the committees, the AFL-CIO said.

THE FEDERATION'S Dept. of Community Services and CSA representatives of unions can provide guidance in the development of the programs, the resolution noted.

Union members, the AFL-CIO pointed out, should keep in mind the effect of the budget cuts when asking for contributions to local fund-raising drives. The federation urged affiliates to step up support "to agencies which respect the rights of employees to join unions, and which respect the provision of union-produced goods and services."

In its report to the convention the AFL-CIO Executive Council noted that the federation has letters of understanding with agencies such as United Way and the American Red Cross that call for such cooperation. The report said the terms of the agreement have not always been followed by some of the national agencies' local affiliates, and it encouraged full adherence to the principles set forth in the letters.

IN ITS resolution, the convention emphasized that labor's community services programs "evolve from labor's concern for the quality of life outside the plant gate or shop or office door." This is the basis for labor's interest in housing, education, health care, human rights and social services, the AFL-CIO said.

The council's report pointed out that the Reagan budget cuts will have a "negative impact" on local voluntary agencies that will be unlikely to make up losses in federal supports funds from private contributions.

Delegates Commend Work Of Amnesty International

New York—The AFL-CIO commended the work of Amnesty Internaitonal and other organizations that "seek an end to human rights violations against trade unionists and others."

Amnesty International's work to protect unionists and others from imprisonment, torture and execution has won the group the Nobel Prize for Peace and the United Nations human rights award, a convention resolution noted.

BENJAMIN HOOKS

Balanced Policy Asked on Growth, Pollution Curbs

New York—The AFL-CIO pledged to fight any attempts by the Reagan Administration and conservatives in Congress to gut environmental safeguards in the name of economic progress.

Reaffirming the federation's long-held support for programs to maintain a balance between pollution abatement and economic growth, the convention stressed that "the Administration has no mandate to turn back the clock and give industry free rein to pollute and despoil" the environment.

THE CONVENTION warned that attacks on the Clean Air Act would greatly weaken its public health protections. The 1977 amendments to the law are now before Congress for renewal or amendment.

The resolution insisted that damage caused by acid rain be dealt with by regulation or amendment to the Clean Air Act.

In emphasizing the need for a balanced environmental policy, delegates condemned the two-year phaseout under the Reagan budget of the Environmental Protection Agency's water treatment grants.

IN OTHER AREAS relating to environmental concerns, the convention called for:

- Expanding resource recovery programs as an alternative to restricting use of non-returnable beverage containers.
- Strong enforcement and adequate staffing for administration of the Surface Mining & Reclamation Act.
- Effective worker protections and provisions against environmental blackmail by employers.
- National land-use policies that consider the impact on jobs and economic growth.

Adversity Seen Reinforcing Labor, Civil Rights Alliance

New York—Adversity, in the shape of the Reagan Administration, has cemented the alliance of the trade union and civil rights movements, NAACP Executive Director Benjamin L. Hooks declared.

The NAACP brought thousands of civil rights activists to Washington to march with labor on Solidarity Day, and solidarity was the eloquent message Hooks brought to the AFL-CIO convention.

"WE STAND ready to help you. We stand ready to march with you," he told the delegates.

"We stand ready to demonstrate with you, to strike with you. We stand ready to vote with you."

Hooks told the convention that "the labor movement is now in the forefront of leadership in America. The torch has been thrown to you," he said.

With leadership, he urged, labor has "an obligation to forthrightly perform . . . in civil rights, human rights, rights for women in the workplace."

LABOR IS America, Hooks said. "If you fail, to whom shall we go?"

For the first time since Franklin D. Roosevelt came to office, Hooks said, "there's a growing feeling across this nation that the black community neither has a President, a Congress nor a Supreme Court concerned about what we are trying to do."

He urged the delegates to "join hands and hearts" and with its coalition allies "march to the polls" and elect a Congress "responsive to the needs of the people."

If labor and the civil rights movement, the women's movement and the Hispanic movement got together, Hooks suggested, "we would discover we are the majority."

THERE HAS been "a breakdown of leadership" in the national government, Hooks said. When members of Congress passed a tax cut skewed to reward the rich and the big corporations, they were "voting for something that they knew nothing about. . . . They just voted for it under the magic name of Reagan."

It's time to shed complacency, Hooks said. "The Reagan-Stockman Follies . . . will be with us a long time. We better get on our fighting shoes, our marching shoes," he urged.

The economics of the Coolidge, Harding and Hoover era "didn't work then and won't work now," Hooks said. "It's time to stand up to President Reagan and tell him, 'We ain't going to let nobody turn us around,' " he declared.

"WE'VE GOT to keep this nation moving forward."

And then, he promised, as the labor movement passes its centennial, "we can join together and make this nation what it never has been, and yet must be, that land where every man and woman is free."

Consumer Prices Moderate As Housing Costs Flatten Out

The nation's consumer price index, which reflects price movements at the retail level, rose another four-tenths of 1 percent in October, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The increase, which followed a rise of 1.2 percent in September, was the least for any month since the summer of 1980, BLS said. The lower rate of price escalation occurred as housing costs flattened out after 15 months of rising steadily, and mortgage interest rates began to slide.

THE CPI NOW has risen at an annual rate of 9.6 percent for the first 10 months of this year.

The October increase was the best showing since the rise of one-tenth of 1 percent in July 1980 during last year's recession.

Housing costs overall, which had risen by more than 1 percent a month for the past five months, showed no change at all for October. The average price of a house fell seven-tenths of 1 percent last month, a sharp turnaround from previous months. Financing costs fell one-tenth of 1 percent.

Meanwhile, the downward trend in the prime lending rate spread among major banks, with Chase Manhattan, the nation's third largest bank, lowering its rate to 15.75 from 16.5 percent.

THE LOWEST equivalent prime rate was in mid-November 1980 when the prime varied from 15.5 to 16.25. This year's high for the prime was 20.5 percent, a level that prevailed throughout July, August, and early September.

Food and beverage prices also moderated last month, rising only two-tenths of 1 percent, the lowest rate of increase since June. Clothing costs increased just two-tenths of 1 percent also.

On the other hand, transportation costs rose 1.2 percent, helped by an identical increase in gasoline prices. Used car prices shot up 3.1 percent, the fifth straight month of substantial increases in this category.

Administration Retreat Scored

Congress Asked to Meet Commitment to Schools

New York—The AFL-CIO underlined the labor movement's long-standing commitment to public schools and denounced the Administration for "retreating" from the government's partnership role in education programs that help all citizens.

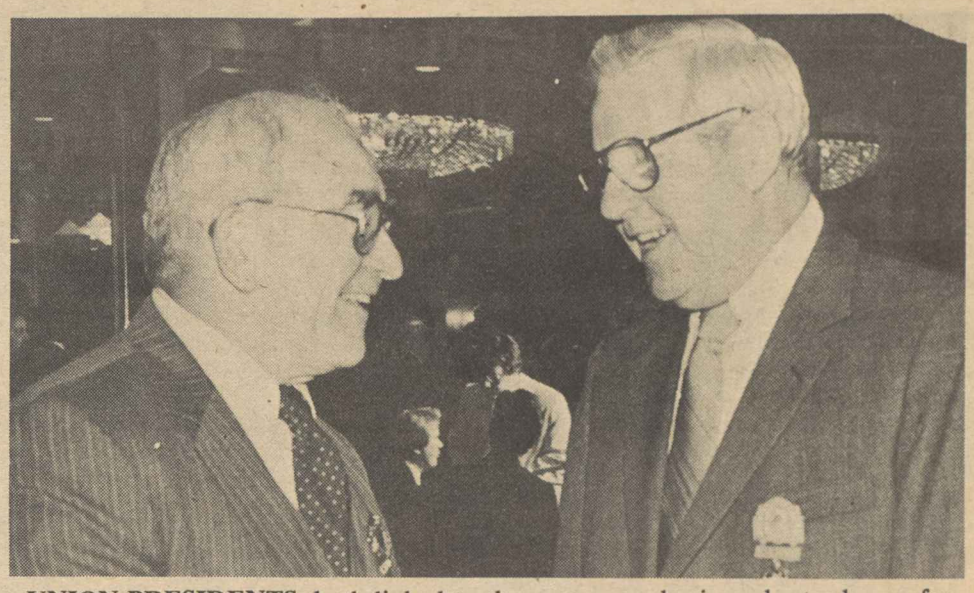
A convention resolution called on Congress to provide full funding for education programs for public schools, vocational and higher education and particularly for assistance to disadvantaged students and those with special needs, such as bilingual instruction.

THESE PROGRAMS, the AFL-CIO said, should be categorical and fully funded, not diluted into block grants to states and cities. Equal access to education programs is critical to the goal of maintaining a productive workforce and eliminating inequities, the resolution stressed.

The AFL-CIO repeated its objections to tuition tax credit proposals and education vouchers, branding them "detrimental to the advancement of the public schools."

Affiliates were asked to encourage schools to teach about the labor movement by providing films, speakers and other aids to help teachers introduce labor studies into school curricula.

THE PROBLEMS of youth unemployment underscore the need for vocational education that is realistically funded, including a federal partnership, the resolution stressed. It urged targeted programs for the inner cities, adequate teacher training and resources, money for new equipment to keep up with technological changes, and an examination of the question of sex equity for both men and women.



The Executive Council's report to the convention pointed out that federal vocational education programs that provide essential job skills to some three million students have already been cut by about $49 million, and the Administration is asking for another 30-percent reduction in that budget.

On higher education, the convention resolution stressed that tuition should not be so high that workers and their families are shut out. The AFL-CIO called on Congress to fully fund student aid programs and reject Administration proposals for even more cuts in basic opportunity grants along with excessive restrictions and limitations on guaranteed student loans.

THE FEDERATION said it supports and encourages the development of worker-oriented liberal arts degree programs by community colleges and universities. It urged union members to begin or continue their own higher education in programs developed by union faculties.

Affiliates were urged to step up efforts to provide education programs for their members. Programs for workers' education should receive public support consistent with the funding for programs staged for farmers and business, the resolution said.

Tuition assistance plans and other educational benefits for workers have been negotiated in a number of collective bargaining agreements, the convention pointed out. In addition, through the establishment of joint trust funds, affiliates have developed a variety of education services for members and their families. Among these are remedial, outreach and pre-retirement training, occupational training and higher education scholarships.

Solidarity Day Rally Cited As Clear Signal to Reagan

New York—House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., told the AFL-CIO convention that labor's massive Solidarity Day turnout marked a "turning point" in public reaction to the Reagan Administration.

Doubts about Reaganomics are spreading across the nation, O'Neill said, and the clearest signal was the massive turnout of workers protesting the President's program "of encouraging the wealthy at the expense of the wage earners, the elderly and the poor."

O'NEILL'S RECITAL of the litany of backward steps taken by the Administration was punctuated by applause from the delegates.

He assailed the Administration for weakening occupational safety and health protections and dismantling labor-supported programs through regulatory changes.

He cited the President's harsh and "wrong" treatment of the air traffic controllers, his attacks on social security protections, the unjust tax program and recession-breeding economics.

O'NEILL TOLD the delegates that Democrats in Congress welcome the AFL-CIO's help in shaping alternatives to the Reagan program and in "keeping the House Democratic in 1982 and regaining Democratic control of the Senate."

In response, at the conclusion of the speech, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland praised O'Neill's "valiant efforts" for progressive programs.

Kirkland then asked O'Neill, as the leader of House Democrats, to remind his colleagues "that they ought to stand and fight for the interests and concerns of the plain working people of this country."

THE DEMOCRATIC Party, he said "has never and will never prosper" if it abandons America's workers.

New York state's two most prominent Democratic office holders — Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan and Gov. Hugh Carey —spoke at the convention's opening session.

Moynihan's theme was the labor movement's century-old "compact" with American society to "work within the rules" to improve conditions for the workers they represent.

CAREY WARNED that the damage to the nation caused by President Reagan's first round of budget slashes would be compounded if Congress were to grant his request for still further cutbacks.

"If we are to have a real program of economic renewal," he urged, "it must face the reality of those forgotten millions who exist outside the economic mainstream without education, job experience or hope."

Energy Independence Goal Focus of AFL-CIO's Policy

New York—The United States must take all feasible roads to energy independence, the AFL-CIO urged, including both conservation and the development of alternative energy sources.

A convention resolution said coal and nuclear power must be part of the nation's energy mix, with awareness of environmental concerns.

IT EXPRESSED concern at the Reagan Administration's curtailment of government research and development programs and at the failure to implement the synthetic fuels program set up by Congress last year.

The resolution noted that the United States and its chief allies remain "dangerously dependent" on oil imports, even though conservation programs have helped reduce the level of imports.

It reaffirmed the AFL-CIO position that the U.S. government should become "the sole importer of oil" so as to hold down prices and in a period of import disruptions "make sure that oil reached consumers rather than being stored while prices soar."

THE CONVENTION expressed concern at budget cuts that have reduced federally-aided conservation measures.

It urged more support for mass transit, federal temperature and lighting standards, conversion of boilers to coal, and expanded low-interest loans for solar energy equipment, among other programs.

The convention urged a commitment to "advancing solar, gasohol and geothermal technology."

INCREASED coal use should be accompanied by greater use of scrubbers and other measures to reduce pollution, the resolution urged. It asked that development of nuclear power "be accompanied by expanded research into technology to further reduce safety hazards, so that nuclear power will enjoy the public support it must have."

The resolution also advocated "development of technology which turns nuclear waste into reusable fuel."

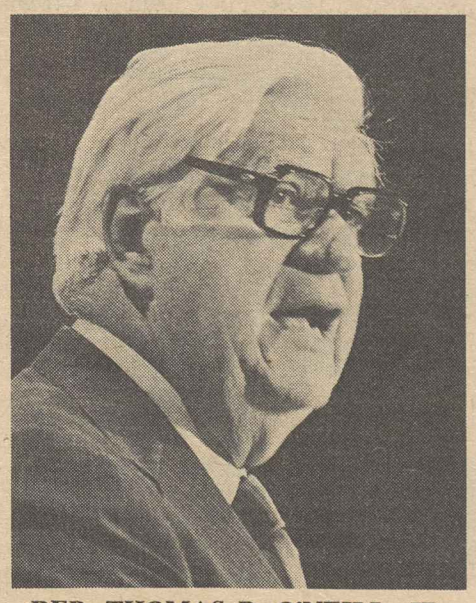
The convention took a strong stand against decontrol of natural gas prices, which under present law would not be fully decontrolled until 1985.

IT SAID current prices "are more than adequate to stimulate exploration for new gas," and "conservation policy should not be based on making energy so expensive that low- and moderate-income families cannot adequately heat their homes."

The convention also expressed concern that the oil companies have accelerated their acquisition of other energy companies and non-energy concerns. Congress should "break up the oil monopolies," delegates stressed.

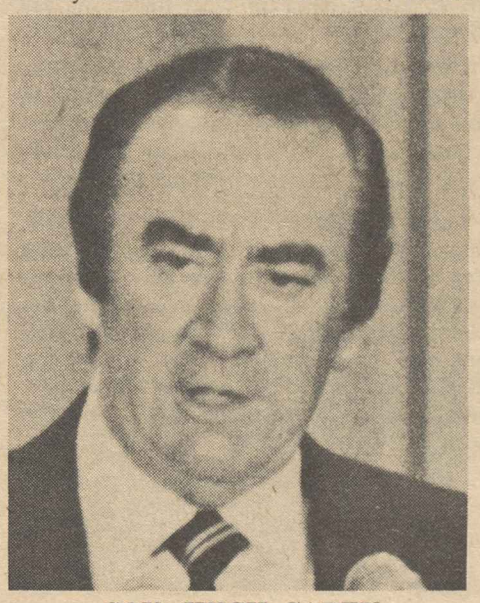
IN A SEPARATE resolution, the convention expressed concern at the lack of enforcement of legislation to assure that U.S. standards aren't hurt by the use of foreign workers on offshore oil drilling in the development of the outer continental shelf.

Health Risk Seen From Weakening Of Additive Law



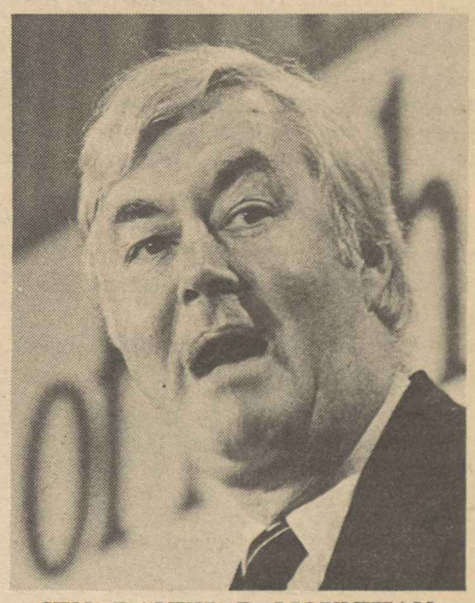
New York—The AFL-CIO voiced strong oppostion to so-called "food safety amendments" before both chambers of Congress that would allow processors to put unsafe additives in foodstuffs.

Under existing law, the use of any food additive intended for human consumption that has been found to cause cancer in animals is prohibited.

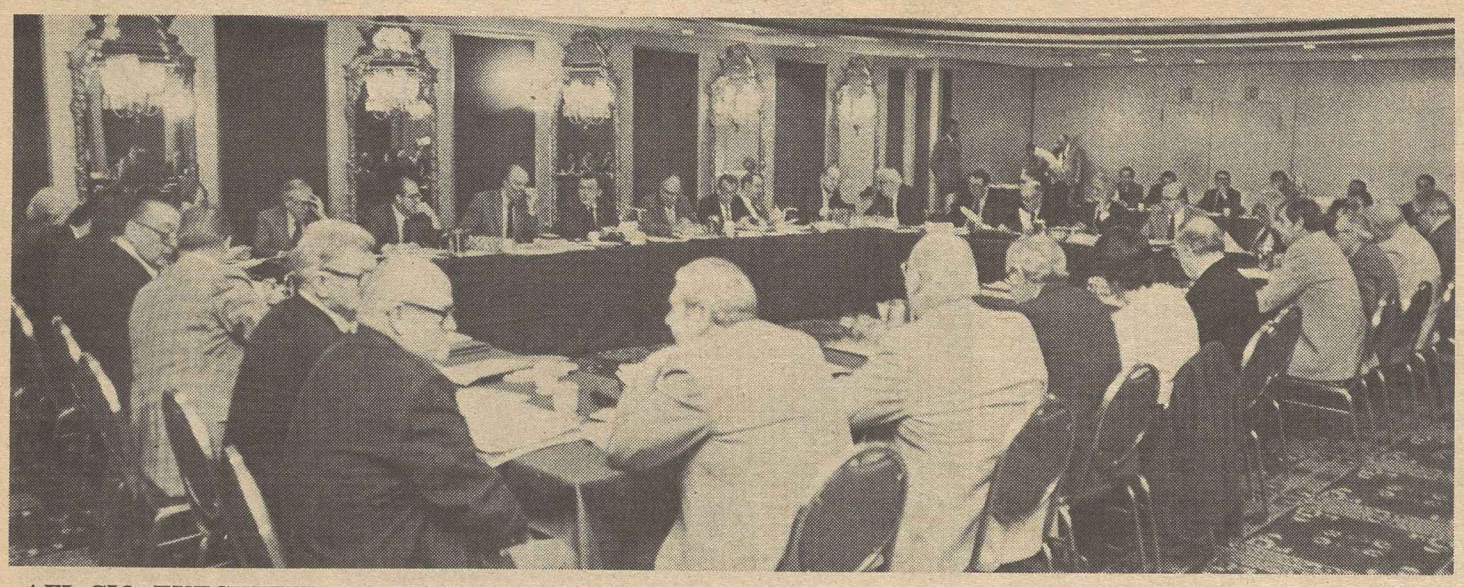


The proposed amendments would not only lift that ban, the convention resolution warned, but also would hamstring federal regulatory agencies for several years while they build evidence against the hazardous additive to get it off the market.

IF ADOPTED, the Food & Drug Administration and the Dept. of Agriculture could no longer ban a substance simply because it causes cancer, the convention noted. The agencies would instead have to determine if the substance posed a "significant risk" and then weigh the costs of the ban against health benefits.



Beyond the serious health risks, the amendments would undermine consumer confidence in the food industry, which could affect the jobs of more than a million workers.



REP. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, JR.

GOV. HUGH CAREY

SEN. DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN

AFL-CIO EXECUTIVE COUNCIL is shown at session before the opening of the convention at which proposed constitutional changes and a number of resolutions were discussed for submission to the convention. The council also held a post-convention meeting with the five newly-elected vice presidents taking part.

Houston Campaign Hailed as Model For Coordinated Organizing Effort

New York — Cooperative organizing campaigns involving AFL-CIO affiliates, local central bodies and the federation's own field staff received a strong and enthusiastic endorsement from delegates to the AFL-CIO convention.

A resolution adopted on the convention's opening day urged AFL-CIO unions to give "total support and cooperation" in the recently launched coordinating organizing effort in Houston.

While noting that the federation's organizing efforts have increased the numbers of new union members in recent years, the convention observed that "unfair and illegal tactics of labor-management consultants and employers hinder employees in their pursuit of collective bargaining through organizing."

The convention directed the federation's Dept. of Organization & Field Services to intensify its development of training projects and teaching materials for organizers. It also urged wider use of the George Meany Center for Labor Studies to devise and jointly administer programs for multi-union participation.

The department and the national organizing committee were encouraged in their efforts to develop creative methods to combat union-busters.

"We call on the committee and the department to continue their critical work on special projects such as the development of manuals on communications, post-election activity, targeting, and positive labor relations," the resolution said.

A separate resolution spotlghted the union-busting role of labor relations "consultants" hired to keep unions out or get rid of an existing union.

It urged the AFL-CIO to expand its program of exposing the union-busters and prodded the Labor Dept. to enforce Landrum-Griffin Act reporting requirements for such consultants.

In its report to the convention, the Executive Council described the Houston project as the most ambitious organizing effort ever launched by labor. Thirty international unions are cooperating in the effort, which is directed at 700,000 organizable workers in the Houston area.

VICE PRESIDENT Lloyd McBride, chairman of the council's organizing committee, called for the entire labor movement to rally behind the Houston project.

Vice Presidents Albert Shanker and William Wynn and others who spoke on the resolution urged that the Houston project be used as a stepping stone for a national campaign to overcome anti-union employers.

Continued support was also expressed for "Project Counter Attack" to address the problems of union decertification.

DECERTIFICATION campaigns were rare until a few years ago, it observed. But today they represent "a menacing new direction taken by American industry—a threat not only to many individual unions, but to the basic role of free trade unionism in our democratic system."

The convention called for vigorous efforts by all affiliates to block blatant attempts to destroy existing collective bargaining relationships and urged responsible corporate leaders to weigh the ultimate effect these anti-union efforts will have on industry and free society.

Delegates urged continued development of labor's corporate research techniques to exert added pressure on targeted employers. A key element of the strategy is the direct involvement of unions in corporate affairs as stockholders and use of pension fund investments in influencing corporate labor relations activities.

Hispanic Workers Looking To Labor to Aid Progress

New York—Hispanic workers are looking to the labor movement "with hope for a better tomorrow," and labor has a stake in sharing "common ground" with Hispanics, Henry L. Lacayo told the AFL-CIO convention.

Lacayo, chairman of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, warned the delegates that "labor's enemies, the 'trickle down' gang who would stop all progress dead in its tracks, are the very ones who are trying to entice and lure Hispanics into their ranks." The labor movement cannot stand by and allow that to happen, he declared.

HISPANICS HAVE a high regard for the labor movement, Lacayo pointed out, and have a higher percentage rate of union membership than that of the total workforce. Because Hispanics have a strong inclination to join unions, the organizing potential is enormous, he asserted.

Lacayo, who directs the Auto Workers' Community Action Program, said that while Hispanic-Americans come from a variety of national backgrounds, they share a common devotion to their country and a common set of problems.

Hispanic voters normally support labor's candidates by wide margins, he noted, but fewer than half the nine million Hispanic citizens eligible to vote are registered.

A HIGH unemployment rate, along with other serious social problems have made many Hispanics feel they are "second class citizens" without political effectiveness, and led to restlessness and despair. despair.

He told the delegates that the success of organizing programs such as the one the AFL-CIO is staging in Houston is linked to accenting "the positive" and to developing "a program that those of us who are in the trenches can utilize when we come in contact with the Hispanic-American community."

Lacayo urged unions seeking to attract Hispanic workers to pay attention to their cultural and language traditions and present "a visible and credible Hispanic presence" in leadership and staff organizing drives.

MEDIA AND public relations campaigns, he said, should be conducted so that "they can be properly understood by the Hispanic constituents" labor wants to reach.

The LCLAA, founded in 1973 with AFL-CIO support, is "labor's bridge to the Hispanic community in America," Lacayo asserted, pointing to the many thousands of Hispanic workers who joined in the Solidarity Day demonstration at LCLAA's urging.

The main role of LCLAA, he said, is to motivate Hispanic union members to become more active in the labor movement and in the American political process.

THE COMMON desire of the labor movement and the Hispanic communities for a decent life explains why Hispanic workers "look to labor and reject the Administration's policies that call for rolling back on affirmative action, the Voting Rights Act and those programs that give assistance to women, the young and the aged," Lacayo asserted.

He told the delegates Hispanics reject an Administration that proposes to bring 50,000 guest workers a year from Mexico into the U.S. to work for low wages to compete with Hispanic Americans who already have a 15.5-percent jobless rate.

Jewish Daily Forward Hailed in 85th Year

New York—The Jewish Daily Forward is nearing its 85th anniversary, and the AFL-CIO convention wished it "many more years" of service to its readers and the labor movement.

A convention resolution noted that over the years the newspaper has been "a true friend" to America's unions.

HENRY L. LACAYO

Emasculation Of Protective Rules Scored

New York—The Reagan Administration has abused both its appointive authority and the regulatory process "to emasculate regulations that protect workers, consumers and the environment," the AFL-CIO charged.

A convention resolution questioned the presidential Executive Order at the start of the Reagan Administration that resulted in postponement, abandonment and weakening of government protections.

COSTS HAVE been cited as justification for scuttling regulations without any offsetting consideration of benefits, the convention noted.

The effectiveness of regulatory agencies has also been further weakened by the appointment of officials with little interest in the mission of their agencies.

Among the regulatory programs hurt by the Reagan Administration's hostility, the resolution noted, are the Occupational Safety & Health Act, the Mine Safety & Health Act, Urban Mass Transportation Act, Davis-Bacon Act, Service Contract Act, Fair Labor Standards Act, affirmative action programs, energy price controls, consumer protection laws and environmental standards.

THE RESOLUTION affirmed the AFL-CIO's intent "to fight to maintain essential worker, consumer and environmental protections" and to monitor the Administration's regulatory enforcement carefully.

It declared that the federation "will bring appropriate legal action" if necessary to prevent laws from being distorted through the regulatory process."

Two More Firms Added by Council To Boycott List

New York—Procter & Gamble soaps and New Galax mirrors were added to the AFL-CIO boycott list by the Executive Council at its pre-convention meeting here.

The boycott against Procter & Gamble was requested by the Steel Workers which has been trying to negotiate an agreement at the company's Kansas City, Kan., plant since the union was certified as bargaining agent in November 1980.

PRODUCTS SUBJECT to the boycott include Tide, Cheer, Oxydol and Bold laundry detergents, Zest, Camay and Ivory bar soaps, and Joy, Ivory and Dawn dishwashing detergents.

The New Galax mirror boycott grows out of a strike by the Furniture Workers, which won an election at the Galax, Va., factory in March 1981. The 65 workers were forced to strike Sept. 2 after the company refused to bargain and began a campaign of firings and harassment, the council statement said.

Most workers at the southwestern Virginia plant are paid less than $4 an hour, the council said, adding that they are also assessed up to 25 percent of their earnings for health insurance.

ON THE Procter & Gamble boycott, the council pointed out that the company's "delaying tactics" are intended "to wear down the workers and their union." The independent union previously in the plant had endorsed the Steelworkers' organizing campaign.

Although the company denies it is taking punitive action against the Kansas City workers, the council pointed out that employees at the plant lag behind those at other P&G plants. They have not had a raise since November 1979, have been required to pay their own medical insurance premiums since February 1980, and have been denied bonuses previously paid. In addition, the council said, the company has transferred or laid off many workers and shut down some departments.

New Leadership for ILPA

Labor Press Sessions Focus on '82 Election

New York — The International Labor Press Association elected Diane Curry to a two-year term as president of the organization, made up of AFL-CIO and Canadian Labor Congress publications.

Curry is director of publications for the Railway & Airline Clerks. She has been an ILPA vice president for six years and is also editor of the Coalition of Labor Union Women's newsletter.

SHE WILL succeed James Cesnik, editor of the Newspaper Guild Reporter, next Jan. 1. The ILPA constitution prohibits presidents from serving successive terms.

Susan Dunlop, an assistant editor of the AFL-CIO News, was elected to her first full term as ILPA secretary-treasurer. She had held the post since last January when she was elected by the organization's executive council after the resignation of Allen Y. Zack.

Some 200 delegates took part in the ILPA convention where programs and workshops focused on coverage of the major issues facing labor in 1982, the role of the labor press in the elections, the emerging use of electronic media, and improving technical skills.

IN HIS KEYNOTE address, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue praised the labor press for its contributions to the work of the labor movement.

"The labor movement stands almost alone," Donahue told the delegates, "as the best organized and most coherent force that is still fighting to defend the rights of and upgrade the quality of life for all the American people."

Although union members are in the minority in the workforce, Donahue said, "it is our unity that makes the difference, and one of our strongest assets in building that unity is the effective communication instrument that we have created in the labor press."

The ILPA's central concern during 1981 was the danger posed to the labor press by the Reagan Administration's attempt to strip the federal budget of funds that permit non-profit publications a lower, phased postage rate schedule, Dunlop told the convention in her report.

The labor press, as well as allies among other non-profit groups, mounted a strong lobbying effort to retain the subsidy in the budget, Dunlop said. She noted that, had those efforts failed, postal rates for most labor publications would have doubled on Oct. 1.

ILPA WAS ABLE to persuade Congress to retain much of the non-profit subsidy, and while labor publications still face the prospect of a postage rate increase, it would be much lower than the Administration first proposed.

Dunlop noted that the ILPA's successful intervention in cases before the Postal Rate Commission in 1980 had won special presort discounts for the labor press. That decision, combined with a recent favorable ruling by the Postal Service Board of Governors, would hold the effective increase for 75 percent of ILPA's member publications to about two-tenths of a cent per copy.

In other elections, 10 incumbent vice presidents were re-elected to the ILPA executive council and five will join the council for the first time in January.

RE-ELECTED were Joseph Hanafin, Canadian Machinist; Ken Germanson, Allied Industrial Worker; Rochelle Hart, Chicago Teachers Union Newsletter; Jean Hughes Wright, San Francisco Actor; Carolyn Jacobson, Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers News; Robert Kalaski, Machinist; Glenn Martin, California AFL-CIO News; Gordon Spielman, the Union Advocate, St. Paul, Minn.; and Marl Young, Overture, Los Angeles Musicians Local 47.

New vice presidents will be Jay Bloom, Voice of Local One, Food & Commercial Workers, Utica, N.Y.; Richard Calistri, Labor Newspaper, Washington; Gregory Croy, UFCW Action; Kim Fellner, the Screen Actor; John Harvey, Bay State Employee, State, County & Municipal Employees Council 93, Boston; and Gary Hubbard, Steelabor.

ILPA Vice Presidents Russell Gibbons, Steelabor, and Jerry Archuleta, Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers News, were honored for their six years of service on the executive council. The ILPA convention limits vice presidents to three two-year terms.

The ILPA's 10th A. J. Liebling Lecture, named in memory of the late press critic for the New Yorker, was given by Jack Rosenthal, deputy editorial page editor for the New York Times, who at one time was on the staff of the Oregon Labor Press.

LABOR EDITORS were reminded of their critical role as a communications link for unions, their leaders and members. That was a major theme of the keynote address by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at the International Labor Press Association's biennial convention. With Donahue is ILPA President James Cesnik, editor of the Guild Reporter, published by the Newspaper Guild.

Fair Foreign Trade Policy Linked to Job Concerns

New York—America needs a fair foreign trade policy to maintain a diversified industrial base that will create full employment and raise standards of living here and in other countries, the AFL-CIO declared.

In shaping that policy, the convention said, there must be greater emphasis on promoting U.S. interests through national actions and international cooperation. It stressed that "the United States must remain a major maritime, agricultural and manufacturing nation."

THE RESOLUTION on international trade and investment called for import relief for key industries, a federal role in the purchase and distribution of oil imports, targeted government promotion of exports, closing of tax loopholes that encourage multinational companies to move operations abroad, and upgrading of grain export practices.

"Immediate import relief should be accorded some key industries faced with serious erosion, such as the auto and steel industries," the convention said.

It urged Congress to strengthen U.S. trade laws to provide speedier relief to industries and workers threatened by imports, including amendments to safeguard producers of essential components.

THE CONVENTION also called for the restoration of funds for Trade Adjustment Assistance, which has been slashed by the Reagan Administration's budget cuts.

"Workers who lose their jobs because of imports should receive the 70 percent of lost pay for up to one year and the training and relocation aid that they were promised in the Trade Acts of 1974 and 1979," the convention said.

Noting that tens of thousands of workers "are unemployed because their jobs have been shipped overseas," the resolution stressed the need to close tax loopholes and eliminate incentives for multinational firms to transfer operations out of the United States.

IT CALLED FOR an end to tax deferrals that benefit multinationals and for repeal of foreign tax credits and the Domestic International Sales Corp. tax gimmick.

Other key recommendations urge:

- Creation of a federal agency to handle the purchase and distribution of oil imports to assure that the nation has an adequate supply of oil at a fair price.
- A federal role in grain agreements to assure that food products made from grain are included in exports, as well as establishing a government board that would handle negotiations on grain trading.
- Greater use of the U.S. merchant fleet by the Navy for auxiliary functions and negotiation of bilateral shipping agreements that would assure wide use of U.S.-flag vessels, particularly for grain and coal shipments.

THE CONVENTION SAID that export promotion with carefully targeted goals should be a government priority, but that it "must not take priority over domestic budget needs, nor be used as an excuse for undermining U.S. antitrust or banking laws."

Limits also should be placed on the transfer of capital, technology, and price-sensitive commodities, the convention said in citing the need to assure the country's security and technological advances.

In a related resolution, the convention reiterated the federation's strong opposition to the creation of foreign trade zones in the United States "because they result in job losses to the United States and have been used to undercut U.S. trade and tax laws."

Broadcasting Act Fairness Policy Pledged Support

New York—Attempts to wipe out safeguards against broadcasting abuses must be repelled, the convention said.

It called for the AFL-CIO to work with other concerned groups to prevent repeal of the Fairness Doctrine and the equal time provisions of the 1934 Communications Act, as proposed by Reagan Administration appointees on the Federal Communications Commission.

If the Fairness Doctrine were eliminated, the convention warned, "broadcasters could proselytize on issues of public importance to serve their personal or collective interests without affording any opportunity for response."

REPEAL OF the equal time provisions could "dangerously distort our political processes" by allowing broadcasters to give favored treatment to some candidates while denying broadcast time to their opponents, the resolution said.

In another resolution, the convention warned that the Reagan Administration and its allies in Congress are attempting to weaken the effectiveness of the Freedom of Information Act through amendments.

NOTING THAT the 1967 law was enacted to give the public a greater access to information, the resolution said, "these amendments seek to undo the progress which the act has achieved in providing a more open and responsive government."

It also charged that the proposed changes are designed "to protect the selfish interests of the business community."

Consumer Interests Backed In Battling Budget Slashes

New York—The AFL-CIO will fight to preserve gains made in protecting the American consumer, a convention resolution pledged.

Reagan Administration policies and budget cuts threaten the nation's consumer protection agencies, including a near-phase out of the Consumer Product Safety Commission and curtailment of anti-trust activities by the Federal Trade Commission, the convention noted.

IT SAID the AFL-CIO will resist cuts in budgets and diminished authority for those agencies and others, including the Food & Drug Administration. It will also press for continuation of the National Consumer Cooperative Bank so it can continue to give loans and assistance to consumer cooperatives instead of being shelved in 1982.

Full federal operations should be maintained in the inspection of meat and poultry, the federation insisted.

The resolution called on the government to "keep its commitment to guard the public against unsafe and defective products and to promote honest and fair dealings with consumers."

THE CONSUMER has a right to full and accurate information about products in the marketplace along with protection against "unfair monopoly pricing," the resolution asserted.

Manipulation of consumer credit and "credit gouging" should be restrained, and the consumer should have the right to be heard in the regulatory decision-making and legislative process, the convention said.

The AFL-CIO had opposed efforts to undercut timely and needed rulemaking by regulatory agencies "at the behest of business interests," the resolution pointed out. It stressed that the government has a "crucial and necessary" job to do in maintaining orderly consumer markets and "redressing imbalances" against consumers in our economic system.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL report on consumer protection had pointed out that the Administration's drive to "get government off our backs" translates into proposals to "reform" regulatory agencies so that their ability to protect consumers, workers and the public is inhibited.

Protective rulemaking could be "strangled" by devices such as "cost-benefit analysis" and extensive administrative review procedures along with the giving of veto power over rules to other agencies or Congress, the report warned.

Federal Law Asked to Curb Plant Closings

New York—Effective federal legislation is needed to protect American workers and their communities against the destructive impact of plant closings and runaway shops, the convention declared.

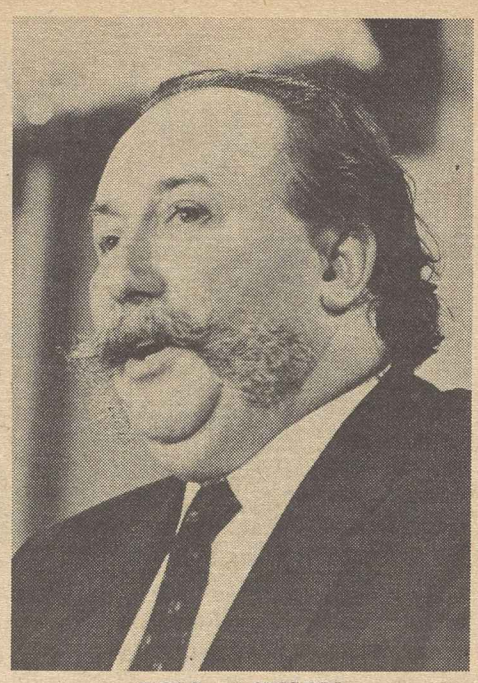
Citing the resultant waste in lost human skills and erosion of community stability, the convention called for elimination of tax incentives that foster shutdowns.

CORPORATIONS should be required to share the financial burden that workers and communities encounter when plants are closed for relocation to other parts of the country or abroad, the resolution stressed.

Other protections the legislation should include, the convention said, are:

- Mandatory advance notice of plant closings.
- Programs to attract new industries to areas hurt by layoffs and job losses.
- For dislocated workers, increased levels of income support for longer periods, as well as continuation of health insurance and meaningful training programs.
- Rights of union successorship when an operation is shut down and is reopened by "new" management.

While the surge in plant closings can be traced largely to the growing "deindustrialization" of the economy, the resolution pointed out that loop holes in tax laws and the flood of imports add to the problem.



"FEDERAL TAX writeoffs are freely available to companies that close plants in an established location to open new plants overseas or in another part of the country—typically where climates are sunnier and unions are weaker," the convention observed.

Fair international trade laws should also be adopted and fully enforced to help bring the problem of plant closings under control, the convention said.

"Whether through reindustrialization, tax reform or trade policy, we cannot afford to design programs to cushion the blows of plant closings while we perpetuate policies that weaken our industrial base and cause many plant closings in the first place."

DENNIS McDERMOTT

TOM JACKSON

Fraternal Delegates Cite Common Economic Woes

New York—The insistence of governments on sticking to disastrous economic policies is uniting the world's free trade union movements, fraternal delegates to the AFL-CIO convention observed.

"Economic chaos of the worst kind and political impotence of the worst kind is the scenario in Canada," Canadian Labor Congress President McDermott told the convention.

UNEMPLOYMENT has gone from 7.5 percent to 8.3 percent from the same period last year, interest rates are at 16.5 percent, although down from some 22 percent, and the average mortgage rate in October 1981 was between 20 and 25 percent, McDermott said.

"The crippling, devastating effect on working people in the entire fabric of society because of this economic idiocy is beyond description," the former Auto Workers' vice president declared.

He said election promises of restraint on interest rates, control of the domestic energy crisis, intelligent use of natural resources, an industrial strategy and the creation of secondary industries have not been fulfilled. The Canadian people were "overwhelmed," he said, when a recently announced new national economic policy contained "nothing about economic reform, nothing about economic stimulation, no help for the homeowner, nothing about planned industrial strategy, nothing about unemployment."

THE CLC IS committed to "work for solutions" through "political mobilization," McDermott stressed. He said the Canadian federation will work to build worker support for the New Democratic Party and form coalitions with "like-minded organizations on energy, interest rates, ethno-cultural matters, and all other things we can join with men and women of good will in the rest of society."

Tom Jackson, representing the British Trades Union Congress, told the delegates they need no "crystal ball to see what is going to happen to you with your government. All you have to do is come to Britain and see what is being done to us.

"It is almost as though your President and our Prime Minister (Margaret Thatcher) had the same speech writer," he observed.

FULL EMPLOYMENT in Britain was once regarded as about 1.5 percent unemployed, Jackson noted. Today the jobless rate stands at 12.3 percent "and is still rising."

Economic policies that "benefit the rich and hit the poor" are commonplace, said Jackson, who is general secretary of the Union of Communication Workers.

Attacks on the labor movement by government are "a daily ritual" and legislation is continually being pressed to weaken British unions, he pointed out.

LABOR UNIONS in Britain, Jackson observed, "have become the whipping boys for the failure of the conservative, monetarist policies of our government."

But "we have won out before in depressing economic circumstances, and so we shall do again," he declared.

He pointed to the achievements of the Polish free trade union, Solidarity, established "in the face of difficulties and daners which make our problems look small."

THE TRADE union movements of both Britain and the United States have survived "oppression and antipathy" for more than a century and will still be strong, Jackson said, "when Reagan and Thatcher are no more than footnotes in history."

The labor movement, he concluded, will survive because "we draw our strength from the people, and the people will not be defeated."

Job Training Called Vital To Economy

New York—Employment and training services for the disadvantaged and chronically jobless, such as those provided by the AFL-CIO's Human Resources Development Institute, are critical to an economy with steadily worsening unemployment, the AFL-CIO declared.

A convention resolution pointed out that HRDI has been an effective arm of organized labor since 1968, providing services for minorities, youth, veterans, the handicapped and women and helping labor organizations participate in national training and employment programs.

THE EXECUTIVE Council's report to the convention stressed that HRDI had stepped up its activities during 1980, especially its assistance to organizations using programs under the Comprehensive Employment & Training Act. HRDI was also expanding its own skill training, apprenticeship outreach, placement and related services.

But sharp reduction in the federal budget for national employment and training programs gutted CETA in 1981 and forced a 37-percent cut in HRDI's own contract with the Labor Dept., the council noted. The institute was forced to reorganize its structure and cut back its field and national office staff in order to keep as many programs as possible functioning.

The convention stressed that training, job creation and placement services are a major element of the national effort to achieve full employment, and it called on the Labor Dept. to maintain adequate funding of national employment and training programs.

THE RESOLUTION called on HRDI to maintain its cooperative efforts with state and local labor organizations to develop jobs, place the jobless and continue its wide range of programs to meet the needs of people with special employment problems.

HRDI should continue to provide technical assistance and services to AFL-CIO affiliates and their locals, the resolution said. This aid should take into account the private sector emphasis of federal programs so labor can participate fully in national employment and training programs and protect its rights.

THE CONVENTION called on HRDI to continue its special, targeted programs for disadvantaged people and maintain its national program structure.

The resolution said the expertise of the HRDI staff should continue to be available throughout the AFL-CIO to help affiliates meet their employment and training needs, including upgrading, retraining or other services needed by union members.

Greater Union Voice Sought In Pension Fund Investments

New York—Increasing the decision-making role of unions in the management and investment practices of pension funds is essential to the interests of union members and their families, the convention said.

A key objective is to build on the progress unions had made over the past two years in training local officials and pension fund trustees by carrying out recommendations of an Executive Council committee on pension fund investments.

IN PURSUING this line of action, the convention observed, unions can better contribute to the creation of jobs while insuring that pension funds are invested in ways that are helpful, not detrimental to union members.

A first step in expanding the voice of unions in collective bargaining over the use of funds now unilaterally controlled by employers is to obtain information about the financial performance, management practices and investment policies of the funds, the resolution noted.

It also urged wider participation in programs such as the AFL-CIO Mortgage Investment Trust that channel funds into union-built construction projects and related enterprises.

PUBLIC EMPLOYEE unions should be assisted in getting pension funds of state and local governments to establish accounts for low-income home mortgages, investments in other construction and funding of job-creating programs, the convention said.

It stressed that unions also should make increased use of shareholder rights in negotiated pension plans to advance workers' interests in collective bargaining, job safety, plant closings and equal employment opportunity.

It called for continuing labor training programs on pension activities and promotion of investment opportunities that spur the country's reindustrialization.

Vice President John H. Lyons, in urging adoption of the resolution, stressed that the thrust of the council committee's pension investment strategy is to protect workers' jobs while they are working and safeguard their pension income in retirement.

IN A RELATED resolution, the convention called for additional amendments to the federal pension protection law. It cited the need to place the administration of ERISA in a single government agency and for providing public employees the same range of protections that now cover workers in private industry.

The resolution also urged speedy implementation of the new multiemployer pension plan termination insurance amendment with appropriate consultation with unions.

Codes, Training Pressed To Avoid Hotel Fires

New York—The AFL-CIO convention called on local governments to enact and enforce effective fire codes to help prevent hotels and motel fires, which pose a serious threat to workers, guests and fire fighters.

The convention also voiced support for fire prevention and survival training programs for hotel and motel employees, noting that some 12,000 hotel and motel fires occur annually in the United States, killing hundreds and destroying vast amounts of property.

19 Resolutions Sent to Council For Disposition

New York—The 14th AFL-CIO convention referred 19 of the 209 resolutions submitted for its consideration to the new Executive Council for disposition after further research and study.

The convention adopted 87 resolutions, accepting amendments to several of them, and deemed 95 others to be covered by its actions. The delegates voted non-concurrence with three resolutions and found that no action was necessary on five, since they reflected long-standing policy.

The 19 referred resolutions deal with a broad range of problems and issues facing AFL-CIO members as workers, trade unionists and citizens. They embrace such topics as the role of the mass media in America, strikes, radiation hazards, and social security inequities.

The referred resolutions will be considered by a committee of the Executive Council.

Professional Employees Report:

Technology, Job Change Reshaping Workforce

New York — Expanded trade union cooperation is essential to fully address the impact of technological change on professional and white-collar workers, the Dept. for Professional Employees declared as it pointed out that sweeping innovations are redefining jobs and shifting the role of workers in all industries.

Delegates to the department's third convention also voiced an interest in the per capita payment increase and re-elected top officers.

TO FACE THE challenge of the new worldwide industrial revolution, the convention called on affiliates to negotiate effective contract protections for members. It also urged continued studies by the DPE's Labor Institute for Human Enrichment on specific problems, stronger ties with labor organizations of other countries, and expansion of the AFL-CIO's capabilities in the area of technological developments.

"The speed with which new equipment is being introduced, and the enormous changes in work organization, management control, job design and employment levels . . . present organized labor with one of its greatest challenges ever," the convention warned.

Delegates took part in two days of workshops to explore the international scope of technological change and various avenues to combat its adverse effect.

IN HIS OPENING remarks to the convention, Department President Albert Shanker said the economic course of the 1980s and beyond will have a direct bearing on the department's widening scope.

This should follow, Shanker suggested, from the increasing talk of reindustrialization. When plants are redesigned, there is a tremendous shift from the traditional makeup of the workforce to white-collar, professional and technical jobs, he noted.

With the coming of these changes, it is especially essential that government support of social programs be increased, not slashed as the Reagan Administration has done, Shanker noted.

INVESTMENTS must go beyond plant and equipment, he said, stressing the need to restore funding for health, humanities and education programs.

DPE Director Jack Golodner noted in his report to the delegates that more than 50 percent of the U.S. workforce is already employed in technical and professional jobs. This is reflected in the department's membership growth and expansion to 27 affiliates.

In an address to the delegates, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland commended the DPE's research studies on the problems of white-collar, technical and women workers as a vital contribution to the pursuits of all federation affiliates in organizing collective bargaining and legislative activities.

KIRKLAND SAID the department's pioneering efforts in human enrichment programs "have opened many doors to higher education and to deeper understanding and appreciation of the arts" by union members and their families.

These contributions are particularly valuable in the face of the Administration's regressive social philosophy, he observed.

The convention re-elected DPE officers to new two-year terms. Besides Shanker, who is president of the Teachers, they include Vice President Victor Fuentealba, president of the Musicians, and Treas. Rodney Bower, who heads the Professional & Technical Engineers. The department's 27 vice presidents on the executive board are chosen by the affiliates they represent. The DPE director is appointed.

IN RESTRUCTURING the per capita tax paid by affiliates, the convention approved increased monthly payments to 10 cents per worker from the current 5 cents on the first 10,000 members, effective Dec. 1. Affiliates will continue to pay 5 cents per member up to 150,000 members, and 1¼ cents in excess of 150,000.

The more than 30 resolutions adopted by the convention included measures calling for the restoration of funds for the arts and humanities slashed by the Reagan budget, opposition to Administration block grants for education that would threaten services for millions of children, rejection of new attempts in the Senate to pass tuition tax credits, enactment of federal legislation to block the concentration of power in the news publishing and broadcast media, and rebuffing efforts to scuttle the Fairness Doctrine and Equal Time provisions of the Communications Act.

Panelists in the workshops on technological change underlined the need to develop systems incorporating a special responsibility through contract negotiations, legislation and employer cooperation.

SPEAKERS CITED examples of "technological scabbing" and intimidation of workers through the use of sophisticated computer systems at a variety of levels—between plants, between companies within a country and even on an international basis where employers play workers of one country against those of another.

Workshop panelists included Harley Shaiken of Massachusetts Institute of Technology; David Lea, assistant general secretary of the British Trades Union Congress; Fritz Hauser, labor counselor of the West German embassy, and Robert Cole, director of Japanese Studies at Michigan State University.

PROFESSIONAL EMPLOYEES delegates meet to discuss the growing interest of white collar workers in unions and the effects of an explosion of technological change in business and industry. Albert Shanker, president of the AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees, chairs the department's convention, which included a half-day conference on new technology. Seated are, from left, DPE-Treas. Rodney A. Bower; Vice President Victor W. Fuentealba; and Director Jack Golodner.

Illegal Immigrants Termed Victims of Double Standard

New York—America has no place for a "double standard" applied to illegal workers, and their status should be corrected as soon as possible, Rev. Theodore Hesburgh told convention delegates.

A significant step in that direction, the president of Notre Dame University said, came in the unanimous recommendation of a national commission he headed which called for the legalization of illegal aliens who have been working in the country since Jan. 1, 1980, and are in good standing with the law.

IN TAKING that action, "we wanted to free these many people who live in the shadows and who are not really a part of this land," he said.

Undocumented workers are often victimized by unscrupulous employers, Hesburgh pointed out. He noted that they are subject to long hours at less than the minimum wage and no overtime pay, cannot join a union and are constantly threatened with deportation.

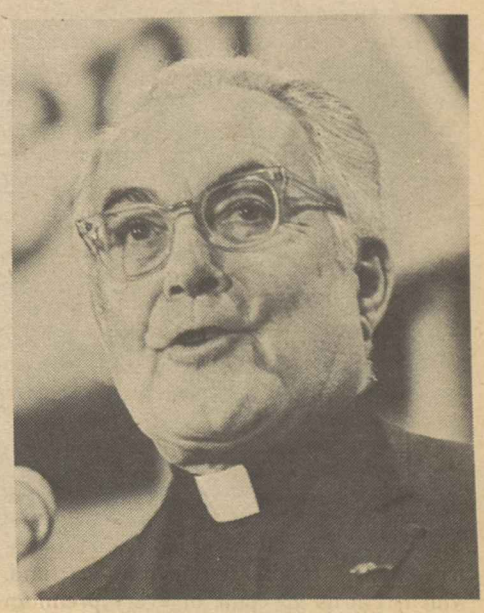
THE PRICE OF legislation, Hesburgh stressed, is to cut the flow of illegal immigration. Most illegal workers come to America, understandably, to find a better life, but America today "simply cannot accept everyone who wants to come here."

Railway & Airline Clerks Vice President J .F. Otero served with Hesburgh on the Select Commission on Immigration & Refugee Policy. Hesburgh also is co-chairman with AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland of a public committee working for reform of immigration policy.

In his address, Hesburgh pointed out that the exploitation of illegal aliens harms all workers.

"Their condition depresses wages and working conditions generally across our land," he said. "America has no place for this depressing double standard for workers and should regularize it as soon as possible by legalization."

HESBURGH SAID two key elements should be included in immigration policy reform:



- Sanctions to penalize employers who exploit undocumented workers.
- Development of documents—such as an upgraded social security card—that can't be counterfeited for job-seekers to use when applying for work.

Although the Reagan Administration has a plan for legalization of undocumented workers, it would impose "such harsh conditions stretching out over 15 years that no one in his right mind would apply," he said.

He suggested that more flexibility keyed to economic conditions should be written into the nation's immigration and refugee laws.

"IN TIMES of economic prosperity, we can afford to be more generous with immigrants and refugees to do our share in helping with this enormous problem which affects 16 million people in the world today," Hesburgh observed.

But in times of high unemployment as the nation is now experiencing, he said "our first obligation is to find work for Americans, especially minority Americans," who are bearing the heaviest burden.

REV. THEODORE HESBURGH

Fair, Humane Immigration Policy Pressed

New York—A fair U.S. immigration policy must take into account the interests of American citizens, deal humanely with illegal workers already part of the community and provide for enforcement of immigration laws, the AFL-CIO declared.

The federation firmly rejects the Administration's proposed guest-worker program with Mexico or any other temporary worker arrangements, a convention resolution stressed.

STIFF PENALTIES against employers who hire illegal immigrants should be made law, the AFL-CIO urged, pointing out that enforcement of such laws would depend on the establishment of a counterfeit-proof identification document.

The resolution said an effective immigration policy requires increased resources for border control and internal enforcement and more staff and funding for the Immigration & Naturalization Service.

Illegal immigrants who have developed ties to American communities should have their status legalized, provided further illegal immigration is curbed the AFL-CIO said. The resolution called the Administration's proposals for legal status "so harsh that they are a mockery of the concept of amnesty."

ADMINISTRATION plans would sharply limit the number of illegal immigrants allowed to apply for naturalization, subject them to a 15-year waiting period, deny them reunification with their families and demand payment of taxes without the right to benefits granted other taxpayers, such as unemployment compensation. Proficiency in English also would be demanded.

The resolution stressed that any expansion of legal immigration must depend on solving other problems first, including unemployment. Time should be allowed for the absorption of the millions of illegal workers already in the system as well as the many refugees who have arrived in the last ten years, the convention said.

Refugees from political persecution should continue to find a haven in the United States, the AFL-CIO said. It stressed, however, that the United States cannot by itself accept the 15 million refugees worldwide, and other nations must take more responsibility for refugees.

THE RESOLUTION deplored the harsh treatment of some refugees trying to enter the United States, treatment that in some cases has resulted in deaths. The resolution termed the transfer of Haitian refugees to detention in a camp in one of the coldest regions in upper New York State "an act of vindictiveness."

A guest worker program would worsen the nation's serious unemployment problems, the AFL-CIO said, pointing out that women and minority workers would be hardest hit.

Railway & Airline Clerks Vice President Jack Otero, praising the resolution, stressed that the United States needs an immigration policy "of compassion, a policy of fairness and equality." He branded the current policy "obsolete, unenforceable and incapable of dealing" with the sub-culture of six million illegal workers already in the United States.

Richard Chavez of the Farm Workers declared that a guest-worker program at a time of such high unemployment would be "a form of union-busting."

LABEL AND SHOP CARD use and promotion were central topics at the Union Label & Service Trades Dept.'s 60th convention. Delegates adopted resolutions urging the wider use and promotion of the union label and shop card and focusing on the problem of jobs lost to unfair competition from the imports of low-wage countries.

Union Label Convention Approves Per Capita Rise to Fuel Expansion

New York—The 60th convention of the AFL-CIO Union Label & Service Trades Dept. approved a per capita tax increase to cover expansion of the department's union label and shop card promotion programs and its boycott activities.

Monthly per capita payments will go from three cents per member each month to four cents on Jan. 1, 1982. The constitutional change also authorizes the executive board to raise the per capita payment by another cent after Jan. 1, 1983, if that is deemed necessary. Affiliates would be given three months' notice of the increase.

THE TAX PAID by local union label and service trades councils will go from $12 to $25 per year, and the initiation fee for newly chartered councils will rise to $25 from $15.

Sec.-Treas. Earl D. McDavid, reporting on activities since its 1979 meeting, stressed that the department is "a servant of the entire AFL-CIO" under its chartered responsibility "to be of substantial assistance to the entire labor movement."

McDavid announced that he will resign as secretary-treasurer on Feb. 28, 1982, but will remain on the staff as a representative based in Seattle to help improve the delivery of the department's services to the Far West and to organize local councils in the area. Dept. President John E. Mara, who is also a vice president of the Food & Commercial Workers, continues in his four-year term.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland told the convention that the department's growth and its record of success with its programs have helped undermine the credibility "of some of the heavy thinkers, academics and journalists who specialize in predicting the decline and fall of the American labor movement."

The department has chartered 187 new local union label and service trades councils since the last convention, Kirkland pointed out, and he praised its efforts to successfully resolve boycotts against J. P. Stevens & Co. and Winn-Dixie Stores, "the leading anti-union forces in their respective industries."

More and more consumers, Kirkland said, are learning to look for the union label in the marketplace as a result of the department's programs.

"IF THESE ARE signs of decline," Kirkland quipped, "we surely need more of it."

He told the convention the AFL-CIO is reappraising the labor movement's public relations and communications programs, and one of the first results has been the setting of new standards and streamlining of procedures for handling boycotts.

One of the aims of the AFL-CIO's exploration of new electronic communications with members and the public is to help "increase the scope and impact of work of this department, which is a vital part of the AFL-CIO," Kirkland said.

IN HIS SUMMARY of department programs, McDavid pointed out that since 1978, when the department began an intensive regional effort to organize local label councils within state and local bodies, 268 new councils have been chartered, giving the department a total of 373 councils.

In 1980, he said, the department published its 223-page consumer directory of union-made products and services and has maintained its policy of providing label and service trades information on request to organizations and individuals along with its programs promoting the purchase of union-made goods.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council guidelines for boycotts put primary responsibility for the action on the union involved, McDavid pointed out, stressing that the department is prepared to support the boycott "to whatever extent that AFL-CIO union wants support, whether it be money or manpower, or whatever is needed."

AMONG THE 72 resolutions acted on by the delegates were measures covering:

- Encouragement of the use of union label products and services by public and voluntary agencies.
- Use of union-made clothing and tools on the job.
- Continuation and expansion of the department's boycott programs on behalf of affiliates.
- Endorsement of the AFL-CIO fair trade policy and fair regulation of imports.
- Development of an awards program to recognize achievement by workers and their employers in the production of union goods and use of union services and skills.

States Called Battleground On Workers' Compensation

New York—The AFL-CIO called on its affiliates to resist attempts to cut back workers' compensation and to seek to strengthen state programs, especially in coverage of occupational disease.

A convention resolution reaffirmed the AFL-CIO's support for establishment of federal minimum standards for state workers' compensation benefits. But because "it is apparent that there will be no federal standards legislation in the immediate future," the current battleground is the states, the resolution said.

IT NOTED attempts to weaken existing protections, some of which have been successful. In Florida, compensation for permanent partial disability will be allowed only when there is a direct wage loss except in extreme cases such as amputations or at least 80 percent loss of vision.

The resolution commended the Ohio AFL-CIO and the state's voters for having decisively beaten a proposal on the ballot that would have undermined Ohio's exclusive state workers' compensation fund, which returns 95 cents of every premium dollar in benefit payments.

Speaking on the resolution, Ohio State AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Warren J. Smith noted that employers in nearby states were paying higher premiums than firms in Ohio, while workers were receiving lower benefits.

"THE MESSAGE is a simple one," he said. "Get the hands of the private insurers out of the pockets of our employers and out of the pockets of the insured workers and there will be more than enough funds to adequately fund workers' compensation."

Smith noted that Ohio's program was based on legislation sponsored by William Green, later to become president of the American Federation of Labor, when he was a state senator.

A SEPARATE convention resolution strongly opposed efforts in Congress to reduce benefits to injured federal and postal workers.

The way to save on benefit costs, the resolution stressed, is to "provide safe working conditions" and not to weaken protection of the Federal Employee Compensation Act.

Effective Care Urged For Mental Patients

New York—The AFL-CIO reaffirmed its opposition to "dumping" mentally ill and severely retarded patients on the community in order to cut down on institutional costs.

The convention adopted a resolution urging effective protection of the interests of the patients and "equitable arrangements," including retraining and alternate employment, for institutional workers whose jobs are eliminated.

State Bodies Applauded on R-T-W Battle

New York—The AFL-CIO will continue to give high priority to the battle against state "right-to-work" laws and to an array of other anti-labor measures being pressed in state legislatures.

An attempt to outlaw the union shop through "right-to-work" laws in any state "is a threat to the entire labor movement," the convention warned.

THE RESOLUTION applauded the work of state central bodies that have been instrumental in turning back attacks on the union shop, and urged the AFL-CIO Executive Council "to continue with its programs of seeking special assistance to state bodies confronted with threats of right-to-work laws."

It urged "a special effort to increase the number of affiliates in all state and local central bodies," especially those "bearing the brunt of the attack on free collective bargaining."

Leaders of state labor federations in Colorado, Connecticut and New Mexico spoke during floor discussion on the resolution of the repeated battles over labor's collective bargaining rights in states that have been targeted by the National Right to Work Committee.

The AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services was lauded for effective assistance to the state federations.

IN NEARLY every state, the convention noted in a separate resolution, labor's legislative achievements of past years are under heavy attack. It urged:

- Continued assistance to central bodies from the AFL-CIO field staff.
- Expanded research and training services to state bodies on legislative issues.
- Interchange of information among state bodies.
- Wide coverage in the labor press of the threat of punitive legislation in the legislature.
- Encouragement by international unions of affiliations by their locals with state central bodies.

Jobless Benefits Cutback Assailed As Safety Net Rip

New York—Federal and state action to repair deliberately inflicted rips in the unemployment compensation safety net was called for by the AFL-CIO.

A convention resolution cited the cutbacks in the extended benefits program, begun under the Carter Administration and intensified under the Reagan Administration. It noted taxation of jobless benefits for the first time and a severe tightening of eligibility for compensation.

THE CONVENTION pressed for repeal of the regressive measures, which are especially oppressive during the present period of recession with rising unemployment. The current 8 percent jobless rate, the resolution noted, is the fruit of the Reagan Administration's "deliberate policy" of high unemployment as a check of inflation.

Budget pressures have been used as an excuse to cut back unemployment entitlements, the resolution noted. But "there is no reason why the state expenditures for unemployment compensation should be part of the federal budget," and they should not be so included, the resolution stated.

The convention reiterated labor's support for the establishment of federal minimum benefit standards, as urged by the National Commission on Unemployment Compensation. But "until that goal is achieved," the resolution urged, states should take the initiative in easing harsh eligibility and disqualification provisions "and to increase weekly benefit amounts and benefit duration periods."

Seek Share of Cargo

Maritime Unions Look To Coal Export Stimulus

New York — Unions in the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. are looking to coal exports for an energy-hungry world as a lever to revive U.S. shipping and shipbuilding industries that have been allowed to sink to dangerously low levels.

A key resolution adopted at the department's biennial convention called for "rebuilding the U.S. dry-bulk fleet by means of legislation calling for the carriage of a portion of our coal exports in U.S.-flag vessels."

THE RESOLUTION noted that the United States—"the world's leading trading nation"—carries less than 4 percent of the cargoes it generates in American-flag vessels. The nation's merchant fleet includes "a mere 15 dry-bulk vessels, mostly very old," the convention noted.

Legislation to reserve a share of dry-bulk cargo for U.S. vessels through bilateral agreements with America's trading partners has been approved by the House Merchant Marine Committee as part of a port development bill, and is now before the House Public Works Committee, which shares jurisdiction.

The convention delegates, representing unions with 8.5 million members, included in the maritime policy resolution a call for utilization of the merchant fleet as a naval auxiliary. They urged "targeted tax relief" to strengthen the competitive position of U.S. shipping companies.

A report to the convention by President Frank Drozak, Vice President Stephen J. Leslie and Executive Sec.-Treas. Jean F. Ingrao stressed labor's continued strong opposition to any export or exchange of oil from Alaska's North Slope.

On the periodic proposals that have been made to allow the sale of Alaskan oil to Japan, a convention resolution warned of lost jobs "in every maritime-related industry" and in pipeline and refinery development, along with a "dangerous" increase in the nation's dependence on foreign oil.

The department also took a strong stand against any weakening of the Jones Act, which reserves cargo and passenger service between U.S. ports for American-built, American-crewed vessels. It urged trade with the Virgin Islands be brought back under the Jones Act.

AFL-CIO PRESIDENT Lane Kirkland pledged the federation's continued support for the restoration of the nation's sea power, which he linked to national security goals.

"No matter how high the defense budget goes," Kirkland told the delegates, "America's safety cannot be assured until we have the sealift capacity and the maritime skills to transport our military forces and sustain our allies anywhere in the world."

House Merchant Marine Committee Chairman Walter Jones (D-N.C.) said his committee intends to make it "crystal clear" that cargo preference laws requiring transport of government-originated cargo in U.S. vessels must be "strictly and faithfully carried out."

REP. MARIO Biaggi (D-N.Y.), chairman of the Merchant Marine subcommittee dealing with the department's legislative priorities, and House Public Works Committee Chairman James Howard (D-N.J.) stressed the importance of port development to achieve the full potential of coal exports.

The convention also heard from two Senate supporters of the department's goals —Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), sponsor of port development legislation, and Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R-Md.).

U.S. Maritime Administrator Harold Shear, who came to his post as a Navy admiral, told the delegates he shared their belief in "the importance of a strong U.S.-flag presence on the world's trade routes" and the need for a strong merchant marine in time of war. He promised to do "whatever is humanly possible to reverse the declining trend in our shipping industry."

THE TWO-DAY convention dealt with 115 resolutions, covering the broad range of the labor movement's concerns as well as the issues of special interest to maritime-related unions.

The department expressed concern at attempts in Congress to weaken the Longshoremen's & Harborworkers' Compensation Act, protested the move to enlarge the Hobbs Act so that picket-line incidents would be prosecuted as federal crimes, and sounded an alert against management consultants hired to thwart the collective bargaining process.

It urged the importance of the Strategic Petroleum Reserve "to insure immediate availability of oil supplies in the event of a supply cutoff." And it warned against allowing the skills and capacities of the U.S. shipbuilding industry to be wiped out through abandonment to foreign shipyards.

RECOGNITION of his long service to the AFL-CIO Maritime Trades Dept. comes to former MTD Vice President Jack McDonald, center, in a special award. Department President Frank Drozak, left and Vice President Stephen J. Leslie presented the plaque during the department's 1981 convention. McDonald, a former Operating Engineers' vice president, helped found the MTD in 1946 and served as its vice president until his retirement in 1979. He was succeeded by Leslie, also an Operating Engineers' vice president.

Federal Ban Sought On 'Lie Detectors'

New York—The AFL-CIO urged Congress to enact effective safeguards against "lie detector" tests that employers are using to intimidate workers while violating their right to privacy.

Although scientific studies have disproved the notion that these tests can accurately measure honesty, a convention resolution noted, 500,000 workers were subjected to polygraph tests last year.

The resolution cited the findings of a congressional commission which in 1974 determined that the use of polygraph devices are an "unreasonable invasion of privacy" and called for legislation banning their use, manufacture and sale.

State licensing provisions, the convention said, offer little protection for workers and instead legitimize the use of the devices.

'Appropriate Action' Pledged To Achieve Equality in Pay

New York—The AFL-CIO will take "all appropriate action" to bring about equal pay for "work of comparable value" and to remove all barriers to equal opportunity for women.

A convention resolution stressed that working women continue to suffer from widespread discrimination in the workplace and urged the federation's affiliates to adopt the concept of comparable worth in bargaining and to use the bargaining process to correct pay inequities just as it is used to remedy other types of unfairness.

EQUAL OPPORTUNITY would be enhanced, another resolution declared, with the establishment by Congress of a comprehensive national system of quality, 24-hour a day child care to aid working parents.

Working women at full-time jobs, the AFL-CIO said, earn only 59 cents for every dollar earned by men working full time. The federation cited a 1981 study done by the National Academy of Science for the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission which tied the differential squarely to discrimination.

THE EQUAL PAY resolution urged AFL-CIO affiliates to use contract negotiations to "upgrade undervalued job classifications regardless of whether they are typically considered 'male' or 'female' jobs."

Another action urged by the AFL-CIO is joint union-employer pay equity studies to "identify and correct internal inequities" between predominantly female and predominantly male job classifications.

AFL-CIO Vice President Joyce Miller, speaking in support of the resolution, called the comparable worth issue "critical" to all workers, a trade union issue that will improve the economic condition of men as well as women.

With women workers available at cheaper wages than men, "trade unionists know what that means . . . men will be fired and women hired," Service Employees Delegate Rosemary Trump said.

WOMEN WORKERS are entering the workforce in record numbers, the convention pointed out. It noted that many are the sole support of their families or work because their paychecks offer "the only hope their families have of keeping up with uncontrolled inflation."

The resolution on day care observed that many women are forced to leave children with "relatives, friends, strangers, even alone and unattended, just to earn money to put food on the table."

The choice between properly caring for children and properly providing for them should not be forced on women living and working in the United States, the AFL-CIO said.

"EVERY AMERICAN woman is entitled to the right to work in support of her family free from the worry that her children are not being properly looked after," the convention declared, adding that children are entitled to experienced professional care while their parents are at work.

Women's Groups Aligned with Unions on Rights

New York—Women's groups marched with the trade union movement on Solidarity Day and will be aligned with labor in the election battle ahead, President Eleanor Smeal of the National Organization of Women told the convention.

"We stand in solidarity with the trade unionists," she said, "determined to protect the last 50 years of victories for workers' rights, minority rights, women's rights, and determined not to go backwards."

SMEAL TOLD the delegates she has found "growing discontent" with the policies and budget actions of the Reagan Administration. In fact, she suggested, her own organization and "for solidarity among groups committed to social progress."

The Administration has been "a consciousness raiser for all those who thought we couldn't go backwards," she said. "The Reagan Administration is proving that the workers of this country need a vigorous trade union movement, women need a vigorous women's rights movement, and minorities and blacks need a vigorous civil rights movement."

Smeal described the fight for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment as "a bread-and-butter issue" involving the use of women as a source of "cheap labor."

IT'S NOT coincidence, she suggested, that legislators who vote against ERA have the highest ratings from employer groups and the poorest labor voting records.

"We have common allies, common goals and common opponents," Smeal stressed.

Smeal said the people who are saying that the women's movement is dead, "that we've had our decade," are the same who say that the civil rights movement was over after the decade of the sixties, and who think that trade unionism stopped after the era of the sweatshops.

THE COALITION of Labor Union Women and today's labor leaders generally have been quick to recognize "the new political potential of women," Smeal said. "We will march in solidarity again and again."

Smeal received a standing ovation from the delegates as she closed with a hope for "a better tomorrow" in which all people can live up to their full potential, with "decency and dignity" in the workplace, in a society "in which men and women, blacks and whites, don't have to make intolerable choices," and where "we indeed can control our own destiny."

ELEANOR SMEAL

Senate Panel Bars Reagan NLRB Choice

The Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee has rejected President Reagan's nominee to chair the National Labor Relations Board, John R. Van de Water.

The AFL-CIO has strongly opposed Van de Water's nomination because of his active and partisan role on the side of management in employer-union disputes over much of his career.

NEWS OF THE Senate panel's vote brought cheers from the delegates attending the AFL-CIO's convention in New York. Federation President Lane Kirkland urged Reagan to nominate "a fair-minded neutral who believes in the right to organize and collectively bargain as set forth in the law."

In testimony before the Senate Labor Committee this fall, AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue charged that Van de Water's management consultant activities over the years showed him to be "an active anti-union partisan, opposed to the exercise by employees of their right to choose union representation, and opposed to people's efforts to gain access to collective bargaining.

"We do not believe that union organizers or management opposers of organization should serve on the NLRB," Donahue said.

THE VAN DE WATER nomination was rejected after Republican Sen. Lowell Weicker of Connecticut joined the seven Democrats on the Labor & Human Resources Committee to produce two 8-8 tie votes on reporting the nomination out to the full Senate favorably. Motions die on tie votes.

Weicker said that because Van de Water during his years as a consultant "decided to cast his lot clearly with business, with management," he would not be perceived as an objective board member.

The seven Democratic Senators on the committee are Edward M. Kennedy (Mass.), Jennings Randolph (W.Va.), Harrison Williams Jr. (N.J.), Claiborne Pell (R.I.), Thomas F. Eagleton (Mo.), Donald W. Riegle (Mich.), and Howard M. Metzenbaum (Ohio).

Van de Water, 64, has served as NLRB chairman since August under a recess appointment by the President. He could continue as chairman until next year without Senate confirmation.

HE HEADED his own California consulting firm, Van de Water Associates, from 1949 until his appointment. He also served as a management representative for both the Ford Motor Co. and North American Aviation, Inc.

During his Senate testimony, Donahue submitted materials compiled by the AFL-CIO's Los Angeles-Orange County Organizing Committee for 1964-72 revealing that Van de Water's firm served in at least 18 campaigns to defeat efforts of workers to organize unions.

Donahue urged the committee to look into this case and others in which Van de Water had been involved to determine whether the nominee had engaged in "persuader activities." Advising employers during a campaign would be a persuader activity, and would have to be reported under the Landrum-Griffin Act.

1982 Elections Designated For Next Solidarity Protest

New York — Solidarity Day 1982 will be Election Day, Nov. 2, the AFL-CIO declared in a convention resolution that urged union members and their allies to "mobilize" and "march to the polls in unprecedented numbers" to elect a Congress that will "reverse the disastrous policies of the Reagan Administration and restore humane government to the American people."

The resolution applauded the success of Solidarity Day 1981, Sept. 19, which drew more than 400,000 union members and supporters of human rights, religious, consumer, environmental and other allied groups to Washington for the largest protest march staged in the nation's capital.

Besides the huge number of protesters, the success of Solidarity Day also lay in the relationships developed and strengthened between the labor movement and its allies at the national and community levels. These relationships must be carried forward to keep the "spirit of Solidarity Day" fresh, the convention said.

That spirit has since made its mark on the local level in the successful campaign against a tuition tax credit initiative on the District of Columbia ballot, the resolution noted. The issue was defeated by a margin of 89 percent.

Nationally, the resolution said, Solidarity Day "has encouraged increasing resistance in the Congress to the President's domestic policies and proposals."

The massive turnout for Solidarity Day is only a beginning, the resolution stressed. It said labor must accelerate its legislative and political efforts locally and nationally "to ensure that the hundreds of thousands who came to Washington on Sept. 19 continue to be heard loud and clear."

The convention pledged to renew and strengthen the Budget Coalition put together in 1981 to fight the Administration's cuts in federal funds for human services. The coalition's job will be to "fight again to meet vital social needs, to end the recession and offset the damage it has already done," the resolution pledged.

One of the successes of Solidarity Day, the convention observed, was that it renewed working relations among international unions and state and local central bodies. The resolution said the AFL-CIO will work to "sustain the spirit of Solidarity Day" in local communities and strengthen newly formed bonds with "friends who share our goals" as part of the Election Day effort.

AFL-CIO Vice President William Wynn, president of the Food & Commercial Workers, observed in floor discussion of the resolution that the next Solidarity Day will "return to the Congress of this country, to our state and local offices, the kind of representatives who will have compassion and understanding for all of the people and not just the privileged."

Solidarity Day was a message "to our government, to our employers and to all of corporate America to call off their anti-union dogs" and end their "divide and conquer" tactics, AFL-CIO Vice President William Winpisinger, head of the Machinists, declared.

Before taking up the resolution, delegates showed an AFL-CIO film highlighting the events of the Solidarity Day demonstration.

Convention Spurs Union Label Use

New York—Union Label Week will be observed Sept. 6-11, 1982, and Sept. 5-10, 1983, the AFL-CIO directed in a convention resolution.

The weeks are set aside to promote the use of the union label and shop card and to encourage consumers to buy union made products and services.

The convention also urged AFL-CIO affiliates to participate in the 1982 and 1983 Union-Industries Shows, produced and managed by the Union Label & Service Trades Dept., and to support the department's work by providing information on the use of labels and shop cards and on labor's boycotts in their publications.

Checkoff Pressed to Offset Corporate Political Funds

New York—Unions can help narrow the wide advantage in political funding that corporate and conservative groups hold over labor by promoting voluntary checkoff contributions from their members, the convention said.

The 1980 elections demonstrated the fast-growing funding gap between unions and opposing political action committees, the convention pointed out. It noted that campaign contributions by right-wing and business PACs were five times greater than that of labor. In the 1978 elections, the edge was 2½ to 1.

"THE AFL-CIO has long urged public financing for all federal elections to avoid turning them into auctions," the resolution observed. But it warned that until a public financing measure is adopted, "it is vital that labor's capacity to help fund its endorsed candidates be dramatically increased.

"Checkoff is the only means through which the AFL-CIO can provide enough funding to endorsed candidates to offset the tremendous amounts their opponents receive from corporate, trade association and right-wing PACs," the resolution stressed.

Looking to next year's elections, the convention called for an outpouring of union members to polling places with the same spirit that brought hundreds of thousands of persons to Solidarity Day demonstration in Washington.

TO MAINTAIN the "momentum" of Solidarity Day the convention urged that the next general election, Nov. 2, 1982, be designated as Solidarity Day II.

It called for continued cooperation by the federation and its affiliates with the more than 200 allied organizations that contributed to the huge Solidarity Day turnout, channeling that spirit into support of "candidates concerned about jobs, social justice and equitable taxation."

In its report to the convention, the Executive Council noted that although labor's overall outlook for the 1982 election improved, prospects for gains by progressives in Congress are still clouded.

IN THE SENATE, there will be 20 Democratic seats and only 12 Republican seats contested. Only a handful of GOP seats appear vulnerable, and some of these are held by moderates.

In the House, the real impact of redistricting is still unknown, although the shift of 17 seats from the Northeast and Midwest to the Sunbelt could enhance opportunities for conservative candidates, the report observed.

Labor to Join in Marking LaGuardia Centennial

New York—The AFL-CIO will join in the Dec. 12, 1982 celebration of the 100th anniversary of the birth of Fiorello H. LaGuardia, late mayor of New York who was a staunch friend of labor during his 1934-1945 tenure in office and throughout his public service.

A convention resolution on the LaGuardia centennial pointed out that he had begun his career as a union lawyer before World War I. As a congressman, he was co-author of the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932 that limited the use of injunctions against unions and outlawed the yellow dog contract.

Economic Index Shows Recession Worsening

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI Saturday, December 5, 1981 No. 48

By James M. Shevis

The government's index of leading economic indicators showed that the nation's economy suffered another sharp setback in October with prospects of further deepening of the current recession.

The measure, which is intended to forecast trends in the economy, fell 1.8 percent over the month, following a 2.2-percent drop in September and a decline of six-tenths of 1 percent in August. It was the first three-month string of declines in the index since the March-through-May series last year, which set the stage for the recession.

THE INDEX is made up of 12 components but only 10 are available at the time of the first report for each month. Six of the 10 declined in October, two fewer than in the previous month. The increase in the manufacturing layoff rate accounted for about 40 percent of the decline. The unemployment rate rose to 8 percent in October, and is expected to continue rising.

A drop in building permits, reflecting the continued slump in the housing industry, and a drop in new orders for consumer goods accounted for most of the rest of the index's decline. Also down were the pace of deliveries, changes in liquid assets, and orders adjusted for inflation. Increasing for the month were the average workweek, crude materials prices, stock prices, and the money supply adjusted for inflation.

Robert Ortner, chief economist for the Commerce Dept., which issued the report, said the October decline "strongly reflects the current business condition and what is likely to be developing over the next few months." He predicted that real gross national product—the value of the nation's total output of goods and services—would drop at an annual rate of nearly 5 percent in the current quarter, and at a slower rate in the first three months of 1982.

SUPPORTING his prediction was a report from the auto industry that November production declined 25 percent to 414,046 units from the year-earlier out-

Council Welcomes Talks with Reagan Despite Deep Split

By David L. Perlman

AFL-CIO leaders told President Reagan that the trade union movement has "deep, principled differences" with his economic policies but welcomes a promise that labor's voice will henceforth be heard during the shaping of Administration policies.

A Dec. 2 White House meeting, initiated by the President, inaugurated an exchange of views that Reagan said he hopes will be continued on a regular basis.

THE AFL-CIO Executive Council was represented by President Lane Kirkland, Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue and 26 federation vice presidents. Joining Reagan around the Cabinet table were Vice President George Bush, Labor Sec. Raymond J. Donovan and top-level White House and department officials. Bush and Donovan were designated by Reagan to set up procedures for continuing consultations.

Kirkland made clear in a statement issued after meeting that the AFL-CIO delegation expressed serious concern over "excessive and mounting unemployment" and the damage done by the deepening recession. (Text, Page 2.)

THE COUNCIL members noted their disagreement with Administration budget and tax policies and their concern that these policies will "aggravate the human problems of working people in a time of severe recession," Kirkland said.

"Labor's approach to national, social and economic issues is at deep variance with that of the Administration," Kirkland observed. He said the council's recommendation to the President was based on the "strong anti-recession program" adopted at the AFL-CIO's recent convention.

That program, in sharp contrast to Administration budget-cutting, calls for funding local public works projects to provide immediate jobs. It would expand housing programs, restore the public service employment program and move toward shoring up the nation's basic industries through targeted government loans, interest subsidies and tax benefits.

KIRKLAND SAID the council members also "urged the President to give humane consideration to the problems of the air traffic controllers and their families."

They called on the President to put the controllers back on the job "so as to restore normal air traffic service as soon as possible, spare the public further inconvenience, and permit the thousands of other furloughed air industry employees to return to work."

At a White House news briefing later that day, White House aides said "the entire matter" of the air traffic controllers is being discussed within the Administration but that no decision has been made.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL members who took part in the White House meeting, in addition to Kirkland and Donahue, were Vice Presidents John H. Lyons, Thomas W. Gleason, Frederick O'Neal, Martin J. Ward, Murray H. Finley, Albert Shanker, Sol C. Chaikin, Edward T. Hanley, Angelo Fosco, Charles H. Pillard,

Conference on Aging Told

Social Security 'Crisis' Fabricated to Fit Budget

By Susan Dunlop

AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman accused opponents of social security of manufacturing a crisis over the system's financial state to persuade Americans to accept deep cuts in benefits.

Seidman told the White House Conference on Aging that the system is sound and its future financial health can be assured by calm congressional action.

IN A KEYNOTE address to the conference's Committee on Economic Well-Being, which is preparing recommendations on social security, Seidman pointed out that attacks on the system are not new, but the program today "is under its most intensive assault in its 40-year history." The voices critical of social security "are more strident, and, what is worse, they are the voices of those in high places in our government," he said.

He charged that the Administration is seeking "to perpetuate the myth that social security teeters on the brink of bankruptcy" and can only be rescued by making sweeping changes in current and future benefits.

Social security, he said, has become a "target of opportunity" for the Administration, "a means by which to balance the federal budget at the expense of social security recipients."

NOT ONLY is the system not facing bankruptcy, Seidman asserted, but its short-term financial problems can be readily eased by beefing up the inflation-plagued Old Age & Survivors Insurance fund through reallocation of taxes, interfund borrowing and permitting borrowing from general revenues.

Solving that short-range crunch will give Congress time "away from the crisis atmosphere calmly to debate needed long-range changes, he told the committee. Current predictions issued by the Adminis-

'80 Job Injury, Death Rate Down

By John R. Oravec

The rate of job-connected injuries, illness and fatalities among private sector workers declined last year for the first time in five years, the Bureau of Labor reported.

BLS said that its survey of records that employers maintain under provisions of the federal job safety law showed that about one worker in every 12 experienced an injury or illness during 1980, compared with a ratio of 1 in 11 in each of the four previous years.

WHILE JOB-RELATED injuries dropped to 5.6 million in 1980 from 6.1 million in 1979, BLS said that nearly 20 percent of the half-million decline can be attributed to a decrease in total hours worked from 1979 to 1980.

The annual BLS report noted that the all-industry incidence rate fell from 9.5 injuries and illnesses per 100 full-time workers in 1979 to 8.7 in 1980, with about 10 percent of that decline attributed to the drop in working hours worked.

Job-related deaths in workplaces with 11 or more workers also declined from 4,950 in 1979 to 4,400 in 1980 as the fatality rate for this category eased from 8.6 per 100,000 workers in 1979 to 7.7 last year, the BLS said.

THE NUMBER of reported occupational illnesses was down over the year to 130,200 from 148,900 in 1979, the report noted.

BLS pointed out, however, that the recording and reporting of occupational illness continues to present measurement problems since employers and physicians often don't recognize a worker's illness to be job-connected. As a result, it said, the survey understates the occurrence of work-connected disease and illness.

AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor traced the overall improvement in the statistics to the efforts of former Assistant Labor Sec. Eula Bingham in developing effective OSHA standards and strengthening enforcement.

Taylor warned that the Reagan Administration's campaign to reverse the programs instituted by Bingham could seriously jeopardize the health and safety of workers and reverse the positive trend in reducing job injuries and illnesses.

The BLS report for 1980 showed that the overall occupational injury rate—excluding illnesses—declined from 9.2 per 100 full-time workers in 1979 to 8.5 in 1980. Seven of the eight major industry divisions showed improvements over the year, and only the agriculture, forestry and fishing division had a slight increase.

Construction remained the most hazardous occupation with an injury rate of 15.7 per 100 workers, followed by manufacturing, 12.2; agriculture, forestry and fishing, 11.9, and mining, 11.4.

OCCUPATIONAL injuries resulting in lost workdays declined to 2.5 million from 2.7 million in 1979, BLS reported. About 40.9 million workdays were lost last year because of injuries, compared with 42.6

Text of Kirkland Statement On Meeting with President

The following is the text of AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland's statement on the Executive Council's meeting with President Reagan.

We welcome this opportunity for an exchange of views with the President.

The AFL-CIO Executive Council expressed deep concern over the nation's excessive and mounting unemployment and the waste of resources and opportunities resulting from the deepening recession. We noted our deep, principled differences with the Administration's budget and tax policies and our concern that they will serve only to aggravate the human problems of working people in a time of severe recession.

We acknowledged that labor's approach to national, social and economic issues is at deep variance with that of the Administration, but urged the President to adopt a strong anti-recession program as contained in our recent convention resolution, adopted unanimously by the delegates from all our affiliated unions.

Among other issues discussed, we urged the President to give humane consideration to the problems of the air traffic controllers and their families. We urged returning these workers to their jobs so as to restore normal air traffic service as soon as possible, spare the public further inconvenience, and permit the thousands of other furloughed air industry employees to return to work.

We welcome the President's assurances that labor will have timely opportunities to express its views on issues of mutual concern, as the Administration's position on these issues is being formulated. The AFL-CIO is prepared to cooperate in any arrangements established to carry out this new policy.

5 Union Leaders Bring Suit For Rehiring of Controllers

Five union leaders have filed suit to require the federal government to rehire the 11,500 members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization fired in August for striking.

In an action filed in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, the union leaders charged that by refusing to rehire the controllers the Administration is violating the 1958 Air Transportation Act, which requires the government to provide "efficient, comprehensive and timely passenger and cargo air transportation under conditions of maximum safety."

THE PLAINTIFFS are Presidents Glenn Watts of the Communications Workers, Douglas Fraser of the Auto Workers, Kenneth Blaylock of the Government Employees, William H. Wynn of the Food & Commercial Workers, and Executive Director Terry Herndon of the unaffiliated National Education Association.

The suit charges that curtailment of air traffic caused by reduced staffing levels at control towers and regional centers has been "detrimental and injurious" to union officials who are required to travel by air to meet their members' needs. It also maintains that air safety has deteriorated and that the national defense has been weakened by shifting military air traffic controllers to civilian service.

At a news conference, the plaintiffs emphasized that the suit takes no position on the correctness of the Administration's initial reaction to the strike or to the Federal Labor Relations Authority's subsequent decision to decertify PATCO.

REFUSAL TO rehire the controllers "is arbitrary, capricious and an abuse of discretion within the meaning of the Administrative Procedure Act," the suit adds. The reason for the defendants' refusal is "extraneous to carrying out their statutory duties," it concludes. Defendants in the action are Federal Aviation Administrator Lynn Helms, Transportation Sec. Drew Lewis, and Director Donald Devine of the Office of Personnel Management.

Recount Affirms GOP Victory In Jersey Governor's Race

Trenton, N.J.—Republican Thomas H. Kean emerged as the winner of the closest gubernatorial election in New Jersey's history, maintaining a lead of about 1,700 votes out of 2.3 million cast through a nearly complete recount.

Rep. James J. Florio (D-N.J.), who had COPE support, conceded the outcome and Kean will take office on Jan. 19, 1982.

Rebukes Reagan Administration

ILO Protests Discharge Of U.S. Air Controllers

Geneva—The International Labor Organization has called on the Reagan Administration to lift its sanctions against the striking air traffic controllers and to resume collective bargaining with their union.

The call was sounded by the ILO's Governing Body of 56 worker, government and employer delegates as it adopted a report by its Freedom of Association Committee on the Reagan Administration's handling of the walkout by the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization.

WHILE ACKNOWLEDGING that the White House had observed the letter of the law in its dealings with PATCO, the committee sharply rebuked the U.S. government by underscoring the "severe nature" of its actions against the union and its members.

"The application of excessively severe sanctions against public servants on account of their participation in a strike cannot be conducive to the development of harmonious industrial relations," the report said.

This finding was in line with the views expressed by President Lane Kirkland in a letter to ILO Director Gen. Francis Blanchard strongly endorsing a complaint filed against the U.S. government by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

THE BRUSSELS-BASED ICFTU had charged the Reagan Administration with "infringement of basic trade union rights"—as embodied in the ILO conventions guaranteeing workers the right to strike and bargain collectively—by its heavy-handed moves against PATCO.

In its conclusions, the Freedom of Association Committee called on the Administration to consider rehiring the dismissed controllers, to waive, or at least reduce, the imposed fines and to deprive none of the strikers of the benefits of the government mortgage protection plan simply because of the strike action.

By adopting without a vote the report of its 10-member watchdog group, the Governing Body of the 146-nation ILO also made clear its condemnation of the Administration's move to decertify PATCO as the controllers' bargaining agent.

THE COMMITTEE expressed no opinion on the legality of the Administration's action because the issue was still before the courts. However, it stressed the importance it attached to having governments and other public administrations "recognize for collective bargaining purposes the organizations representative of their employees."

For this reason, the committee expressed the hope that the Administration would move toward "reopening a dialogue with PATCO."

The committee, composed of three members of each of the Governing Body's three groups of worker, employer and government representatives with an independent legal expert as chairman, also showed its concern over the use of military air controllers as substitutes for the striking PATCO members.

Responding to the calls that the Administration seek a settlement with PATCO, U.S. Deputy Under Sec. of Labor Robert W. Searby assured the Governing Body that he would communicate "accurately" to Washington the committee's conclusions and recommendations and keep the ILO informed of developments.

Seven vice presidents did not attend for reasons ranging from illness and previous commitments to opposition to the meeting.

The invitation on behalf of the President had been extended to Kirkland and the Executive Council on the eve of the AFL-CIO convention. Council members were told that "the President wants very much to receive the counsel and input of the representatives of organized labor on a continuing basis."

AFTER THE White House meeting, Kirkland said the federation welcomes "the President's assurances that labor will have timely opportunities to express its views on issues of mutual concern, as the Administration's position on these issues is being formulated."

He said the AFL-CIO will "cooperate in any arrangements established to carry out this new policy."

Seidman Hits Social Security Scare Tactic

tration that the system will not be able to meet its long-range obligations are "exceedingly questionable" because they are based on weak assumptions, Seidman said.

The White House conference, the third of its kind, opened in Washington amid charges by many organizations representing the elderly that the Administration had stacked the delegate roster with supporters of its own policies and had made rules for voting on conference recommendations that would stifle criticism of the Reagan Administration's actual and proposed budget cuts in programs that aid the elderly.

JACOB CLAYMAN, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens, voiced the NCSC's objections during a meeting with Health & Human Services Sec. Richard S. Schweiker. Clayman and other leaders had asked the secretary to change a rule that forces delegates to vote only to accept or reject the entire package of proposals coming out of the committee, but Schweiker rejected their appeal.

Seidman was chairman of the technical committee on retirement income that reported to the full panel on economic well-being.

He charged that the Administration was "perpetuating myths" that social security would be better replaced by a private insurance system, that it had reduced personal savings incentives, that it can only be saved by acquiescing in massive cuts in benefits.

THE ADMINISTRATION created a "crisis atmosphere" in which it could insist the only way to "save" social security was to make it a "smaller, less adequate program," Seidman said. That plan, he pointed out, called for cutting 40 percent from the benefits of early retirees, raising the retirement age to 68, changing the formula for determining benefits, sharply reducing the cost-of-living adjustment and creating harsh new eligibility rules for disability benefits.

These proposals "touched off a firestorm of protest" Seidman noted, and the Administration quickly asked Congress not to act until a "bipartisan commission" could study the system and report on it "once the dangerous shoals of the 1982 congressional elections had been navigated."

"The Administration has backed off on its plan to mutilate social security," Seidman said, "but it hasn't backed down."

HE SCORED Congress for allowing the Administration to cut back social security benefits in the overall budget process through elimination of the minimum monthly benefit and certain lump sum death benefits and phasing out or reducing survivors' benefits.

Congress is acting to restore the minimum benefit, Seidman noted, and he urged that "once that error in judgment" is corrected, it should deal in orderly fashion with the system's current needs.

When the short-term problems are resolved, Seidman said, Congress should consider such long-term actions as removal of social security from the unified budget and restoring the "autonomy" it had prior to fiscal 1969, establishment of an independent board to run the system, and the infusion of funds from general revenues.

THE PROBLEMS of aging call for an examination of ways to make the program work even better, Seidman stressed, particularly for women, blacks, Hispanics, Native Americans and others who "have been ill-treated in the labor market."

He cited polls showing that social security is one of the most popular government programs and observed that this "tells us there is no gulf between the generations" in support for the program "despite the Administration's attempts to drive a wedge between contributors and beneficiaries."

Fire Fighters Cite Excessive Job Hazards

Hollywood, Fla.—The rate of deaths and injuries among fire fighters across the nation continues at "unacceptably high levels, and we must work to bring it down," Fire Fighters President John A. Gannon warned at a symposium on occupational health and hazards here.

Gannon reported that the union's 1980 death and injury survey revealed that 63 fire fighters died last year in the line of duty and another 98 died as a result of occupational illnesses.

"TRANSLATING those figures into statistics, we find 61 line-of-duty deaths per 100,000, the highest of any occupation in the country," Gannon said.

Gannon spoke at a symposium conducted by the John P. Redmond Foundation, which was created by the IAFF and named for a former president of the union. It brings together doctors, scientists, manufacturers of fire service clothing and equipment, public officials, union leaders, and members of the fire fighting community to discuss ways to reduce fire fighting hazards.

Other findings of the IAFF death and injury survey included:

- 36 percent of all fire fighter deaths due to occupational diseases last year were related to cancer, 56 percent to heart disease.
- There were 46,260 reported injuries, 34,562 occurring at the emergency scene.
- 480 forced retirments were due to occupational illnesses, and 338 to line-of-duty injuries.
- Fire fighters averaged 44.8 injuries per 100 workers.
- Fire fighters suffered 181 heart attacks at the emergency scene.

The entire survey is published in the November issue of the union's publication, the International Fire Fighter.

10-DAY CONFERENCE at the International Labor Organization in Geneva explored avenues of upgrading working conditions for teachers and the rights of teachers on collective bargaining. Discussing the issues are Eugenia Kemble of the American Federation of Teachers, and Oscar De Vries, ILO office director of the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

ILO Session on Teachers Backs Bargaining Rights

Geneva—Teacher union representatives from around the world have gained significant recognition from governments on the need to upgrade their working conditions and on the rights of teachers to bargain over them.

For the first time under International Labor Organization auspices, a joint government-teacher union meeting came to some historic conclusions on teacher working conditions as well as on the means by which they should be determined.

AFTER A 10-DAY session, 18 teacher-worker representatives and 15 government officials reached agreement on a statement asserting that "competent authorities should recognize independent and legitimate teachers' organizations as representatives of their members, entitled to full information and consultation and to bargain collectively on all the matters covered by these conclusions."

The statement's conclusions covered a broad range of issues, such as the numbers of qualified teachers employed, teacher recruitment and retention, teaching hours, class size and pupil-teacher ratios, teacher health and safety, teacher stress, and the problems of teachers in rural and isolated areas.

They urged the Governing Body of the ILO to "establish a permanent Joint Committee on Teachers" and to hold an early follow-up meeting. They also asked for ILO support for regional seminars "for teachers' organizations on problems of particular concern to them."

AMONG THE topics suggested for future study and discussion were trade union rights, training and the quality of teaching, conditions of employment, and the social situation of teachers in developing countries.

Eugenia Kemble, special assistant to President Albert Shanker of the American Federation of Teachers, chaired the teachers' side of the drafting committee which negotiated the final conclusions with the governments.

"The teachers did very well," Kemble said, " we have a clear recognition on the part of governments that teacher unions represent teachers, that it is appropriate and necessary to negotiate with them and that the range of what can be negotiated is very broad."

SOME GOVERNMENTS took exception to portions of the conclusions, particularly those concerned with negotiations and collective bargaining. Japan, the Philippines, Argentina, Mexico, and Brazil were among governments that noted dissents.

While the ILO had previously studied teacher issues through committees of experts and in joint projects with UNESCO, this was the first time teacher union representatives and governments met on them in the ILO. Erich Frister, president of the International Federation of Free Teachers Unions and outgoing president of the Association of Teachers & Educators of Germany, led the teacher group as its chairman.

Auto Workers Denounce GM On Captive Audience Tactics

Detroit—The Auto Workers accused General Motors of trying to "spoonfeed" management views on the need for worker sacrifice to a captive audience of employees, and advised local UAW leaders not to participate in the company's "unilateral" program.

UAW President Douglas A. Fraser and Vice President Owen Bieber, director of the union's General Motors Dept., said in a statement that the firm's "Road to Survival" campaign is a propaganda attempt to persuade workers they must make wage and benefit concessions in 1982. The automaker employs some 440,000 unionized workers.

THE STATEMENT, issued after top UAW leaders voiced their objections to GM officials at a meeting here, charged that GM seeks to have its employees accept its views on the scope of next year's collective bargaining while attempting to generate distrust of the UAW leadership.

"Efforts by the General Motors spokesmen in this area are nothing new—it happens prior to each round of negotiations," Fraser and Bieber said. "What is new here is that the corporation is attempting to shift a major portion of its efforts into the workplace and to spoonfeed it to a captive audience."

GM calls its program "a special communications effort," and envisions a series of in-plant meetings conducted on company time by local managers and involving nearly all of its workers over the next six months. Negotiations on a new contract are scheduled to begin next July. The current contract expires next September.

A DOCUMENT distributed by GM titled "The Road to Survival" calls for four hour-long meetings of small groups of employees who would be shown films and drawn into discussions on management's publicly stated needs for cutting labor costs.

"In this endeavor," Fraser and Bieber observed, "it seeks to involve the in-plant joint union-management 'quality of worklife' committees"—panels established over the past several years at different locations to lessen labor-management tensions and promote cooperation on local working conditions.

"This was strenuously objected to by the union as a perversion of the contract," Fraser and Bieber said. The quality of worklife committee was never intended as "a vehicle to propagandize or parrot the current views of the chairman of the board of GM as to how to save General Motors through worker sacrifice," they said.

"THE CORPORATION obviously has the right to communicate with its employees, but that process must occur on a purely voluntary basis on the part of each individual and cannot be made compulsory," they stressed.

Meanwhile, in Toronto, UAW members at Chrysler Canada voted to withdraw from the union's international Chrysler agreement next year and negotiate a separate national pact. It marked the third time that Chrysler workers in Canada have voted on the question of bargaining internationally with their U.S. counterparts.

In 1967, the Canadian workers voted for establishment of the international agreement and again in 1973 to remain within the bargaining structure. However, local union leaders in Canada who called for the referendum felt the Chrysler international bargaining process had become complicated because of involvement by the U.S. government and the U.S. Loan Guarantee Board.

American Jewish Committee Presents Award to Georgine

New York—President Robert A. Georgine of the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept. received the American Jewish Committee's 1981 Democratic Heritage Award at a testimonial dinner.

Georgine was honored for his accomplishments in the labor field, and for his "pursuit of excellence" on behalf of all Americans.

put. As sales lagged, automakers resorted to temporary plant closings to hold inventories in line.

Meanwhile, the Commerce Dept. reported that October construction spending fell 1.7 percent to a seasonally adjusted $230.8 billion annual rate, the lowest since a $228.9 billion annual rate in October 1980. Outlays on construction have been lackluster for months because of high interest rates on mortgages and construction loans. The department reported that the number of new housing starts in October was down 6.8 percent over the month and 44 percent over the year to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 857,000 units, the lowest in 15 years.

Two large banks, Continental Illinois in Chicago and Crocker National in California, announced cuts in their prime lending rates to 15.5 from 16 percent, and several others dropped the key rate to 15.75 percent, including Citibank and Chase Manhattan.

AN UNEXPECTED jump in the nation's money supply, reported after the banks lowered their primes, may well preclude any further downturn in the rate in the near future, however. The prime, around which rates on many other loans are set, is the interest rate banks charge their best corporate borrowers. The rate has dropped sharply since September, when it stood at 20.5 percent.

In other economic reports, the Bureau of Labor Statistics said that workers' purchasing power increased three-tenths of 1 percent in October, but was down 3.6 percent over the year-earlier level. The monthly increase followed a 1.7-percent decline in September.

Elsewhere, the Commerce Dept. reported that the nation's merchandise trade deficit widened to a seasonally adjusted $5.27 billion in October as imports soared and exports weakened. In the first 10 months of this year, imports have exceeded exports by $33.99 billion. The year-earlier deficit was $31.29 billion. Commerce Sec. Malcolm Baldrige said that it "appears almost certain" now that the deficit for all of 1981 will be "several billion dollars higher" than the $36.36 billion 1980 deficit.

Most of the October increase in imports involved non-oil products. The value of imports of petroleum and related products over the month rose 1 percent to an adjusted $6.55 billion from $6.49 billion the month before.

million in 1979. The number of lost workdays per 100 workers fell from 66.2 in 1979 to 63.7 in 1980, but the average number of lost workdays per lost-time injury remained at 16 days.

BLS said the only industry with an increase in the lost workday rate was mining—162.8 days per 100 workers—and it continued to lead that category.

As a result of the BLS findings, OSHA has lowered the cutoff point it uses when reviewing an employer's injury rate to determine whether to inspect a manufacturing plant. The average lost workday injury rate in manufacturing declined from 5.7 per 100 workers in 1979 to 5.2 in 1980.

In a related report, the National Institute for Occupational Safety & Health and the Consumer Product Safety Commission predicted that U.S. workers will suffer about 3.3 million occupational injuries in 1981 that will require hospital treatment. The projection is based on a three-month survey of 66 hospitals around the country conducted earlier this year by the two agencies.

Mandate for Compassion

THIS NATION'S ECONOMY is in a shambles—and growing worse with each passing day.

The lines of the jobless grow longer as unemployment heads inexorably toward a postwar record.

The output of our factories diminishes and business bankruptcies are reaching dangerous new highs.

Interest rates are still usurious, prices are still out of control, the purchasing power of all Americans is eroded by inflation, and so are the hard-earned savings of the people who somehow managed to put a few dollars aside for a rainy day. Now the deluge is upon them, and those dollars can barely buy an umbrella.

THE ECONOMIC POLICIES which the Administration has already put into place have cut deep into the social fabric of the nation without having achieved any of their promised goals—and further cruel and painful cuts are threatened with little hope that they, either, will turn the economy around.

The rosy predictions of the spring have given way to the gloomy forecasts of the oncoming winter.

Yet through it all there are voices in high places that seek to reassure us. The downturn will be "shallow," they say. The upturn is sure to follow. It will be here, they say, in the first quarter of 1982—well, maybe not the first quarter, but certainly in the second. Or will there be further slippage into the third, or even fourth quarter?

About all that's missing is for someone in the White House to proclaim, with pompous piety, that "prosperity is just around the corner."

If that happens, we will have come full circle to where this country stood a half-cenury ago, when we were mired in the Great Depression and the men of little vision who were in charge did little more than try to whistle their way past the graveyard of America's hopes and dreams.

WE WORKED OUR WAY out of that difficult period 50 years ago because the American people chose to follow the path of imagination and compassion—because the American people took seriously the constitutional mandate that government's role was to "promote the general welfare"—because laws were enacted to put a floor under misery and to assure that the people of this country shared, just a little more fully, in the great wealth that their hands and hearts and minds had helped to produce.

Nowhere was this compassion and concern more in evidence than in the Social Security Act. That landmark legislation made it clear that the later years in the lives of our citizens—when people were too old to work but too young to die—should be cushioned by at least a minimum retirement income.

'Well, Back to the Old Crystal Ball!'

As Nation Burns

Top White House Economist Flouts Full Employment Law

By Gus Tyler

AS CHAIRMAN of the Council of Economic Advisers, Murray L. Weidenbaum is in violation of federal law.

The law is the Full Employment Act of 1946 that calls upon the council to advise the President of the United States on how to maintain "full employment, production, and purchasing power." It was that Act that created the council now headed by Weidenbaum and it is his sworn responsibility to do what that piece of historic legislation instructs him to do.

Instead, he has been issuing statements telling the country that things are going from bad to worse. Next year, he says, the jobless rate will rise to 9 percent, just about the highest since the Great Depression. He forecasts that the total economy will grow by a measly 1 percent for the year. He does not make a single recommendation on what to do about it.

When Rep. Robert S. Walker (R-Pa.) proposes a further tax cut to spur buying, Weidenbaum says that he doesn't "feel comfortable with that kind of fine tuning." Nor does Weidenbaum have any other plans for any kind of tuning—fine or gross, whether about taxes or interest rates or government spending.

WEIDENBAUM ACTS like a fireman who, upon arrival at the site of the conflagration, sprays no water, mounts no ladders, rescues no victims, but calls a press conference to announce that, according to his lights, the fire will get worse, but that—if we are all patient—the fire will eventually burn itself out, provided it doesn't spread to some neighboring buildings, in which case he will reappear at the site to issue another press release.

What Weidenbaum does not seem to appreciate is that in his job as chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, for which he is paid by the taxpayers, it is his responsibility to put out economic fires known as recessions and depressions. That's why the law was passed and why his post was created and why he was appointed. If he doesn't know how, he ought to resign.

But he won't, because for at least a dozen years it has been the policy of Administrations to start the fires, to act as economic arsonists. Not only have Presidents and their advisers failed to honor the injunctions of the Full Employment Act, they have actually gone out of their way to see to it that the economy does not live up to its "potential."

IF YOU WANT TO know when this policy started, take a look at the President's Economic Report of 1970 when Nixon announced that he intended to keep "real output" below "potential output from 1970 to 1972 because some gap between actual and potential output is necessary to slow down inflation."

To make the "gap," Nixon had to manufacture unemployment, which he did successfully. But prices did not come down. So, he did more of the same, and by 1974 we saw the jobless rate go to the highest since the Great Depression and prices soar to double-digit levels.

For those who like visual aids, Nixon actually provided a diagram (Chart 8 on page 85) showing exactly how much he would depress the economy.

So, whatever Weidenbaum's crime in failing to pursue his sworn purpose in enforcing the law, he is not likely to go to jail. Since every Administration since 1970 has actively violated the law by engineering recessions, by artificially promoting unemployment, to enforce the law now would be impractical because there are probably not enough cells in our federal penitentiaries to house all the members of all the Administrations who have openly flouted the Full Employment Act of 1946 that has not been either repealed or remembered.

Proposed Cutbacks Jeopardize Commitment on Social Security

The following is from the resolution on social security adopted by the AFL-CIO convention.

WITH ENACTMENT of the social security law in 1935, the nation made a commitment to the elderly and to each succeeding generation of older people to provide a continuing share of the nation's abundance to workers after they become too old to work. Now that commitment is in jeopardy because of proposals by the Reagan Administration and conservative forces in the Congress to gut the social security program.

Since social security touches the life of practically every American, responsible public debate concerning its provisions and financing is appropriate. Only in this way can the program be adapted to meet the new and changing needs of the American people. Unfortunately, many recent criticisms are clearly designed to discredit the program and exaggerate its financial difficulties with the purpose of making major program cuts.

Administration proposals to slash or eliminate a number of essential social security protections would cut the overall program by 21-23 percent. Disability insurance would be reduced by about one-third and early retirement benefits by 43 percent. These cuts would have a devastating impact on the program and on those protected by it.

THE PRESIDENT'S recent decision not to push for these cuts pending the report of a proposed study commission is a political maneuver aimed at achieving these cuts by another method. The AFL-CIO will continue to oppose cuts in social security protections whether proposed by the Administration or by any other quarter. We will continue to fight proposals which would:

- Deny social security beneficiaries their full cost-of-living increases.
- Raise the age of retirement or tamper with the early retirement provisions of the law. This is tantamount to an across-the-board benefit reduction for millions of workers and would bear hardest on workers forced into early retirement for reasons of health and inability to find a job.
- Lower the present formula for determining the benefits workers receive at retirement.
- Restrict eligibility or reduce benefits under the social security disability program. The present program is already too stringent.
- Reduce or eliminate the "family" component in the system. Numerous proposals are pending that would eliminate children's benefits for early retirees and place a ceiling on survivors and retirement benefits.
- Increase Medicare premiums, deductibles and coinsurance. The elderly now pay much higher out-of-pocket payments for health care than before Medicare.

SUCH CUTS are not necessary to restore financial balance to the social security system. The immediate problem of a likely funding shortfall during the next five to 10 years in the Old Age & Survivors' Trust Fund (OASI) can be met by borrowing from the Disability and Medicare Trust Funds which are running surpluses and for a back-up provision allowing for the use of general revenue to protect against any potential cash-flow problems. After that, the OASI trust fund situation will improve and remain favorable well into the next century. In addition, the Congress should remove the social security trust funds from the consolidated federal budget so that social security policy can be determined by program and not general budgetary considerations.

We continue to oppose the taxation of social security benefits.

The AFL-CIO urges the introduction of some general revenue financing to provide relief for workers from the scheduled increases in the payroll tax and to strengthen the financing of the system. Partial general revenue financing was anticipated by the founders of the system and is to be found in practically all industrialized countries.

The AFL-CIO urges the Congress to restore the minimum benefit for all present and future retirees.

We urge the Congress not to be unduly influenced by transitory economic and political events and adopt proposals that will do irreparable harm to the social security rights of American workers.

EVERY CONGRESS in the past has made clear beyond question its pledge to the American people that the social security commitment will be honored. The present Administration proposes to violate that commitment. We will do everything possible to make sure that the Congress does not.

While we must direct our energies now to resisting disastrous cutbacks in long-standing social security protections, the AFL-CIO will not lose sight of the continuing need to improve the law.

When the social security program was enacted, the typical American family consisted of a working husband and a wife who was an unpaid homemaker. Since that time major changes have occurred in patterns of work and family relationships. Labor force participation of married women and their divorce and remarriage rates have greatly increased. Though the social security law treats equally men and women with the same work and earnings record, modifications should be made in the law to better relate to these changing work and family patterns.

Revival of Exploitation

Guest Worker Scheme Scored As Throwback to Bracero Era

THE ADMINISTRATION'S guest worker plan was branded a "camouflaged revival" of the discredited bracero program by Jack Otero, executive vice chairman of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement.

"We don't need to import workers at a time when 10 million Americans are out of work, looking for jobs," Otero declared. He pointed out that the bracero program, after which the Administration's guest worker scheme is patterned, put "severe strains on the relations between Mexico and the United States" as it let "unscrupulous employers fatten their purses" through the exploitation of imported Mexican workers, who were often treated "like slaves."

THE NATION'S first priority should be jobs for U.S. citizens and legal alien residents, Otero stressed on Labor News Conference.

Otero, a vice president of the Railway & Airline Clerks, agreed that both the substance and the enforcement of U.S. immigration laws should be upgraded. But he emphasized that those changes must be "humane, fair and consistent with the interests of American workers," as well as those who come here "looking for the opportunity to improve themselves economically and socially."

He said the "best way to end illegal immigration is to demagnetize the magnet, which is the job source." He noted that the AFL-CIO concurs wholeheartedly with the recommendation of the Select Committee on Immigration & Refugee Policy, created by Congress to study the current statutes and policies, that U.S. employers who hire illegal immigrants be subject to civil penalties, with criminal penalties for repeated willful violations of the law.

Such employer sanctions, he said, must be coupled with an effective system for employers to determine the status of job applicants, such as "nonforgeable social security cards" which would be available to every person looking for a job. He said that technology now makes it possible to make those cards counterfeit-proof, as is now done with security identification at the White House, the Pentagon and military installations.

Reporters questioning Otero on the AFL-CIO produced public affairs program were Doug Harbrecht of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers, and Susan Zachem of Press Associates, Inc.

WOMEN ARE IN the workforce to stay, as the trend of recent decades shows.

According to the most recent government figures, 58 percent of mothers with children under 18—some 18.4 million mothers—are in the labor force. Viewed another way, more than half the children under 18—about 38 million—have mothers who work outside the home.

When wives and mothers work, what happens to family life?

That question was examined in an article in the Labor Dept. publication Monthly Labor Review by Sar A. Levitan, director of the Center for Social Policy Studies, George Washington University, and Richard S. Belous, executive director, National Council on Employment Policy.

THE AUTHORS recognize that because women work doesn't mean they have rejected marriage. Marriage may be postponed until after a career is started, but marriage rates remain high. In fact, they write, "data show that economic downturns tend to postpone marriage because the parties cannot afford to establish a family or are concerned about rainy days ahead."

They also suggest the earning ability of women can make them more attractive as marriage partners, especially in view of the rising cost of buying a house and other economic realities.

Another fallacy about working women attacked by the authors is that there necessarily exists a cause-and-effect relationship between rising divorce rates and the number of working women.

While a working wife in an unhappy marriage may be more likely to divorce because of the ability to support herself, it also may be true that career interests for wives may act as a "safety valve" for feelings of being "caged" or "shackled to the house," which are reasons for divorce for some couples. Wives' earnings also may alleviate financial strains in a marriage.

"WORK AND MARRIAGE can go together to create a stronger and more stable union," depending on the attitudes of both husband and wife, the authors conclude.

A point very clearly made is that although women work for a variety of reasons, such as career fulfillment, the overwhelming reason is economic in nature. Even in two-earner households, inflationary pressures and sluggish gains in workers' real earnings can make wives' earnings the difference between financial stability and instability.

At the start of the 1970s, nearly one in ten families was headed by a woman. As of March 1981, one of every six families was maintained by a woman who was either divorced, separated, widowed or never married.

The most pressing problem in female-headed families is that they are five times more likely to have incomes below the poverty level than married couple families, the data show. However, there also is some indication that the status of women as single parents is temporary. Studies over a ten-year period found that during the first five years as many as 16 percent of all adult women sampled were heading a household. However, only 9 percent were household heads for the entire period.

AS THE AUTHORS and other observers agree, most Americans live in families and probably will continue to do so.

However, the family form is changing from the American "ideal" of a working husband with a wife staying at home with the children, and this seems to be where controversy arises.

Studies brought to light during the 1980 White House Conference on Families indicated the American family form probably rarely throughout the nation's history conformed to the ideal. Rather, the family form fluctuated over different periods of economic and social change.

THE GUEST WORKER scheme pushed by the Reagan Administration is merely a version of the discredited and harmful bracero program that was abandoned in the early Sixties, Jack Otero, center, executive vice chairman of the Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, charged. He was questioned on Labor News Conference by Susan Zachem of Press Associates, Inc., and Doug Harbrecht of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers. The program is aired over Mutual radio.

House Rollcalls on Funding Resolution

The House on Nov. 22 sought to provide for the funding of government programs through a resolution that President Reagan subsequently vetoed.

Column I shows the 213-183 vote to include in the resolution an additional pay raise for non-striking air traffic controllers, as urged by the Administration. This bypassed scheduled committee hearings that would have allowed exploration of all issues involved in the PATCO dispute. The pay bonus, ironically, was nullified by Reagan's veto. Voting right (R) were 181 Democrats and 2 Republicans. Voting wrong (W) were 41 Democrats and 172 Republicans.

Column II shows the 215-184 rejection of a Republican motion to send the budget stopgap legislation back to committee in order to slash billions more from the emergency appropriations bill. Labor's position was supported by 215 Democrats, opposed by 175 Republicans and 9 Democrats.

Numerals show congressional districts. A—absent; PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong; P—present but not voting or paired.

ILPA Competition

Awards Cite Progress In Union Use of Media

New York—Winners in the International Labor Press Association's newly inaugurated film and broadcast communications competition were announced in a special ceremony at ILPA's biennial convention here. Awards also were formally presented to winners, announced earlier this year, of ILPA's journalistic awards competition for union publications.

Judges selected a total of 27 award winners from 106 entries in ILPA's first electronic communications contest. The competition was established by ILPA's executive council to reward achievement in film, radio and television communications; enlarge the labor movement's knowledge of resources available in these media, and encourage their greater use by labor organizations.

THE COUNCIL termed the first competition "a clear success" and will consider running it again during 1983.

In the annual competition for union journals, 106 winners were named from 1,095 entries.

C. V. Glines, editor of the Air Line Pilot, was given the Max Steinbock Award. The prize, named for the late president of ILPA, honors "the best journalistic effort which exemplifies a humanistic spirit." Glines won the award for his story, "A Matter of Heart and Conscience," which describes efforts by ALPA members to aid a number of aged and disabled pilots facing severe economic hardship.

JUDGES OF the electronic communications contest included: Jackie Kienzle, assistant director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education; Mark Harrad, director of public information, Public Broadcasting Service; Carmella LaSpada, board chairperson of No Greater Love; Harry Matthews, director of the Labor Institute for Human Enrichment, AFL-CIO Dept. for Professional Employees; Sid Brechner, broadcast engineer for the AFL-CIO; Walter Davis, director of public relations for the Food & Commercial Workers; Harry Conn, president of Press Relations Wire; John Stagg, education director of the Graphic Arts International Union, and Ronia Garnicki, staff assistant of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers.

The publication awards were judged by Cheryl Arvidson, reporter for the Cox Newspapers; William Eaton, reporter for the Los Angeles Times; Frank Swoboda, reporter for the Washington Post. The judges' committee was chaired by Al Herling, former editor of the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers News and a past ILPA president.

TOP WINNERS in the film and broadcast competition were: Film Strips & Slide Shows, "The Energy Factory," State, County & Municipal Employees District Council 37, New York; Radio Documentaries, "Voice of Labor," Kansas City Labor Beacon, Greater Kansas City Central Labor Council; Informative Radio Commercials, "Kids" and "Just a Teacher," Chicago Teachers Union, and "Union Label Series," Ladies' Garment Workers; Issue-Oriented Radio Commercials, "Working Men & Women for a Change in Leadership," Ohio AFL-CIO; Informative Television Commercials, "Building America's Future," Carpenters; Films and Television Programs, independently produced, "Farewell, Etaoin Shrdlu," David Loeb Weiss, producer, Typographical Union Local 6, New York, sponsor; Films for Internal Education, "Moving Mountains," Steelworkers; Films for External Education, "Strength Through Struggle," Ohio AFL-CIO.

Special commendations were awarded by the ILPA executive council at the recommendation of the judges to "Stewards Training Program" of the Communications Workers for overall quality and excellence, and the ILGWU's "Look for the Union Label" television and radio spots for outstanding achievement in labor's public communications.

In the publications competition, top winners in the overall excellence categories were:

International and national unions — newspapers of 100,000 or more circulation: IUE News, International Union of Electrical, Radio & Machine Workers; magazines of 100,000 or more circulation: American Educator, AFT; newspapers of less than 100,000 circulation: The Guild Reporter, Newspaper Guild; magazines of less than 100,000 circulation: IUD Viewpoint, AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept.; newsletters: SEIU Leadership News UPDATE, Service Employees.

State and local central body—17 or more issues a year, California AFL-CIO News; fewer than 17 issues per year: Ontario Labor.

Television Networks Accused Of Distorting Labor's Image

A study conducted by three AFL-CIO affiliates accuses the nation's major television networks of neglecting the interests of union members and portraying them and their unions in a negative way.

The one exception is CBS's "Lou Grant Show," which casts unions "in a realistic light, and does an outstanding job in helping to educate viewers to the often complex world of collective bargaining." Actor Ed Asner, who plays the show's title role, was elected president of the Screen Actors Guild last month.

Conducted by members of the Machinists, Operating Engineers, and the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, the study found that even the newscasts deemed fairest—NBC's Evening News—favored corporate or big business positions on major issues over workers' views by a 3-to-1 margin.

THE STUDY rates network news programs on the nature and extent of coverage given to five major issues: inflation, medical care, job losses, tax reform, and energy. The networks varied on individual issues, but on an overall basis the study showed NBC favored a corporate view by a ratio of 31to-1, ABC 5-to-1, and CBS 6-to-1.

The Union Media Monitoring Project, as it is called, was the result of monitoring during April and May by 2,000 volunteers from the three unions in 36 states. Results of the project were announced by the three union presidents, William W. Winpisinger of the IAM, J. C. Turner of the IUOE, and John DeConcini of BC&T.

Turner said that TV "continues to ignore labor's contributions to the community and the nation. TV—the most powerful persuader and educator in the country—is guilty of presenting negative messages about workers and their unions, undermining our efforts to reverse America's growing concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few."

Political Action Fund Set Up by Nebraska Labor

Omaha — Delegates to the Nebraska AFL-CIO's 24th convention voted to establish a special political action fund through a 5-cent increase in per capita payments to the state federation.

State AFL-CIO President Gordon L. McDonald said the fund will be used to promote legislative issues and labor-endorsed candidates. The per capita increase went into effect Oct. 1, raising monthly payments to 35 cents per member.

IN DRAFTING labor's agenda for the next session of the state legislature, the 250 convention delegates called for enactment of a measure providing for union dues checkoff rights with all private sector employers, improvements in workers' compensation and unemployment benefits, and the upgrading of public employee collective bargaining provisions.

The convention also affirmed support of striking Air Traffic Controllers and members of Steelworkers Local 7377 of Fremont, Neb., who have been on strike against Stormer, Inc. since mid-February.

In other action, delegates endorsed ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment and development of a state energy conservation program and called on local labor organizations to establish community service committees.

McDONALD, who has headed the state labor federation since 1979, was elected to his first full four-year term. Delegates also re-elected Sec.-Treas. Victor G. Meyers and the 12 incumbent executive board members, and elected Gerald Carpenter of the Transport Workers after expanding the board to 13 members.

Convention speakers included President William W. Winpisinger of the Machinists, Nebraska Gov. Charles Thone (R) and John H. Fanning of the National Labor Relations Board.

Social Security Slash Hits 400,000 Railroad Retirees

President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks called on President Reagan for help in "rectifying" sharp cuts in the pension checks received by some 400,000 retired railroad workers.

Because of the congressional budget impasse, Kilroy said, the recipients of both railroad retirement and social security payments were faced with elimination of the social security portion of their payment in the Dec. 1 checks, as well as continuing cuts averaging between $20 and $30 a month on a permanent basis.

ELIMINATING the payment, Kilroy said, even "if only for a short period of time and three weeks before Christmas, is inhumane and violates the spirit and intent of the Railroad Retirement Act."

In a letter to Reagan voicing the union's concern about the pension situation, Kilroy cited elimination of the social security payment from the rail retirees' Dec. 1 check and a cut of 21 percent in the total of social security payments, effective last October, for retirees entitled to dual benefits, as clear evidence that some 400,000 retirees "have bceome victims of the budget process."

The group—which represents about 40 percent of those receiving railroad retirement benefits—comprises persons who also have worked outside the railroad industry and thus are eligible for social security.

Since 1975 the two payments have been linked in one monthly pension check, with the social security factor representing an average of about $100 a month in the combined benefit.

DESPITE THE government's commitment to these 400,000 people in 1974, the Office of Management & Budget and Congress have shared responsibility for appropriating less money than necessary to meet this obligation. With the beginning of fiscal 1982, these dual benefit payments were cut by an average of $20 to $30 a month. Now OMB has directed still further cuts of 12 percent in the pension checks.

'Guest Worker' Plan Assailed as Retreat on Gains

The foreign "guest worker" program advocated by the Reagan Administration would set back gains agricultural workers in the United States have made since the end of the infamous bracero program in 1964, the Farm Workers testified.

UFWA Legislative Rep. Stephanie Bower told the Senate Subcommittee on Immigration that only after the importation of Mexican nationals under the bracero program was abolished were farm workers "able to organize their own union and sign contracts."

Now that unionization on the farms is more widespread, she said, growers are looking for a guest worker program to find "a docile, controllable workforce."

Importation of temporary workers would add to unemployment, she testified, and especially curtail the job opportunities for minority youth in rural areas. "These teenagers should be able to work in their own surroundings at a decent wage," she urged, "and not have to migrate to the cities where there are already too many unemployed workers."

Court Rules in 2 Cases

Confidential Employees Protected by Labor Law

The Supreme Court agreed with labor's position in two important cases involving the rights of "confidential" employees under the National Labor Relations Act.

By a 5-4 margin, the high court ruled that a personal secretary whose work does not involve matters dealing with labor-management relations has the same protection of federal labor law as other workers.

IN A RELATED case, all nine justices joined in rejecting an appellate court's ruling that employees do not have the right of union representation if their work gives them access to business information their employer considers confidential.

Both cases had been decided by the 7th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals in a way that would have led to the exclusion of thousands of workers the National Labor Relations Board has long held to be protected by federal labor law.

Because of their importance, the AFL-CIO filed a brief with the Supreme Court last June, and the points it made were largely adopted in the majority opinion, written by Justice William J. Brennan, Jr.

THE SPLIT decision came in a case involving a rural electric cooperative in Hendricks County, Ind. The general manager fired his secretary after she had joined other employees in signing a petition asking reinstatement of a worker who lost an arm in an on-the-job accident and was denied re-employment after he was able to resume work.

The NLRB found that the secretary was not involved in labor relations matters and therefore was protected against retaliation when she joined with other employees in a lawful "concerted activity."

In denying enforcement of the NLRB's reinstatement and back pay order, the appellate court relied on language in a 1974 Supreme Court decision involving the status of managerial employees of the Bell Aerospace Co.

BUT THE AFL-CIO argued, and the five justices in the majority agreed, that the footnote cited by the appellate court was not essential to the Bell Aerospace case, making it a non-binding "dictum," and was based on an erroneous assumption of the intent of Congress.

Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr., who was the author of the Bell Aerospace decision, vigorously dissented, joined by Chief Justice Warren E. Burger, Justice William H. Rehnquist and the newest member of the Supreme Court, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor.

With Brennan in the majority opinion were Justices Byron R. White, Thurgood Marshall, Harry A. Blackmun and John Paul Stevens.

THE SUPREME COURT majority concluded that the NLRB's policy of excluding from bargaining units only confidential employees in jobs touching on labor relations "does indeed have a reasonable basis in law" and stems from the labor board's "understanding of the nature of the collective bargaining process."

The dissenters protested that the majority decision "tends to obliterate the line between management and labor."

The other case that was before the Supreme Court involved employees of the Malleable Iron Range Co. in Beaver Dam, Wis., who had voted for representation by Local 39 of the Office & Professional Employees.

THE COMPANY refused to bargain, claiming that 18 of the 64 employees in the unit should have been excluded because they had access to "confidential" business information. Those the company wanted excluded included a $3.50 an hour shipping clerk and a $6,400-a-year clerk who handled correspondence dealing with defective merchandise.

All nine Supreme Court justices agreed that the appellate court was wrong in accepting the company's claim that access to confidential business information deprives workers of labor law protection. Because the appellate court had not ruled on arguments the company had made that some of the employees should be excluded because they held "managerial" jobs, the case was sent back for consideration of those objections.

Chester Migden Leaving Screen Actors' Post

Los Angeles—Chester L. Migden, national executive secretary of the Screen Actors Guild since 1973, announced that he will leave SAG at the end of the year when his current contract expires. Migden has been with the Guild for 30 years, joining the SAG staff as assistant executive secretary in 1952 and becoming associate executive secretary in 1962.

SAG's board of directors named Kendall Orsatti to serve as acting national executive secretary until a replacement is appointed. Orsatti has headed the Guild's Hollywood office since 1973 and is an assistant national executive secretary.

Domestic Content Law Urged To Save Auto-Related Jobs

Voluntary restrictions on Japanese auto imports haven't worked, and action by Congress to prevent a permanent wipeout of U.S. jobs and production is "long overdue," the AFL-CIO testified at Senate hearings.

Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan said conditions in the auto industry and its supplier companies have worsened since last March, when the Subcommittee on Trade last held hearings on the issue.

AT THE TIME, he reminded the panel, the AFL-CIO and the Auto Workers had urged that Japanese auto imports be limited to 1.2 million cars in a 12-month period and that a phased-in domestic-content law be enacted so that automobiles assembled in the United States won't be primarily foreign-made. Labor also proposed a comparable quota on imports of auto parts.

Instead, Koplan noted, the Administration relied on a voluntary commitment by the Japanese to limit exports to 1.68 million passenger cars between April 1981 and April 1982, with adjustments thereafter.

The legislation that labor urged then is still urgently needed, Koplan testified. "The auto recession has worsened," he noted. Sales of U.S. cars are the lowest in 20 years, and the mid-November sales of General Motors, Ford and Chrysler were nearly 30 percent below a year ago.

The loss of jobs affects steelworkers, rubber workers, glass workers and scores of other occupations linked to the health of the automobile industry, Koplan stressed.

At the same time, he reminded the senators, the trade adjustment program that was supposed to cushion the job losses resulting from imports has been virtually wiped out by the wave of federal budget slashes.

Koplan cited the example of other nations that have imposed and enforced quotas on automobile imports and require that vehicles exempt from quotas be largely built as well as assembled in their countries.

BECAUSE THE United States imposes no such requirement, he noted, Japanese firms have established production facilities in other nations and often export the output from these plants to the United States.

"Imports, recession, tight money and lack of effective purchasing power continue to compound U.S. industry problems," Koplan stressed. Communities across the nation have been hurt by the loss of jobs and income. "Import monitoring and regulation are urgent necessities until the U.S. auto industry is on its feet," he insisted.

UAW Research Director Sheldon Friedman told the Senate subcommittee that American auto workers have "benefited relatively little" from the Japanese commitment to hold down imports.

SINCE 1978, he said, the hourly-paid workforce is down 19 percent at General Motors, 25 percent at Ford and 44 percent at Chrysler. An estimated 600,000 manufacturing jobs have disappeared from the "auto-related" sector, Friedman testified. And the number of workers on layoff "has been rising again."

Friedman told the panel that a local content law for motor vehicles sold in the United States would be the most effective single step to prevent "further disastrous loss of jobs . . . not only in motor vehicle assembly but in the many firms and industries which supply the auto industry."

Reagan Seeks to Salvage NLRB Choice

The Reagan Administration is trying to revive the President's nomination of John Van de Water for chairman of the National Labor Relations Board by bypassing the Senate committee with jurisdiction over the appointment.

Van de Water failed to win a majority on the Senate Labor & Human Resources Committee after hearings spotlighted his role as a management consultant in union-busting campaigns.

IN A LETTER to senators, the AFL-CIO charged that Van de Water's efforts to keep workers from organizing and to decertify unions already established "went to the very edge of the law and sometimes beyond."

Van de Water is serving as NLRB chairman under a presidential recess appointment, but an 8-8 tie vote in the Senate committee last month, defeating a motion to send the nomination to the Senate floor, had apparently killed his chances of confirmation.

The first attempt to revive the nomination was made by Senate Majority Leader Howard Baker (Tenn.), who introduced a resolution discharging the committee from further consideration of the nomination—a step that would bring the nomination directly to the Senate floor.

BAKER ASKED "for its immediate consideration," but Senate Democratic Leader Robert C. Byrd (W.Va.) objected "on behalf of senators on my side of the aisle."

Opponents of the nomination quickly let it be known that they are prepared to filibuster if necessary to keep the appointment from being revived.

A letter from committee members to their Senate colleagues noted that the Senate has never before discharged a committee for acting unfavorably on a nomination. The committee, which has a Republican majority, met its responsibility to conscientiously consider the nomination, they declared, and the effort to bypass it is unjustified.

AT A WHITE HOUSE news briefing, Deputy White House Press Sec. Larry Speakes said the Van de Water nomination had been "discussed" at the meeting President Reagan had with the AFL-CIO Executive Council. But he said the President considers Van de Water an "excellent" nominee and the White House is standing by the appointment.

After Baker's move to bypass the Labor & Human Resources Committee, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison wrote senators urging them "not to support the effort to discharge the committee" and "not to support cloture" on the nomination. It requires the votes of 60 of the 100 senators to limit debate on a motion.

Because Van de Water "for many years made his living planning and leading anti-union campaigns," Denison wrote, he lacks the impartiality "required to serve as the head of the agency whose primary responsibility is to set the rules that govern employers and unions during representation campaigns."

Mediation Board Reports New High in Airline Cases

The National Mediation Board closed out a record 95 airline representation and mediation cases in fiscal year 1980, the agency said in its latest annual report.

The number was the largest since the airlines came under the agency's jurisdiction in 1936. The board also handles representation and collective bargaining disputes in the railroad industry.

Unions won 35 of the airline representation elections last year to gain or retain bargaining rights for 11,147 airline employees.

Jobless Surge Tied to Reagan Policies

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI — Saturday, December 12, 1981 — No. 49

8.4 Percent Rate Highest In Six Years

By James M. Shevis

The sharp rise in unemployment in November, to a six-year high of 8.4 percent, is further evidence that President Reagan's program "is not solving but aggravating the nation's economic and human crisis," the AFL-CIO charged.

"The Administration's promise of eventual 'long-run' recovery is hardly reassuring to the nine million Americans now jobless," Federation President Lane Kirkland said. "As the AFL-CIO Executive Council told the President earlier, it is time to adopt a new, anti-recession program that will ease hardship now and build toward a healthy economy."

IN THE LAST two months alone, unemployment has risen by more than one million persons, and the government's latest set of economic indicators points to a worsening of the recession, Kirkland observed.

Deputy White House Press Secretary Larry Speakes called rising joblessness "the price you have to pay for bringing down inflation," a statement which House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr. (D-Mass.), termed "outrageous."

O'Neill charged that the President's January promise of an economic recovery program producing 13 million new jobs was "a cruel hoax."

The November increase of four-tenths of 1 percent in the nation's unemployment rate was the fourth consecutive monthly rise. The number of jobless workers jumped by 484,000 to a seasonally adjusted total of 9,004,000 in a labor force of 107 million.

THE NOVEMBER unemployment rate is the highest since May 1975, when at the height of the severe 1973-75 recession the jobless rate soared to 9 percent. At more than nine million, the number of unemployed workers is the highest since 1939, when almost 9.5-million people were out of work. Administration economists have said the unemployment rate could rise to 9 percent or higher before a hoped-for recovery begins in mid-1982.

The Bureau of Labor Statistics, which released the newest jobless figures, said unemployment last month affected most worker groups but was particularly pronounced among men. The rate for adult men rose from 6.7 to 7.2 percent over the month, just below the post-World War II high of 7.3 percent reached in May 1975.

The jobless rate for adult women went up from 7 to 7.3 percent while that for teenagers increased from 20.6 to 21.8 percent. The rate for white workers rose from 6.9 to 7.4 percent, while joblessness among blacks was unchanged at the record high of 15.5 percent reached in October.

Hobbs Act Amendment Screens Anti-Union Bid

JOB CREATING PROGRAMS are needed to halt the deepening recession and rising unemployment caused by the Administration's economic policies, AFL-CIO Vice President John Lyons testifies before the Joint Economic Committee of Congress. He was accompanied by Rudy Oswald, director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Economic Research. (Story, Page 3.)

Labor Hits Proposals As Unfair

By David L. Perlman

A bill that would make picket line misconduct a federal crime and send an offending striker to prison for up to 20 years is both unnecessary and unfair and would make the government an ally of employers in every labor dispute, the AFL-CIO testified.

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) is sponsoring the anti-union amendment to the Hobbs Act, but the big push for his bill has come from the National Right to Work Committee through a television and advertising campaign linking unions with "violence."

AFL-CIO SPECIAL Counsel Laurence Gold told a Senate subcommittee that the attempt to tie unions to strike violence is as flawed as the Thurmond bill itself.

His testimony included documented refutations of "case histories" exploited by the Right to Work Committee. Rare and isolated instances of serious wrongdoing by strikers were in fact punished under local and state law, Gold stressed.

"Neither the AFL-CIO nor any of its affiliates condones picket line misconduct. Our unions do all in their power to prevent it," Gold testified. And "almost without exception," state and local authorities effectively deal with wrongdoing.

HE TERMED THE Right to Work Committee "an employer-financed front organization which supports neither rights nor workers."

Its support for the Thurmond bill, he Administration Pressure Hit

Revision of Price Index Draws Strong Protest

The AFL-CIO renewed its criticism of Administration pressures on the Bureau of Labor Statistics to revise its measurement of consumer prices. And it urged Congress to restore budget cuts so that BLS can continue to compile economic data important to collective bargaining.

Reliable labor statistics take on special importance as the nation slips deeper into recession, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald stressed at House hearings.

The Reagan Administration's tampering with the consumer price index and its "budgetary starvation" of BLS data-collecting programs is weakening the nation's ability to understand and deal with inflation, he warned.

Oswald and other union witnesses testified before two House subcommittees to labor's strong disagreement with the BLS decision to eliminate home ownership costs from the consumer price index calculations.

The BLS has announced that it will substitute a "rental equivalence" measurement of housing costs. The change would be made in January 1983 for the broadest of the consumer price indexes and in 1985 for the key CPI-W. The latter is the index generally used to calculate wage and benefit increases due under cost-of-living provisions of union contracts and government entitlement programs, including social security.

ONE UNION, the Steelworkers, estimates that if the CPI change had been in effect in recent years, its members would have been shortchanged about 75 cents an hour in cost-of-living adjustments.

Oswald told a House Budget Committee task force and a Labor-Management Relations subcommittee that it "strains credulity" to swallow the claim that the change wasn't motivated in large part by the Administration's desire to hold down federal spending on entitlement programs and show a lower inflation rate.

Latest Deficit Projections Explode Supply-Side Myth

Massive federal budget deficits now projected by the Reagan Administration over the next few years demonstrate "the myth of supply-side economics," AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald declared.

The ballooning of the Office of Management & Budget's deficit projections to more than $160 billion by 1984 stung the Administration, which had promised a balanced federal budget by that year if its economic policies were adopted.

"JUST SIX MONTHS after selling the country an economic package of hocus-pocus, the architects of that program admit that it has no hope of producing the results that they promised," Oswald said.

Those results included creation of jobs, substantial economic growth and a balanced federal budget by 1984, Oswald noted. He scored the Administration for clinging to its policies in the face of the evidence and seeking to "inflict more of the same budget cuts that have been part and parcel of their bankrupt policy."

He said the current unemployment of nine million workers "already gives testimony to the suffering inflicted by Reaganomics."

The announcement of the revised deficit projections revealed some disarray within the inner circles of the Administration as the White House quickly denied statements by members of the President's Council of Economic Advisers suggesting that federal budget deficits are not the root of all infla-

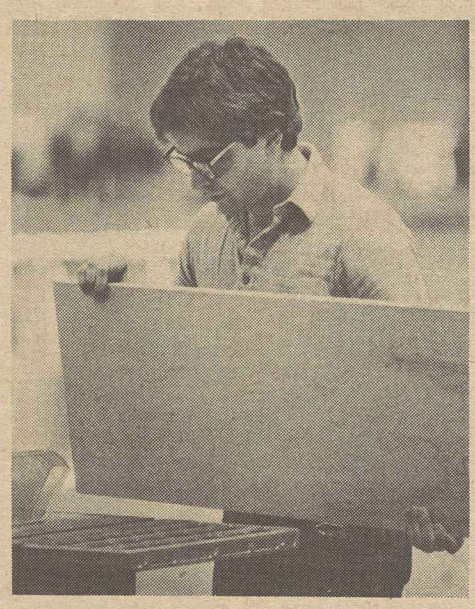
Reagan's PATCO Decision Called 'Disappointment'

The AFL-CIO expressed "disappointment" at President Reagan's decision to permit federal agencies to hire striking Air Traffic Controllers he fired in August —but not at their old jobs.

Federal Aviation Administrator Drew Lewis announced that Regan is lifting the ban on hiring PATCO strikers with the stipulation that they will not be allowed to return to the air traffic control positions.



"This is not a holiday gift," Lewis said, adding that any former controller applying for a federal job will be investigated to determine his or her role in the strike which began Aug. 3.

Supreme Court Lets Stand Liability Ruling on Asbestos

The Supreme Court steered away from a dispute over which insurance companies should pay damage claims to workers for asbestos-related illness.

Without comment, the justices declined to review decisions of two appellate courts that upheld a so-called "exposure" theory on financial liability for the claims.

THE 5TH AND 6TH U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals ruled that all insurance firms that had provided coverage to a company when its workers were exposed to the cancer-causing substance were liable in proportion to the period of time their policies were in force.

Several major insurance carriers affected by the appellate court rulings had asked the justices to decide in favor of the "manifestation" theory—suggesting that insurance liability begins only when the disease is first detected.

Exposure to asbestos on the job can lead to several serious diseases, including lung cancer, asbestosis and mesothelioma, a cancer of the chest cavity. These diseases may not be detected for as long as 20 years after initial exposure to asbestos.

A NUMBER of federal courts have adopted rulings that conflict with the decisions of the 5th and 6th Circuits. These cases may come before the Supreme Court later.

The issue is particularly significant to the insurance industry which may eventually have to pay billions of dollars in damage claims to workers and consumers over asbestos-related diseases in more than 20,000 pending lawsuits.

The appeals that the justices denied were filed by the Insurance Co. of North America and Liberty Mutual, which had been held jointly liable for coverage of workers of an Illinois manufacturer of asbestos-containing products, and Aetna Casualty & Surety, which had to pay a share of a $155,000 verdict awarded to the family of a worker who died from asbestosis.

THE HIGH COURT also refused to review a 9th Circuit court decision holding that the religious accommodation provision of Title VII of the 1964 Civil Rights Act exempts members of certain faiths from the obligation to pay union dues or a service fee.

The case stemmed from a union security clause in a 1976 contract between Steelworkers Local 8141 and Martin-Marietta Corp. in The Dalles, Ore., which involved three Seventh Day Adventists.

Because of their religious tenets, the three church members offered to pay an amount equal to union dues to a charity acceptable to the union in order to retain their jobs in the plant.

In rejecting the petition for review, the justices declined to hear the USWA local's argument that Congress intended that the matter of religious objections to union dues come under the National Labor Relations Act rather than the Civil Rights Act. The union also contended that the Title VII provision violates the First Amendment by singling out a certain group of citizens for special economic benefit on religious grounds.

IN OTHER ACTION, the Supreme Court agreed to review the liability of a union to pay a Postal Service employee from Lynchburg, Va., who claimed he wasn't properly represented by the Postal Workers in his grievance.

The worker was discharged in 1976 following a scuffle with a fellow employee. Although the APWU pursued the case through the grievance process, it was abandoned when the contractual time limit for arbitration expired. A federal district court ruled that the union should pay a portion of the lost wages. The 4th Circuit court later held that only the Postal Service should be liable for the lost wages.

Social Security Cuts Opposed

Conference on Aging Shapes Positive Goals

Administration efforts to manipulate the 1981 White House Conference on Aging backfired as delegates fought back to support social security and other key social programs for older Americans and their families.

An emotionally charged showdown in the most controversial of the 14 conference committees led to a compromise resolution maintaining social security protection. AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman joined Chairman Claude Pepper of the House Committee on the Aging in negotiations leading to the accommodation.

MEMBERS OF at least five other committees took time from assigned missions to rally around social security when they perceived it to be endangered by "mystery delegates" assigned to the conference only five or six weeks before it opened.

The final product of the conference was a summary of more than 600 resolutions calling for continued or greater federal response to the needs and talents of this nation's elderly population.

"To sum it up," Seidman said, "the conference came out on the whole with constructive recommendations which if followed will work to the benefit of older persons and the rest of society. Despite the extraordinary efforts of the Reagan Administration, conferees over and over again repudiated its policies."

A statement by the Leadership Council of Aging Organizations (LCAO) reached a similar conclusion. It found "remarkably positive tone and content in the majority of resolutions adopted in all but a few of the committees."

THE LCAO ALSO noted that the bulk of resolutions were either drawn from or are in harmony with the "8 for '80s" statement adopted by the AFL-CIO and 24 other members of the LCAO. This statement set forth eight broad goals, including continuing commitment to social security and endorsement of a national health plan serving all age groups.

Delegates assigned to the conference's health committee endorsed a resolution calling for a continuing search for a national health care plan. They also urged expansion of Medicare to cover out-patient prescription drugs, eye examinations, foot care, routine dental care, dental prosthetics and hearing aids. A change in Medicare-Medicaid policy to encourage greater use of non-institutional care was approved, together with another calling for expansion of mental health services for older adults.

Key resolutions presented by committees to the 2,200 delegates also included calls for:

- Interfund borrowing among the social security trust funds to meet short-term financing needs.
- Restoration of the social security minimum benefit for present and future beneficiaries.
- An increase in supplementary security income payments to at least the official poverty level.
- Earlier vesting and greater portability of individual pension rights.
- Prospective reimbursement under Medicare and Medicaid to institutions and practitioners as one means of promoting better cost accountability and better services.
- A national social policy for long-term care, based on a comprehensive data base with actuarial information and financial underwriting, together with a comprehensive national health plan which would include a long-term care community-based health system.
- At least 200,000 units of housing for the elderly to be provided "within all levels of the government and the private sector."

SOCIAL SECURITY took center stage soon after the conference's committee work began.

The first committee resolution—offered by a delegate later identified as an Orange County, Calif., official and former Reagan aide—opposed any use of general revenue funds to finance social security.

This maneuver confirmed misgivings expressed at a rally held by LCAO on the eve of the conference. At another rally, mid-way in the conference, dozens of speakers denounced the conduct of the conference and the negative resolution on general revenues.

PEPPER AGREED to lead a delegation to protest the controversial resolution. Before the protest could be conveyed, however, Conference Director Betty Brake asked Pepper and later other LCAO leaders including Seidman and National Council of Senior Citizens President Jacob Clayman, to join in negotiating what became a compromise resolution opposing any reduction in benefits being paid current social security recipients.

The resolution recommended "that Congress and the Administration make every possible and fiscally reasonable effort with regard to the security of the social security system to maintain no less than the real protection that is currently provided to all participants."

Seidman and Clayman later joined in criticizing another resolution praising the Reagan Administration for its "defense" of social security, terming it a "double-cross" which undermined the earlier progress of the day.

THE APPARENT stacking of key committees, caused concern even as the conference ended. Last-minute revelations centered on a letter from the Texas Governor's office to the Republican National Committee naming four delegates "who would put loyalty to the President ahead of their commitment to the elderly and who would not take offense at the involvement of the Republican Party." Press reports of similar letters in other states appeared the day after the conference.

Other documents indicated that a Republican "whip" system had been established for critical committees.

Deficit Forecasts Sting White House

tion after all, and that budget balancing could be postponed without damage to the economy.

THE FUROR was touched off when CEA Chairman Murray Weidenbaum said in a speech that the economy could absorb larger federal deficits without a new surge in interest rates and without depriving business of sources for funding expansion, a position sharply at odds with the Administration's past economic preaching.

William Niskanen, also a member of the economic advisory council, said "it is now recognized that some of the expected effects of the Reagan Administration economic program are inconsistent and something has to give." He said the Administration has already abandoned its goal of trying to balance the federal budget by 1984.

White House Deputy Press Sec. Larry Speakes quickly issued a disclaimer, insisting that Niskanen's statement "did not reflect the President's opinion or Administration policy."

The new estimates by the Administration foresee federal budget deficits of $109.1 billion in fiscal 1982 and $152.3 billion and $162 billion for the following two years. In July, the OMB predicted the deficits would be only $42.5 billion in 1982, $52.7 billion in 1983 and $44.2 billion in 1984. As recently as November, the Administration had substantially increased those figures, and less than a month later upped projections to the higher estimates. The deficit in fiscal 1981, which ended Sept. 30, was $57.9 billion.

Walesa Sends Thanks For AFL-CIO Aid

Lech Walesa, unable to attend last month's AFL-CIO convention because of ongoing tensions between Polish authorities and the Solidarity labor federation, sent his thanks to the American labor movement for its support.

In a taped message to Federation President Lane Kirkland, Walesa conveyed his regrets that he could not appear personally at the convention to accept the AFL-CIO's first George Meany International Human Rights Award on behalf of Solidarity, but noted that "the situation in Poland has unfolded in such a way that I have been forced to stay here." Walesa added:

"I HAD WANTED to personally thank you for the great assistance which you have extended to us, to personally express my gratitude at your convention. . . .

"I hope that you understand that the problems of this country are monumental. Still, that does not mean that I do not wish to acknowledge the significance of what you are trying to do for us.

"Working people have always had to fight for their gains. I expect that you too are facing many problems, that you have to settle many things at your convention so that your members' lives will be better. I am certain that the convention will map out directions which will benefit your members.

"I thank you once again for your aid, and I hope that I will have an opportunity of doing this personally. Also, I would like to become acquainted with your working conditions and your activities because we can learn much from you. . . . Many of your solutions are worthy of emulation and not just in Poland."

WALESA CONCLUDED his remarks to Kirkland saying that "if fate has it that I can meet with you . . . I will look forward to that opportunity." The Executive Council hopes to present Walesa the Meany award at some future meeting.

Walesa's message was taped between meetings in Warsaw of Solidarity's national leadership as it mapped strategy for talks with the Polish communist authorities. Leah Belli, president of the California Democratic Council, who interviewed Walesa, translated his remarks and delivered the message to Kirkland.

COLLECTION OF TRIBUTES and remembrances highlighting the contributions of Al Barkan to the labor movement over the past four decades was presented to the retiring national COPE director at a testimonial dinner in Washington which drew more than 1,000 well-wishers. Making the presentation are Jacob Clayman, left, president of the National Council of Senior Citizens and a long-time friend of Barkan's; AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue. Barkan has headed COPE since 1963.

South Africa Pressed to Free Jailed Black Trade Unionists

The AFL-CIO protested the recent arrest and detention of 14 black trade union leaders in South Africa and called for their immediate release.

"These and previous arrests are serious violations of trade union rights, and will help to fuel the fires of violence and unrest, the consequences of which no one can foretell," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland declared in a cable to South African Prime Minister P. W. Botha in Pretoria.

THE BLACK LABOR leaders were arrested Nov. 27 in coordinated predawn raids in several South African cities by security police under a law that allows detention without charge.

Also arrested were students, researchers, and political activists in what appeared to be part of a continuing drive to uncover links between organizations operating legally in South Africa and the banned African National Congress, the main movement of resistance to white minority rule.

The trade union leaders included Sam Kikane, general secretary of the South African Allied Workers Union; Emma Mashinini, general secretary of the Commercial, Catering & Allied Workers Union, and Samson Ndou, president of the General & Allied Workers Union.

IT WAS ALSO reported that T. Gqweta, president of the South African Allied Workers Union, and a vice president of the union were arrested and held on Dec. 8. Those arrested are held under a law permitting detention without charge for 14 days. Frequently, when the 14 days are up, the authorities simply extend the period of detention, which they are permitted to do indefinitely under the Terrorism Act.

At its preconvention meeting last month, the AFL-CIO Executive Council launched a special fund to assist black unions in South Africa and urged affiliates to contribute to it. The council voted an initial $25,000 contribution.

The arbitrary arrest and detention of trade union leaders, not only in South Africa but in other African countries such as Zambia, Zaire, Namibia, and others, recently drew strong denunciation from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions.

Meeting in Monrovia, Liberia, the ICFTU executive board condemned government interference in trade union affairs and "the unfortunate trend whereby governments facing social and economic problems are using trade unions as scapegoats."

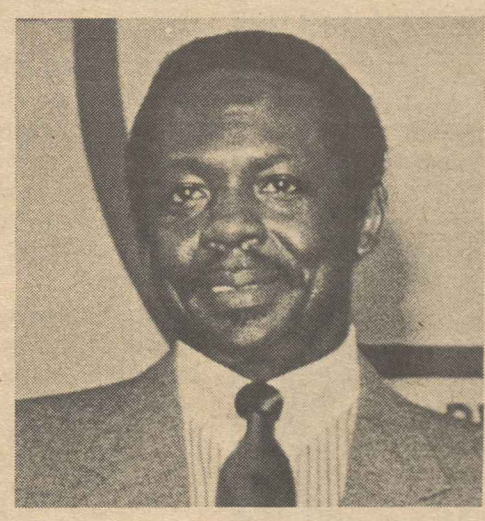
Reversal of Policy Sought To Combat Jobless Rise

The AFL-CIO called on Congress to reverse the disastrous direction of the Administration's economic policies and deal with the tragic and wasteful high unemployment situation that had over 9 million Americans out of work last month.

John H. Lyons, a vice president of the federation and chairman of its Economic Policy Committee, outlined the anti-recession, job-creating programs adopted by the AFL-CIO's 14th convention in an appearance before the congressional Joint Economic Committee.

LYONS, WHO IS president of the Iron Workers, called for sufficient funding of programs already on the books to provide jobs rapidly and help lift the economy. In addition, he said, the AFL-CIO proposes new legislation establishing a Reconstruction Finance Corp.-type organization to make loans and subsidies for the retooling and growth of basic industries, credit allocation to channel funds into productive uses and halt speculative excesses and merger activities, limiting tax cuts and credits for both businesses and individuals, and withdrawing tax giveaways to wealthy oil royalty owners.

"Unemployment is already at crisis levels," Lyons observed. "The number of men and women without jobs, more than 9 million, is the largest number of jobless since the Depression of the 1930s."



In addition to the 9 million, there are another million "hidden unemployed" workers—those too discouraged to look for employment—and 5 million employed only part-time because full-time work is not available, Lyons noted.

"If you add up all these numbers," he said, "you have 15 million Americans today who are suffering serious job loss and income loss. Over the next year, more than one-fourth of the labor force will suffer some unemployment, and nearly half of all workers will suffer the direct impact of the recession through either joblessness or reduction in hours and earnings."

Unemployment is a personal tragedy, a human tragedy, to those affected by it, Lyons said, and unemployment compensation or welfare brings only temporary or partial relief. He cited a Johns Hopkins University study showing that recession and joblessness produce more heart ailments, suicide, crime, murders, mental and physical disease.

MOREOVER, HE SAID, the economic waste of productive workers without jobs is a tremendous loss to the nation.

Every 1 percent of unemployment, every one million workers without jobs, costs the federal treasury $30 billion—$25 billion in lost taxes and $5 billion in additional unemployment benefits, Lyons noted. This costs the nation about $100 billion in lost output of goods and services, he added.

HENRY NICHOLAS is the new president of the Hospital & Health Care Employees division of the Retail, Wholesale & Dept. Store Union. He was elected at the division's convention in Philadelphia to succeed Leon J. Davis, who did not seek reelection but will continue to head its District 1199. Nicholas has been secretary-treasurer of the division for the past eight years.

8.4% Jobless Rate Highest In Six Years

As in the previous two months, unemployment increases in November were especially large for blue-collar workers, whose rate rose from 11 to 11.8 percent after a similar jump in October. The jobless rate for construction workers rose from 18 to 18.2 percent, following an increase of 1.7 percent the month before.

As the nation's eighth post-war recession deepens, unemployment also has begun to take its toll of white-collar workers, a labor category generally less affected by downturns in the business cycle. In November, white-collar unemployment hit its highest level—4.2 percent, or 2.7 million persons—since the record of 5.3 percent set during the 1973-75 recession.

BLS Commissioner Janet L. Norwood told the Joint Economic Committee of Congress that the deterioration which set in last summer has accelerated over the past two months. After rising half a percentage point over the summer, the nation's jobless rate jumped nearly a full point from September through November.

"THE NUMBER of payroll jobs grew very slowly between July and September but declined by nearly half a million over the last two months," she observed. Since July, employment has dropped by 940,000.

Although the November drop of 235,000 in nonfarm payroll jobs occurred throughout the economy, two-thirds of the decline was in durable goods industries, with especially large reductions in transportation equipment, fabricated metals, and electrical equipment, Norwood said.

The number of people holding jobs fell by 190,000 in November to 98 million, with the overall employment-population ratio dipping to 57.9 percent, its lowest level in about four years, BLS reported. The civilian labor force, meanwhile, grew by 293,000 over the month. Since January, the labor force has grown by 1.6 million, with adult women accounting for most of the increase.

Reagan's PATCO Decision Called 'Disappointment'

pointment, AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said the Administration action was "clearly not what the Executive Council had in mind when we asked the President to show compassion. We don't see how this fits the needs of either the PATCO families or the nation's air travelers."

"We continue to believe the air controllers should be restored to their jobs," Kirkland said, reiterating his statement of a week earlier after visiting the White House: "We urged the President to give humane consideration to the problems of the air traffic controllers and their families. We urged returning those workers to their jobs so as to restore normal air traffic service as soon as possible, spare the public further inconvenience and permit the thousands of other furloughed air industry employees to return to work."

KIRKLAND also observed that "there can be no comfort in being told you are eligible for a federal job" in an administration which prides itself in reductions in force among federal employees and "is committed to more and more cutbacks in federal budgets."

PATCO President Robert E. Poli characterized the Reagan action as a "cruel hoax" at a time there are no federal jobs.

Lewis gave as an excuse for the continued lockout of the controllers "safety-threatening friction" he said would result between returning strikers and controllers who crossed picket lines.

Fired controllers would be permitted to work as military air traffic controllers, if they are qualified, Lewis said.

Full Circle on Trade

TRADE AFFECTS jobs, technology and the nation's future. The nation is now in a serious recession. Already 9 million Americans are jobless. Plant shutdowns are not a sign of Christmas holidays, but rather of a national tragedy.

Compounding and worsening that tragedy is the adverse trade relationship. During the first 9 months of this year, the nation's trade balance has run $26.2 billion in the red.

Instead of the current preoccupation with the nation's budget deficit—money we owe ourselves—there should be more concern about the trade deficit—obligations this nation must meet to producers abroad. It is time to recognize that imports are aggravating the effects of the recession, particularly in basic industries.

The recession needs many national actions to turn it around and put the nation on a solid expansion path. One of those actions must deal with the additional impact of imports upon industries reeling from the blows of recession. Imports—now over 30 percent of the production of all goods in the U.S.—must be regulated until U.S. industry can get back on its feet. Otherwise, the plant closing will be permanent and the United States will emerge from the recession with even less of an industrial base.

THE PUBLIC explanations for trade policy have come full circle since World War II. Then, as U.S. seamen watched the shipping industry go down and their jobs exported to foreign flags, they were told that the United States is a manufacturing nation—not a service nation.

Exports of manufactures are job creators, the story went. But in the three decades since that war, the deficits have grown in basic industries: steel, autos, textiles, electronics, shoes, some types of machinery. Each time the newer technology industries were considered to be an answer. But they no longer are an answer as even aircraft and computers are now using imported parts.

Now the story has turned in 1981 as the international trade balance shifted from surplus in the 1960s to deficits in the 1970s and 1980s. Now the emphasis is on service industries in trade policy, because the United States is a service economy.

However, the AFL-CIO believes the United States must be a diversified manufacturing, agricultural and service economy. We need high technology industries and many other industries for full employment. Trade is part of that goal.

THE COUNCIL of Economic Advisers still portrays all people who are concerned about import damage as "special interests." The AFL-CIO believes this is a false view of the special interests in trade policy.

Importers, foreign investors or foreign governments are all special interests. On the other hand, the jobs and production that imports cost across the nation are a general problem that should be considered the national interest. The people who pay the costs of imports now number in the millions. Surely, it is time to recognize the costs as well as the benefits involved.

The AFL-CIO believes in fair trade. Instead, the government abdicates responsibility except to try to talk other countries into greater markets for U.S. exports. That is a valid and important goal, but it is only part of the picture and part of the goal. The continued encouragement of products from nations which don't give America a fair deal is a bankrupt policy.

'Whatever You Do, Don't Show Fear!'

Letting the 'Market' Decide

When U.S. Steel Turns to Oil 'Industrial Backbone' Suffers

By Gus Tyler

THE TALE OF two chairmen at U.S. Steel reads like a morality play, entitled, "What's Going Wrong With the American Economy."

There was one chairman, Edgar Speer, who believed that the job of U.S. Steel was to make steel. He went to work on a plan to build a $3.5-billion facility that would be up-to-date and that could compete against all comers around the world.

THEN, THERE IS Speer's successor, David M. Broderick, who took the reins of U.S. Steel in 1979. He dumped the plans to build the new modern mill; he closed 14 plants that were not money makers; he began to accumulate a cash reserve.

Broderick did not have his eye on steel; he had it on money. His biggest move to date is to reach out for Marathon Oil with an offer of $6.3 billion from his cash reserve.

Now, which chairman is doing the right thing? They both are, depending on what you consider right.

MOST FINANCIAL analysts believe that, in the short run, Broderick is right—at least, he is right for the shareholders in U.S. Steel. He is very likely to get a faster return by putting bucks into oil than into steel. Making the metal is a business that has been yielding only about 4 percent on equity; making a merger is fairly certain to yield much more.

Speer's strategy, on the other hand, was much riskier and promised lesser immediate returns to the shareholders. New plants do not yield instantaneous results: they require much capital; the returns are slow until momentum is picked up against overseas rivals.

But, from the point of view of the United States as a country, Speer is right. America needs steel; it is the backbone of an industrial society. If we lose our capacity to turn out steel, we lose much of our industrial strength and military might.

BUT WHETHER Broderick is right or Speer is right, should such a decision that so profoundly affects the lives of people, their communities (closing 14 plants), and the country be left entirely to Mr. S. or Mr. B., according to his preference? The general answer is to "leave it to the market to decide."

Well, the "market" has decided. It says that Americans prefer to buy steel from overseas so long as steel made in this country is needlessly costly because of the obsolete way in which it is made. The right response to the "market" would be to build mills that are better than those in Germany or Japan—a deed which can, indeed, be done.

BUT U.S. STEEL is not responding to that "market," a market that speaks for the needs and the preferences of the American people. The new chairman is responding to the needs of shareholders whose interests do not coincide with the interests of America and its people.

Shouldn't the people have a voice in deciding which way this country goes—especially if those multi-billion dollar reserves that U.S. Steel has accumulated were made possible by generous tax treatments from Uncle Sam?

Human Suffering Behind a Statistic

The 8.4 percent unemployment rate announced by the government means that over 9 million Americans are now out of work, and a million more have given up their search for a job.

Mayors are particularly distressed by this high rate of unemployment because the unemployed—youth and adults—are concentrated in such large numbers in our cities.

The unemployment rate is a statistic that reflects human suffering among Americans.

Our federal government has a responsibility for the millions of citizens who are victimized by current economic policies and conditions.

The time has come for a moratorium on further federal budget cuts and for a re-examination of the cuts that have already been made.

—Mayor Helen Boosalis of Lincoln, Neb., president of the U.S. Conference of Mayors, commenting on the November unemployment report of the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

'Old-Fashioned Economics'

Reviving a 'Bankrupt' Policy

"This is the price you have to pay for bringing down inflation."—Deputy White House Press Secretary Larry Speakes, Dec. 4, 1981, on report that unemployment in the United States had jumped to 8.4 percent in November, the highest rate in six years.

"I don't believe the alternative to inflation is recession. I think that's old-fashioned economics. I don't think that you have to trade unemployment—and incidentally, President Carter as a candidate said that he would never fight inflation by using unemployment. President Carter in his present economic message has said that as a part of his fight against inflation, unemployment is going to be allowed to go up one to one-and-one-half or two percentage points.

"Now, this is self-destructive, because for every single percentage point that you add to the unemployment rolls, you add 25 to 29 billion dollars to the federal deficit, both in the loss of revenue from those no longer working and in the benefits that go out to them."—Candidate Ronald Reagan, League of Women Voters debate, Houston, Apr. 23, 1980.

"Unemployment is not the answer to inflation. Unemployment means only lost jobs, and blacks, who are all too often the last hired, are usually fired first."—Candidate Ronald Reagan, speech to the National Urban League, New York, Aug. 5, 1980.

* * *

"The Democratic Congress and the Carter Administration are espousing programs that candidate Carter in 1976 said were inhumane: using recession, unemployment, high interest rates, and high taxes to fight inflation. The Democrats are now trying to stop inflation with a recession, a bankrupt policy which is throwing millions of Americans out of work."—1980 Republican Party Platform, adopted July 15, 1980, Detroit.

New Biography

Meany a Man for His Times

George Meany and His Times—A Biography, by Archie Robinson, 445 pages. Simon & Schuster, $18.75.

ADVANCE COPIES of this major new biography of George Meany announced for publication in January 1982 by Simon & Schuster, were released during the centennial convention of the AFL-CIO in New York.

Titled "George Meany and His Times," the 445-page book by Archie Robinson covers the career of the AFL-CIO president that spanned six decades and made him in the words of the publisher, "not only the architect of the AFL-CIO, its leader, its most articulate spokesman and its enduring symbol for 24 years, (but) also one of America's most influential lobbyists for progressive legislation and one of the world's most controversial, outspoken and incorruptible public figures."

ROBINSON, WHO covered labor's activities for nearly 40 years, first for the Detroit News and then for U.S. News & World Report, says the book is drawn as George Meany's own story, told largely in his own words excerpted from taped interviews that began in late 1975 and ended in 1979, only six months before his death.

The book is based not only on the hundreds of hours the author spent with Meany himself, but on scores of additional interviews with the late federation president's associates, with family members and with many who worked closely with him over the years.

In addition, Robinson had access to unpublished documents, AFL-CIO Executive Council minutes and the archives of the federation.

The book is organized into 19 chapters, with all of the material in chronological order—because that is the way Meany, with his phenomenal, photographic memory, had it stored in his mind, Robinson says.

IT EXPLORES his relations with eight U.S. Presidents, beginning with Franklin D. Roosevelt, reveals behind-the-scene maneuvers involving important political and labor events, and tells why he took the actions and made the statements that made him unique among the leaders of his time.

The book contains an extensive collection of photographs documenting the life of George Meany in public and private over the entire span of his 85 years.

Copies of the book are available to union members and friends of labor at a reduced price of $12.50 each, which includes postage and handling, a 33-percent savings off the bookstore price. Orders must be accompanied by checks payable to "AFL-CIO Books" and should be sent to: AFL-CIO Books, P.O. Box 37437, Washington, D.C. 20013. Cash and COD orders will not be accepted.

Job Loss Mounts

Setting a Course for Disaster

IF THE ADMINISTRATION continues on its present course, more than 25 million workers will suffer temporary or permanent job losses during 1982, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald warned on Labor News Conference.

At least 15 million Americans are now out of work or working only part-time because they can't find full-time jobs, Oswald stressed. He said that the sharp jump in unemployment that has added 1.5 million men and women to the jobless rolls since July signals an even deeper impact in the months ahead, and that "nearly 50 million Americans will experience the effects—lost income and lost work opportunities."

Not only has the Administration's economic game plan failed to produce the promised turnaround, but conditions "are actually getting worse" month after month, he asserted.

Oswald renewed the AFL-CIO's call for federal reinvolvement in job-creation and job-development efforts. He rejected the Administration's contention that those efforts had failed in the past. The fact is, he said, "public service employment provided more than 250,000 jobs for people who could not find work in the private sector." He said that the "public works programs that were incorporated very quickly in the 1975 recession" were a major factor in shaping the recovery, and provided badly needed community facilities as well as jobs.

THE PRIVATE SECTOR just hasn't responded to "take up the slack" created by the budget cuts that wiped out those jobs programs, Oswald said. He pointed out that there has been a sharp fall-off of private sector jobs over the last two months—more than 100,000 jobs lost in the auto industry, 40,000 in steel, and at least 20,000 each in lumber, textile and apparel.

"Instead of a revitalization, we've had a great number of layoffs," he declared, and "there is no single, bigger waste in our economy than unemployed workers sitting on the shelf, doing nothing."

Reporters questioning Oswald were Warren Brown of the Washington Post and Michael Posner of Reuters news agency. Labor News Conference, produced by the AFL-CIO as a public service, is broadcast weekly on Mutual radio.

By Press Associates, Inc.

FROM THE BEGINNINGS of commercial broadcasting in this country, the law has recognized that those who reap profits from their government-granted monopoly of television and radio frequencies have a certain responsibility to serve the public interest.

But the principle that use of the public airwaves is also a public trust has been under siege by the Reagan Administration and even in the Congress.

Under the banner of "deregulation" and "private enterprise" and even "free speech," the Federal Communications Commission, now dominated by Reagan appointees, and Congress, heavily lobbied by the broadcast industry, have been whittling away at rules providing for public accountability by broadcasters.

Some recent examples:

- Congress last summer eliminated the need for a potential owner of a radio or TV station to prove itself more deserving of a license than other applicants because it would better serve the community interest. Instead, initial licenses will be granted by lottery—a throw of the dice.
- The FCC has severely weakened the incentive for radio and television stations to be accountable by extending broadcast licenses from three years to seven years.
- The FCC has impaired its ability to determine whether radio stations are meeting public service standards by ending the requirement that they maintain a daily log of programming.

UNFORTUNATELY, the worst may be yet to come. The FCC has asked Congress to repeal the Fairness Doctrine and the "equal time" provision of the Communications Act, the law that has governed broadcasting in this country since 1934.

The Fairness Doctrine, which has been called a bill of rights for the viewing and listening public, requires broadcasters to provide time on the air for balanced presentation of controversial issues.

Equal time means that if a station gives air time to a candidate for public office, aside from news coverage and paid ads, it must give the same amount of time to all other legally qualified candidates for that office.

In addition, the FCC has proposed eliminating the requirement that individuals be allowed to reply to personal attacks on the air, a change which could open the door to character assassination and other abuses.

TELEVISION AND radio can be unfair and superficial enough even with a Fairness Doctrine in its treatment of labor, of women, of minorities, and in its coverage, or lack of coverage, of vital issues. But without this protection for the public, and with their new seven-year licenses, station owners would be accountable to no one.

The attack on the Fairness Doctrine is coming at a time when television and radio networks are beginning to broadcast so-called advocacy advertising. With the cost of both production and television air time zooming, such issue-targeted advertising practices will allow the wealthy groups and individuals to broadcast their views on the most influential of all media—television.

Without the Fairness Doctrine, less well-endowed opponents of the messages carried through advocacy advertising would be left with no opportunity to voice their opposition on radio or television.

BROADCAST INDUSTRY executives claim a First Admendment free speech privilege to use their monopoly of the limited number of broadcasting frequencies as they please—without regard to the Fairness Doctrine.

But while the industry has never substantiated any real burden on its freedom of speech, repeal of the Fairness Doctrine and other protections would give all the freedom to the broadcasters and leave the public without recourse.

Congress has a special responsibility to maintain the public's access to the airwaves and to promote free and open debate.

THE ECONOMIC COURSE set by the Administration will lead to temporary or permanent unemployment for more than 25 million American workers in 1982, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Warren Brown, left, of the Washington Post and Michael Posner of Reuters. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs program is aired weekly on Mutual radio.

Hobbs Act Proposals Called Bid to Stifle Unions

suggested, is based on a belief "that the legislation will chill the exercise of the right to form and join unions, will intimidate workers and will embolden anti-union employers in their efforts to crush organizing efforts and strikes."

The radical right is using its campaign for the Hobbs Act amendments to raise funds to be used "to undermine collective bargaining," Gold charged.

Passage of the legislation, he warned, would mark "a serious departure from the principle of national labor policy that the federal government should not side with either management or labor during legitimate labor disputes."

THE THURMOND bill would create new categories of federal crime, including property destruction, that could be used against strikers.

It would also nullify a 1973 Supreme Court decision that the Hobbs Act, which deals with such crimes as "extortion," was not intended by Congress to apply to offenses committed in the course of a lawful strike.

The Justice Dept. told the subcommittee it strongly opposes the portion of the bill that would create new categories of federal crimes. It does favor overturning the Supreme Court's interpretation of the law in the Enmons decision, thus applying the crime of extortion to acts of violence or property damage that take place during a labor dispute.

But the witness, Assistant Attorney Gen. Jonathan C. Rose, acknowledged that the Justice Dept. did not know of any crimes that have gone unprosecuted because of lack of Hobbs Act jurisdiction and has found no "reluctance" by state and local authorities to prosecute violence in labor disputes.

GOLD TOLD the subcommittee, in response to a question, that the only purpose of the legislation is to "get the government on the employer's side" in a labor dispute. "and we just resent the hell out of it."

A union seeking a pay raise is not trying to "extort" money from an employer, Gold stressed. But comparable attacks by employers or their agents against strikers wouldn't be covered because they couldn't be linked to the crime of extortion.

IT'S UP TO the advocates to demonstrate a need for the legislation and that test hasn't been met, Gold insisted. "States and localities are meeting their peacekeeping responsibilities."

Further, he stressed, "at a time when serious crimes are increasing and the federal budget decreasing," involving federal criminal law enforcement in labor-management disputes makes no sense. A serious enforcement effort would require creation of a national police force, he told the Senate panel.

Gold pointed out that misuse of the strike weapon for wrongful purposes is already a federal crime under the Hobbs Act, and that a number of other serious offenses such as the use of explosives during a strike are also punishable under other federal law.

THE PROPOSED Hobbs Act amendment "will not close any enforcement gaps left open by either state, local or federal laws," Gold said. But some offenses normally treated as misdemeansors under local laws would be transformed into federal felonies requiring long prison terms.

Under the Thurmond bill, Gold told the subcommittee, the Hobbs Act would be enlarged to embrace "minor misconduct, picket line affrays in the heat of the moment and any other misuse of force motivated by fear or animus by union members during a strike."

Such an expansion of the Hobbs Act, he said, "loses all touch with the reason for providing federal jurisdiction over extortion in the first place—to check racketeering activity."

Gold reminded the Senate panel that picketing is a form of free speech, that "the men and women of the American labor movement are law-abiding citizens," and that all available evidence refutes the assertion "'endlessly repeated by the bill's supporters that 'union violence' is a pervasive national problem."

Rose, the assistant attorney general who testified for the Justice Dept., told the subcommittee that portions of the department's prepared testimony had been modified in light of "concerns leaders of organized labor raised" at the recent White House meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council with President Reagan and his top aides.

ROSE WAS repeatedly pressed as to why the Justice Dept. wanted to overturn the 1973 Supreme Court decision if it had found no need for a broader law, and why it sought additional jurisdiction when Administration budget cuts and policy decisions were drastically reducing its ability to deal with such clearly federal areas of concern as interstate organized crime and drug rings.

Rose responded that the Justice Dept. considered the Supreme Court decision erroneous in its interpretation of the Hobbs Act, but was not "taking the initiative" in seeking a change.

Reed Larson, president of the National Right to Work Committee, and officials of two construction contractor associations argued for the entire Thurmond bill.

It is needed, Larson insisted, to deal with the "growing problem of union corruption and violence." The Supreme Court decision, he claimed, has "emboldened union officials" to commit "murder" and "manslaughter."

LABOR CENTENNIAL WEEK was marked by the city of Corpus Christi, Tex., to commemorate the 100th anniversary of the AFL-CIO. Participating in the proclamation ceremony are, front row from left, Mayor Luther Jones; Penny Dudley, Government Employees; Becky Moeller, vice president, Coastal Bend Central Labor Council; and Linda Bridges, Teachers. Drop in Food Prices Slows Climb of Wholesale Index

Wholesale prices moderated in November, rising five-tenths of 1 percent over the month, as lower food prices offset higher energy costs, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

If the November rate held for 12 straight months, the increase would be 6.3 percent, BLS said. Officials compute the annual rate by compounding a monthly figure that is more precise than the rounded-off five-tenths of 1 percent that is published.

AS IT IS, the November increase in the government's measure of wholesale prices for finished goods—the producer price index—lifted the index 7.1 percent above the year-earlier level.

Food prices dropped five-tenths of 1 percent over the month, the result of ample crops and high levels of pork and beef production. Energy costs rose nine-tenths of 1 percent, the sharpest increase since April. The November increase was mostly the result of the recent decision of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries to set a unified price for crude oil.

Energy prices had fallen four-tenths of 1 percent in October. The increase in November was due to rises in prices of gasoline and natural gas, BLS said. Home heating oil costs, however, continued to drop.

Among changes in food prices, eggs fell after rising in October while milled rice prices were off more than 9 percent for the second straight month. Prices were up more than 18 percent for fresh fruit, while the cost of soft drinks, roasted coffee and refined sugar also advanced considerably.

PRICES FOR goods other than food and energy climbed eight-tenths of 1 percent after a 1 percent rise in October. Those increases were attributed to higher new car prices, which advanced nine-tenths of 1 percent in November, following a sharp 4.2 percent rise in October.

New Contract Ratified At Frontier Airlines

Chicago—Some 2,700 members of the Air Line Employees overwhelmingly ratified a new agreement with Frontier Airlines that will provide a 36-percent salary increase over a 30-month period.

ALEA President Victor J. Herbert said that the pact will raise the base salary of 10-year station agents from $21,300 to $29,580 a year over the life of the agreement.

The contract is retroactive to Jan. 1, when the old agreement expired, and represents productivity increases and adjustments to keep up with living costs.

Unions Denounce Tampering With Consumer Price Index

The BLS completely bypassed the Labor Research Advisory Council when it decided to scrap homeowner costs as a component of the price indexes, Oswald noted. The union advisory body anticipated only a BLS study of the feasibility of such a change. "It now appears that feasibility has been determined in advance of the study," Oswald protested.

HE AND OTHER union witnesses spelled out in detail labor's technical objections to substituting a rental equivalence statistical measure for actual home ownership costs.

Oswald noted also that changing the calculation won't necessarily bring down the CPI level. If the change had been in effect in October, he pointed out, the price index for all urban consumers would have risen by seven-tenths of 1 percent over the month. The actual increase was four-tenths of 1 percent because it happened to be a month when "home prices fell, mortgage rates stabilized, and rents continued upward."

The United States "is the largest nation of homeowners in the world," Oswald noted. But under the planned changes, the consumer price index "is going to say that all these houses are rented."

ALSO PROTESTING the BLS change in the price measurements were representatives of the Food & Commercial Workers, Auto Workers, Machinists and Steelworkers.

Arnold Mayer, vice president and government affairs director of the Food & Commercial Workers, stressed that "statistical sleight-of-hand" won't cure inflation. But it can "make it even more difficult for workers and retirees to cope."

Changing the cost-of-living calculation, Mayer suggested, enables "a politically sensitive move such as cutting social security benefits" to be achieved "by executive fiat," without the need for legislation.

UAW ECONOMIST Lydia Fischer said the Bureau of Labor Statistics injected the home ownership component into the price indexes to reflect the reality that nearly two-thirds of households are homeowners rather than renters. Before World War II, most families rented their dwellings.

The BLS should keep its market basket mix in line with present-day conditions, Fischer urged, rather than switch over to a hypothetical "equivalency" figure.

Machinists Economist William E. Bittle noted that COLA provisions in union contracts "did not come freely or easily," and most were "paid for one way or another" through bargaining table tradeoffs of other improvements.

"WHEN BLS economists start to tamper with it," he stressed, they're tampering with an index that determines how much cash people will have "to put groceries on the table."

Substituting a rental equivalent for home ownership, Bittle testified, "leaves little doubt as to who is being 'trickled on' under the Administration's trickle-down economic theories."

James Smith, assistant to the president of the Steelworkers, noted that the Bureau of Labor Statistics "has made a significant contribution to stable relations between management and labor . . . because workers were convinced of the integrity of the BLS." Thus, they and their unions have been willing to accept collective bargaining decisions based on the CPI and other measurements.

"This confidence has been widely jolted by the Reagan Administration's decision to change the CPI methodology," Smith said. "It can be further undermined," he warned, "if the BLS is forced to abandon other services of value to workers as part of the current orgy of budget slashing."

OSWALD'S TESTIMONY noted that budget cuts over the past two years "have fallen particularly hard" on the BLS Office of Wages & Industrial Relations. Data compiled by this office are accepted by both parties in bargaining as "reliable and credible," he stressed. And while management can usually get wage data through its industry associations, comparable non-government information isn't available to unions.

BLS wage surveys by area and industry are also used in connection with prevailing wage laws, Oswald noted. A series on union wage rates in the building trades dates from 1910, and provides "both inter-area and inter-union comparisons."

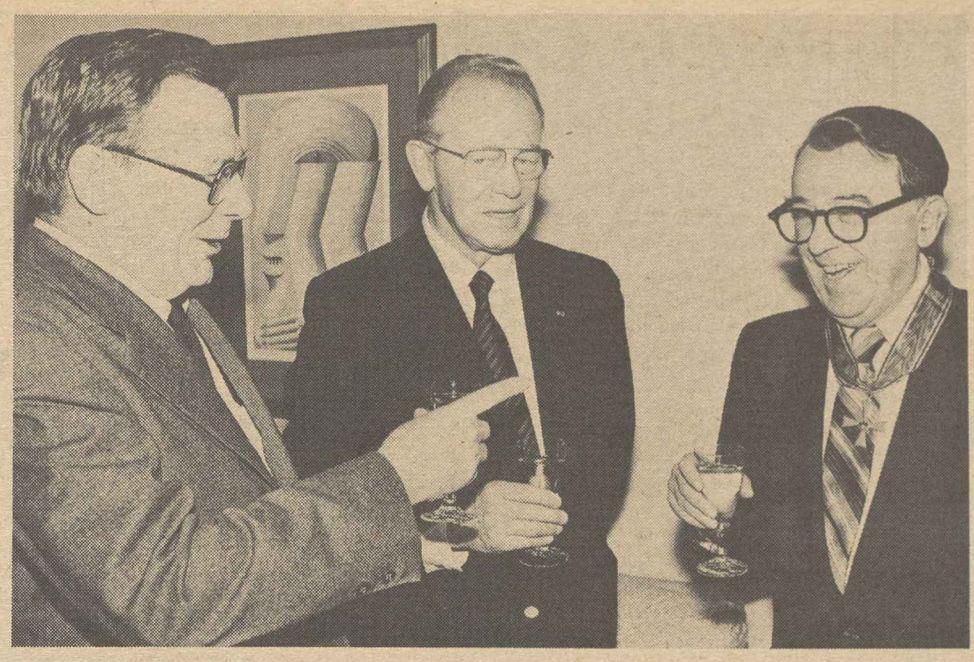
Oswald urged restoration of $4 million to the BLS budget to continue its wage data collection and asked Congress to put back $400,000 to allow continuation of the "family budget" series, which since 1945 has shown in dollars and cents the total living costs of worker families in various parts of the country at three different standards of living.

Reagan's Tax Plan Termed Costly Drain

Exclusions and special benefits written into the federal tax code have distorted the concept of taxation based on ability to pay, AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison told the House Rules Committee.

Denison said labor would welcome a stronger spotlight on the impact of so-called tax expenditures on the federal budget. Not all tax expenditures are unjustified loopholes, Denison said. But "most of the costly and inequitable provisions in the tax code" fall into the definition of tax expenditures.

TAX FORGIVENESS features have increased dramatically, starving the government of needed revenue and severely limiting "the nation's ability to solve its growing economic and social problems," Denison stressed.



He said the Administration tax bill, which Congress enacted last summer, contributed significantly to the "rapidly spreading economic mess."

Denison expressed reservations, however, about a bill being considered by the committee which would require Congress to write a binding ceiling on "tax expenditures" into the budget resolutions it adopts each year. The resultant changes to comply with such a ceiling would not necessarily be in the direction of tax reform, he suggested, and could spawn even greater inequities.

The AFL-CIO does endorse "efforts to give the tax expenditure budget more visibility," Denison testified. "We feel that better and more timely information on beneficiaries of particular tax expenditures and their needs would improve tax policy."

HE URGED ALSO frequent analysis on whether tax expenditures that were enacted as "incentives" to encourage a particular activity have actually achieved their purpose.

Such studies, he suggested, could "provide some insights as to the effects of the new depreciation system on investment, productivity and job creation; the impact of the interest income exclusions on the level of savings, as well as the costs and effects of the various tax provisions that subsidize the global activities of U.S. multinational corporations."

IRVING BROWN, the AFL-CIO's European representative, is toasted by Federation President Lane Kirkland and President Heinz Oskar Vetter of the German Confederation of Trade Unions following his decoration with the German Federal Republic's Order of Merit. Brown was cited for his contributions to the development of German-American ties, particularly trade union relations.

German Government Honors Irving Brown's Contribution

New York—Irving Brown, the AFL-CIO's representative in Europe, was honored here by the Federal Republic of Germany for his contributions over the years to the development of relations between the German and American people, particularly in the area of union relations.

Brown was awarded the FRG's Order of Merit by the German Consul General in New York, Hartmut Schulze-Boysen, on behalf of President Karl Carstens.

IN HIS REMARKS, Schulze-Boysen welcomed Brown "as someone whose very name stands for the good and solid relationship between organized labor in our two countries." Knowing that a democratic revival of Germany after World War II would not be possible without an effective labor union movement, Brown paved the way for German unions to return to the international labor community, Schulze-Boysen observed.

"By drawing the DGB (German Confederation of Trade Unions) closer together, you have contributed to the lasting alliance between Germany and America," he said.

Accepting the award for himself and the American labor movement, Brown said cooperation between the AFL-CIO and the DGB will be further strengthened with the federation's reaffiliation with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in January.

AT A DINNER following the decoration ceremony, DGB President Heinz Oskar Vetter recalled post-war attempts by some Western leaders to dismantle German industry, a plan rejected by the American labor movement which supported a democratic Germany with free and independent trade unions. Brown was instrumental in reviving the German labor movement and forging close links between German unions and the AFL in the aftermath of World War II, Vetter noted.

"The DGB is certainly a very self-conscious organization, standing on its own feet," Vetter said, "but without the assistance of our American colleagues, to stand up again would have been much harder."

VETTER added that he looked forward to the return of the AFL-CIO to the ICFTU, which it helped found in 1949, because "economic and social problems which today in particular face the working class in Western industrialized nations need common solutions."

In a congratulatory message, Sec. of State Alexander M. Haig, Jr., described Brown as "an eminent emissary of American values, of the American labor movement, and of universal democratic principles. His advocacy of the cause of free trade unionism has made him a distinguished servant of the international labor movement."

Flight Engineers Denounce Two-Person Cockpit Crew

Rio de Janeiro—The Flight Engineers' 33rd annual convention denounced the report of a special presidential panel earlier this year that found the McDonnell Douglas Super 80 safe for flight with only a two-member cockpit crew.

The task force also concluded that other new generation aircraft soon to be marketed with cockpits designed for only two crew members appeared to be "potentially" safe, a position that the 7,000-member FEIA also takes issue with.

"SINCE THE task force report, the operations and engineering departments of the airlines have been looking at how to operate the 767 with two-man crews," FEIA President William A. Gill, Jr., said in his report to the delegates. "All is not well with many in these departments. Problems are beginning to creep up.

"Does it really make sense safety-wise and economy-wise to fly the 767 with only a two-pilot crew, they are now asking themselves? Time will tell."

In its presentation to the panel, the union pointed out that the heavier workload in the computerized cockpits of the new aircraft requires a third crew member for an "extra margin of safety." FEIA also pointed out that no technical testing was conducted before the panel's decision was made. Gill told delegates that the union will monitor airline operations using the two-member crews.

"IF FEIA WAS right when we testified that three was safer than two, then the true-life tests will prove it," he said.

Other resolutions adopted at the three-day convention opposed airline deregulation and supported striking members of the Professional Air Traffic Controllers Organization.

A unique worldwide union with chapters in 20 countries, the FEIA also voted to raise the per capita tax $1 to $11.50 per member per month.

GILL WAS unanimously re-elected to his ninth two-year term. Also re-elected by acclamation were First Vice President Roger C. Bricknell of Britain and Donald F. Thielke, vice president for air safety and engineering, Karl F. Anderson has another year remaining in his two-year term as executive vice president and secretary-treasurer.

Brownie H. Searle Dies, Edited Chattanooga Paper

Dallas—Brownie H. Searle, former editor of the Labor World published by the Chattanooga AFL-CIO, died recently here.

Mrs. Searle edited the central labor council paper from 1950 to 1959, and in that period served for six years as a vice president of the International Labor Press Association. She had assisted her first husband, Tom Cuthbert, in publishing the paper since 1935.

Bishops Back Union Rights At Hospitals

Catholic health care facilities have the moral obligation to recognize the rights of their workers to organize and to bargain collectively, a pastoral letter by the American Catholic Bishops declared.

These employers have an indispensible responsibility to deal justly with their workers on wages, fringe benefits and other matters that affect their lives and futures, the bishops said.

"THIS CALLS for full recognition of the rights of employees to organize and bargain collectively with the institution through whatever association or organization they choose," the pastoral letter stated. It suggested that workers have the right to select the bargaining representative without "unjust pressures" from their employers or existing labor organizations.

The pastoral letter, which took the bishops several years to formulate, is the first to spell out their comprehensive position on health care. It is directed at all American Catholics.

The section of the letter addressing the rights and responsibilities of employers and employees of Catholic health care institutions quoted extensively from Pope John Paul II's recent encyclical, Laborem Exercens.

In addressing the role of organized labor, the Pope noted that "it is clear that even if it is because of their work that people unite to secure their rights, their union remains a constructive factor of social order and solidarity, and it is impossible to ignore."

THE PASTORAL letter also outlined responsibilities of workers "who care for the sick in a Christian facility." Underlining the Catholic church's commitment to human dignity and basic human rights, the bishops stressed that "workers must take no action that endangers the very life of the patients in the health care facility where they may be employed."

On this point, the letter quoted the Pope's encyclical that said in part: "Workers should be assured the right to strike, without being subjected to personal penal sanctions for taking part in a strike. While admitting that it is a legitimate means, we must at the same time emphasize that a strike remains, in a sense, an extreme means. It must not be abused."

The bishops also addressed the role of government in developing national policy to provide adequate health care for all.

"PRIVATE AGENCIES and institutions alone are unable to develop a comprehensive national health policy or to insure that all Americans have adequate health insurance, or to command the vast resources necessary to implement an effective national health policy," they said.

Court's Voiding of Contract Called Threat to Bargaining

Congress didn't intend to make federal courts the judge of whether union and management negotiators arrived at a "reasonable" agreement at the bargaining table, the AFL-CIO insisted in a brief filed with the Supreme Court.

The case involves the United Mine Workers, an unaffiliated union, but the AFL-CIO submitted a legal argument to the court because the outcome could affect the basic principles of free collective bargaining.

A 2-1 DECISION by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, which the AFL-CIO asked the Supreme Court to overturn, nullified a section of a national contract between the Mine Workers and the bituminous coal operators dealing with eligibility for survivors health benefits.

The appellate court had concluded that the contract made an "arbitrary" distinction between survivors of retired miners and survivors of miners who died while employed that resulted in inequities. It held that the contract provision violated the fiduciary responsibility obligation imposed by the Taft-Hartley Act for employee benefit trusts.

In its brief, the AFL-CIO stressed that the Taft-Hartley provisions are intended to assure that trust funds are used to benefit workers on whose behalf contributions have been made and not diverted for private gain or unlawful purposes.

CONGRESS DID NOT intend to impose the court's judgment of what is "best" for workers in place of the decisions made in the give-and-take of the bargaining process, the AFL-CIO said.

The "fundamental policy" of federal labor law, the AFL-CIO brief contended, "is that of free collective bargaining, in which the government prescribes the procedure—but not the substantive result—of collective bargaining."

To Ease Recession

Import Tide Raises Call For Curbs, Worker Aid

The AFL-CIO pressed Congress to stem the flood of job-destroying imports and patch up a badly battered program of trade adjustment assistance for workers who have already lost their jobs.

Emergency curbs on imports can help bring the United States out of serious recession and put Americans back to work, AFL-CIO Research Director Rudy Oswald said.

HE REMINDED members of a House Ways & Means subcommittee that plant shutdowns taking place across the country "are not a sign of Christmas holidays, but rather of a national tragedy."

Earlier, at hearings by a Senate Finance subcommittee, AFL-CIO Legislative Rep. Stephen Koplan and other union witnesses testified on the abandonment of the trade adjustment assistance program that a previous Congress had erected for workers made jobless by increased imports.

Congress earlier this year used budget shortcuts to enact Administration proposals that virtually eliminated the special unemployment benefits the law had provided, severely tightened eligibility requirements and slashed funding to about one-fifth of last year's level.

EVEN WITH the drastically reduced funding levels, the union representatives noted, Congress has thus far failed to appropriate $112 million budgeted for training, job search and relocation.

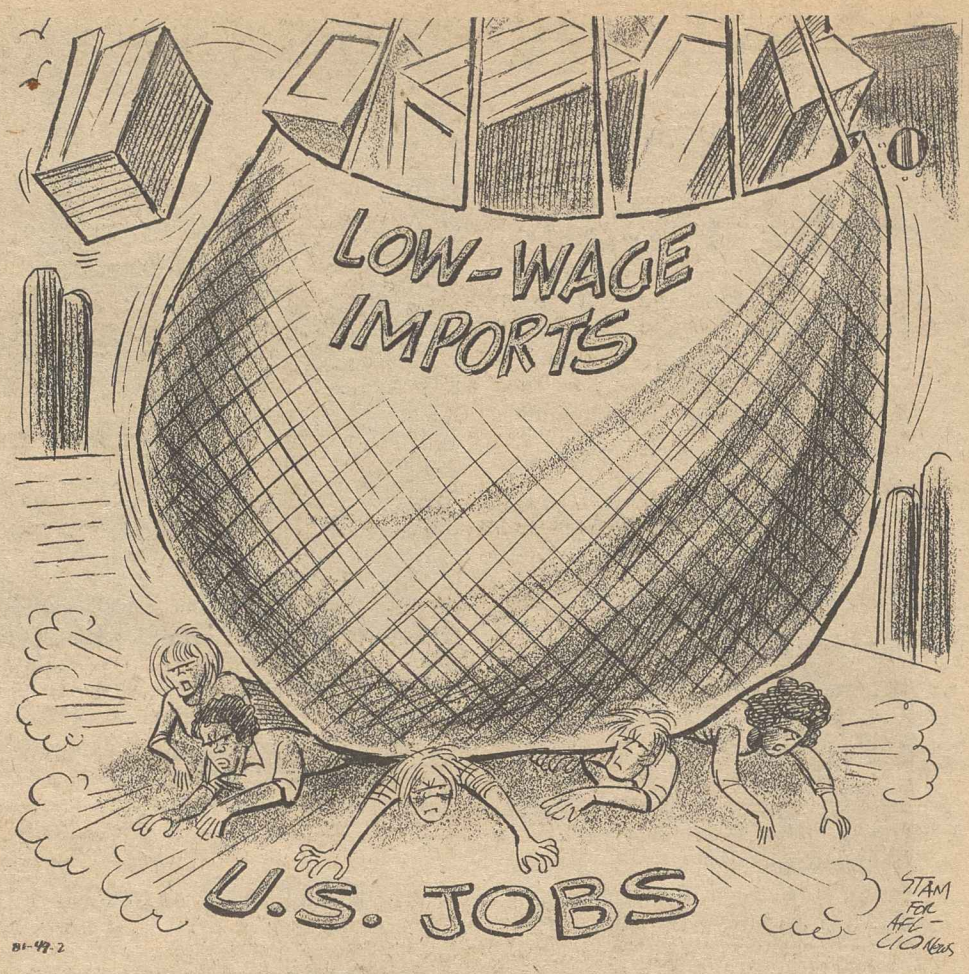
A bill introduced by Subcommittee Chairman John C. Danforth (R-Mo.) would rectify one of the damaging changes made by Congress. It would restore the eligibility language of the previous law, allowing adjustment assistance when imports have "contributed importantly" to a worker's unemployment.

Koplan and the other union witnesses urged the subcommittee to support a broader bill introduced by Sen. Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.).

THE MOYNIHAN bill incorporates the Danforth measure and goes on to make training benefits an entitlement, rather than subject to availability of funds. It extends coverage to employees of parts and services industries who also have been put out of work. It also remedies some inequities in previous work requirements and assures that workers won't be cut off from assistance if they turn down an unsuitable job at the minimum wage.

Steelworkers Legislative Rep. John Powderly told the Senate panel that even under the old law, the Labor Dept. has been rejecting a big majority of petitions for adjustment assistance. The changes made by Congress would leave little left of the program, he said.

Evelyn Dubrow, vice president and legislative director of the Ladies' Garment Workers, said many garment industry workers are denied eligibility because their work history has been interrupted by industry patterns of periodic shutdowns or seasonal layoffs.



LEONARD PAGE, assistant general counsel of the Auto Workers, said the Reagan Administration's welfare "safety net" simply isn't big enough to hold the many thousands of families left destitute by the curtailment of trade adjustment benefits.

At the House hearings, Oswald stressed the AFL-CIO's strong belief that the United States must retain its industrial base and have a "diversified manufacturing, agricultural and service economy."

He protested the Administration's attempt to portray groups concerned with the damage caused by imports as "special interests."

IN TODAY'S world, Oswald noted, "free trade does not exist. Other nations in the world do not apologize for pursuing their national interest." But the United States is assailed "when suggestions are made to move in U.S. national interests."

He urged Congress to provide "realistic adjustment assistance." Because of generous trade policies, Oswald testified, "millions of Americans have lost their jobs through no fault of their own . . . Devastated communities and eroded tax bases dot the U.S. landscape."

Soviets Assailed on Conduct Leading to Sakharov Fast

The "vindictive, mean-spirited behavior" of the Soviet government in its initial refusal to allow the bride of Andrei Sakharov's stepson to leave the USSR and join her husband in the United States "deserves universal condemnation," the AFL-CIO declared.

"Although we are happy and relieved by the news that Dr. Sakharov and his wife, Yelena G. Bonner, have ended their successful hunger strike, we are outraged that they were forced to this extreme action," Federation President Lane Kirkland said.

"THE FREE MOVEMENT of people and ideas is a right proclaimed in the Helsinki accords, which the Soviet Union signed, and should not require for its implementation the ordeal through which Dr. Sakharov and his wife have passed."

Yelizaveta Alekseyeva, who is married by proxy to Alexey Semyonov, Bonner's son by a former marriage, had sought to join her husband in Newton, Mass. When the Soviet authorities refused to permit her exit, Sakharov and his wife began their hunger strike in protest on Nov. 22.

Sakharov, who was awarded the Nobel Prize for his defense of human rights in the Soviet Union, charged that the 26-year-old woman was being punished for his dissident activities.

SOVIET AUTHORITIES relented and told Alekseyeva on Dec. 9 that she could leave the USSR to join her husband, now a graduate student at Brandeis University. Wire services quoted her saying that Sakharov and Bonner had ended their fast in Gorki, after being told that she would be allowed to emigrate. The physicist was banished to Gorki, an industrial city on the Volga River, in early 1980 because of his outcries over Soviet human rights violations.

The Sakharovs were in the 13th day of their hunger strike when Izvestia, the government newspaper, announced that they had been taken to a hospital for medical help to avoid complications in their health.

The hunger strike caused an international furor, with governments and human rights groups around the world calling for the Soviets to meet Sakharov's demands.

IN WASHINGTON, Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), chief sponsor of a unanimous Senate resolution asking the Soviets to release Alekseyeva, said her release "is a result of the Sakharov's courage and the worldwide demand for decency."

Sen. Paul Tsongas (D-Mass.) and other congressional leaders sent a letter to Soviet Ambassador Anatoly Dobrynin urging "a prompt and humane resolution of this wrenching affair," and Rep. Timothy Wirth (D-Colo.) introduced a resolution in the House accusing Soviet authorities of "maliciously persecuting" Sakharov "for his tireless advocacy of human rights."

Foreign Steel Subsidies Sap U.S. Jobs

The Steelworkers and a steel industry trade association called on President Reagan to take action against a new surge of foreign government-subsidized specialty steel imports from seven countries.

In a petition filed with U.S. Trade Rep. William Brock, the USWA and the Specialty Steel Industry charged that import pentration by government-owned and subsidized steel operations in the seven countries is causing severe injury to American producers and their workers.

THE SEVEN countries named in the petition are Belgium, France, Italy, Britain, Austria, Brazil and Sweden—all signers of a subsidies code under the General Agreement on Tariffs & Trade (GATT).

The charges were brought under Section 301 of the U.S. Trade Act which forbids unfair trade practices such as export subsidies.

USWA President Lloyd McBride noted at a press conference announcing the filing of the petition that well over 20 percent of the workers in the domestic specialty steel industry are unemployed—more than double the national jobless rate.

"THIS TRAGIC loss of jobs and displacement of our people did not come about because our steelworkers are less efficient or less productive than foreign workers," McBride said.

"But our workers cannot compete, any more than American industries can compete, against the massive subsidization of foreign steel mills by their governments," he stressed. "This is not competition at all. It is the penalization of our people for being the most productive, the most efficient, the hardest working."

Eugene Mach, chairman of the trade association's committee on tool and stainless steel, said the U.S. specialty steel industry is recognized as the technological leader by other countries.

"BUT NO MATTER how efficient we are," Mach said, "foreign companies can always undercut us on price because almost all of them are either owned outright or are heavily subsidized by their governments."

As examples, he noted that Britain's steel industry is 79 percent government-owned; Italy's 57 percent, and Sweden's 59 percent.

Specialty steel imports climbed sharply in 1981, rising from 29,000 net tons in the first quarter to 51,000 tons in the third quarter.

American producers have charged that foreign companies were able to capture an increasing share of the U.S. by undercutting the prices of domestic producers by as much as 54 percent.

THE PETITIONERS warned that the domestic specialty steel industry appears to be headed back to the conditions it faced in 1975 when nearly half of its workforce was laid off because of import penetration.

Conditions improved after the United States imposed a three-year limitation in 1976 on imports of tool steel and certain stainless steel products. In mid-1979 a phase-out began, and all import restrictions were lifted in February 1980.

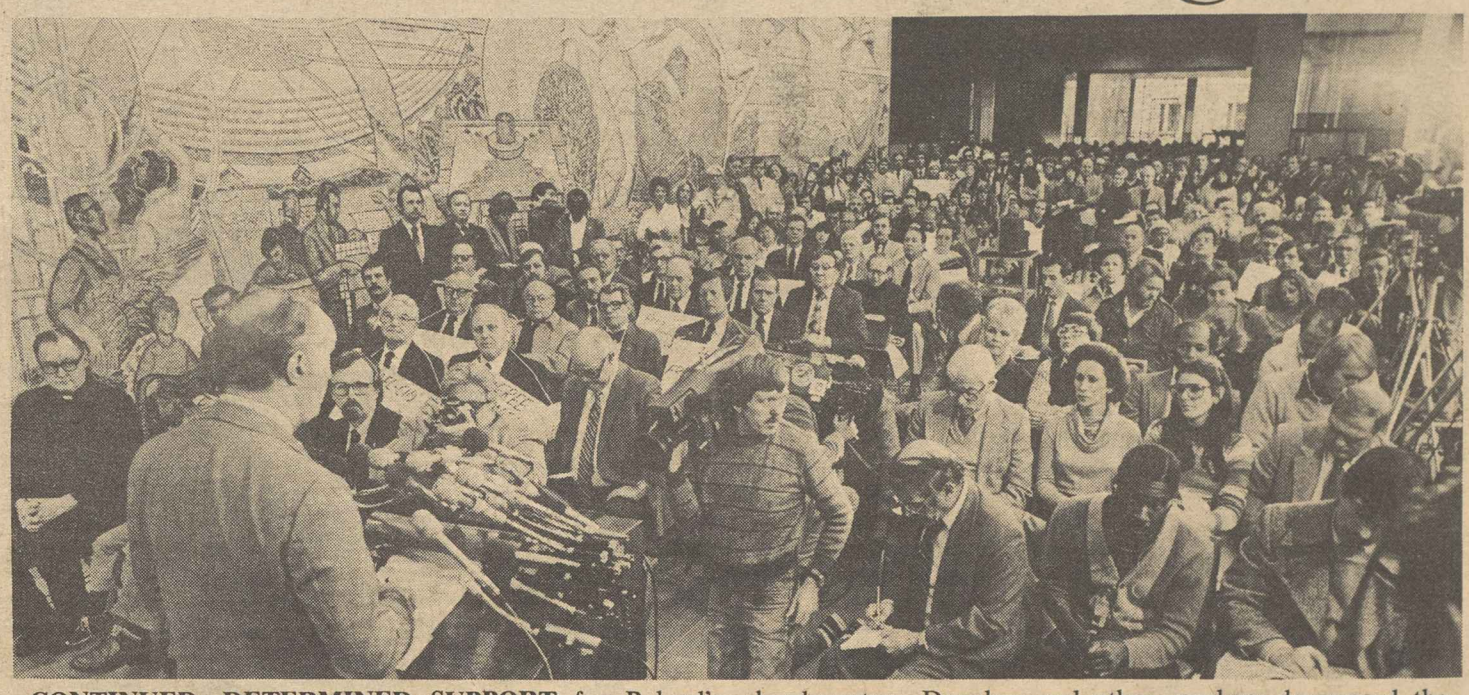
The petition to Brock is one of several avenues of relief available to the specialty steel industry. If Brock accepts the petition, he is required to begin consultation with the seven foreign governments in an effort to work out a remedy.

SHOULD THERE be no remedy resulting from the talks, the President has the authority under U.S. trade law to impose duties and other restrictions or suspend concessions under multilateral trade agreements.

Warning that foreign countries are dumping their unemployment on the United States with their subsidized products, McBride said "it is time for the President to insist that other countries abide by the same rules that our workers and industries must abide by."

Flight Attendants Voting On Texas Airlines Pact

The Flight Attendants reached tentative agreement with Texas International Airlines on a new 37-month contract providing for wage increases and fringe-benefit improvements.



Details of the pact were withheld until members vote on acceptance of the agreement. The mail ballot is expected to be completed by Dec. 18.

The airline and the union had been in negotiations since July 15, 1980, and in mediation since July 29 of this year.

American Labor Vows Support For Poland's Besieged Workers

CONTINUED, DETERMINED SUPPORT for Poland's Solidarity trade union federation was assured by AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at a rally at federation headquarters. Donahue and other speakers denounced the imposition of martial rule in Poland, suspension of Solidarity's activities, and the jailing of thousands of union leaders.

Crackdown On Unions Condemned

By James M. Shevis

The AFL-CIO issued a swift condemnation of the Polish Communist Party crackdown on Solidarnosc (Solidarity), and pledged its "continued, determined support" of the 16-month-old, independent trade union federation.

"By imposing martial law, banning the activities of Solidarity and its affiliated unions, and jailing many of their leaders, the Polish government is seeking to deprive the Polish people of their strongest instrument for democratic progress and to stamp out the spark of freedom," the federation charged.

"AMID THIS new assault on Polish liberty, American workers reach out to their brothers and sisters in Poland. We renew our pledge to assist Solidarity and its members by all the moral, financial, and physical means at our disposal."

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland said that in its support of the Polish workers the federation will cooperate fully with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and all other associations and members of the international free trade union movement in taking every possible legal action in support of Solidarity. The ICFTU immediately filed a formal complaint against the Polish government with the International Labor Organization, a specialized agency of the United Nations, for stifling the fledgling Polish labor federation.

The AFL-CIO's European representative, Irving Brown, attended an extraordinary meeting of free world trade union leaders called by the ICFTU at its Brussels headquarters "to examine the situation in Poland, and to decide the initiatives to be taken with the aim of re-establishing in Poland trade union rights and freedoms." (Story, Page 3.)

As a signatory of ILO conventions No. 87 and 98, the Polish government is committed to respecting union rights of freedom of association, organizing, and collective bargaining.

FROM LONDON, where he stopped to confer with British Trades Union Congress leaders after a meeting of the Trade Union Advisory Committee of the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development in Paris, Kirkland called on the Polish government to cease its repression of Solidarity and its leaders as a signal to

Labor Urges Tightening Election Law

The AFL-CIO urged Congress to tighten rather than loosen limits on contributions to congressional candidates and to maintain an independent Federal Election Commission to enforce campaign laws.

A statement submitted to the Senate Rules Committee stressed the AFL-CIO's concern that large contributions have become increasingly significant in the political process despite efforts by Congress to curb abuses.

THE NUMBER of business-related political action committees (PACs) has increased tenfold since 1974, the AFL-CIO noted, and accounted for $35 million in contributions to candidates for the House and Senate in the 1980 elections.

"These PACs are merely the alter ego of small groups of business executives and professional people who also make large contributions of their own," the AFL-CIO said. "The result is that the already disproportionate influence which these wealthy individuals have on the political process is further augmented."

The statement reiterated the AFL-CIO's preference for public financing of congressional elections and said it would "have the same positive result" that public financ-

Benefit Floor Restored For Current Retirees

By David L. Perlman

Congress remedied part of the damage inflicted on the social security system by the Administration-dictated budget cuts it enacted earlier this year and adjourned until Jan. 25, when the second session convenes.

It adopted a compromise bill which retains the $122-a-month minimum social security benefit for some 3 million persons who were about to have their payments slashed, but which also takes some backward steps.

AFL-CIO SOCIAL SECURITY Director Bert Seidman especially deplored the decision by a House-Senate conference committee to eliminate the minimum benefit for persons who become eligible for retirement or survivorship payments after Dec. 31.

Many low-paid workers will be penalized by that action, Seidman protested.

"Also unfortunate," he said, was the decision to make the first six months of sick pay subject to the social security payroll tax, "thus placing an added financial burden on workers at a time of reduced income and high medical expenses."

ON THE PLUS side, Seidman noted, the final version of the legislation maintains the family benefit entitlements of present law.

The Senate version would have penalized both large families and low-wage earners. It would have set a ceiling on total family benefits of 150 percent of the worker's primary insurance amount or 85 percent of average indexed lifetime monthly earnings, whichever was lower.

In a letter to House-Senate conferees, the AFL-CIO had protested that the effect would be to reduce benefits "among those who need them the most." Large families could have received no more than a retired couple under the Senate plan.

Included in the bill cleared for the President's signature is authority for borrowing among the various social security trust funds to deal with temporary fluctuations when one fund shows a surplus and another is underfinanced. But the authority extends only through the 1982 calendar year.

Additional action to bolster social security funding should be taken by Congress next year before the borrowing authority expires, Seidman urged.

A bipartisan 15-member task force has been named by President Reagan and congressional leaders to make recommendations for dealing with the funding problem.

As a practical matter, the minimum benefit was in the process of a gradual phaseout. Congress in 1977 froze the minimum at $122 a month so that its

Congress Votes New Program Cuts

At President Reagan's insistence, Congress adopted a second round of budget cuts that will compel further retrenchment in nearly all of the government's non-military programs.

The latest slash was embodied in a resolution providing stopgap funding for government agencies whose appropriations have not yet cleared Congress.

IT WOULD compel an additional $4 billion in new spending cuts for the fiscal year that started last Oct. 1, based on a 4-percent across-the-board reduction for all but a few exempted functions. On some programs labor considers important, the cuts were substantially greater.

Republicans described the measure as a compromise since the spending reduction was less than Reagan had proposed last September. But its impact will be far more than the indicated 4 percent because the cuts will have to be absorbed during the balance of the fiscal year.

The continuing funding resolution had to be enacted before Congress could adjourn, and the House Democratic leadership tried to compel Reagan to accept a smaller reduction. Reagan had vetoed an earlier version because it didn't meet his specifications.

ON THE KEY vote, however, 36 "boll weevil" Democrats voted against their party's position and only three "gypsy moth" Republican moderates crossed the other way. The Republican substitute was then adopted and passed by the Senate intact.

In the Republican-controlled Senate, every attempt to modify the new round of Reagan budget cuts was handily beaten back.

Typical were two rollcalls appearing in this issue of the AFL-CIO News on Page 6.

On one, Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Donald W. Riegle, Jr., (D-Mich.) sought to restore a staggering 12 percent slash in funds for states to administer their unemployment compensation programs.

Another amendment that failed was an attempt by Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W.Va.), the minority leader, to prevent a cut in funds for mine safety enforcement after a week in which a series of mine disasters had taken 27 lives.

THE FUNDING resolution included a pay raise for top government executives who had missed out on recent annual salary increases because of a $50,112 pay ceiling. The ceiling was raised to $57,500, effective Jan. 1.

However, the Administration was unable to get approval of the extra pay raise it sought for air traffic controllers who stayed on the job during the PATCO strike and who replaced strikers. The provision was stricken from the House bill by a point of order.

Anti-Picket Amendment Hit as Unfair

The AFL-CIO presented the case against anti-union amendments to the Hobbs Act to a House Judiciary subcommittee that is considering an overhaul of the U.S. criminal code.

Legislation being pushed by the National Right to Work Committee would treat minor and isolated picket-line misconduct as serious federal crimes, punishable by up to 20 years in prison.

A BILL introduced by Rep. J. Kenneth Robinson (R-Va.) is almost identical to the measure sponsored by Sen. Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), which was the subject of Senate hearings the previous week.

AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold, who testified at both hearings, charged that the proposed amendments would put the federal government on the employer's side in labor disputes.

There is no demonstrated need for new federal legislation, Gold insisted, and enforcement of such a bill would compel creation of a national police force.

Gold stressed that neither the AFL-CIO nor any of its affiliates condones picket line misconduct.

LOCAL AND STATE laws are fully adequate to deal with offenses by strikers or employers, he stressed, and are already backed up by federal laws dealing with specific areas of interstate crime.

With federal law enforcement capabilities being cut back, Gold testified, "it does not make sense to require the FBI and federal prosecutors to keep their eyes on the factories and workers of America and to pursue individuals already subject to arrest by local police under local laws dealing with assaults and vandalism, while drug pushers and narcotics importers, arson-for-profit businessmen and stock swindlers breathe easy."

ATTEMPT TO PUSH THROUGH a Hobbs Act amendment making picket line disturbances a federal crime is really an anti-union campaign by the National Right to Work Committee, AFL-CIO Special Counsel Laurence Gold testified before a Senate subcommittee. He was accompanied by Federation Legislative Director Ray Denison, left, and Howard Marlowe, associate director.

Coalition Presses Exports Of Processed Farm Goods

A new union-industry coalition is promoting the expansion of processed farm products for export as a means of spurring jobs creation and stimulating economic growth.

The educational and legislative campaign of the Export Processing Industry Coalition (EPIC) hopes to offset the current emphasis in U.S. agricultural export policy toward the shipment of raw commodities, such as wheat, feed grains, soybeans and cotton.

WHILE AGRICULTURAL exports have increased from $6.7 billion in 1970 to $40.5 billion in 1980, EPIC noted that the proportion of processed farm products has dropped sharply over the decade.

As an example, it pointed out that 11.8 percent of U.S. wheat exports were in the form of processed flour in 1970, compared with only 3.2 percent in 1980.

If just 10 percent of current wheat exports were processed before leaving U.S. ports, the difference would mean a $5.6-billion increase in business activity and the addition of 122,400 jobs, EPIC concluded from a study done for the U.S. Dept. of Agriculture.

It said a similar growth pattern could be realized if the U.S. corn milling and soybean processing industries gained a 10-percent share of the exports.

The principal organizations of EPIC are the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., the Corn Refiners Association, Millers' National Federation and the National Soybean Processors Association.

ELEVEN AFL-CIO affiliates are also participating in the coalition. They are the Allied Industrial Workers, Grain Millers, the Bakery, Confectionery & Tobacco Workers, Molders, Operating Engineers, Woodworkers, the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers, Carpenters, the Cement, Lime & Gypsum Workers, Food & Commercial Workers and the Steelworkers.

Nolan Hancock, EPIC labor coordinator and OCAW legislative director, said numerous plant shutdowns have resulted from the declining U.S. role in the processing of farm products for export.

"We are not only losing jobs," he observed, "we are losing the added value to our entire economy that flows from domestic processing."

8 Rail Unions Ratify Accord For 240,000

Eight unions with members employed by the nation's major railroads have ratified new contracts drawn up last month, while five others are in various stages of negotiations with the industry.

Approval of the pacts by the eight unions was overwhelming. The Railway & Airline Clerks, which represents about 100,000 workers, voted by a 9 to 1 margin in favor of the 39-month wage and benefits package and the Machinists by a 2 to 1 margin.

Also ratifying the agreement were the Maintenance of Way Employees, the Carmen, the Boilermakers & Blacksmiths, the Sheet Metal Workers, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, and the Signalmen. The eight unions together represent about 240,000 workers.

Retroactive to Apr. 1, the new contracts provide a maximum average hourly increase of $3.33 over the life of the agreements. Improvements in fringe benefits, such as personal leave days, an additional holiday, improved vacations, and added health, welfare and dental benefits, are also included in the pacts.

The five unions still negotiating with the National Railway Labor Conference, the industry's bargaining arm, are the Locomotive Engineers, Firemen & Oilers, Yardmasters, United Transportation Union, and the Train Dispatchers. They represent a total of about 200,000 workers.

RLEA Picks Hardin As New Chairman

Fred A. Hardin, president of the United Transportation Union, was elected chairman of the Railway Labor Executives' Association at the RLEA's fall meeting.

Hardin fills the vacancy created by the death of Fred J. Kroll, president of the Railway & Airline Clerks.

Ole M. Berge, president of the Maintenance of Way Employes, was elected vice chairman, succeeding Carmen's President O. W. Jacobson, who did not run for the office.

BRAC Legislative Director James Kennedy was elected executive secretary-treasurer, suceeding C. M. McIntosh. McIntosh was named to the newly created position of administrator.

The new officers assume their duties on Jan. 1. Their terms are for three years.

Hardin paid special tribute to Jacobson, who served as interim chairman of RLEA following Kroll's death on July 30.

Jerry Wurf Dies at 62, Led AFSCME 17 Years

Jerry Wurf, who led the State, County & Municipal Employees during a 17-year period of dramatic growth in membership and influence, died at the age of 62.

Tributes to AFSCME's president came from government and union leaders, and from workers whose lives he had touched during a life dedicated to the union cause.

"THE LABOR MOVEMENT is richer because he passed our way," AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland and Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said in a joint statement. "All American workers and especially public employees will continue to benefit from the paths he pioneered."

Wurf was an AFL-CIO vice president and served on the federation's Executive Council since 1969.

He died of cardiac arrest at George Washington University Hospital six weeks after surgery for a gastric ulcer.

AT A DEC. 16 memorial service at the Washington Hebrew Congregation, 1,800 friends and admirers took part.

From his own union, AFSCME Sec.-Treas. William Lucy and the Rev. Albert Blatz, an AFSCME vice president, spoke in tribute. The president of the Public Services International, Heinz Kluncker, and the president of the Canadian Union of Public Employees, Grace Hartman, were among the speakers.

House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., Msgr. George G. Higgins, University of Colorado President Arnold Weber and Columnist Charles Bartlett were others who spoke at the memorial.

DURING HIS 17 years as president of the AFSCME, the union's membership rose from 240,000 to nearly 1 million.

Wurf's trade union career spanned four decades. In 1940, after graduating from New York University, he went to work in a cafeteria and promptly helped organize the workers as a local of the Hotel & Restaurant Employees. He later served as an organizer and welfare fund administrator of the union's Local 448.

He joined the AFSCME staff in 1947 as an organizer and was instrumental in winning a number of key representation struggles during the next 11 years. In 1959, Wurf became executive director of the union's District Council 37 in New York, the post he held until his election as president of AFSCME in 1964.

Wurf served on the executive boards of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, Americans for Democratic Action and the Jewish Labor Committee. He also had been a vice president of the AFL-CIO Industrial Union Dept., served on the executive board of the federation's Maritime Trades Dept., and was a member of the Democratic National Committee.

Survivors include his wife, Mildred, and three children.

JERRY WURF

State-County Board Elects McEntee as New President

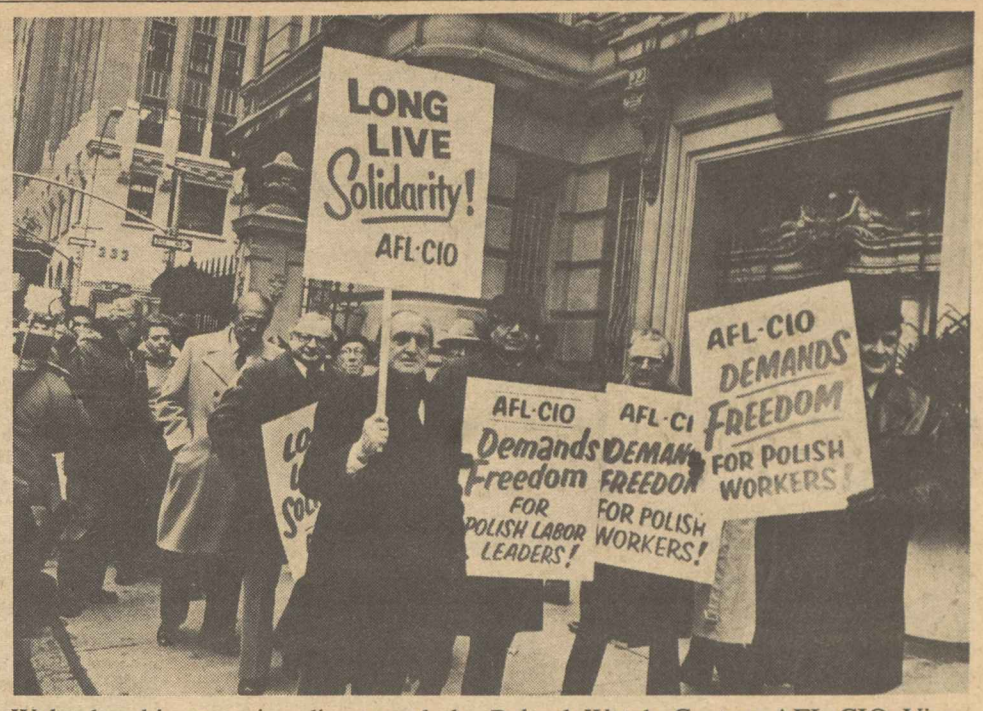
The executive board of the State, County & Municipal Employees elected Gerald W. McEntee of Pennsylvania as the union's new president to fill the vacancy left by the death of Jerry Wurf.

McEntee, 46, was elected by a vote of 483,080 to 449,911 for William Lucy, AFSCME secretary-treasurer, at the Dec. 16 board meeting.

McENTEE WILL serve out the remaining 2½ years of Wurf's term, until the summer of 1984. The election, in which 24 members of the AFSCME board voted the membership strength in their districts, was supervised by the American Arbitration Association.

At a press conference following his swearing-in, McEntee pledged to continue the union's "well-earned reputation for effective bargaining and aggressive organizing," starting "next year when we will negotiate contracts for half a million public employees."

McEntee was executive director of the union's 75,000-member Council 13, a post he has held since 1973. He has a degree in economics from LaSalle and began work in 1958 for AFSCME. His father, William McEntee, headed AFSCME Council 33, which represents Philadelphia city employees.



McEntee told reporters that his election came after a "spirited campaign which reflected credit on the organization" and thanked Lucy for "one of the finest speeches of aggressive unionism I have ever heard" to the board following the vote.

AS ACTING president after Wurf's death, Lucy administered the oath of office to McEntee and introduced him to the press conference. Both said they concur in goals, and McEntee said Wurf had charted "an aggressive and postive course" that he would continue to follow.

McEntee said he wouldn't attempt more than broad outlines of AFSCME goals, but "certain things should be obvious, however. The current occupant of the White House has put this nation on a course that may very well end in economic chaos. This we will continue to resist."

In response to reporters' questions about hopes within AFSCME that Lucy would be the first black to head a U.S. union of that size, McEntee said "Bill Lucy didn't get that vote because he is black, but because he is an effective trade union leader."

BANNER OF THE BELEAGUERED Polish trade union federation Solidarnosc (Solidarity) is displayed by speakers at the AFL-CIO's Washington rally in support of the Polish workers. The flag, brought back from Poland in September by Msgr. George G. Higgins, left, as a gift to the AFL-CIO from Solidarity, will be displayed as a symbol of the American labor movement's continuing support, Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue said. Shown above also are Tadeusz Walendowski, executive director of the Poland Watch Center; AFL-CIO Vice President Martin J. Ward, and Walendowski's son, Elias. In photo at right, AFL-CIO Regional Director Michael Mann and other unionists protest the repression of Polish workers' rights in a demonstration outside the Polish consulate in New York. Similar demonstrations were mounted by labor and Polish-American groups throughout the nation as the crisis in Poland deepened.

American Labor Rallies Support for Solidarity

the world that it intends to honor its commitments under the ILO conventions.

Kirkland called upon the governments and people of the free world to raise their voices in protest against the destruction of human rights in Poland, and to take whatever diplomatic and economic measures are necessary to dissuade the Polish government from its "brutal and reckless" course.

ILO Director-Gen. Francis Blanchard in Geneva cabled the Polish government in Warsaw his "deep concern" over the restrictions on the trade union rights of Polish workers, and called for the release of imprisoned Solidarity leaders. A similar plea came from Poland's Roman Catholic Church, perhaps the most powerful voice in the country. Archbishop Josef Glemp and a council of Polish bishops issued a strongly worded statement calling for the release of all interned trade unionists and the "revival of the labor union Solidarity."

The chief of the Polish government, Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, ordered the imposition of martial law as of midnight, Dec. 12, declaring a "state of war," the equivalent of a state of emergency in other countries.

HE FOLLOWED up the announcement with the appointment of a 21-member military council of "national salvation" as the top authority in Poland. Made up primarily of the nation's highest-ranking generals, the council issued a proclamation saying that it would rule the country "until the situation becomes normalized." It said the emergency rule was needed because Poland was "threatened by mortal danger," and charged that "forces hostile to socialism" were preparing for a "reactionary coup."

The creation of military rule came after two weeks of rapidly rising tension between Solidarity and the Polish government, and followed a meeting of the union's leadership in Gdansk where a nationwide referendum was proposed on setting up a non-communist government and defining the country's military relationship with the Soviet Union. Poland and other East European Soviet satellite nations belong to the USSR-dominated Warsaw military pact. The referendum would have been held by Solidarity among non-union Poles as well as the federation's 10-million members if Jaruzelski did not agree to a series of key union demands by the end of the year.

IN COORDINATED predawn raids, Polish police and security forces, along with several thousand army troops, entered Solidarity offices across the country, taking many union leaders prisoner and confiscating files. A 10 p.m. to 6 a.m. curfew was put into effect. All trade union activity, strikes and public gatherings except for religious services were banned. Airports were closed, borders sealed to prevent Poles from leaving the country, and all normal lines of communication cut off.

Within hours of the announcement of martial law in Poland, Kirkland and the AFL-CIO were in touch with the Administration, the State Dept., the ILO, ICFTU, and other agencies, making the strongest representations in behalf of the Polish workers.

AT A RALLY at AFL-CIO headquarters, Federation Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue vowed: "We're going to continue to expend our energies to mount a support campaign in the western world to let the world remember and know of the struggle of the Polish workers and their current plight."

In addition to the Washington rally, the AFL-CIO quickly organized demonstrations in major cities across the United States. The largest outpouring occurred in Chicago, where an estimated 600,000 Polish-Americans reside in the largest ethnic Polish community outside of Warsaw. Held jointly with the Polish-American Congress, the rally drew over 10,000 demonstrators to Daley Center Plaza in downtown Chicago.

About 600 protestors, waving Polish flags and chanting "Freedom for Poland," rallied outside the Polish consulate in New York, and hundreds more demonstrated in the Dorchester section of Boston. Labor rallies in support of the Polish workers also took place in Milwaukee, San Francisco, and Cleveland, and candlelight vigils were held near the Polish embassy in Washington.

IN NEW BRITAIN, Conn., a rally followed by a Mass for Peace was scheduled for Dec. 20. Sponsors were the Connecticut State AFL-CIO, the New Britain Central Labor Council, and the city's Polish community and clergy.

At the AFL-CIO Washington rally, some 400 Solidarity supporters stood and cheered as Polish refugee Tadeusz Walendowski warned that the Polish government, "by making Solidarity illegal . . . is trying to make illegal the Polish nation. Such an action should be, and will be, opposed by virtually all Poles, no matter if they are in Poland or abroad."

Walendowski, executive director of the Poland Watch Center, which plays an ad hoc role in coordinating the activities of Polish-American organizations in the United States, read a statement of the Committee in Support of Solidarity, signed by leading Polish and Polish-American intellectuals, appealing to "every democratic government, and to all those who believe in the Polish people's right to basic freedoms immediately to halt all transactions, economic and other, with Poland until every member of Solidarity is freed."

MSGR. GEORGE G. Higgins of Catholic University, who delivered Kirkland's message to Solidarity's first national congress in September after the AFL-CIO president was denied a visa to enter Poland, said he came away from that meeting convinced that "the one, great notable virtue of the people in Solidarity, and of the Polish people in general, is their courage," and he admonished those who are ready to count out the Polish labor federation to think again.

Solidarity "is not finished, and it will not be finished," Higgins said. "It speaks for most of the people of Poland. The government does not. Solidarity includes at least a million members of the Communist Party out of three or four million."

Federation Vice President Martin J. Ward, chairman of the federation's Committee on International Affairs, said the creation of Solidarity—the first trade union movement anywhere in the Soviet empire—was a profound embarrassment to the ruling communists in Poland.

"The fact that the workers of Poland felt themselves compelled to create a new trade union movement to defend their interests is a vindication of the longstanding AFL-CIO position that the official unions in communist countries do not represent workers but are the instruments of the totalitarian state," Ward charged.

In closing remarks, Donahue noted that all the gains Solidarity has amassed since the historic workers' revolt in August 1980 are threatened by the imposition of martial law. Today, all of the union's glowing future "hangs in the balance," as the Polish government's resort to repression deepens, he warned.

Donahue also lashed out at media commentators who have pictured Solidarity as the culprit in the current confrontation with the Polish authorities.

"THAT IS SHEER nonsense," he said. "Solidarity has demonstrated a degree of great sophistication about its bargaining tactics and a patience and a willingness to compromise that few in the western democracies or in the East European dictatorships expected. . . .

"The government's provocations, on the other hand, have surely not shown the same degree of flexibility. The threat to pass a law banning strikes and further regulating trade union activity were indeed the final straws—not the other way around."

Information on the immediate response of Polish workers to the crackdown remained sketchy throughout the first few days of the new military regime because of the communications blackout. Solidarity Chairman Lech Walesa, who was to have addressed the AFL-CIO's convention last month but stayed in Poland due to the tense situation there, was detained by the government near Warsaw. Solidarity sources told reporters that the Polish labor leader, who had become a symbol of the campaign for democratic renewal in the Soviet Union's most populous ally, remained defiant.

DIPLOMATIC reports and wire service stories reaching the West, however, indicated that strikes and opposition to the military takover were spreading. Thousands of Solidarity officials across the country were detained under the new military rule.

Despite the communications blackout, a Solidarity strike committee formed in the city of Szczecin near the Baltic Sea coast was able to get a message out of the country on a boat bound for Sweden. It appealed to the West to support the Polish workers with protests over the detention of the Solidarity officials.

"Be with us in our hour of darkness," it pleaded.

Worldwide Protest Spurred Among Free Trade Unions

Brussels—In the wake of the military crackdown on Solidarity, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions called on its 130 affiliated organizations throughout the free world to "undertake immediate and continuous protest actions" in support of the Polish workers' struggle for human and trade-union rights.

At a special meeting at ICFTU headquarters here, representatives of western national trade-union centers, including the AFL-CIO's European representative, Irving Brown, adopted a series of initiatives aimed at restoring freedoms in the Soviet satellite nation.

Among these was a call to member organizations to exert strong pressure on their respective governments to press Polish authorities to observe fully the international conventions on freedom of association, which Poland ratified in 1957.

ICFTU affiliates, representing a worldwide total of about 70 million workers, also were urged to make representations to the Polish ambassadors in their countries with a view toward establishing democratic procedures to ensure that material assistance given to Poland does, in fact, reach those parts of the population that are most in need of it.

'Their Battle Is Ours'

THE AFL-CIO strongly condemns the action of the Polish government in seeking to suppress and crush the free trade union created by Polish workers—Solidarnosc.

We have been in direct contact with our own government and the International Labor Organization urging every effort to secure the immediate release of the detained Polish labor leaders and the restoration of trade union rights.

The actions of the Polish government are in direct violation of the ILO's Convention 87, guaranteeing freedom of association—a convention to which Poland is a signatory. We call upon the ILO to make strong representation to the Polish government to honor Convention 87.

The AFL-CIO insists that the Polish government cease its present course of action and release the Solidarnosc leaders as a signal to the world that it intends to honor its commitments.

THE PROBLEMS within Poland have not been caused by the Polish workers or their union. They have been caused by governments that have consistently dealt in bad faith with the Polish people.

These problems must be solved by the Poles themselves, free of all outside interference. Solutions can be found when the Polish government halts its efforts to stifle dissent and begins to negotiate in a forthright manner with Solidarnosc.

The AFL-CIO pledges its full support to our Polish brothers and sisters. We do not presume to recommend what Solidarnosc should or should not do. These are decisions that only the Polish workers can make for themselves. Whatever the decisions of these courageous people, we shall do what we can to assist them.

IN THIS EFFORT, the AFL-CIO will cooperate fully with the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and its affiliates. We are in close contact with the ICFTU, working with it to coordinate and rally support for Polish workers.

Poland's working men and women are struggling against tremendous odds to build and maintain an effective free trade union. Their battle is ours. We shall not let them down.

We call upon the governments and people of the free world to raise their voices in protest against the ongoing destruction of human rights in Poland.

—AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, Dec. 14, 1981.

Not Even a Trickle

OBVIOUSLY, hot meals for the low-income, homebound elderly are not high on the Reagan Administration's budget priorities.

A New York Times article describes a neighborhood Meals on Wheels program that has had to cut back its assistance from two meals a day for 350 people in 1977 to one meal for five days a week to 250 recipients, whose average age is 83. On weekends, they do without.

The Administration position is that private charity—"voluntarism"—is best suited for such purposes. But alas, when the Meals on Wheels center solicited 85 food corporations to help fill Christmas baskets for the homebound, it came away with nothing—not even a trickle.

Short-Range Vision

High Profits, Poor Management Blamed for U.S. Auto Decline

By Gus Tyler

THE EXPERIENCE of Sony in its San Diego, Calif., plant murders many myths about the indolence and the irresponsibility of the American worker ever since his alleged fall from the Protestant work ethic that, according to some sources, is now the very special preserve of the very non-Protestant Japanese.

The Sony plant, built in 1972, "now holds Sony's worldwide record for quality of 200 days of production without a major defect," according to testimony submitted to the Joint Economic Committee of the U.S. Congress by H. William Tanaka, a lawyer who, because of his expertise in international trade, was asked to prepare a study for the congressional committee.

TANAKA ADDS that "studies of defects and their causes have shown that over 80 percent are correctible only by management—design changes, for example—and not by workers."

American workers broke the record for quality because they were operating under "management methods that the Japanese have been perfecting for many years." At a time when American auto manufacturers, for instance, were planning poor quality as part of their policy of planned obsolescence, Japan decided to concentrate on quality, using "concepts of quality control that came from the United States."

American car makers were not interested. They preferred to turn out vehicles that would break down on schedule so that the company could sell new parts and new cars.

DETROIT ALSO opted for big cars. That was their passion because, says Tanaka, "large cars are far more profitable to build than small cars."

As to labor costs, adds Tanaka, "contrary to popular myth, the U.S. automotive industry's failure to compete with imports has little to do with the hourly wages paid American workers."

But our failure has a lot to do with the once high profits of the auto makers. "General Motors' profit on each vehicle it produces is about three times that of its foreign competitors." Foreign manufacturers "accept smaller profits than American corporations."

The contrasting policies of Japanese and American auto makers are a striking example of the difference between short-range and long-range policies.

American makers were smart—in the short run: high profits for the company from "planned obsolescence" and from the mania for big cars.

Japanese makers were smart—in the long run: working at quality control, selling at low profits, and focusing on the small car.

THERE IS another, perhaps more basic difference. "The Japanese emphasis on quality," notes Tanaka, "has been an integral part of Japan's national strategy to build an export economy, not just a company-by-company decision."

In other words, the Japanese have had a plan to be Number One auto maker while we leave it to the "market forces"—forces that are motivated by the short-run profits of a company rather than the long-range strength of the country.

A Ploy to Undermine Collective Bargaining

The bill to amend the Hobbs Act represents a serious departure from the principle that the federal government should not side with either management or labor during legitimate labor disputes.

In practical terms, it would require a national police force to supervise the orderly conduct of strikes.

There is no factual case for its enactment.

The major backing comes from the National Right to Work Committee, an employer-financed front organization which supports neither rights nor workers.

This employer front supports the bill in the belief that the legislation will chill the exercise of the right to form and join unions, will intimidate workers and will embolden anti-union employers to crush organizing efforts and strikes.

Using the bill as a vehicle, the "right-to-work" front is churning the direct mail factories of the radical right to raise funds for its anti-worker war chest. The ultimate goal is to undermine collective bargaining.

—From AFL-CIO testimony at House and Senate hearings.

AFL-CIO's Pledge

Support for Poland's Workers

From speech by Martin J. Ward, chairman of the AFL-CIO Committee on International Affairs, to rally at AFL-CIO headquarters in support of Polish workers:

THE CREATION of Solidarity, the first trade union movement anywhere in the Soviet empire, inspired workers everywhere. It was a profound embarrassment to communists and their apologists. It undermined the legitimacy of their claim that the communist state itself is an instrument of workers and exists to promote their welfare.

The fact that the workers of Poland felt themselves compelled to create a new trade union movement to defend their interests is a vindication of the longstanding AFL-CIO position that the official unions in communist countries do not represent workers but are the instruments of the totalitarian state.

IN RESPONSE to appeals from Solidarity, the AFL-CIO established a Polish Workers Aid Fund to raise money to buy office supplies and equipment which Solidarity asked for. They needed everything—desks, Xerox machines, typewriters, offset printing presses, and even paper to print on, which was not available in Poland except through government agencies. I am proud to say that the American workers and their unions gave more than $250,000 for that purpose. We bought the materials that Solidarity asked for and sent them on with the help of European trade union centers and the help of the ICFTU.

We also did more than that. We urged the government of the United States to provide economic assistance to the government of Poland, on condition that the Polish government honor the agreement that it reached with Solidarity and that it signed in August of 1980.

These actions were endorsed and re-asserted by the delegates at the AFL-CIO convention last month, who added in a policy statement that American workers stand ready to give further assistance, including food and medicine.

IN ALL OF our actions in support of Solidarity, we have made it clear that we have no wish whatever to intervene in Solidarity's policies or give any political or economic advice. Solidarity has not asked for our advice in such matters, and we have not offered any.

The workers of Poland alone can decide what they need and want to do. Our job is to provide fraternal support and encouragement and to provide the materials they need.

We have been watching with great admiration over the last few months while Solidarity and its officers walked a tightrope in their relations with the Polish communist government. We are outraged by the action taken over the weekend to impose martial law and military dictatorship.

We believe that Polish workers are tough enough to stand fast and help get their country back on the track. We will continue to give them all the support we can through every avenue open to us.

Solidarity's Role

Authentic Voice of the People

From remarks by Msgr. George G. Higgins at the AFL-CIO headquarters rally:

SOLIDARITY IS the authentic spokesman of the people of Poland. Their movement will not be put down. Against impossible odds, they succeeded in forcing the government to recognize their rights to establish autonomous unions independent of the government and their right to strike.

I had the privilege of addressing the Solidarity convention in Gdansk. I said at that time, and I meant it, that I had not come to Poland to interfere directly or indirectly in the internal affairs of that nation. And I would not presume to do that today. Solidarity needs no advice from me, nor does the Polish government.

WHILE AMERICANS have no right to interfere in the affairs of another nation, they do have a right and a duty to stand up in complete solidarity with the basic human rights of this movement which the government is now in vain trying to suppress.

The one, great notable virtue of the people in Solidarity, and of the Polish people in general, is their courage. The Nazis did their best to destroy the country. The Soviet Union "liberated" them only to try to oppress them again. Other nations in the past few hundred years have tried by every means at their disposal to suppress this brave people, and they have failed. And they will fail this time.

They are not afraid of this government. They are not afraid of the Soviet Union. The present military government may hobble them, constrain them, put them under limitations, but they will not kill this movement. Nothing will.

IT WILL rise again and become, I'm sure, what it was destined to be, a beacon to the entire world that there is life at the end of the tunnel of oppression, not only in Poland but in many other countries throughout the world, including many which can only be described as right-wing dictatorships.

On the way back from Poland, I stopped at a meeting in Geneva of 40 or 50 people from the Third World—from Asia, Latin America, and Africa—and it was clear to me that Solidarity was for them the greatest single beacon of hope that they had seen in their lifetime. Many of them are living under right-wing dictatorships with no freedom to organize, no freedom to strike, but taking new hope from the fact that in the most unlikely place in the world—in Poland, with a communist government—these brave workers succeeded in doing the impossible and establishing the Solidarity movement.

Let us pray that the government meant it when it said in its official announcement that it did not have any intention of turning the clock back. It did not intend to go back beyond August of 1980. It did not intend to abrogate the agreement which it was compelled to make with Solidarity in Gdansk in August 1980. We shall see.

If Reagan Policies Continue

No Relief in Sight for Housing

THE SEVERE DEPRESSION gripping the nation's homebuilding and related industries will deepen in the months ahead if the Administration persists in its tight-money, high-interest policies and housing program cutbacks, AFL-CIO economist Henry Schechter warned.

Schechter said that with the "turnaround point" not even on the horizon, the staggering 18.2-percent construction unemployment rate for November will jump even higher in 1982. He said the recent slight drop of mortgage interest rates has done little to stimulate new home sales which, in October, fell to an all-time low rate.

Very few families, he said, can afford to buy homes under such conditions "and have enough left over to meet their requirements for food, clothing, health care and other essentials.". Schechter, who is director of the AFL-CIO Office of Housing & Monetary Policy, appeared on the network radio interview Labor News Conference.

HE POINTED OUT that the construction and building supplies industries have been hit hard by the deep cuts in federally assisted housing programs which were part of the Administration's budget-cutting spree. He noted that the latest Administration proposals for fiscal year 1983 "call for cutting new federal construction to zero."

Schechter declared that "the tight-money policy pursued in the name of fighting inflation is actually contributing to inflation in the housing sector," and even after the industry recovers, home prices will stay at very high levels. He said that when "housing begins to pick up, the start-up costs will be higher."

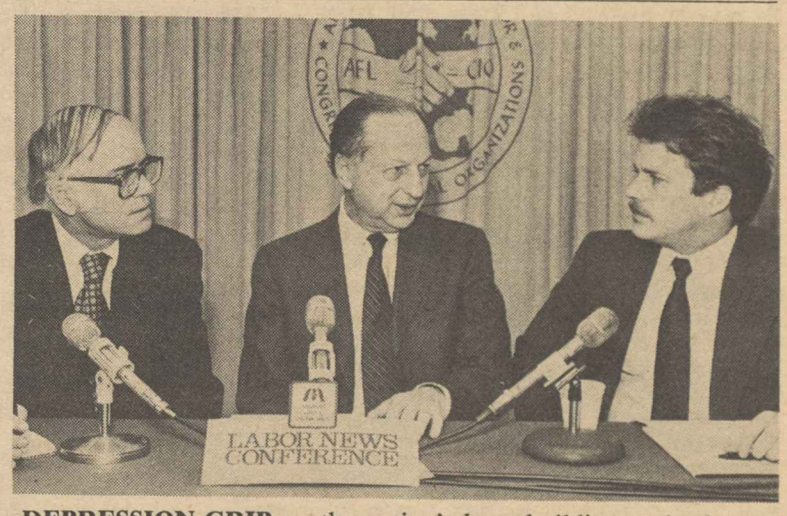
ALTHOUGH IT HAS been more than 100 years since Abraham Lincoln issued the Emancipation Proclamation abolishing slavery in the United States, overt and subtle forms of slavery and peonage are still being practiced today.

The documentation of debt slavery and farm labor peonage demonstrates that it is widespread, victimizing thousands of undocumented Hispanics, black and white U.S. citizens and Haitian refugees.

These appalling conditions of depressed servitude were described at a recent New York press conference called by the Workers Defense League, a non-profit organization dedicated to the defense of the rights of labor. The WDL, which has been involved in exposing and campaigning against peonage and forced labor since the early 1940s, cited these cases:

- In Florida, Jose Corona, an orange picker, worked 13 hours a day, seven days a week for four weeks to pay a $200 transportation fee his employer had given a labor smuggler. Other undocumented workers in this grove worked under the supervision of the gun-carrying grower and were threatened with death if they tried to leave.
- In Louisiana, a chicken farmer kept two of his workers chained in a chicken coop to prevent them from running away.
- In Arkansas, farmers bought aliens for $400 each and withheld their wages until the $400 was paid off with their labor. The workers would then be sold to other farmers for $400 and the practice would be repeated. In this way, according to Hugh Williams, a U.S. Border Patrol chief, "the aliens never saw any cash. In effect, each farmer was getting free labor. We found Mexicans who were at their third or fourth farm job and hadn't made a penny the whole time they were in the U.S.—peonage, that's really what it was."
- In Washington, labor peonage was practiced by a Uruguayan diplomat who held his household servant captive in his house. The woman, a foreigner, was not allowed to use the telephone, or to leave the house unaccompanied, and for her duties she received little pay. Her conditions were discovered by Sister Barbara Ham of the Washington Spanish Service Center, who helped the woman escape and found another position for her.

THESE ARE NOT isolated cases, but part of a pattern of illegal and cruel exploitation wherever there are undocumented workers. The threat of violence or exposure prevents most of them from seeking help.



More than 160 leaders in the civil rights, labor and religious movements have joined the WDL in an open letter to President Reagan, asking him to direct the Dept. of Justice to enforce civil rights and labor laws already on the books prohibiting slavery and peonage.

Three signers of the WDL letter to the President urged a clear government policy on the problem.

Murray H. Finley, president of the Clothing & Textile Workers, warned that "the freedom of the country is in danger when we permit the undermining of labor standards and stop enforcing even the basic human rights that protect workers from extortion."

Harry Fleischman, executive committee chairman of the WDL, underlined the need for the President to bolster the federal agencies in order "to bring an end to the latter-day slave trade practiced by illegal contractors."

Benjamin F. McLaurin, long-time civil rights activist, pointed out that today's peonage represents a continuation of practices in the Old South. From his civil rights campaigns with A. Philip Randolph, McLaurin observed that isolation and intimidation, along with endless chains of inflated debts had long served as a means of forcing blacks in rural areas to perform unpaid labor.

DEPRESSION GRIP on the nation's homebuilding and related industries will tighten in coming months if the Administration continues its tight-money policies and housing program cutbacks, AFL-CIO Economist Henry Schechter, center, warned on Labor News Conference. He was questioned by Jerome Cahill, left, of the New York Daily News and Andre Shashaty of Housing & Development Reporter, a publication of the Bureau of National Affairs. The AFL-CIO produced public affairs interview is aired weekly on the Mutual radio network.

ORIGINAL SCULPTURE saluting the AFL-CIO on its centennial is presented to Federation President Lane Kirkland by Alvin F. Friedman, senior vice president of the Amalgamated Bank of Chicago. The work, titled the Second Century, was done by sculptor Richard Hunt under a commission from the bank.

Social Security Task Force Lists Kirkland, Pepper, Ball

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland will serve on a bipartisan 15-member task force set up to explore solutions to the social security system's funding problems.

President Reagan named five of the panel members, including Chairman Alan Greenspan, who served as head of the Council of Economic Advisers in the Ford Administration. The other presidential appointees were Alexander B. Trowbridge, president of the National Association of Manufacturers; Robert A. Beck, president of the Prudential Insurance Co.; Mary Falvey Fuller, vice president of the Shaklee Corp. of San Francisco, and Joe D. Waggoner, Jr., a former Democratic congressman from Louisiana.

THE OTHER 10 appointees were chosen by House and Senate leaders. In addition to Kirkland, they are Senators William L. Armstrong (R-Colo.), Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.), John Heinz (R-Pa.) and Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-N.Y.); Representatives Claude Pepper (D-Fla.), Barber B. Conable, Jr. (R-N.Y.) and Bill Archer (R-Tex.), former Rep. Martha Keys (D-Kan.), and Robert M. Ball, who headed the Social Security Administration from 1962 to 1973.

Reagan announced that he would set up the bipartisan task force after the Administration withdrew most of its proposals for cutbacks in social security programs following a storm of public protest.

AT THE TIME, Reagan said he expects the task force to "come up with a plan that assures the fiscal integrity of social security and that social security recipients will continue to receive their full benefits."

In announcing his appointees to the panel, Reagan told reporters at the White House that "for too long, too many people dependent on social security have been cruelly frightened by individuals seeking political gain through demagoguery and outright falsehood."

California Law Would Curb Abuses by Athletes' Agents

Sacramento, Calif.—California became the first state in the nation to adopt legislation regulating athletes' agents.

The measure had the strong backing of the California AFL-CIO and the Federation of Professional Athletes. It was among 13 major bills backed by the state labor federation that were enacted by the legislature this year.

IN SIGNING the athlete agency law, Gov. Edmund G. Brown, Jr., noted that "for every superstar in professional sports, there are dozens of athletes who must struggle to make a living."

He said the measure would prevent "the infrequent, but nevertheless severe abuses that have afflicted professional athletes in the past."

The law requires athlete agencies and their representatives to register with the state labor commissioner, post surety bonds of at least $10,000, obtain approval of all form contracts, and submit disputes between athletes and their agents to the labor commissioner for adjustment.

The new law gives professional athletes protections similar to those governing talent agencies, performers and musicians.

A key provision of the law states: "No athlete agency shall knowingly secure employment for a person in any place where a strike, lockout, or other labor trouble exists, without notifying the person of such conditions."

PRESIDENT Edward R. Garvey of the Professional Athletes said the passage of the law is a welcome development for the union's members in professional football and soccer.

On hand for the governor's signing ceremony were President Gene Upshaw of the National Football League Players Association; David Meggyesy, assistant to Garvey, and Assemblyman Bill Lockyer, chief sponsor of the bill.

Ken Kramer Dies at 68, Served Labor, Red Cross

Fairfax, Va.—Kenneth L. Kramer, former director of the Red Cross labor participation department, died Dec. 10 at Fairfax Hospital after a heart attack. He was 68.

Before joining the Red Cross in 1956 as a labor consultant, Kramer was an organizer with the Textile Workers. He had earlier served on the staffs of the Ladies' Garment Workers and the Marine & Shipbuilding Workers. He retired from the Red Cross in 1976.

Survivors include his wife Blossom, a daughter and three sons. A memorial service was held at AFL-CIO haedquarters Dec. 15.

For Needed Programs

Senate Rollcall Votes On New Budget Cuts

The Senate defeated labor-supported attempts to protect vital government programs from a new round of budget cuts that are required by a resolution continuing the funding of government programs through next March.

Vote No. 1, on December 10, is the 65-30 defeat of an amendment to prevent a 12 percent cutback in funds for state administration of unemployment insurance programs—roughly three times the cutback imposed on other programs despite the sharp rise in unemployment that has pushed up the unemployment insurance workload.

Vote No. 2, on Dec. 11, is the 54-38 defeat of an amendment to exempt the Mine Safety & Health Administration from an additional 4 percent cut in funds. The vote came within a week of underground coal mine disasters in three states that claimed the lives of 24 miners and the deaths of an additional three workers in surface mining accidents.

On the rollcalls, R indicates "right" votes for labor's position, W shows "wrong" votes. PR—paired right; PW—paired wrong.

Du Pont's Election Tactics Denounced by Steelworkers

Pittsburgh—Loss of representation elections at 14 Du Pont Co. plants "stands as testament to the anti-union sentiment abroad in this nation," Steelworkers President Lloyd McBride said.

Du Pont, the nation's largest chemical manufacturing firm, spent millions of dollars—"far more than it would have on labor agreements—in its frantic efforts to deny and discourage their workers from gaining any meaningful say in their work lives," McBride said, adding:

"THE STEELWORKERS is a strong union, a proud union, and a union that fully intends to continue its vigorous efforts to bring the benefits of trade unionism to unorganized workers, both in the chemical industry and elsewhere."

The hardfought organizing campaign ended with six plants voting to retain their small independent locals while the others chose to remain non-union. About 12,000 of Du Pont's 100,000 domestic employees were involved in the week-long voting supervised by the National Labor Relations Board.

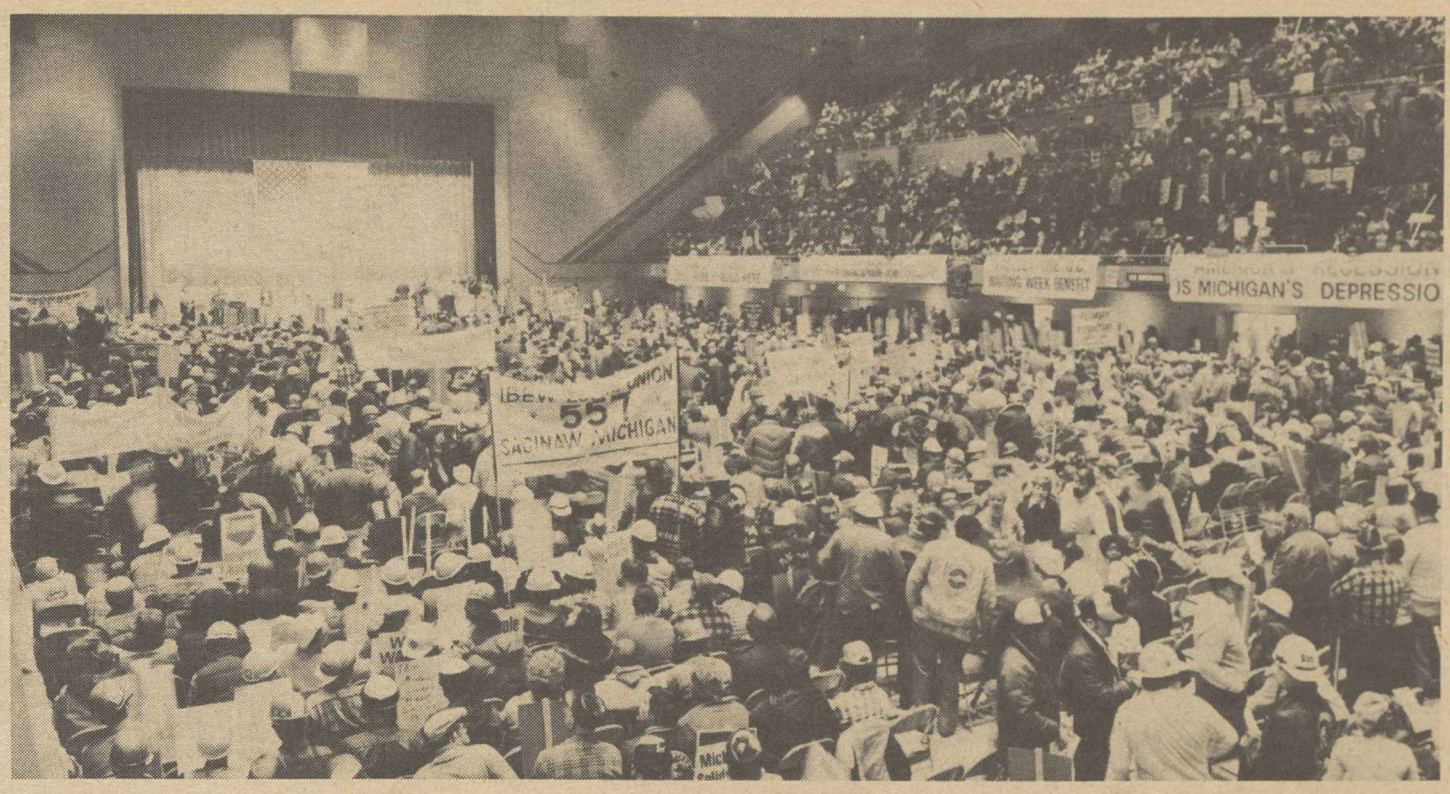
The huge chemical company operates about 100 U.S. plants. About 5 percent of the 66,000 eligible Du Pont employees belong to national unions, while 34 percent are represented by fragmented independent workers' associations.

During the long drive to organize the firm, the company tried to discredit the Steelworkers with films for its workers warning of possible long strikes and other tactics.

UAW Okays Early Talks With Industry

Detroit—The Auto Workers' executive board announced that the union would allow its bargaining councils to decide whether to conduct early negotiations with individual auto firms.

"Each situation is different, and we reached a conclusion that because of the deterioration of the economy it was no longer satisfactory to have one rigid policy," UAW President Douglas A. Fraser said at a news conference at Solidarity House, the union's headquarters here.



IN DISCUSSING the board's position, Fraser emphasized that "I don't think anybody can say with certainty that negotiations will be opened." He said the decision would be up to the union's General Motors and Ford councils, and that no meetings of these groups were scheduled.

The union later announced that results of surveys of GM and Ford locals to determine whether worker council meetings to consider the early talks should be called were due to be made known Dec. 21. A meeting of the American Motors Corp. council was set for Dec. 17. No meeting of the International Harvester council had been scheduled.

With the economy in recession again, automakers have entered a new round of retrenchments and layoffs. Since last spring, thousands of UAW members have lost their jobs, and industry losses for the first nine months of this year have exceeded an estimated $1 billion.

THE UAW'S contracts with Ford and GM expire next September. The Harvester pact expires in October, and the AMC agreement in 1983. All four companies have asked for pay concessions because of the auto slump.

"Times have changed," said Fraser. "The situation in our industry is distressful, and has changed since we last discussed this issue."

MICHIGAN SOLIDARITY DAY drew 10,000 working people from around the state to Lansing for a rally and march to the state capital to protest sharp cuts in workers' compensation and unemployment compensation statutes. But legislators turned a deaf ear as both the House and Senate passed the employer-backed bill proposed by Gov. William Milliken that will slash workers' compensation benefit levels and duration of payments and set harsh eligibility rules for the disabled. In a state suffering close to 12 percent joblessness, cuts proposed for the unemployment compensation system would include tight qualifications that could leave more than half the state's 110,000 construction workers ineligible because of seasonal work patterns. The three-hour protest, organized by the Michigan AFL-CIO and the UAW, included an overflow rally at the civic center and a march through the city to the capitol building where many demonstrators met with representatives and senators. The action to slash benefits in the name of attracting business to the state makes workers scapegoats for the state's economic woes, the demonstrators charged. The workers' compensation cuts demonstrate "mass insensitivity" to the needs of working people, the Michigan AFL-CIO and the UAW said. The marchers and their supporters also protested a proposal to lift the ceiling on state interest rates.

Wyoming Boosts Per Capita Tax to Expand Program

Casper, Wyo.—Delegates to the Wyoming AFL-CIO convention endorsed the expansion of the state labor federation's political education, research and activities programs with a 10-cent increase in the per capita tax, raising monthly payments to 70 cents.

The convention unanimously accepted the recommendation of the executive board for an early endorsement of Rodger McDaniel for the 1982 U.S. Senate election. McDaniel, who has served in the state legislature for 10 years, is one of two announced Democratic candidates for the seat now held by Republican Sen. Malcolm Wallop.

EXECUTIVE SEC. Keith Henning said McDaniel built a solid, pro-labor record during his career in the legislature and shapes up as a formidable opponent to Wallop, who has only a 12-percent "right" COPE voting record in the Senate.

The 200 delegates also urged Gov. Ed Herschler and Supt. of Public Instruction Lynn Simons to seek re-election.

In other action, the convention renewed its call for the repeal of Wyoming's open shop law as the state labor federation's top legislative priority.

DELEGATES elected Bill Newman of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers as vice president to succeed Glenn Sweem, who did not seek re-election after 14 years in the office. Re-elected to new terms were State AFL-CIO President Tom Lee and three of the four executive board members. John Faunce of the Utility Workers was elected to the board to succeed Newman. The board reappointed Henning to a new term as executive secretary.

Coalitions Mobilize to Fight Natural Gas Price Decontrol

The Citizen/Labor Energy Coalition (CLEC) and Energy Action announced the two groups will merge to wage a more effective battle in Congress against moves to hasten the decontrol of natural gas prices.

At a press conference, Machinists President William W. Winpisinger, head of CLEC, said the merger will create a "stronger and tougher" organization.

HE CALLED accelerated decontrol of natural gas the "big swindle" and pledged that the merged coalition will work to "sensitize" Congress to consumers' wishes. "Congress is going to have to choose between their constituents and the oil companies," he said.

Actor Paul Newman, a founder of Energy Action six years ago, predicted that the gas decontrol issue will be "the next big battle in Congress." Newman warned that the oil companies may try to trade off accelerated decontrol for taxes on the resulting windfall profits.

This is a "trickle-up economic philosophy" Newman said, where consumers' gas bills double and then the oil companies and the government split the profits.

Winpisinger said the argument by the oil companies that the United States has been paying too little for energy because of price controls is false.

"Why should natural gas that belongs to all Americans be priced according to levels set by foreign cartels?" he asked.

THE COALITION has estimated that accelerated decontrol would cost some $260 billion, would double gas bills, and would add 2 to 3 percent to the nation's inflation rate. It also estimated that a million jobs would be lost each year by 1988.

Both Winpisinger and Newman said the merger would increase the effectiveness of the fight against gas decontrol through the combination of CLEC's organization and Energy Action's educational and research facilities. CLEC represents over 300 unions, citizen organizations and senior citizen groups with a combined membership of more than 13 million.

Council on Handicapped Honors AFL-CIO's Smedley

Lawrence T. Smedley, associate director of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Social Security, was cited as the outstanding labor representative of the Industry-Labor Council on Employment of the Handicapped.

Smedley was honored at an awards dinner held in conjunction with the council's national conference in Washington.

Tight Lid Asked On Donations To Candidates

ing has had on presidential campaigns.

BUT WITH acknowledgement that "there is little chance" that Congress will enact such a program in the near future, the AFL-CIO urged that "at the very least, a dollar limit on the total amount of PAC contributions a candidate for Congress may accept should be adopted."

The AFL-CIO endorsed some simplifications and clarifications in federal election law being considered by the Rules Committee but opposed raising the limit on individual contributions. "Too much" of campaign financing comes from large corporations, the federation stressed.

THE AFL-CIO also opposed a proposal to require detailed and complex reporting by unions on expenditures for lawful voter registration and get-out-the-vote campaign and for administering and soliciting funds for union political action committees. It said the reporting burden, especially on local unions, would discourage participation in the election process.

It noted that reporting on internal communications "primarily devoted to advocating the election or defeat of federal candidates is already required" by law.

Social Security Minimum

Benefit Floor Revived For Current Retirees

value in real terms would continue to drop and the number of new beneficiaries helped by it would steadily decline.

BUT THE budget reconciliation bill that the Administration pushed through Congress last summer would have ended the minimum benefit next March for persons already getting it and denied the minimum to new recipients after last October.

In the face of a public outcry, the House last July 31 voted 404-20 to restore the minimum benefit for both present and future beneficiaries.

The Republican-controlled Senate used that bill as a vehicle for other changes in the law. It voted to deny the minimum to future retirees and survivors, but to allow most persons previously receiving it to continue to do so. However, persons receiving a government pension of more than $300 a month would not be entitled to the full $122. The Senate bill also included the sick pay tax, a version of interfund borrowing and the ceiling on family benefits that was dropped in conference.

THE OFFSET for government pensions also was among the labor-opposed features of the Senate bill that was dropped in the final version. The legislation enacted also restored retroactively the minimum benefit for persons qualifying for it in November and December of this year, ending the benefit floor on Jan. 1, 1982, for those not covered before that date. The only exception is for nuns and members of religious orders requiring a vow of poverty.

The taxation of sick pay will bring into the social security funds almost as much as the cost of retaining the minimum benefit, and House conferees defended the compromise measure as the best that could be worked out with the Senate.

In other developments in the final days of the first session of the 97th Congress:

● Congress approved a bill supported by both the Mine Workers and the coal industry doubling the special tax on the sale of coal which is used to finance black lung benefits for miners. The trust fund for that purpose has had to borrow from the Treasury to continue to pay benefits. The measure raises the tax rate temporarily from 50 cents to $1 a ton on underground coal and from 25 cents to 50 cents on surface-mined coal.

● The House voted 244-136 approval of a standby emergency petroleum allocation bill that gives the President temporary authority to impose oil price ceilings and allocate petroleum supplies in the event of a severe shortage. Gasoline rationing would be prohibited and either the House or Senate could block controls by a resolution of disapproval.

The AFL-CIO had urged stronger standby legislation but supported passage of the House bill because the previous standby authority had expired at the end of September. The Senate has passed its own version and a House-Senate conference committee will try to reach agreement in the second session of Congress.

● Congress approved before adjournment a massive $200 billion defense appropriations bill, foreign assistance funding, and a compromise farm bill that cleared the House by a scant 205-203 margin.

SOUP LINE PROTEST against Reagan Administration economic policies rallied 3,000 demonstrators outside a Cincinnati hotel as a symbolic contrast to a posh Republican Party fund-raiser going on inside with Reagan as the attraction. Sponsors of the rally included the Cincinnati AFL-CIO and the NAACP.

Reagan Names Moffett to Head Mediation Agency

Kenneth E. Moffett has been nominated by President Reagan to be the director of the Federal Mediation & Conciliation Service, a position that has been vacant for almost a year. The nomination is subject to Senate confirmation.

Moffett, who has been with FMCS since 1961, has served as its acting director since Jan. 1, when Wayne L. Horvitz resigned from the post. Before joining the agency, Moffett served as an international representative with District 50 of the Mine Workers for five years.

EARLIER THIS month, the FMCS entered into a stipulation agreeing not to implement personnel cuts until a permanent director is named, an agreement that settled a lawsuit by six employees of the agency who were to be terminated. Moffett told reporters that the stipulation probably led the Administration finally to fill the long vacant post.

A number of major collective bargaining contracts are due to expire in 1982, and the director often becomes involved in the talks. Moffett said the FMCS is monitoring petroleum and trucking negotiations, which are now under way.

During his career with the FMCS, Moffett served as deputy director from 1977 through last January. Previously, he served as its director of mediation services for five years. In 1969, he was special assistant to former director J. Curtis Counts. He started with the agency as a mediator, serving in Washington and in Cleveland.

NLRB Judge Backs Union On Right to Chemical Data

A tire company has been ordered to comply with a union's request under the National Labor Relations Act for precise information on hazardous substances that its members encounter on the job.

Ruling in favor of Rubber Workers Local 26 in an unfair labor practice case, NLRB Administrative Law Judge Thomas E. Bracken held that the information was essential to the union's responsibilities in representing 1,700 workers at the Kelly-Springfield Tire Co. plant in Cumberland, Md.

BRACKEN DIRECTED the company, a subsidiary of Goodyear, to furnish the URW local with a list of all chemicals by generic name, as well as handling precautions, that its employees come in contact with.

Bracken noted that three other NLRB law judges reached the same conclusions earlier on the need for full identification of toxic and carcinogenic materials in the workplace. Although the rulings came more than two years ago, the full NLRB has yet to make a final decision on any of the cases against Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co., Colgate-Palmolive Co., Borden Chemical and Goodyear Tire & Rubber.

Kelly-Springfield had offered to provide the union with precaution sheets, but would only identify the chemicals by code name. Insisting on the union's need for generic names, Bracken asserted that "the code name is as meaningless to the union as if it were in Sanskrit."

THE UNION requested the precise identifications in January 1979 after the company disclosed that one of the compounds used in the plant caused cancer in laboratory animals.

"The specter of cancer," Bracken said, "has few equals in casting fear into the minds of American workers, and certainly the union had not only the right, but the duty to seek out all chemicals that would be potentially dangerous to the health and well-being of its members."

A toxic labeling standard was promulgated by the Occupational Safety & Health Administration last January before the Carter Administration left office. But it and 62 other proposed regulations were pulled back under an Executive Order of President Reagan in March over the strong protests of the AFL-CIO.

THE PROPOSED toxic labeling regulation would have required employers to provide precise chemical identification and warnings on hazardous substances found in some 328,000 manufacturing facilities that employ more than 20 million workers.

Medical studies have found that nearly 60 percent of the recorded occupational illnesses can be traced to chemical exposure in manufacturing.

In endorsing the URW local's contention on the need for information, Bracken observed that "by learning what potential risks and hazards the employees face in the plant, the union would then be in a position to bargain intelligently for protective measures to eliminate or reduce such hazards."

HE SAID the union could also bargain "for better medical facilities in the plant that would be geared to meet these hazards, for greater medical and surgical benefits, and for more relaxed eligibility rules for securing disability pensions."

Kelly-Springfield contended that the union's request for the information was designed to procure evidence for personal injury lawsuits against the company. Twenty-six Kelly-Springfield workers have filed federal suits for personal injury.

Union, Industry Groups Assail 'Unrealistic' Trade Policies

The United States is continuing to lose jobs and production by sticking to unrealistic trade policies, union and industry officials testified at House hearings.

Representatives of two labor-management coalitions and the Ladies' Garment Workers were among the witnesses heard by a Ways & Means subcommittee that is reviewing foreign trade issues.

THE LABOR-INDUSTRY Coalition for International Trade (LICIT) told the panel that non-tariff barriers to U.S. products have tilted the balance against the United States in the world competition for markets.

Industrial Union Dept. President Howard D. Samuel was joined by Lawrence C. McQuade, senior vice president of W. R. Grace & Co., in presenting LICIT's proposals for trade policies reflecting "today's realities."

Samuel said the United States has been relatively successful in negotiating with other countries for a mutual reduction of tariffs, but still has "a long way to go" in securing the removal of non-tariff barriers.

HE AND McQUADE urged a legislative package to assure greater relief from unfair trade practices by other countries and "enhance the negotiating leverage of the United States" in dealings with its trading partners.

Another union-employer coalition, the Textile/Apparel Import Steering Group, said imports from low-wage nations threaten to wipe out hundreds of thousands of U.S. jobs—on top of the heavy losses already imposed.

Shelley Appleton, secretary-treasurer of the Ladies' Garment Workers, testified for the 20 trade associations and unions making up the steering group.

Imports of textiles and apparels are up 17 percent over the previous year, Appleton noted.

THE UNITED STATES is currently renegotiating the multifiber arrangement regulating textile and apparel trade among 50 signatory nations. Appleton said the agreement should be strengthened as well as renewed.

If it would allow imports to grow at the expense of U.S. industry, it would be better to authorize U.S. quotas, he told the panel.

ILGWU Legislative Director Evelyn Dubrow testified separately on one of the trade issues of speical importance to her union—a loophole in the tariff code known as Item 807.

Under this provision, American companies can export parts for assembly abroad and reimport the finished product, paying duty only on foreign value added, which is largely the labor cost.

SINCE THE REASON for assembly abroad is to get cheap labor, the duty imposed is minimal, she noted.

Dubrow said garment workers have been displaced by the practice of manufacturers who sent cut garments to Mexico and other nearby low-wage nations to be sewn and returned to the United States.

The dollar value of garments brought into the United States under the Item 807 loophole rose from $1.7 million in 1965 to $524 million last year, she testified.

First Session of Congress Posts Dismal Record

AFL-CIO News

Vol. XXVI Saturday, December 26, 1981 No. 51

By David L. Perlman

The first session of the 97th Congress was a near disaster in terms of labor's assessment of the nation's needs. Neither rising unemployment nor worsening recession budged Congress from the ideological path laid out by the Reagan Administration.

AFL-CIO Legislative Director Ray Denison sees the first session record as "a virtual abdication of the independent role of Congress."

At the Administration's bidding, he noted, "Congress bypassed its own committee structure and resorted to budget-setting shortcuts to rewrite laws and curtail benefits."

CONGRESS WORKED hand-in-glove with the Administration to wipe out the public service jobs program, scuttle trade adjustment assistance for workers displaced by imports and demolish most job training and placement programs.

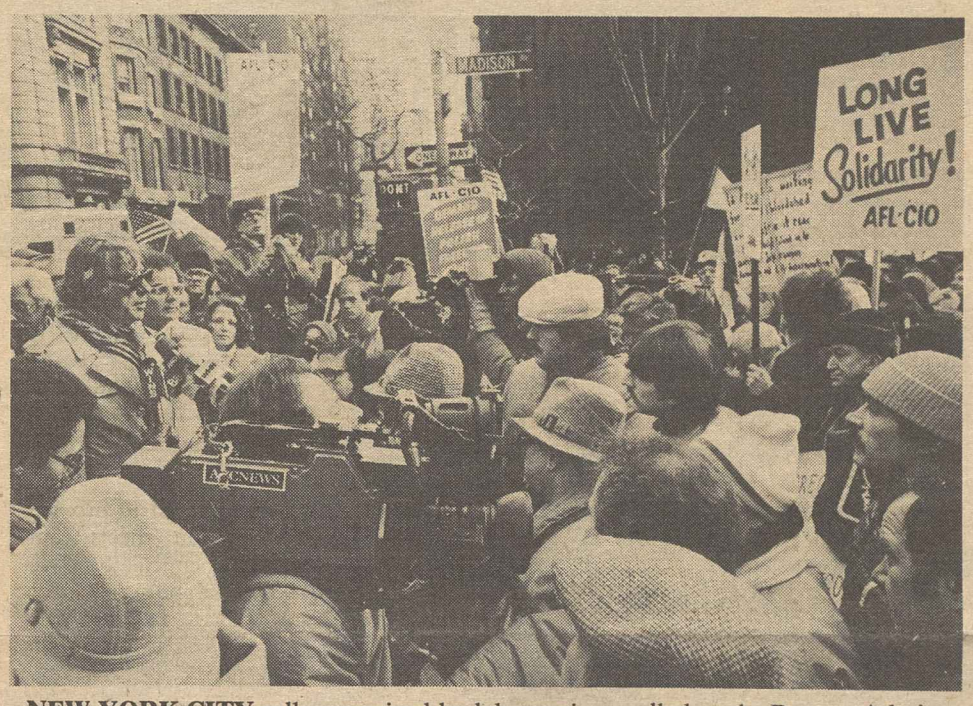
It slashed family assistance for the neediest and savaged programs designed to help the working poor and the near-poor. More than a million persons were cut off from food stamps; fewer children will get reduced-price school lunches.

Medicaid payments to the states have been reduced, and Medicare cutbacks compel the elderly to pay a bigger share of their health costs out of pocket.

The "victories" for labor during the first session of the 97th Congress were largely in staving off further catastrophes.

Almost every economic step taken by the 97th Congress has been in the wrong direction, Denison observed.

Housing programs were reduced substantially below current levels at a time when homebuilding was almost at a standstill because of high mortgage interest rates.



Through underfunding of both direct federal grants and consolidated "block grants," Congress and the Administration squeezed states and cities so hard that Republican governors and mayors protested as loudly as Democrats.

THERE WILL BE less aid to the arts and to public broadcasting. But Congress refused to block President Reagan's costly decontrol of domestic crude oil prices.

Especially outrageous, Denison stressed, was the tax cut bill that Congress enacted as it embraced the trickle-down philosophy

Protests Mount on Polish Crisis

NEW YORK CITY rally organized by labor unions called on the Reagan Administration to support the demand of the Polish trade union federation, Solidarity, for an end to martial law in Poland. More than 2,500 took part in the demonstration outside the Polish consulate. Teachers President Albert Shanker is shown during a TV interview. (Additional photos Page 2.)

Labor Rallies U.S. Support For Embattled Solidarity

By James M. Shevis

American workers and their unions stepped up their protest over the Polish government's attack on the Solidarity labor federation and demanded the release of thousands of union members and officers "detained" since the communists reimposed military rule in Poland two weeks ago.

In major cities across the United States, the AFL-CIO joined Polish-American, civic, religious, civil rights, and other groups in expressing outrage over Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski's crackdown on the free trade union organization that held out the promise of "odnawa," or democratic renewal, of Polish society. Poland has been under Soviet-imposed communist rule since the Red Army occupied it at the end of World War II.

AS ONE expression of support for the Polish workers, Longshoremen's President Thomas W. Gleason announced that ILA members would not handle any cargo going to or from Poland on any vessel until martial law, the detention of trade union leaders, and the denial of the civil rights of the Polish people have ended.

"Armed might seeks to extinguish the torch of liberty in Poland," Gleason told a New York City news conference. "It is for American workers to hold it high as a beacon of hope and support. In conscience we can do no less."

GLEASON SAID he hoped to see the action spread to transport unions throughout the free world, and that he had urged the International Transportworkers' Federation, a trade union secretariat headquartered near London, to issue a call for its member unions around the world to join in the refusal to handle cargo moving to or from Poland.

Gleason, a vice president of both the ITF and the AFL-CIO, said the only exceptions to the ILA boycott would be emergency medical or food supplies delivered for a recognized charity. The State Dept. earlier announced that the United States would permit the continued supply of food aid being distributed to the Poles by private American organizations such as CARE and Catholic Relief Services.

But the U.S. government has put in abeyance a Polish government request for more than $730 million in credits for next year to purchase feed grains and other agricultural products.

AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland, on returning from London and Paris where he conferred with European trade union leaders, met with President Reagan at the White House to discuss the Polish situation. Reagan told reporters before the meeting that the Administration "wants a return to the negotiation stage, an end to martial law, and the release from confinement of those people who have been unjustly arrested, and an end to violence."

FROM COAST TO coast, American workers demonstrated against the Draconian measures promulgated by the Polish Army after it dropped a curtain of darkness on the Polish people the night of Dec. 12-13. Except in churches, the Poles

Industrial Output Drops As Recession Worsens

Industrial production declined 2.1 percent in November and the economy continued to contract as the nation's eighth recession since the end of World War II deepened and forced hundreds of thousands of additional workers onto the unemployment rolls.

The slide in output of U.S. factories, mines, and utilities was the fourth consecutive monthly drop and the largest since the 3-percent decline in May 1980 at the depth of the last previous recession. The drop in industrial production reflected a continuing decline in orders from businesses as they responded to shrinking demand and rising inventories.

THE NOVEMBER decrease in output, which resulted primarily from sharp reductions in the production of automobiles, home appliances and business equipment, was larger than expected. In reporting the lower production levels, the Federal Reserve Board said the declines were broad, with only defense and space industries reflecting modest growth.

Production of home goods, which includes appliances and furniture, fell 5.3 percent over the month. The automotive sector declined 7.2 percent, and auto assemblies dropped nearly 13 percent.

Separately, the Commerce Dept. said housing activity in November picked up only slightly from the 15-year low recorded in October. Starts of new houses were recorded at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 871,000 units.

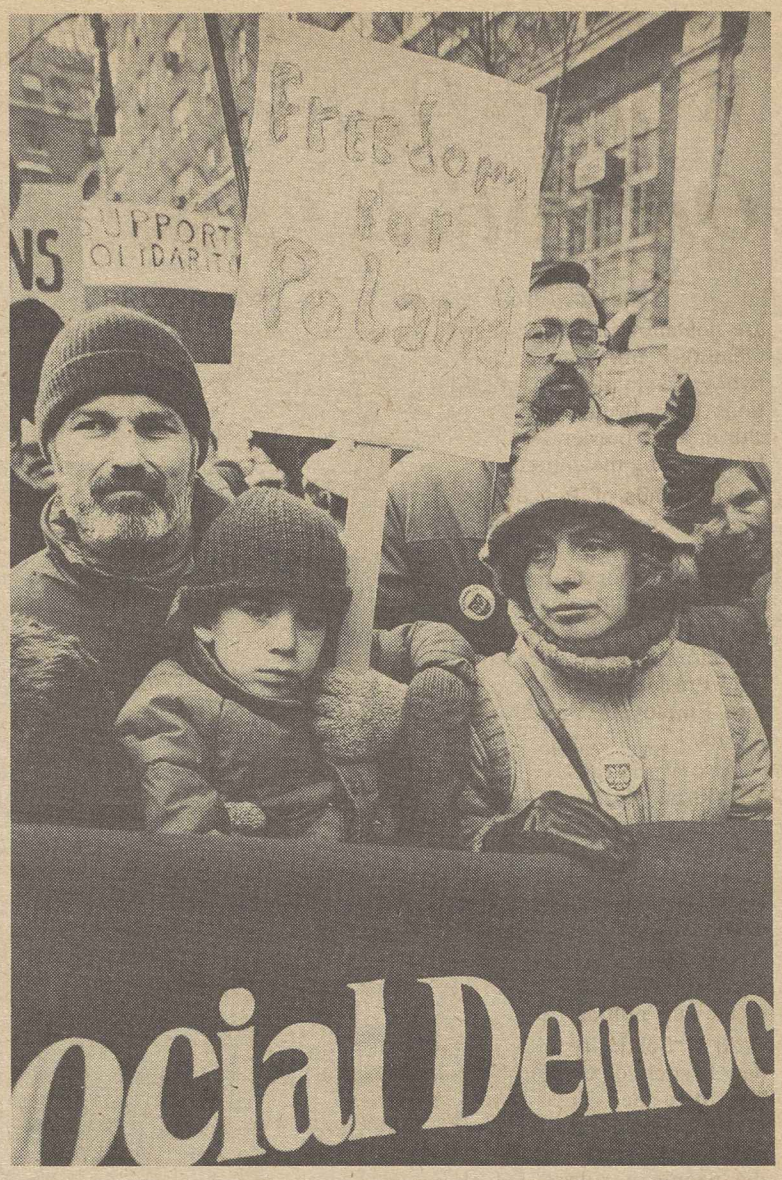
MEANWHILE, the Commerce Dept.'s preliminary assessment of the current quarter's performance showed the economy contracting at a 5.4-percent annual rate. In releasing the figure, the government also raised its estimate of third-quarter growth to a seasonally adjusted 1.4 percent annual rate from six-tenths of 1 percent.

Much of the revision reflected stronger inventory buildup than previously estimated. The economy contracted at an adjusted annual rate of 1.6 percent in the second quarter, after expanding at an 8.6-percent rate in the first quarter.

Job Security Key To Pattern Pacts In Meat Industry

The Food & Commercial Workers approved new contracts with two of the country's major meatpacking firms providing major job and union security protections through August 1985.

In return for a wage freeze, Armour & Co. and Wilson Food Corp. agreed not to close any of their plants for the next 18 months and to give notice of any plant closings for the 12 months thereafter.



ARMOUR AND WILSON also agreed to recognize the union whenever a majority of workers at a new plant sign authorization cards, and to provide the union with information about its spending plans. The pacts, which the UFCW says will set a pattern for about 40,000 workers in the industry, also provide for medical benefit improvements.

UFCW President William Wynn said employees at Hormel are voting on a similar contract and that the union is considering contract terms with Swift and John Morrell & Co. The Armour and Swift agreements became effective on Dec. 17,

Speaking Out for Solidarity

AMERICAN trade unionists rallied in demonstrations across the country to express their support of Polish workers and their Solidarity movement—the target of a crackdown by Poland's communist government. Similar protests were conducted in major cities around the world. In the United States, marches, protests and candlelight vigils were coordinated by the AFL-CIO. At a White House meeting, Federation President Lane Kirkland briefed President Reagan on International Confederation of Free Trade Unions actions on the crisis in Poland.

World Outrage Grows On Polish Crackdown

are not allowed to assemble. Penalties for seemingly minor infractions range from two years to death. Normal communications have been cut off with the outside world, and borders sealed to keep Poles from leaving the country.

Thousands of Polish-Americans in Chicago, the home of more ethnic Poles than any other city outside Warsaw, joined with organized labor to protest the communist regime's crackdown on free trade unionism. Speakers included AFL-CIO Regional Director James Freeman, Illinois AFL-CIO President Robert G. Gibson, and Service Employees Vice President Eugene P. Moats.

Also at the rally, which drew more than 10,000 people, were Mr. and Mrs. Robert Walesa. Walesa, the cousin of Solidarity Chairman Lech Walesa, is an elevator maintenance engineer in Park Ridge, Ill. He later wired President Reagan "to do whatever in your power it takes for the release of my cousin." The Solidarity leader was detained by authorities at the start of the new military rule.

At a "Solidarity with Solidarity" rally in San Francisco, California State AFL-CIO Executive Sec.-Treas. John F. Henning noted that martial law "is the first thing imposed by a government that is afraid of the people it rules." Henning drew loud cheers from trade unionists, human rights activists, and Polish-Americans when he urged "the puppet government in Warsaw" to free Solidarity's leaders, restore trade union rights, and lift restrictions on individual freedoms.

SOME 2,500 demonstrators proclaimed support for the independent Polish labor federation at a rally outside the Polish consulate in New York City. Organized by the State AFL-CIO and the Social Democrats USA, the rally drew members of more than 20 unions. Speakers urged the United States to impose sanctions against the Polish government, and called on Poland's military regime to free Walesa, who has not been seen in public since the crackdown.

AFL-CIO Regional Director Michael Mann said that "Poland is afire, and we want action now from the U.S. government" to press the Soviet bloc to restore the rights of Polish citizens. Mayor Edward Koch blamed the Soviet Union for the crackdown, and compared the situation in Poland to the days before World War II when Nazi troops moved into Czechoslovakia. "We were silent then, but let us never be silent again," he said.

OTHERS WHO spoke during the emotional demonstration in chilling temperatures included Sen. Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.), President Harry Van Arsdale, Jr., of the New York City Central Labor Council, Sec.-Treas. E. Howard Molisani of the New York State AFL-CIO, and Carl Gershman, counselor to U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Jeane J. Kirkpatrick. Chairman Bayard Rustin of the A. Philip Randolph Institute led the crowd in singing a modified chorus of the labor anthem, "Solidarity Forever."

In New Britain, Conn., a crowd of 4,000 cheered labor and public officials who urged the U.S. government not to extend loans and credit guarantees to Poland until martial law is lifted and Solidarity leaders are freed. Rally speakers included State AFL-CIO President John J. Driscoll and Lt. Gov. Joseph J. Fauliso.

Other trade union activities around the country in support of Solidarity involved participation in candlelight vigils near the Polish embassy in Washington, D.C., and rallies in Houston, Albany, N.Y., Detroit, and in Buffalo.

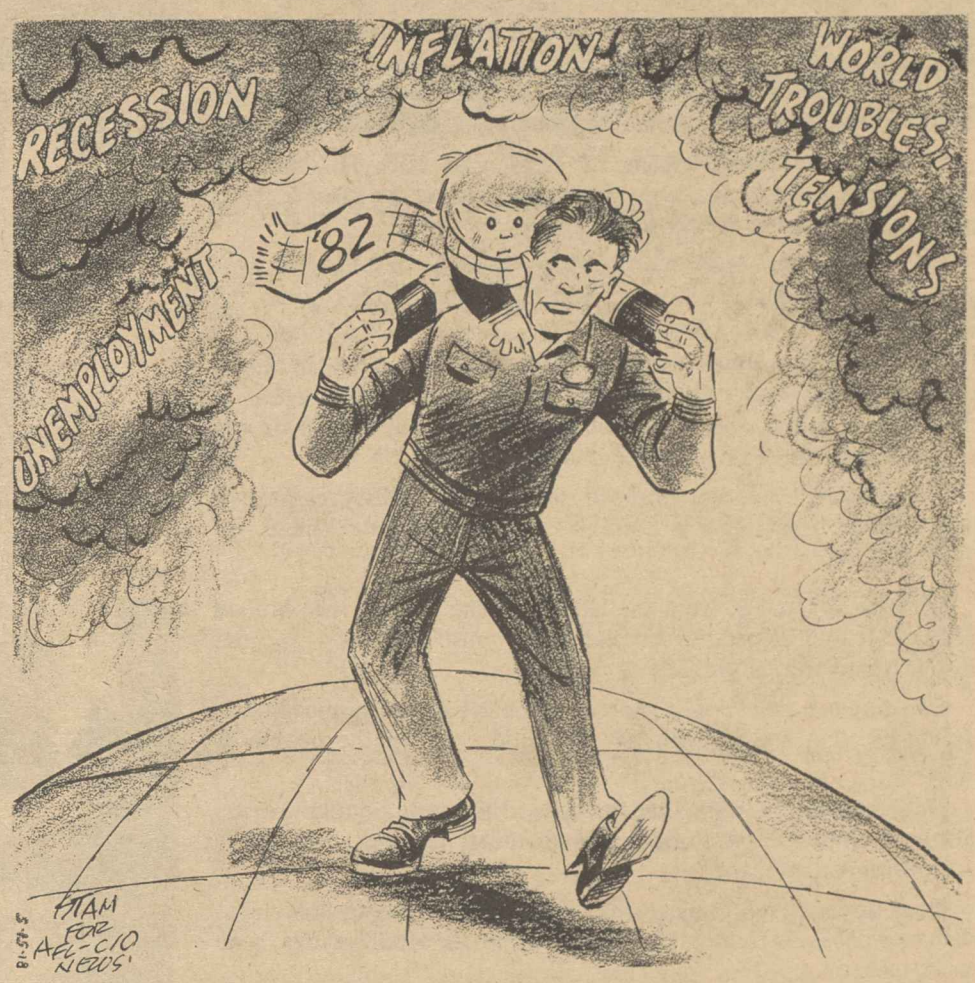
AFL-CIO SEC.-TREAS. Thomas R. Donahue spoke at a breakfast in the nation's capital launching a Christmas Week vigil in support of the Polish workers and their unions. Expressions of support also poured forth from leaders of various AFL-CIO affiliated unions.

President Richard I. Kilroy of the Railway & Airline Clerks said the union "joins with the AFL-CIO, the International Transport Workers Federation, and the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions in condemning the Polish government's attack on the basic human rights of its citizens, an action which flouts the treaty obligations undertaken by Poland at the Helsinki conference."

PRESIDENT William Konyha of the Carpenters, noting that the union has many Polish-Americans among its members, stressed "the right of workers everywhere to join freely in trade unions that will represent their just aspirations for economic progress and social well-being."

Sec.-Treas. Ray Majerus of the Auto Workers said, "The massive arrests and detention of the leadership of Solidarity and the banning of that union of workers are unjustified and unrealistic. . . . The dialogue of peaceful negotiations can be the only road to true social justice in Poland."

STEELWORKERS President Lloyd McBride said the union's members throughout the United States and Canada "offer their prayers for the people of Poland" and urged the U.S. government to use "all economic and diplomatic sanctions possible to impress upon the communist regimes in Moscow and Warsaw the great outrage members feel at the military reoccupation of Poland."



The Screen Actors-Television & Radio Artists joint board termed the imposition of martial law, curfew, raids by police upon Solidarity chapters across Poland, and the detention of union leaders a repudiation of agreements between the independent trade union federation and the Polish government.

The protest against the Polish military crackdown took on worldwide scope as workers in Tokyo, Paris, and other foreign cities stood up to be counted in support of Solidarity.

THE INTERNATIONAL Labor Organization, a specialized agency of the United Nations, sought to send a mission to Poland to survey the situation after receiving the protests of the ICFTU and several international trade union secretariats.

The International Metalworkers' Federation, headquartered in Geneva, called on its 170 affiliated unions throughout the world to support protests to Polish embassies in their countries, "and to make clear that relationships between the West and the Soviet bloc countries will be imperiled unless the leaders of Solidarity are released, trade union rights restored, and a dialogue between Polish workers and the authorities begins again."

'Hold On, Kid!'

OSHA Denies Union Petition To Curb Pesticide Exposure

Administrator Thorne G. Auchter of the Occupational Safety & Health Administration has rejected a union petition calling for an immediate reduction in worker exposure to a highly toxic agricultural fumigant that is suspected of causing cancer and sterility.

Rather than issuing an emergency temporary standard for ethylene dibromide (EDB), Auchter said OSHA would follow routine rulemaking procedures in developing a standard to lower permissible exposure levels. He acknowledged, however, that new medical evidence strongly suggests that the existing OSHA regulation for EDB doesn't adequately protect workers against serious health risks.

EDB IS USED on grains, fruits and vegetables after harvest to kill Mediterranean fruit flies and other insects. The existing federal regulation limits worker exposure to 20 parts EDB per million parts air (20 ppm).

The union petition—filed jointly by the AFL-CIO, the Food & Beverage Trades Dept., the unaffiliated Teamsters and other unions—seeks to immediately lower the exposure level to at least 0.13 ppm and ideally to a ppm level of 0.015.

Because of the concerns over the EDB health risks, AFL-CIO Occupational Safety Director George H. R. Taylor noted in a letter to Auchter that California lowered worker exposure to the chemical to the 0.13 level in August under an emergency temporary standard (ETS).

THE CALIFORNIA ETS has withstood challenges by growers in state and federal courts, including the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals.

In the meantime, OSHA has proposed a series of guidelines for minimizing worker exposure to the suspected carcinogen, which labor safety and health specialists branded as meaningless.

"Never before in its entire 11-year history has OSHA issued such an unprofessional and technically deficient document and so utterly failed to respond to a serious and immediate health threat posed to workers," Taylor charged.

An estimated 108,000 workers are exposed to EDB while handling, processing and transporting agricultural products, according to the National Institute of Occupational Safety & Health. In 1977, NIOSH called for reducing EDB exposure limits to the lowest feasible levels and reiterated its recommendation last month.

TAYLOR NOTED that scientific studies show that laboratory animals have developed tumors when exposed to EDB at one-half the existing OSHA exposure limit.

The AFL-CIO warned that growers, after being rebuffed by the courts on the California EDB standard, are now attempting to wipe out the state regulation by appealing to OSHA that it "unduly burdens interstate commerce."

Retreat on Lead Standards Proposed by Administration

The Occupational Safety & Health Administration has proposed rolling back engineering control requirements for eight of 47 industries subject to a 1978 lead exposure standard.

In a long-delayed statement to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia, OSHA asked for the return of the court record for further study to determine if the controls were "feasible" for the eight industries.

FOR THE 39 industries where OSHA agreed the standard was indeed feasible, it extended the timetable for compliance from one year to two and one-half years.

OSHA said it would also allow the use of respirators instead of engineering controls in plants where workers are exposed to lead in excess of the exposure limit, which is 50 micrograms per cubic meter of air.

Excessive exposure to lead can cause damage to the kidneys and nervous system, serious blood disorders, sterility and death. About 835,000 workers are exposed to lead on the job, according to federal estimates.

Major provisions of OSHA's lead standard have been in effect since March 1979 for all major lead-using industries. Engineering control provisions went into effect in June of this year for 10 industries after the Supreme Court refused the Administration's request for review of the appeals court decision upholding the standard.

Those 10 industries are primary lead smelting, secondary lead smelting, battery manufacturing, electronics, gray iron foundries, ink manufacturing, paint and coatings manufacturing, wall paper manufacturing, can making and printing.

AMONG THE 39 manufacturing industries where OSHA proposed to relax engineering control requirements are auto, sheet metal, leather, glass, textiles, plastics, pottery and rubber.

One of the causes for the delay of the OSHA court statement was that it had to be cleared by the Administration's Office of Management & Budget. In submitting the statement, Auchter contended that the rollback on engineering controls would save employers more than $50 million "without reducing worker protection."

Building Trades Offer Guide On Fighting Union-Busters

A new pamphlet to help workers fight back against union-busting consultants and anti-union employers is available from the AFL-CIO Building & Construction Trades Dept.

The booklet, "Fighting the Union-Busters, A Workers' Guide to Using the Law," includes model complaint forms and information on obtaining copies of reports consultants and employers are required to file with the Labor Dept. about their activities.

The pamphlet was prepared by the department's Center to Protect Workers' Rights. Up to 10 copies are available free from the center, 815 16th St. N.W., Room 603, Washington, D.C. 20006.

Solidarnosc . . . Forever

POLAND'S AMBASSADOR to the United States, breaking openly with the government that he could no longer in conscience represent, spoke to Americans of "the cruel night of darkness and silence" that had descended on his beloved country.

"I cannot be silent," Romuald Spasowski said. His decision was reached when he learned "that Lech Walesa, the most beloved leader of Solidarity, is arrested and kept by force."

The ambassador spoke of the "war against the Polish people" and the "reign of terror" unleashed by military rulers doing the bidding of their Soviet masters.

"Factories have been stormed where workers defended themselves," he reported. "Solidarity members have been arrested in their offices and at night. All communications lines have been cut off to isolate the country and to confuse the world."

Ambassador Spasowski insisted that "this carefully orchestrated and directed crackdown is not an internal Polish issue." And, indeed, it is not.

OTHER VOICES, from the leaders of the nations that profess democracy and respect for human rights, must be raised—and not just in the cautious phrases of diplomacy.

Can anyone now doubt that it is the trade union movement, Solidarity, that speaks with the authentic voice of the people of Poland?

Does anyone question that the censorship and communications blackout imposed on Poland was intended to keep Solidarity's voice from being heard?

Does anyone truly believe that the free trade union movement that caused such tremors in Moscow and its satellites has been extinguished?

THERE MAY STILL BE an opportunity for a restoration of freedoms if the military regime accepts the fact that it cannot establish a viable economy with a bayonet at the throat of its workers. But it will be actions, not rhetoric, that impel such a development.

The rulers of Poland must be put on notice that there will be no business-as-usual with a government that crushes with force its own people. Such notice must come from all free nations, not just from the United States.

Through their unions, the workers of the world have proclaimed their support—their solidarity—with Poland's Solidarnosc.

Second Century

AMERICAN LABOR'S second century opens on a note of urgency and concern.

It's safe to predict that the third century will be equally beset by problems. And that there will be a trade union movement around to deal with them.

Consumer Spending Sluggish

Business Council Economists Find Reagan Scheme Failing

By Gus Tyler

THE IDEA BEHIND the tax cut was to stimulate the economy: the savings would put people to work in new and expanded plants.

But it's not working out that way, say the top economists of the Business Council, spokesman for America's largest corporations. The economists say that the tax cuts are failing to "stimulate the final demand that might help to spur a larger increase in business investment."

THE KEY WORD here is "demand," the spark plug of economic action. If there is weak demand, no prudent investor will invest. You don't produce products for non-existent customers. This perfectly obvious idea was restated in more elegant and formal words by Lawrence Chimerine of Chase Econometrics:

"Despite the current emphasis on savings and investment, it is essential that some of the increases in real income that will result from lowered inflation and reduced taxes be reflected in higher consumer spending. Continued sluggish consumer spending would directly suppress economic activity and, by holding down profits and operating revenues, would also depress capital formation."

THE BUSINESS COUNCIL has been a strong backer of Reaganomics. But facts are facts, and the simple facts are that the Reagan tax cut put great gobs of money in the hands of the investing class but did just about nothing for the consuming classes, the great 85 percent of the nation that lives on wages and salaries. The result is "sluggish consumer spending," a weak market, and hence weak prospects of investment in production.

That "demand" is the key to economic vitality is not a new idea, I was reminded on the same day that the Business Council made its surprise statement. That noon, I attended a luncheon of Public Affairs Pamphlets, an organization that in 1936 embarked on a program of popular booklets to educate the American people on certain truths that often get buried in forgotten tomes.

The first tract, written in 1936 by Maxwell Stewart, was a popular summary of several volumes by the Brookings Institution on the American economy. One part of that study dealt with savings and what it could and could not do. Here's an excerpt from the booklet, Income and Economic Progress:

"Money savings will be used to build new plant and equipment only if it pays to do so. The question is: Will business men run the risk of expanding productive capacity at a time when, as a result of increased savings, consumer demand is declining, and the amount of unutilized productive capacity is increasing? In boom periods, when people are buying increased amounts of goods, manufacturers will hasten to build new factories and to install labor-saving machinery; but in a depression when consumption is low, they, as a rule, avoid all unnecessary expenditures.

"IF THIS IS true, then it does not follow that all money set aside as savings will be immediately used for new plant and equipment. For if the proportion of a nation's income which is saved should suddenly increase, the resulting decline in the purchase of consumers' goods would serve to prevent the use of money savings in building new plant and equipment. The demand for capital goods is derived not from savings but from the consumers' expenditures."

That was written 45 years ago. Too bad it was not read by Reagan's economic advisers before they wrote the recent law to enrich the rich.

A Parting Word From the Editor

This issue of the AFL-CIO News marks the end of my role as editor of the federation's weekly newspaper. I have been privileged to direct and edit the News for the past 26 years with broad editorial freedom.

The News has had a simple objective: to publish a weekly paper for the trade union movement based on editorial integrity and credibility. That objective, in the main, has been achieved, we have been assured by friends and critics.

The News has set a standard also for the labor press. It has helped develop the crisp professionalism, attractiveness, credibility and commitment in trade union publications today.

On retirement I give thanks for the opportunity to have served, to have worked with the fine editors and writers whose names have graced these pages.

Worldwide Protest Pressed

ICFTU Statement on Poland Demands Return of Freedoms

The following statement was issued by the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions following a special meeting at the organization's headquarters in Brussels.

ON DEC. 16, 1981, a special trade union meeting was convened in Brussels by the ICFTU to discuss the serious situation in Poland.

Representatives of ICFTU affiliated organizations and of the International Trade Secretariats expressed the international free trade union movement's condemnation of the arrests of leading members of Solidarnosc and the imposition of military rule in Poland.

THE MEETING emphasized that these measures were taken in the absence of any provocation on the part of the Polish free and independent trade union movement, which on the contrary has repeatedly stated, and is still stating, that it is ready to negotiate.

The international free trade union movement condemns the Polish authorities' shameful attempts to stifle, by means of these measures, the hope of resurgence and freedom that the Polish free and independent trade union movement has succeeded in creating in Poland and elsewhere.

The international free trade union movement once again pledges its wholehearted support to the Polish workers and their Solidarnosc trade union organizations in their determination to ensure that the Polish authorities fully respect the Gdansk agreement.

THE INTERNATIONAL free trade union movement reaffirms its deep conviction that the problems of the working class cannot be solved without freedom and full observance of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the international conventions on freedom of assication, and therefore calls upon its member organizations to:

A. Undertake immediate and continuous protest actions in support of the Polish workers fight for the respect of human and trade union rights.

B. Exert stronger pressure on their respective governments.

C. Make representation to the Polish ambassadors in their countries with a view to ensuring that:

1. All the arrested trade unionists are immediately released.
2. Martial law is immediately abolished.
3. Negotiations are resumed immediately between the Polish authorities and Solidarnosc on measures to solve social and economic problems that the country is facing, on the basis of the agreements already reached before the declaration of martial law.
4. Democratic procedures are established to ensure that material assistance given to Poland does in fact reach those parts of the population that are in real need of it.
5. Any assistance to Poland by governments or credit institutions is strictly linked to the comprehensive fulfillment by the Polish authorities of the above mentioned trade union demands.

The ICFTU together with the International Trade Secretariats will follow developments closely and will make every effort to ensure effective coordination and maximum cohesion of the international solidarity action in support of the Polish workers.

'A Terrible Tragedy For Human Rights'

A terrible tragedy for trade union rights and individual human rights is unfolding in Poland, with reports of the jailing of trade unionists and trade union leaders, with pictures of tanks and troops controlling every street and byway, with the imposition of martial law and the use of force by a military government.

Free citizens all across Europe and the United States are giving voice to their shock at these events, and giving expression to their support for the Polish workers and the Polish people.

We are proud to be part of that protest.

The hand-wringing of some commentators to the effect that Solidarity has caused this confrontation is sheer nonsense. The Solidarity union movement has demonstrated sophistication about bargaining tactics, patience and a willingness to compromise.

Theirs has been the course of pressure with moderation.

We will continue to press for restoration of trade union rights, for full freedom of association and freedom of expression.

Long live Solidarity! Long live a free Poland!

—AFL-CIO Sec.-Treas. Thomas R. Donahue at the Dec. 14 Solidarity support rally in Washington, D.C.

Administration Tactics Hit

Conference on Aging Assails Attempt to Gut Social Security

DELEGATES TO the 1981 White House Conference on Aging overwhelmingly rejected the Administration's call for cuts in social security and other protections for America's elderly, despite the attempt of the White House to rig the meeting to get endorsement of the President's policies.

That report was made in a network radio interview by AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman and President Jacob Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens, who charged that the Administration stacked key committees with pro-Reagan delegates identified in a telephone poll conducted by the Republican National Committee. The ploy backfierd, they said, and the "unloaded committees did what the loaded committees could not do." They pointed out that the entire conference went on to adopt a series of recommendations that "preserve, at least in spirit, the whole gamut of programs" vital to the nation's elderly.

Clayman and Seidman, both of whom were delegates to earlier Aging Conferences, which are held at 10-year intervals to assess the needs of older Americans, said that such "political manipulation" was unprecedented, regardless of the party occupying the White House. "This Administration apparently was enormously fearful" of a free and open expression of opinion and "figured that the only way they could manage the picture was to stack the deck," Clayman asserted.

QUESTIONED BY reporters on Labor News Conference, Clayman and Seidman noted that most of the delegates left the conference with "feelings of disillusionment, disappointment and resentment" over the "extraordinary efforts of the Reagan Administration to manipulate this conference." But, Seidman added, "the spirit of the elderly" was not dampened, and they made it clear that they, like the majority of Americans, "want social security maintained and the programs of benefit to the elderly maintained."

Seidman warned that the Administration may still try to slant the conference report in its favor. "After what I saw in the way of manipulation, I don't put anything past these people," he declared. He said that the labor movement and senior citizen organizations will monitor the preparation of the conference report to try to assure that it accurately states the views and votes of the delegates.

Labor News Conference is broadcast weekly on Mutual radio.

Washington Window

By Press Associates, Inc.

ONE OF THE MOST mischievous pieces of anti-union legislation ever introduced in Congress got a good airing recently before a Senate criminal justice subcommittee.

Sponsored by South Carolina Sen. Strom Thurmond, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and 11 other conservative Senate Republicans, the legislation would place certain labor-management disputes under the federal anti-extortion law known as the Hobbs Act.

In practice, the Hobbs Act amendments would make a striking worker who, say, became involved in a scuffle on the picket line, subject to federal prosecution. If convicted, he or she could be sentenced to up to 20 years in jail or fined $10,000, or both.

BUT THE EMPLOYER or his hired agents probably wouldn't have to worry about prosecution under an amended Hobbs Act because the crime of extortion would apply in legal terms only to the employee, the party attempting to gain something through strike action.

Spearheading the campaign for the Hobbs amendment has been the National Right to Work Committee, whose mass mailing to 2 million potential contributors alleged rising "union terrorism" in the nation. The committee also has been circulating a sensationalistic, 30-minute film dubbed "Scepter of Violence."

Testifying before a Senate criminal law subcommittee, Right to Work Committee President Reed Larson painted a colorful picture of growing "union-inspired violence" orchestrated by "an international network" of union officials.

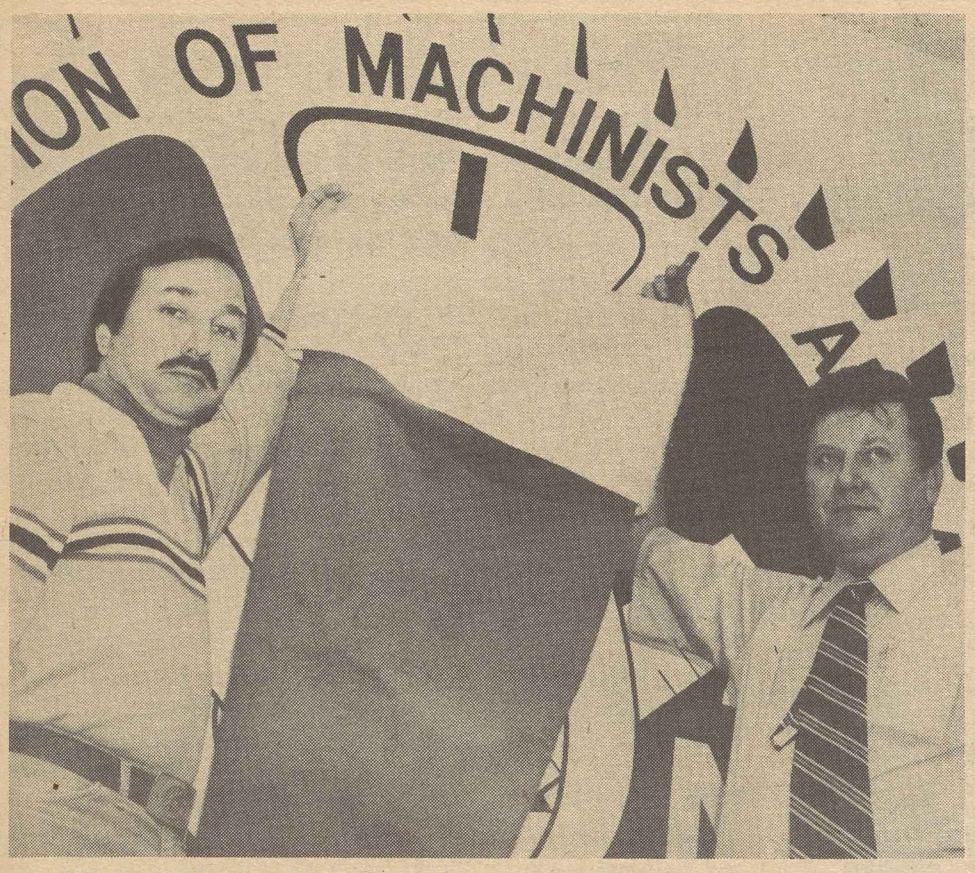
TO "DOCUMENT" his case, Larson reeled off his organization's litany of horror stories regarding alleged violence by union members.

Unfortunately for Larson, union opponents of the Hobbs amendments had done some homework. An AFL-CIO attorney offered these refutations of what he called distortions and misrepresentations spread by the Right to Work Committee:

● Allegation: "The U.S. Treasury Dept.'s Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco & Firearms reports that labor-related violence has replaced political terrorism as the number one cause of property damage by explosives in this country."

Fact: This is not true. The 1980 report of the BATF shows that "labor-related" incidents accounted for only 4.3 percent of all reported bombing incidents, putting this category a distant fifth on the list. And this includes incidents which "could have been perpetrated by members of labor or management," reported the bureau.

● Allegation: "A violent campaign against nonstriking employees at a Fremont, Neb., grain bin factory took an ugly turn with recent reports that two thugs pinned down a terrified worker while a third assailant repeatedly and expertly slashed the man with a razor."



Fact: According to the local police chief, city administrator, city prosecutor and county prosecutor, and the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board, no such incident ever occurred. But local officials reported that a union steward "got beat up pretty bad" and his assailant was arrested.

IN FACT, the National Association of Attorneys General has told Congress that local and state laws are fully adequate to deal with offenses by strikers or employers. And these laws already are backed up by federal laws dealing with such areas of interstate crime as bombings, arson and extortion.

The Hobbs Act amendments, if enacted, would have a chilling effect on workers wanting to exercise their right to strike and picket. And that, it seems, is the main reason it has been proposed.

OVERWHELMING REJECTION of the Administrations' drive to cut social security and other programs for older Americans was voted by delegates to the 1981 White House Conference on Aging despite attempts to rig the conference, AFL-CIO Social Security Director Bert Seidman, second from right, and President Jacob Clayman of the National Council of Senior Citizens, second from left, said. They were questioned on Labor News Conference by Judith Randal of the New York Daily News and Dale McFeatters of the Scripps-Howard Newspapers.

WORKING MEMBERS of Machinists Local 1746 at East Hartford, Conn., filled this six-foot stocking with dollar bills in fund drive for their union brothers and sisters laid off by Pratt & Whitney Division of United Technologies. Local President Bill Rudis, left, and IAM District 91 Rep. Fred Drosehn report fund passed $6,200 mark in 48 hours.

Contract Covering 12,000 Ratified at Groton Shipyard

Groton. Conn.—Workers at General Dynamics' Electric Boat Division here overwhelmingly approved a new contract providing for substantial wage increases and fringe-benefit improvements.

The pact, ratified by a vote of 6,832 to 1,025, was reached more than six months before the old agreement was to expire, the first early settlement at the shipyard in 26 years.

NEGOTIATED BY the Metal Trades Council comprising nine AFL-CIO unions and the unaffiliated Teamsters, the new three-year contract covers 12,000 workers, about 60 percent of the facility's workforce.

Settlement of nearly 3,000 grievances broke the ice after a month of negotiations, according to Council President Thomas Kiddy. The council agreed to drop the backlogged cases in exchange for one-time $100 payments to each worker covered by the settlement. The grievances involved assignment of workers outside their craft.

Under the agreement, all workers will receive a 25-cent hourly raise on Jan. 1 as a bonus for early settlement. General raises will be given at three different intervals over the life of the contract.

FIRST-CLASS mechanics under the pact will receive $2.25 more an hour, including the early settlement bonus, general pay increases and two 10-cent cost-of-living adjustments. This category makes up about 70 percent of the workforce.

The first general wage increase of 75 cents an hour will be made in July 1982. A 55-cent hourly increase will be paid in July 1983, and the final increment in July 1984. Current salaries of workers represented by the council range from $5.61 an hour for first-step, second-class workers to $8.97 for first-class workers.

The council also negotiated significant improvements in employee benefit plans. General Dynamics agreed to increase the amount a worker can have deducted from each paycheck under the firm's Shipyard Savings Investment Program from 4 to 7 percent in the first year, 8 percent in the second, and 10 percent in the final year. The company matches 50 percent of each worker's investment.

PENSION PLAN improvements include addition of a "magic 85" clause allowing a worker to retire with full benefits when his or her years of service and age total 85. Pension benefits were raised from $12 to $14 a month per year of service.

AFL-CIO unions represented by the council are the Plumbers & Pipe Fitters, Machinists, International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, Molders, Laborers, Carpenters, Boilermakers, and the Office & Professional Employees.

Medicaid Restoration Asked For Low-Income Mothers

A new bill that would restore Medicaid eligibility to low-income working mothers has been introduced in the House with a strong endorsement from the Health Security Action Council.

Its goal is to help working mothers who are being cut off from Aid to Families with Dependent Children benefits because of budget cutbacks and who as a result also face the loss of family Medicaid benefits.

REP. HENRY A. Waxman (D-Calif.) and other co-sponsors of the bill warned that loss of Medicaid benefits could tilt the balance and force many working mothers to give up their low-paying jobs and turn to welfare payments.

Auto Workers President Douglas A. Fraser, who heads the Health Security Action Council, said a strong effort will be made to get passage of the legislation in the second session of Congress. AFL-CIO President Lane Kirkland is secretary of the coalition group, that was formed in the campaign for national health insurance.

By cutting out health benefits as well as wage supplements, Fraser charged, Congress "is driving these people back into welfare" and discouraging others from taikng jobs that would make them self-supporting.

THE PROPOSED legislation would allow states to continue Medicaid coverage for low-income working mothers.

Waxman is chairman of the House Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Health, which has jurisdiction over Medicaid. Other key co-sponsors include Rep. Harold Ford (D-Tenn.), who is chairman of the Ways & Means Subcommittee on Public Assistance, which deals with AFDC legislation, and Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.), who heads the Ways & Means subcommittee dealing with legislative oversight.

At Annual Meeting

Screen Actors Press Inter-Union Solidarity

Hollywood, Calif.—The insecurities of their industry, coupled with economic conditions, make strong unions necessary for performers, Screen Actors Guild President Ed Asner told the union's annual membership meeting here.

The 800 SAG members at the meeting discussed ways to strengthen solidarity with other performing arts unions, including merger discussions with the Radio & Television Artists and a proposed merger with the Screen Extras Guild.

THE UNION will also review its traditional policy of neutrality in political action and consider playing a more active role in the election process.

Asner denied rumors that a strike by SAG and AFTRA members who make commercials is in the offing. He urged members to "pass the word along" to stop the "misinformation."

Negotiations have begun, he said, "to achieve what we feel is necessary for the welfare of our brothers and sisters in the commercial field—without disrupting our industry."

Asner, who plays the lead in the weekly television series "Lou Grant," was elected president of the 50,000-member union in November.

SAG'S 14-MEMBER national board of directors reported on actions it took in its three-day meeting preceding the convention, including approval of Kendall Orsatti as the new executive secretary.

Orsatti, who joined the SAG staff in 1961, had headed the union's Hollywood office and served as assistant national executive secretary. He succeeds Chester L. Migden who resigned in November.

The board voted to give Migden the union's first Ralph Morgan Award in recognition of his 30 years of service.

A PROPOSED dues and initiation fee increase, approved by the board, will be submitted to the membership in a referendum vote. The proposal, the first in six years, would retain the union's sliding scale dues structure while raising minimum dues by $25 to a total of $75 per year and dues for members earning more than $100,000 to $1,150 per year.

Orsatti said the increase is needed to meet a projected $1.6 million deficit in the 1982 budget caused by higher costs for current programs and the need to increase many services. He added that the "anti-labor climate" in the nation was also a factor driving up costs.

"Five arbitrations used to be a busy year," Orsatti said. "Now we have more than 100 arbitrations a year in Hollywood alone."

THE BOARD approved a memorandum of understanding covering merger with the Screen Extras. If approved by the SEG board, it will be sent to members of both unions for a referendum vote. A membership meeting to discuss the merger proposal has been scheduled for late January preceding the mailing of the ballots.

Both the SAG and AFTRA boards have already acted on the first stages of their merger plans, and SAG Merger Committee Chairman Philip Sterling told the membership that final proposals could be ready for a vote by the end of 1982.

The SAG board broke with the union's traditional non-political stance and approved a resolution denouncing attempts to destroy or weaken gains won by labor in such areas as wages and working conditions, safety and health, job training and placement, civil rights legislation and other social legislation.

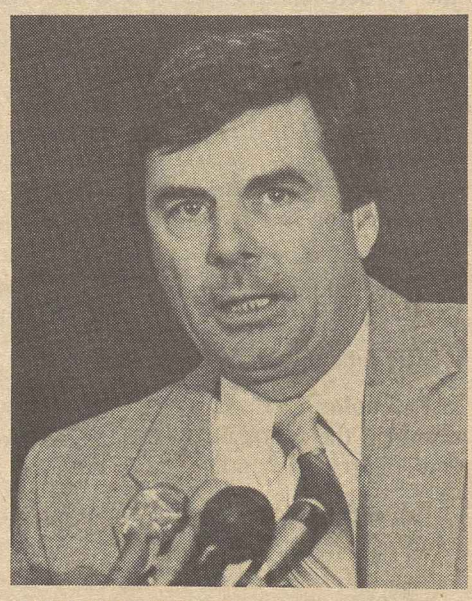
THE RESOLUTION called for SAG to "join with others in the labor movement to expand resistance to anti-union tactics and the gains of decades" and to "exercise its rights to affirm and defend itself and its members" by "vigilant participation" in lobbying and politics.

The union's legislative and government review committees will give the board recommendations by Mar. 15, 1982, on the nature of the union's involvement in the political process as it relates to both candidates and issues.

Federal, Postal Unions Fight Cuts in Job Injury Benefits

The AFL-CIO Public Employee Dept. urged Congress to keep faith with federal and postal workers by rejecting an Administration effort to cut back workers' compensation for job-related injuries and illness.

PED President Kenneth T. Blaylock told a House Subcommittee on Labor Standards that the Administration bill is motivated by budget-slashing, not the obligation of fair compensation for incapacitated workers.



IT WOULD eliminate the present provision for a 45-day period of pay continuation while a disability claim is being processed, lengthen the waiting period for benefits from three to seven days, reduce the existing cost-of-living formula for adjusting benefit payments, and shift disabled workers to lower-paying civil service retirement status at age 65. Other proposed changes would add to the problems of administering the law, Blaylock protested.

Blaylock, who is also president of the Government Employees, was joined by President Moe Biller of the Postal Workers and President Vincent R. Sombrotto of the Letter Carriers in criticizing the bill introduced by Rep. John N. Erlenborn (R-Ill.). The Erlenborn bill is based on Administration proposals made last March in President Reagan's budget message.

ADMINISTRATION of the program could and should be improved, Blaylock told the House panel. More effective safety programs would reduce job injuries, he suggested, and an improved rehabilitation program would make it possible for more disabled employees to return to work.

But the Administration budget axe, he charged, is aimed at destroying, not reforming the program.

In a related area, the Public Employee Dept. urged approval of bills before the subcommittee that would extend for federal police and fire fighter employees the $50,000 special death benefit awarded to families of local and state law enforcement and fire fighting personnel killed in the line of duty. Sec.-Treas. Robert D. Gordon of the International Union of Police Associations also testified on that issue.

NEW PRESIDENT of the State, County & Municipal Employees is Gerald W. McEntee, 46, from Pennsylvania. He was elected by AFSCME's executive board after the death of Jerry Wurf, who had headed the union for 17 years.

Meatpacking Pattern Tied To Security

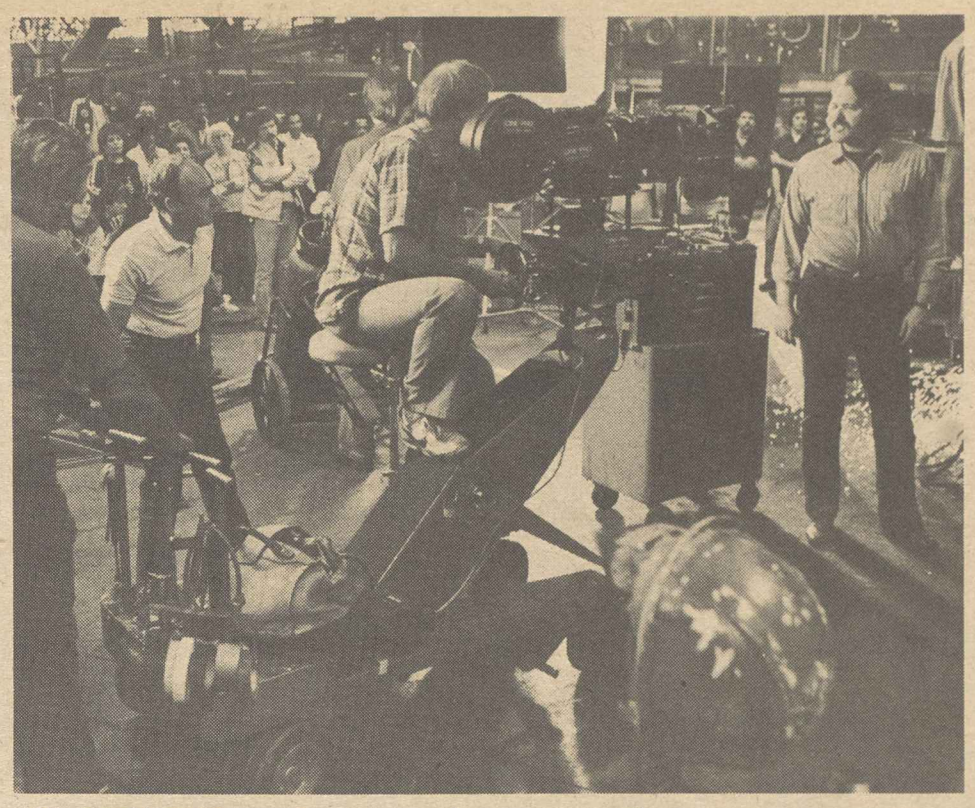
replacing ones that were to have expired next August.

Wynn and UFCW Vice President Lewie Anderson, who heads the union's packinghouse division, said in a statement that the meatpacking industry "as a whole is in sound financial condition," but that the major firms "were rapidly becoming vulnerable to severe competitive pressures from lower wage operators."



THE NEW PATTERN settlement "cannot correct, nor is it intended to correct, the developing monopoly trend in the meatpacking industry, the lack of capital investment, and mismanagement," Wynn and Anderson observed. But, they said, the settlement will put the major firms "more in line with competitors in the industry and afford the union time to deal with the threat from low-wage operators."

One of the union's main goals in the negotiations was to protect wage increases already won by members rather than allow a rollback. With the exception of one Armour plant, there will be no reduction in current wages or benefits under the new pact.

The new contracts retain the cost-of-living provisions under the old agreements but suspend payments for the duration of the agreements. The firms agreed to a lump-sum payment in December 1983 of COL increases that were due in January and July 1982 under the old pacts, however.

The new contracts also include these major changes:

- Employees will be paid $1 an hour less than the current base rate during their first 60 days of employment, and 50 cents less than the hourly base rate for the next 30 days. The base rate is $10.69 an hour. The lower starting rate is "on an experimental basis and only for the term of the new agreement."
- Effective September 1985, the basic pension benefit rate will be increased from $15 a month per year of service to $17.
- A provision allowing wage reopener talks in September 1984, with the right to strike.
- Additional coverage in basic health insurance.
- Management will provide the union with detailed reports of capital expenditures for each of its plants at the end of every year of the contract.

ON LOCATION in a busy plant, television crews film one of three spots produced by the Auto Workers for airing on local and network programs. UAW members are shown with the products they help make, including the NASA space shuttle, talking about their concern for product quality, job security and the economy. The TV spots are being aired in December and January.

Auto Workers' TV Campaign Focuses on Quality Security

Detroit — Three television spots produced by the Auto Workers will air on network and local stations in December and January.

The 30-second and 60-second messages featuring UAW members will stress the concerns of the union and its members for product quality, job security and a revitalized economy, the union said.

THE ADS BEGAN to air on local stations in mid-December and the first nationwide broadcast is scheduled for Jan. 11, 1982, during ABC's World News Tonight program. Local placements will be concentrated in regions with large UAW membership.

The advertising program is in response to a resolution adopted at the UAW's 1980 convention calling for increased efforts in organizing, education and communications.

Interest and dividend income from the union's strike fund is paying for production of the ads and air time.

UAW President Douglas Fraser said the advertising program will help improve the public image of workers "by taking our message to millions of viewers."

One of the new ads was filmed on a factory floor and features UAW members explaining the union's role in defense production during World War II and its continuing commitment to building quality peace-time vehicles.

Another, filmed at Edwards Air Force Base, Calif., describes the vital role of UAW members in building the space shuttle, again stressing the concern for quality.

The third spot, produced on a farm, features a UAW member explaining that Auto Workers built the tractors shown in the background—"the finest in the world."

EACH OF THE spots ends with the message, "The UAW wants to help make America work again."

Copy for the ads was developed from research by the UAW's Public Relations & Publications Dept. to determine public perceptions about unions and the concerns local union leaders and members wanted to stress to a nationwide audience.

Studies Center Schedule Set for January

Three one-week labor studies institutes and a one-day workshop on stress highlight activities at the George Meany Center, Silver Spring, Md., in January. The programs are open to full-time union officers and representatives.

In addition, five AFL-CIO affiliates will use facilities at the 47-acre campus for their own leadership development programs, as will the Committee on Political Education (COPE) and the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD).

Nearly 120 unionists working for Bachelor of Arts degrees in labor studies will come to the campus for their semi-annual week of classroom work. The program is run in collaboration with Antioch University, which awards the degrees.

Three additional labor studies programs sponsored by the center will be offered during the month at other locations.

The schedule:

Psychology For Union Leaders, Jan. 4-8—An institute covering the fundamentals of psychology, group dynamics, leadership skills and public speaking.

Educational Techniques, Jan. 10-15—A program on adult education co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Education focusing on discussion methods, role playing, using films effectively, preparing written materials, designing conferences and locating resources and teaching outlines.

Advanced Organizing Techniques, Jan. 17-29—A two-week workshop for experienced union organizers co-sponsored by the AFL-CIO Dept. of Organization & Field Services.

Stress Workshop, Jan. 28—A one-day program to study stress: how to diagnose its causes, how to handle stress at work, and protection for workers that can be negotiated.

The off-campus programs during January include Pension Investment, San Francisco, Jan. 6-8; Secretary-Treasurers' Conference, Williamsburg, Va., Jan. 10-13; and Arbitration: Preparation & Presentation, University of Oregon, Eugene, Jan. 17-22.

Affiliates using the campus for their own leadership training are: American Federation of Teachers, Jan. 4-8; Railway & Airline Clerks, Jan. 10-15; Communications Workers, Jan. 10-29 and Jan. 24-27; State, County & Municipal Employees, Jan. 24-29; Building & Construction Trades Dept., Jan. 31-Feb. 5.

COPE will open this election year with a staff conference Jan. 17-22. AIFLD will bring to the campus 40 Spanish-speaking trade union leaders from Latin America for six weeks of study on trade union techniques.

At the month's end, the campus will start a week's classroom work for trade unionists working for college degrees. Nearly 120 are enrolled in the program.

Information on these and other labor studies programs can be obtained from Fred K. Hoehler, Jr., executive director, George Meany Center for Labor Studies, 10000 New Hampshire Ave., Silver Spring, Md. 20903. Telephone 301/431-6400.

Fuel, Clothing Help Restrain Price Surge

Consumer prices rose another five-tenths of 1 percent in November, slightly higher than October's increase of four-tenths of 1 percent but less than half of September's 1.2 percent, the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported.

The higher retail prices lifted the government's consumer price index to a level that was 9.4 percent higher than a year earlier. Real spendable earnings, or take-home pay stripped of the impact of inflation, rose a slight three-tenths of 1 percent over the month but still were down 3 percent from November 1980.

LESS EXPENSIVE fuel and clothing, combined with small increases in food prices, held the CPI rise to a moderate rate. Clothing costs remained unchanged and transportation costs slowed to about three-quarters of the October rate, increasing nine-tenths of 1 percent.

The housing component of the CPI was up four-tenths of 1 percent. Homeownership costs rose one-tenth of 1 percent, as increases in home financing costs, property insurance, and property taxes offset a 1 percent decline in house prices.

Medical care kept its reputation as the most consistent inflation builder, going up another 1 percent for the month, about the same as in October. Medical costs have climbed by about 1 percent each month since August.

Food costs increased three-tenths of 1 percent, the same as in October. Grocery store food prices rose two-tenths of 1 percent as moderate increases in most food items offset declines in beef, pork, poultry, and dairy products.

Veteran Editor Ken Fiester Dies, An ILPA Pioneer

Lanham, Md.—Kenneth Fiester, veteran labor editor and union publicist, died Dec. 20 at Doctors' Hospital. He had been hospitalized since suffering a severe stroke in early December.

Fiester, who was 70, had been a founding vice president of the International Labor Press Association and served as secretary-treasurer from 1960 to 1969 when he was elected to a two-year term as president of the ILPA.

A NATIVE of Orange, N.J., Fiester went to work in a research laboratory in the early 1930s after earning a degree from Newark College of Engineering. In 1936, he joined the Newark Sunday. Call as a reporter and became active in the Newspaper Guild, serving as local president for six years.

In 1946 Fiester joined the staff of the Textile Workers Union of America as publications editor and public relations director.

He became publications director for the Auto Workers in 1957 and was the first editor of UAW's Solidarity which at the time was a weekly tabloid with seven regional editions.

He left the UAW in 1959 to join the staff of the AFL-CIO Dept. of Public Relations and ten years later went to the Industrial Union Dept. as public relations director and editor of a monthly newsletter.

HE LEFT the IUD the following year and had since been working as a free-lance writer and editor, producing a number of union publications, including the Insurance Worker, the United Shoe Worker, and the Metaletter of the Metal Trades Dept.

Survivors include his wife Marion, two sons, a daughter and five grandchildren. A memorial service was held Dec. 23 at the AFL-CIO headquarters.

The family suggested that expressions of sympathy be in the form of contributions to the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, 1125 15th St. N.W., Washington, D.C. 20005.

Few Labor 'Victories'

Dismal Record Posted By Congress Session

of discredited supply-side Reaganomics.

The tax measure hugely rewards the rich, shifts still more of the tax burden from corporations to taxes paid by workers, and starves the federal government of revenue for years into the future.

The reviews of the first session of Congress, which ended Dec. 17, were understandably mixed.

THE WHITE HOUSE reported the President "pleased" with the session. His string of legislative victories included winning Senate approval of the sale of militarily sophisticated AWACS planes to Saudi Arabia as well as budget issues.

The evaluation by Senate Republican Leader Howard H. Baker was cautious and ambiguous. "Men and women will disagree on the policies adopted," he noted, "but almost no one will dispute that this Congress has made more fundamental changes in the public policy of this nation than any Congress in decades."

Democratic congressional leaders didn't mince words. Senate Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd termed the first session record "dismal" and agreed with House Speaker Thomas P. O'Neill, Jr., that its actions helped the rich at the expense of both the poor and middle-income Americans.

THE REAGAN Administration stumbled badly only once during its first-session arm-twisting of Congress. That was when its proposals to reduce social security benefits and severely penalize those who retire at 62 stirred nationwide outrage. But while abandoning its more extreme proposals, the Administration did get Congress to end the modest $122-a-month minimum benefit for future retirees and to subject sick pay to the payroll tax.

Congress did refuse to go along with an Administration proposal that would have required persons receiving unemployment compensation to take minimum-wage jobs after 13 weeks of benefits. Cutbacks in education programs were not as severe as the Administration had sought. And the most directly anti-union attacks were turned back.

Even in the Republican-held Senate, an attempt to eliminate Davis-Bacon Act prevailing wage protection from military construction projects was beaten by a decisive 55-42 vote. Hearings found little support for a subminimum youth wage—although it still remains a threat whenever the minimum wage is next raised. And despite a massive campaign by the free-spending National Right to Work Committee, critics outnumbered supporters of a move to transform the Hobbs Act from a weapon against crime and racketeering to a threat against union members during lawful strikes.

On a strongly-felt issue not affecting the federal budget, the civil rights coalition won an impressive victory in the House with the passage of a bill that both extended and strengthened the Voting Rights Act. Even more remarkable was the co-sponsorship of the identical bill by a bipartisan group of 60 senators—despite the public misgivings that President Reagan expressed on a key section of the House bill.

A TIE VOTE in the Senate Labor & Human Services Committee blocked confirmation of labor-opposed John R. Van de Water, a management consultant in union-busting campaigns, as chairman of the National Labor Relations Board. But a second-session battle still is likely over Administration efforts to bypass the committee and get the appointment ratified.

At the start of the 97th Congress, the Democratic-controlled House of Representatives was seen as the check-and-balance to the Reagan White House and the Republican Senate.

But on the key budget showdowns of the first session, Republican ranks held virtually solid—after a few token concessions to northern Republican "gypsy moths." The Republican minority in the House prevailed with the votes of conservative Democratic "boll weevils" who broke ranks to support the President.

TOWARD THE end of the session, however, there were signs that the GOP unity was fraying as Republican moderates got a first-hand look at what the budget slashes they had supported were doing to their constituents. The President actually lost a budget round when Congress balked at the second round of cuts he had demanded and passed a continuing appropriations veto significantly less damaging.

Reagan's veto of that bill forced a compromise that saved face for the White House—and further damaged the economy. But the confrontation revealed a restiveness in Republican ranks that could signal some shifting coalitions in the second session.

MARCH OF DIMES poster child Richard Wagner is introduced to AFL-CIO Community Services Director Walter G. Davis by Charles L. Massey, right, president of the foundation. The meeting took place at a New York reception announcing the formation of a labor advisory council to the foundation. The five-year-old poster child will be the centerpiece of the promotion for the foundation's 1982 campaign to help combat birth defects.

Effective Voting Rights Bill Sponsored by 61 Senators

Sixty-one senators have joined in sponsoring a Voting Rights Act extension bill identical to the labor-supported measure the House passed last October and stronger than the version President Reagan has advocated.

Senators Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) and Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. (R-Md.) put together the bipartisan group of 40 Democrats and 21 Republicans, with a strong assist from the lobbying efforts of the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

THE GOAL OF the civil rights coalition was to get at least 60 sponsors—the number needed to cut off a filibuster and assure a vote on the measure.

The Voting Rights Act, dating from 1965, has often been termed the most effective single civil rights law. It was instrumental in extending the franchise to southern blacks who had been kept from voting by legal subterfuges, harassment and intimidation.

In 1975, the law was extended and broadened to include a requirement for bilingual election material in localities where there are substantial numbers of Spanish-speaking citizens or other language minorities.

WITHOUT congressional action, key portions of the law will expire in August, including the requirement that states and localities whose past voting patterns strongly indicated discrimination must have "pre-clearance" from the Justice Dept. before redrawing election districts or otherwise changing election laws.

The House-passed bill and the bipartisan Senate measure continue these requirements. But starting in 1984, the bill provides a so-called "bailout" procedure that would allow jurisdictions to escape the pre-clearance requirement. They would have to convince a three-judge federal panel in the District of Columbia that they had not discriminated for the past 10 years and had made "constructive efforts" to bring minorities into the election process.

THE BILL also would extend the bilingual requirements until 1992 and make an important clarification in language to offset a 1980 Supreme Court decision.

Civil rights groups have been concerned that the court ruling requiring evidence of "intent" to discriminate would make it greatly more difficult to nullify voting changes that in practice do discriminate against minorities.

To remedy this, the coalition-supported bill would specify that the law had been violated if it were shown that an action had been taken "in a manner which results" in voting discrimination.

At his Dec. 18 news conference, President Reagan reiterated the Administration's opposition to substituting a result test of discrimination for a requirement that "intent" to discriminate be proved. He said dropping the requirement to prove intent in charges of discrimination could lead to racial quotas.

AT A NEWS conference announcing introduction of the Senate bill, Kennedy said the impressive rise in voter registration following the passage of the Voting Rights Act is threatened in some states by "highly questionable" re-registration techniques. "Their ostensible purpose is to purge old records," Kennedy said, "but their timing and methods are clearly discriminatory."

Mathias said supporters of a strong bill will not try to bypass the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is expected to open hearings soon after the second session of Congress opens on Jan. 25. Despite the opposition of Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.), the legislation will be enacted because "our cause is right," Mathias predicted.

Social Security Tax to Edge Up in 1982

Both the social security tax rate and the maximum earnings subject to the tax will go up on Jan. 1.

Most workers will be affected only by the change in the tax rate, which will rise for both workers and their employers from 6.65 percent of covered earnings to 6.7 percent. A worker earning $20,000 a year will pay only $10 a year more as a result of the rise in the tax rate—a total of $1,340 instead of $1,330 under the 1981 rate.

Only persons who earn more than $29,700—which was the 1981 ceiling on wages subject to the social security payroll tax—will be affected by the rise in the taxable wage base to $32,400.

PERSONS EARNING $32,400 a year or more will pay a total of $2,170.80 in 1982—up from the $1,975.05 maximum this year. About 10 percent of employees are in this group. In return for paying more into the fund, they will become entitled to higher future retirement benefits and greater family protection in the event of disability or death.

These other changes also will take effect on Jan. 1:

- The maximum amount that beneficiaries may earn annually and still receive full social security payments will increase from $5,500 for those over 65 and under age 72, and from $4,080 to $4,440 for those under 65. Benefits are reduced $1 for every $2 of earnings exceeding these amounts. As at present, persons 72 and over may earn any amount without any reduction of benefits. The age at which earnings are unrestricted is scheduled to drop to 70 in 1983.
- The amount of earnings required for a quarter of coverage under the social security system will increase from $310 to $340.

Persons covered by the Railroad Retirement System will be affected by comparable increases in the payroll tax and wage base. As under social security, the tax rate will rise on Jan. 1 to 6.7 percent and the wage base will go up. However, the impact of the higher wage base may not be identical since the railroad retirement base is computed on monthly earnings, which fluctuate with overtime pay and other variables.

For 1982, the maximum pay subject to the retirement tax will rise from $2,475 to $2,700 a month.

IN ADDITION to matching the retirement tax paid by workers, employers under the Railroad Retirement Act are required to make a "second-tier" payment which during 1981 was 9.5 percent of up to $1,850 a month. The 1982 rate rises to 11.75 percent of $2,025 a month.

Railroad employers also pay a tax of 8 percent on the first $400 of earnings each month to finance the combined unemployment and sickness benefit program.

The next issue of the AFL-CIO News will be published on Jan. 9, 1982, because of holiday schedules.

The staff of the AFL-CIO News wishes all readers a Happy New Year.
